Fourthly, it is said that, in the present case, the notice was not 'left' at the property within the meaning of s 196(3). Assuming that, before the notice was actually posted through the letter box, Mrs Johnson had decided that she would pick it up and destroy it, and bearing in mind that she was the person whose notice it was, it is said that the notice was never really 'left' for Mr Johnson at the property. In my judgment, that argument is wrong as a matter of principle, and would be inconvenient to apply in practice.

So far as the principle is concerned, it seems to me that, by putting the notice in the post, Mrs Johnson effectively left it to the Post Office to serve the notice on her behalf. One therefore has to ask oneself whether the person who was, in effect, appointed by Mrs Johnson to serve the notice, acted in accordance with the test propounded by Russell LJ in Lord Newborough's case. In my judgment, by posting the envelope containing the notice, and addressed to Mr Johnson at the property, through the letter box of the property, the postman served the notice in accordance with that test. I do not think that it is right to test the matter by reference to what Mrs Johnson thought or intended, because, she left it to the Post Office to serve the notice. Accordingly, subject to any other arguments, once the notice was posted through the letter box, it had been 'served' in accordance with s 196(3), and therefore 'given' in accordance with s 36(2), and, as I have mentioned, such a notice cannot be 'un-served' or 'un-given'.

So far as convenience is concerned, I consider that, if s 196(3) is satisfied once it is shown that the relevant document was bona fide delivered to the last-known place of abode or business of the addressee, then, although it might lead to an unfair result in an exceptional case, the law is at least simple and clear. On the other hand, if the court starts implying exceptions into the clear and simple statutory procedure, confusion and uncertainty could result. Thus, if, by picking up the notice after it was posted through the front door of the property, Mrs Johnson might have prevented the notice being 'served', problems could arise. Would there be a maximum time within which Mrs Johnson would have to pick up the notice before it would be held to be validly served? Would it make any difference if Mr Johnson had seen the envelope containing the notice on the mat? What if Mrs Johnson had picked up the notice and had kept it but not destroyed it? What if she had picked up the notice intending to destroy it but had changed her mind? What if she had picked up the notice and tried to destroy it, but Mr Johnson had seen her doing it, or had seen and read the imperfectly burnt notice?

Hence, notice was served at the time that the letter was delivered. Once this had occurred, it was too late for Mrs Johnson to seek to change her mind.

Similarly, in the earlier case of Re 88 Berkeley Road,[25] severance was held to have occurred when written notice was sent by registered post and signed for on delivery by the sender without, it seems, ever being passed on to the other joint tenant.

2.3.2 An act of a joint tenant operating on his or her share

An act of a joint tenant severs the joint tenancy by destroying one or more of the unities of title, time, and interest.[26] This first head of severance, identified in Williams v Hensman,[27] runs into the immediate logical difficulty that joint tenants do not have 'shares': on what basis can a joint tenant 'act' upon a share that he or she does not have? Logical difficulties are sidestepped by treating the act itself as causing severance and so freeing up the share as the subject matter of the act in question.[28]

In Williams v Hensman, Page-Wood VC referred to an act of disposition. The disposition may be voluntary—for example, through the sale of a share—or involuntary—as where a joint tenant's bankruptcy causes his or her share to vest in their trustee in bankruptcy. Despite the terms of Page-Wood VC's judgment, an actual disposition appears unnecessary. Joint tenants have also been held to have acted on their share by, for example, entering a contract for sale,[29] or simply through acquiring a greater share than other joint tenants.[30]

The position is more complex if one joint tenant buys out the share of another. In such a case, the purchasing joint tenant is a tenant in common as regards the newly acquired share, but remains a joint tenant in relation to his or her original interest. Hence, just as the joint tenancy and tenancy in common can subsist side by side, the same beneficiary may be a joint tenant in relation to his or her initial interest and a tenant in common as regards a subsequently acquired interest (see Figure 11).

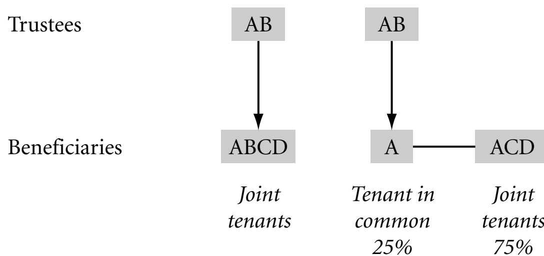

Figure 11 Severance by one joint tenant (B) selling his or her share to another joint tenant (A)

[25] [1971] 1 All ER 254.
[26] Prichard (1975, p 29) (referring specifically to destruction of unity of title).
[27] (1861) J&H 546, (1861) 70 ER 862.
[28] Crown, 'Severance of Joint Tenancy by Partial Alienation' (2001) 117 LQR 477, 478.
[29] Brown v Raindle (1796) 3 Ves 296, (1796) 30 ER 998.
[30] Megarry and Wade: The Law of Real Property (7th edn, eds Harpum et al, 2008), [13–041].

The ultimate limit on the scope of this head of severance is that there must be an act operating on the share. A unilateral declaration of intent to sever by a joint tenant is not effective. In the absence of an act operating on his or her share, the joint tenant must follow the requirements of s 36(2) of the LPA 1925 and serve written notice in order to affect severance. In Nielson-Jones v Fedden,[31] Walton J considered there to be 'no conceivable ground' for suggesting that a unilateral declaration can ever be effective to sever.

Voluntary acts

An outright transfer of a share by a joint tenant by sale or gift, whether to another joint tenant or a third party, is the clearest example of an act operating on a share. More contentious is the effect of a partial alienation, where the transferring joint tenant retains an interest and the transfer itself may have only temporal effect.[32]

The most significant practical example of partial alienation is a mortgage or charge of an equitable share. The beneficiary-mortgagor retains an interest in property and (subject to an action for default) the mortgage will eventually be discharged. Such mortgages may be unlikely to be granted expressly, because the security of a beneficial share may not be commercially attractive, but they arise, not infrequently, as the result of a failed attempt by a single joint tenant to mortgage the legal title through, for example, forgery or undue influence committed against the other co-owners.[33] Such a mortgage has no effect on the legal title, but operates as a mortgage of the joint tenant's beneficial interest: does such a mortgage affect a severance? The issue is of importance, because, if severance does not take place, the mortgagee 'joins the survivorship wheel of fortune', with his or her security interest over the property lost on the death of the mortgagor.[34]

In First National Security v Hegerty,[35] a husband forged his wife's signature on a legal charge to use the property as security for a loan. Bingham J considered this to constitute a disposition of the husband's beneficial share, which severed the beneficial joint tenancy and created a valid equitable charge over the husband's share. While this remains the current position, the matter was not argued in the case (it being unclear whether the parties were joint tenants or tenants in common) and academic doubt has since been cast on the issue.

Nield suggests that the distinction between a mortgage and a charge may be crucial in this context. A mortgage of an equitable interest necessarily takes effect as an assignment of the interest and therefore involves a disposition.[36] In contrast, she argues that the inherent nature of a charge means that an equitable charge should not affect severance.

Nield, 'To Sever or Not to Sever: The Effect of a Mortgage by One Joint Tenant'
[2001] Conv 462, 469–70

> However the historical and comparative evidence against severance by equitable charge is strong. At common law, although alienation was preferred over survivorship, survivorship

[31] [1975] Ch 222, 230. Previous judicial acceptance to the contrary is criticised by Baker (1968) 84 LQR 462. See further, Burgess v Rawnsley [1975] Ch 429, 448, where, in a summary of principles, Sir John Pennycuick noted: 'An uncommunicated declaration by one party to the other or indeed a mere verbal notice by one party to another clearly cannot operate as a severance.'

[32] Crown (2001) pp 479–80.

[33] Nield, 'To Sever or not to Sever: The Effect of a Mortgage by One Joint Tenant' [2001] Conv 462, 462–3.

[34] Ibid, p 463. The debt remains and will need to be met from the mortgagor's estate.

[35] [1965] 1 QB 850.

[36] Nield (2001), p 467.

was preferred over the creation of a mere encumbrance. It has long been asserted that easements and rentcharges do not effect a severance. They are encumbrances and as such are said not to be inconsistent with the nature of a joint tenancy, even though they may create a distinction between the interests of the joint tenants. For instance, it has been suggested that a rentcharge would not disturb the joint tenancy for it could be paid out of the joint tenant's portion of the income from the land, even though re-entry might follow if payments were not made. An easement granted by one joint tenant will only effect the interest held by that joint tenant and the right granted thus must be exercised in common with the rights of the other joint tenant.

Equitable charges are mere encumbrances that give no right to possession. The chargee may apply to court for an order for sale or the appointment of a receiver over the charged property. It is accepted that an equitable charge creates some sort of interest that is proprietary in nature but there is considerable hesitation in acknowledging this interest as an interest in the land itself. There are thus even weaker grounds for claiming that an equitable charge should effect a severance, because it destroys the unities, than in the case of a rentcharge or easement, which are clearly interests in land.

In contrast, Crown considers that the issue of severance should not be left to technical questions as to whether alienation occurs. He suggests the matter should be addressed by considering whether there are policy reasons for preferring one approach to the other.

Crown, 'Severance of a Joint Tenancy of Land by Partial Alienation'
(2001) 117 LQR 477, 483

One can easily imagine a situation where A and B are joint tenants in law and equity of land. A grants an equitable mortgage of his "share". If the approach of Re Sharer is adopted, this severs the joint tenancy in equity, but B may know nothing about it. Suppose A repays the loan with the result that the mortgage is discharged, and subsequently B dies. B's personal representatives will have no way of finding out about the creation of the mortgage and the result will be that A will succeed to the entire estate by virtue of the doctrine of survivorship. If A were to die first, however, a different result might well occur. A's personal representatives may well find documentary evidence of the creation of the mortgage while going through his papers. They will then be able to argue successfully that the joint tenancy was severed with the result that they will succeed to half the estate. Policy considerations therefore point strongly towards adopting the view that the grant of an equitable mortgage will not sever a joint tenancy.

Underlying Crown's concern is the risk of a mortgage of an equitable interest causing severance without the knowledge of other joint tenants. While the example he gives is not an attractive outcome, however, it is acknowledged as a unique feature of this head of severance that it enables a joint tenant to sever in secret, without the participation of, or giving of notice to, the other joint tenants.[37]

A novel approach to severance has been suggested in relation to a different example of partial alienation: the unilateral grant of a lease by one joint tenant. As with a mortgage, the joint tenant retains an interest in the land and the status quo is returned to at the end of the lease. As will be seen in Chapter 22, the essential characteristic of a lease is exclusive possession. The effect of a single joint tenant granting a lease is therefore to confer on the tenant of the lease exclusive possession against all persons other than those joint tenants who did not take part in the grant.[38] There is no clear authority determining whether the grant of a lease by one joint tenant constitutes an act of severance.[39] One possibility in such a case is that the joint tenancy is suspended for the duration of the lease, but is resurrected when the lease expires. The suspension of the joint tenancy ensures that if the grantor of the lease dies during its duration, survivorship does not operate, which ensures that the tenant's lease is unaffected by the death.

[37] Smith (2005), p 58.

The possibility of the joint tenancy being suspended is explored by Crown.

Crown, 'Severance of a Joint Tenancy of Land by Partial Alienation'
(2001) 117 LQR 477, 488

> The notion of a suspension of the joint tenancy has, however, been criticised on the ground that "once a severance, albeit temporary, has occurred, surely the unity of interest of the joint tenants is destroyed, and the co-owners cannot afterward be regarded as enjoying unity of title and time". This argument has a certain attraction, but one needs to bear in mind that the very idea of severance by alienation is based on a logical fallacy, as pointed out at the beginning of this article. Joint tenants do not have separate shares in the land. The alienor disposes of an interest that he does not actually have and this "transfer" creates the very interest, which was supposedly the subject-matter of the transfer in the first place. The truth of the matter is that modern lawyers accept the idea of severance by alienation not because it makes any logical sense, but simply because it is enshrined in the case law. The notion of suspension of a joint tenancy may not be so solidly rooted in the case law, but it is not a new idea and can be supported by reference to the earlier literature preceding Dixon J.'s remarks in Wright v. Gibbons. Moreover, it is by no means clear that the co-owners should not be regarded as enjoying unity of title, time and interest after the expiry of the lease. So far as unity of title is concerned, the co-owners still claim title to the land under the same act or document. So far as unity of time is concerned, the interest of each co-owner did indeed vest at the same time. So far as unity of interest is concerned, once the lease has come to an end, the interest of each joint tenant is the same in extent, nature and duration.
>
> Perhaps the strongest argument for the idea of suspension of the joint tenancy in leasehold cases arises out of practical considerations. It has been argued here that the existence of a simple method of severance under modern statute law means that there is no need to increase the number of cases of severance in equity. Indeed, it is undesirable to do so where there is a risk that this might make it possible for one co-owner to sever behind the back of his fellow co-owner. Such a risk may indeed exist in the case of leases.

Fox also supports the suspension of the joint tenancy.[40] If accepted, could the same solution be adopted to the more practically important case of a mortgage? Crown highlights that leases are different from mortgages, because a lease must come to an end, while a mortgage

[38] Crown (2001), p 484.

[39] Ibid, pp 485–90. He notes that while sixteenth-century cases indicate that the grant of a lease by one joint tenant of a leasehold estate affects a severance, there is no authority dealing with the grant of a lease by one joint tenant of a freehold estate. Courts in other jurisdictions have reached different conclusions on the matter.

[40] Fox, 'Unilateral Demise by a Joint Tenant: Does it Effect a Severance?' [2000] Conv 208.

carries the risk that the security will be enforced. He suggests that this may explain the different effect each has on severance. Nield, however considers the suspension of the joint tenancy (or some other means of modifying survivorship) to 'provide tantalising compromises to balance the interests of the mortgagee and joint tenants and deserve serious consideration'.[41]

A final example of partial alienation is a declaration by a joint tenant of a trust of his or her share. In this instance, severance seems likely to arise by analogy with the effect of a contract to sell the share outright. Such a contract gives rise to a constructive trust through the maxim 'equity looks on as done that which ought to be done'. If a constructive trust effects severance, it necessarily follows that an express trust must also do so.[42]

Involuntary acts

An involuntary act operating on a share is most likely to arise through the interception of a debt affecting one of the joint tenants. Bankruptcy has provided the focus of attention, although the grant of a charging order also operates to sever a joint tenancy as the debt becomes secured against the debtor's share.[43] While bankruptcy undoubtedly causes severance, debate continues as to the time at which severance occurs. This can be significant where the bankrupt (or another joint tenant) dies during the course of the bankruptcy. If death pre-dates the time of severance, then survivorship operates, taking the beneficial interest beyond the reach of the creditors.

There are three possible dates from which severance may take effect: the date of the act of bankruptcy; the date on which the joint tenant is declared bankrupt; and the date of appointment of the trustee in bankruptcy.

The date of the act of bankruptcy was favoured by the common law and was applied under the Bankruptcy Act 1914 in Re Dennis.[44] In that case, the bankrupt and his wife were joint tenants of their home. Between the date of the act of bankruptcy (by failing to comply with a bankruptcy notice) and the declaration of bankruptcy, the wife died. The court held that severance occurred at the date of the act of bankruptcy. This meant that, on her death, the wife was a tenant in common of a 50 per cent share, which passed to the couple's children. If the date of the declaration of bankruptcy had been chosen, survivorship would have operated on the wife's death, leaving the bankrupt as sole owner and the entire house therefore available to his creditors.

In Re Palmer,[45] which was decided under the Insolvency Act 1986, a different analysis was taken. Under s 306 of that Act, the bankrupt's estate vests in the trustee in bankruptcy immediately upon appointment; from the time of the declaration of bankruptcy, however, the Official Receiver holds the estate in trust. The court held that severance therefore occurs at the time of the declaration of bankruptcy. In that case, Mr Palmer was declared bankrupt after his death. In such a case, the declaration dates back to the day of death, so the bankrupt's estate on that day vests in the trustee in bankruptcy. The court held, however, that this did not include a joint tenancy that the bankrupt had at the start of the day, but which ceased to exist at the moment of his death through survivorship. Through survivorship, Mr Palmer's wife became solely entitled to the home, which was protected from the effect of the bankruptcy.

Both decisions produce results that are sympathetic to the bankrupt's family. The courts' choice as to the date of severance conflicts and, while factually distinct, there is no logical reason for treating the date of severance as different, according to whether bankruptcy occurs during the bankrupt's lifetime, or after his or her death. The analysis in Re Palmer should now be followed in all cases, because it applies the current legislation. If applied to the facts of Re Dennis, it would appear to reverse the decision in that case.

[41] Nield (2001), p 474. [42] Smith (2005), pp 59–60; Crown (2001), pp 490–2.
[43] See C Putnam & Sons v Taylor [2009] EWHC 317 (Ch), [20]. [44] [1996] Ch 80.
[45] [1994] Ch 316.

Subsequent to the decision in Re Palmer, the Insolvency Act 2000 inserted s 421A into the Insolvency Act 1986. The effect of that provision is that where a joint tenant is declared bankrupt after his or her death (so that survivorship operates in favour of the remaining joint tenants), the survivors may be required by the court, on an application by the trustee in bankruptcy, to compensate the bankrupt's estate by payment of a sum not exceeding the value lost through survivorship. Hence, while the operation of severance remains governed by Re Palmer, the financial consequences of the decision may be reversed by an application under s 421A.

2.3.3 Severance through mutual agreement

The scope of the second category of severance identified by Page-Wood VC in Williams v Hensman is difficult to pinpoint in the abstract: it is sandwiched between the stricter requirement of an 'act' and the more liberal third category of a course of dealings. Collectively, mutual agreement and a course of dealings differ from statutory severance and an act operating on a share, because they only enable severance by all of the joint tenants. They differ from the other common law methods of severance as regards the rationale for severance. As we have noted, an act operating on a share effects severance by the destruction of one or more of the unities of title, time, and interest.[46] In cases of mutual agreement and a course of dealings, the rationale for severance is the common intention of the parties. For example, in Davis v Smith[47] the Court of Appeal held severance to have taken place where correspondence between the joint tenants evidenced a common intention that a house should be sold and the proceeds divided equally. Destruction of a unity is the result of the severance, not the cause of it.[48]

The Court of Appeal applied severance by mutual agreement in the following case. Browne LJ's judgment demonstrates both the similarities and differences between this method and the other two recognized in Williams v Hensman.

Burgess v Rawnsley
[1975] Ch 429, CA

Facts: Mr Honick and Mrs Rawnsley were joint tenants of a house occupied by Mr Honick alone. The property had been purchased in the expectation that the parties would both live there, but while Mr Honick anticipated marriage, Mrs Rawnsley intended to live alone in the upstairs flat. The parties' mismatched expectations came to light after the purchase. Mrs Rawnsley did not move in, but reached an oral agreement to sell her share to Mr Honick for £750. She then changed her mind and sought a higher price. Matters stood this way at Mr Honick's death, whereupon the house was sold and Mrs Burgess, his administratrix, sought to establish that severance had occurred, leaving his estate entitled to 50 per cent of the proceeds of sale.

[46] See section 2.3.2 above.
[47] Unreported, judgment 23 November 2011 (CA).
[48] Prichard (1975), pp 29–30.

Browne LJ

At 443–4

Counsel for Mrs Rawnsley conceded, as is clearly right, that if there had been an enforceable agreement by Mrs Rawnsley to sell her share to Mr Honick, that would produce a severance of the joint tenancy; but he says that an oral agreement, unenforceable because of s 40 of the Law of Property Act 1925, is not enough. Section 40 merely makes a contract for the disposition of an interest in land unenforceable by action in the absence of writing. It does not make it void. But here Mrs Burgess is not seeking to enforce by action the agreement by Mrs Rawnsley to sell her share to Mr Honick. She relies on it as effecting the severance in equity of the joint tenancy. An agreement to sever can be inferred from a course of dealing (see Lefroy B in Wilson v Bell and Stirling J in Re Wilks) and there would in such a case ex hypothesi be no express agreement but only an inferred, tacit agreement, in respect of which there would seldom if ever be writing sufficient to satisfy s 40. It seems to me that the point is that the agreement establishes that the parties no longer intended the tenancy to operate as a joint tenancy and that automatically effects a severance. I think the reference in Megarry and Wade to specifically enforceable contracts only applies where the suggestion is that the joint tenancy has been severed by an alienation by one joint tenant to a third party, and does not apply to severance by agreement between joint tenants. I agree with counsel for Mrs Burgess that s 40 ought to have been pleaded, but I should be very reluctant to decide this case on a pleading point.

The result is that I would uphold the county court judge's judgment on his second ground, namely, that the joint tenancy was severed by an agreement between Mrs Rawnsley and Mr Honick that she would sell her share to him for £750. In my view her subsequent repudiation of that agreement makes no difference. I would dismiss the appeal on this ground.

Section 40 of the LPA 1925 has since between replaced by s 2(1) of the Law of Property (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1989 (LP(MP)A 1989), under which an oral contract for sale of land is void. This change does not, however, alter the decision in the case. Browne LJ's judgment demonstrates that there was no act operating on a share in the absence of a specifically enforceable contract; there was, instead, an informal agreement, drawn from the parties' course of dealing. It is emphasized, however, that severance was based on mutual agreement, not on the course of dealings itself. The Court of Appeal was unanimous that severance had occurred under this method, while, as will be seen, the judges were divided on the possible application of course of dealings as an alternative basis for severance. Browne LJ's judgment leaves that method of severance to apply where the course of dealings falls short of even an informal agreement.

In Hunter v Babbage,[49] although an informal agreement was found on the facts, the court suggested that such an agreement is not necessary for this method of severance. Drawing on comments in the judgment of Williams v Hensman, Deputy Judge John McDonnell QC considered that it would be sufficient if it could be inferred that the parties had mutually treated their interests as a tenancy in common.[50]

2.3.4 Severance through a course of dealings

Actions between parties falling short of establishing a mutual agreement will still sever if there is a sufficient course of dealings to intimate that the parties regarded themselves as tenants in common. The exact demarcation of this method with mutual agreement may be difficult to identify with certainty, particularly if, as has been suggested, mutual agreement can include cases falling short of an actual agreement. Practically, nothing may turn on any overlap between the categories. It is more important to note, as was emphasized by Pennycuick LJ in Burgess v Rawnsley,[51] that this method of severance is distinct from mutual agreement, not merely a subheading of that category.

[49] (1995) 69 P & CR 548. [50] Ibid, 554.

In that case, the judges were divided on whether a course of dealings provided an alternative means of severance on the facts.

Burgess v Rawnsley
[1975] Ch 429, CA

Lord Denning MR

At 440

Even if there was not any firm agreement but only a course of dealing, it clearly evinced an intention by both parties that the property should henceforth be held in common and not jointly.

Pennycuick LJ

At 447

I do not doubt myself that where one tenant negotiates with another for some rearrangement of interest, it may be possible to infer from the particular facts a common intention to sever even though the negotiations break down. Whether such an inference can be drawn must I think depend on the particular facts. In the present case the negotiations between Mr Honick and Mrs Rawnsley, if they can be properly described as negotiations at all, fall, it seems to me, far short of warranting an inference. One could not ascribe to joint tenants an intention to sever merely because one offers to buy out the other for £X and the other makes a counter-offer of £Y.

Browne LJ expressed no final opinion on the matter. The key issue appears to be when negotiations falling short of an agreement are sufficient to effect severance. Lord Denning MR appears to take a broad view of this issue, reflected both in his decision in Burgess v Rawnsley and in his discussion, in his judgment in that case, of Nielson-Jones v Fedden.[52] In that case, as has been seen,[53] a memorandum granting the husband discretion to sell the house was considered insufficient to sever under s 36(2) of the LPA 1925 on the basis that it dealt with use, rather than ownership of the proceeds of sale. At the time of the husband's death, a contract for sale had been entered and a deposit paid by the purchaser. It was argued, as an alternative to s 36(2), that the parties' discussions, as regards their financial arrangements and the distribution of part of the deposit, constituted severance. Walton J rejected this argument, on the basis that no agreement could be drawn from the parties' ongoing negotiations.

We have seen that Lord Denning MR considered the decision to be wrong in relation to s 36(2). He further suggested that severance had occurred through a course of dealings:[54] 'The husband and wife entered on a course of dealing sufficient to sever the joint tenancy. They entered into negotiations that the property should be sold. Each received £200 out of the deposit paid by the purchaser. That was sufficient.' To the extent that reliance is placed on negotiations, these should be accepted only where the agreement, if reached, would have been sufficient to sever within the category of mutual conduct. If the agreement would have been insufficient to affect severance, it necessarily follows that negotiations for the agreement cannot do so.[55]

[51] [1975] Ch 429, 447. [52] [1975] Ch 222. [53] See section 2.3.1 above.
[54] Burgess v Rawnsley [1975] Ch 429, 440.

2.3.5 Severance through unlawful killing

Public policy prevents a person responsible for the unlawful death of another from benefiting from their death. Such benefit could arise through the operation of survivorship where one joint tenant is responsible for the death of another. The public policy rule is achieved through forfeiture under the Forfeiture Act 1982, with the possibility of relief.

In Re K,[56] Vinelott J accepted the view of counsel that 'the forfeiture rule unless modified under the Act of 1982 applies in effect to sever the joint tenancy in the proceeds of sale and in the rents and profits until sale'. This implies that, where relief is awarded, the correct analysis is that severance does not occur, leaving survivorship to operate. Hence, it is the availability of relief that determines whether severance occurs.[57] In Re K, relief was awarded where a battered wife, who had unintentionally shot and killed her husband (her intention had been merely to threaten him), had been convicted of manslaughter.

The culpability of the defendant has since been confirmed as the principal factor in determining relief.[58]

2.3.6 Are the current severance rules satisfactory?

In 1985, in its Working Paper on Trusts of Land, the Law Commission considered two radical reforms of severance: firstly, limiting severance to the statutory method of written notice; secondly, enabling severance by will.[59] Reform of severance was not carried over into the subsequent final report on Trusts of Land, on the basis that the issue is also relevant to personal property; instead, the Law Commission indicated that the matter would form the basis of a separate, future report.[60] The Law Commission has, in fact, carried out no further work in this respect. Notwithstanding, its suggestions have continued to attract academic attention in discussions of possible reforms.[61]

The limitation of severance to written notice necessarily carries the consequence of the abolition of the Williams v Hensman methods of severance. We have seen that these methods of severance do cause difficulties in interpretation and application. The underlying question, therefore, is whether these difficulties are sufficient to support the extreme response of abolition—a question addressed by Tee, together with the other reform discussed by the Law Commission: the introduction of severance by will.

55 Hunter v Babbage (1995) 69 P & CR 548, 560.

56 [1985] Ch 85, 100.

57 The practical focus on the availability of relief is noted by Bridge, 'Assisting Suicide Rendered Financially Painless' [1998] CLJ 31, 32.

58 Dunbar v Plant [1998] Ch 412, in which relief was awarded to the survivor of a suicide pact who was clearly criminally complicit in the suicide of her fiancé, although had not been charged.

59 Law Commission Working Paper No 94, Trusts of Land (1985), [16.11]–[16.14].

60 Law Commission Report No 181, Transfer of Land: Trusts of Land (1989), [1.3].

61 Tee, 'Severance Revisited' [1995] Conv 105; Smith (2005), pp 79–82.

Tee, 'Severance Revisited' [1995] Conv 105, 110–13

The abolition of severance by acting upon one's share has a certain attraction in logic—there has always been an intellectual sleight of hand which allows the alienation both to transform and transfer the interest, but it would effectively prevent a joint tenant from dealing with his equitable interest in any way. Voluntary alienation, whether by sale or mortgage would be impossible, unless there had been a prior severance. Thus, for example, an innocent mortgagee would only obtain an unsecured debt if a determined rogue "mortgaged" his unsevered "share". Involuntary alienation, as, for example, in bankruptcy, would also be affected. At present, the vesting of the debtor's estate in the trustee in bankruptcy automatically severs the debtor's joint tenancy and vests the resultant tenancy in common in the trustee. An absolute requirement of written notice would complicate an already difficult area of the law and could result in unfairness to creditors where the bankrupt held property as a beneficial joint tenant.

The abolition of severance by mutual agreement or by mutual conduct would have fewer legal repercussions. It is arguable that severance on such grounds has been found so rarely by the courts over the last 50 years that the abolition of these methods would not in practice amount to a serious limitation, and would produce much needed certainty. When personal representatives feel obliged to go to court to discover the beneficial entitlement to a home after the death of an erstwhile joint tenant, land law is shown in a poor light; the stress of any litigation is self-evident, and the timing, shortly after a death, and the subject matter, a home, must only compound the unhappiness for the parties involved.

What is uncertain, however, is how often severance on one of these grounds has been recognised and accepted by practitioners without resort to court. The Working Paper suggests that "if either has behaved as though the joint tenancy does not exist and treated the property as his own, it seems right that the law should accept that [...]" If indeed people often act in this way, then the abolition of informal methods of severance could result in widespread unfairness. The advantage of permitting informal methods, in terms of fairness to lay people, has to be weighed against the disadvantage of the uncertainty engendered by the possibility of informal severance having taken place.

(c) The introduction of severance by will

This is a radical suggestion, which runs counter to the whole concept of joint tenancy with its right of survivorship. This right is its distinctive feature, and is why equity in general favours the less capricious tenancy in common. Thus the arguments in favour of introducing severance by will must be carefully examined. The Working Paper mentions that in a matrimonial breakdown a spouse may be anxious to sever but unwilling to serve a notice and thereby aggravate negotiations over, for example, access to the children. The argument has a certain force, but the period during which such considerations hold sway should be quite short. In any relationship breakdown negotiations over children and property may be delicate and fraught, but they still need to be pursued and any property arrangement would be incomplete without an explicit decision as to the beneficial ownership of the home.

A more persuasive argument is that severance by will would prevent undesired devolution of property. There must be many cases where a beneficial joint tenant leaves his property by will, fondly (and not unreasonably) imagining that thereby the "half share" in the house will go to his children, his new loved one or whomever. No doubt the testator was told about the right of survivorship and the methods of severance when he originally bought the house, but that could have been many years ago. Presumably, the deceased testator is never aware that his wishes have been frustrated. The cases do not come to court because the law is clear: one cannot bequeath a beneficial joint tenancy. Although the problem would not occur if a testator took proper legal advice before making a will, this frequently does not happen.

The counter argument is two-fold: first, it would be unfair to allow severance by will and second, difficult questions of construction would arise. The first argument is that a "rogue" beneficial joint tenant could secretly sever by will and then enjoy the possibility of the right of survivorship without any risk to his estate. If he survived his co-tenant, he would take all, and if he pre-deceased, his chosen beneficiaries would inherit his share. Thus he could both "have his cake and eat it". His co-tenant, meanwhile, would not know of his severance by will, and would assume that the right of survivorship was going to operate. By the time she discovered her mistake (after the rogue's death), it would be too late for her to rearrange her affairs. Or she might die first, never knowing that she had been duped. It is possible to riposte that she must have been content that the rogue should take the house or she, too, would have made a will to the contrary, or would previously have severed inter vivos. Also, although she might have relied financially upon acquiring the rogue's "share" after his death, such reliance would not have been secure anyway—up until the moment of death, the rogue could have served a notice of severance—and the family provision legislation should cure any dependancy problems. But still one's immediate reaction is that the law should not facilitate such apparently unscrupulous behaviour, or permit a joint tenant to break faith with his co-tenants with impunity. A sophisticated argument that the unfairness is more apparent than real is not the basis upon which to apply legislative reform, especially one which directly affects so many people.

The other difficulty with severance by will is a practical one—the construction of the will. The Working Paper states that severance by will should be specified and explicit: "Severance should not be implied by a gift, for example, of all the residue to a charity, but a gift of 'my halfshare of Blackacre' should be sufficiently explicit to sever". Those examples seem clear enough, but the gift of all the residue to the testator's children, or indeed of "all to mother", would be far more problematic. At present, it is sometimes uncertain whether inter vivos severance has taken place; the additional possibility of severance by will would no doubt result in still more uncertainty for the survivors and a succession of applications to the court. The question to be decided is whether the real problem of undesired property devolution is sufficiently serious to warrant a reform which will in turn produce problems both of principle and practice.

While both reforms discussed by the Law Commission are drawn from dissatisfaction with the operation of the current rules, they provide polarized responses that strengthen or weaken the role of survivorship. Abolition of the Williams v Hensman methods of severance would inevitably appear to increase the incidence of survivorship; in contrast, the introduction of severance by will would enable joint tenants to undermine the very essence of the joint tenancy as a gamble on survivorship. Because survivorship is the key difference between the two forms of co-ownership, perhaps the underlying issue is the desirability of the beneficial joint tenancy. The scope and purpose of any reform must logically reflect a policy decision as to the desirability of the joint tenancy. Without this, there is a danger of focusing on the symptoms, whilst ignoring the disease.

We return to this issue at the end of this section of the chapter, after first noting the methods through which co-ownership is brought to an end.

3 TERMINATION OF CO-OWNERSHIP

Co-ownership comes to an end once there is a sole legal and equitable owner. Where the same person is entitled in law and equity, this also marks the end of the trust. Where the legal and equitable owners are different (for example, if T is the sole legal owner and B the sole beneficial owner), a bare trust remains.

Termination of co-ownership in this way may arise through a variety of circumstances. In a joint tenancy, the longest surviving co-owner will become solely entitled through survivorship. A sole beneficiary who is of full age and capacity may insist that legal co-owners transfer legal title to him or her through the rule in Saunders v Vautier.[62] It should be noted, however, that where co-owned land is sold to a single purchaser, even assuming that the beneficial interests do not bind the purchaser under the priority rules discussed in Chapter 19, co-ownership is not terminated. While the purchaser solely owns the land, the co-owner's interests (whether as joint tenants or tenants in common) shift from the land into the proceeds of sale.

Co-ownership may also be brought to an end through the process of partition. Section 7 of TOLATA 1996 provides for partition by the trustees, though it may also be ordered by the court in the exercise of its powers under s 14[63] (the courts powers under that section are discussed below in section 5.5 of this chapter). Partition is a process through which the trustees may physically divide the land and transfer separate plots into the sole ownership of the beneficiaries. The beneficiaries thus cease to be co-owners, with unity of possession over the land, and become sole owners of their separate parcels of land.

Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996, s 7(1)–(5)

(1) The trustees of land may, where beneficiaries of full age are absolutely entitled in undivided shares to land subject to the trust, partition the land, or any part of it, and provide (by way of mortgage or otherwise) for the payment of any equality money.

(2) The trustees shall give effect to any such partition by conveying the partitioned land in severalty (whether or not subject to any legal mortgage created for raising equality money), either absolutely or in trust, in accordance with the rights of those beneficiaries.

(3) Before exercising their powers under subsection (2) the trustees shall obtain the consent of each of those beneficiaries.

(4) Where a share in the land is affected by an incumbrance, the trustees may either give effect to it or provide for its discharge from the property allotted to that share as they think fit.

(5) If a share in the land is absolutely vested in a minor, subsections (1) to (4) apply as if he were of full age, except that the trustees may act on his behalf and retain land or other property representing his share in trust for him.

It should be noted that partition is limited to circumstances in which the beneficiaries are tenants in common. This precludes the trustees from interfering with the consequences of survivorship while joint tenants remain. While it is also initially restricted to trusts in which the beneficiaries are of full age (subs (1)), subs (5) enables the trustees to partition even where there are minor beneficiaries—in which case, the minor's land is held on trust by the trustees.

[62] (1841) 4 Beav 115.
[63] Atkinson v Atkinson, unreported judgment 30 June 2010 (Leeds County Court).

4 IS THE BENEFICIAL JOINT TENANCY DESIRABLE?

The operation of survivorship is the key practical difference between the joint tenancy and the tenancy in common. As has been noted, the two reforms of the severance rules discussed by the Law Commission would strengthen or weaken the role of survivorship. It was suggested, therefore, that the reforms raise an underlying issue of the desirability of the beneficial joint tenancy. Difficulties and uncertainties in the application of severance rules would be removed at a stroke by confining equitable ownership to the tenancy in common. But because this would come at the expense of the loss of survivorship, is this a price worth paying?

The operation of survivorship is most obviously consistent with the likely intentions of parties embarking on what they anticipate will be a lifelong relationship. Smith notes that relationship breakdown, where survivorship ceases match the parties' intentions, now provides the factual context for the 'great majority' of severance cases[64]—but he also notes that the abolition of the joint tenancy will not resolve problems.

Smith, Plural Ownership (2005, pp 87–8)

We now need to investigate the broken down relationship in more details. This context is the major source of concern as far as the operation of the joint tenancy is concerned. How well would the law operate if there were no joint tenancy? Obviously, if the parties never wanted survivorship, then the tenancy in common works well. However, in most relationships the parties are likely to want the survivor to get the property. We have just seen that this can cause problems if one dies during the relationship without making a will. The tenancy in common demands that wills be made in order to that the parties' intentions are fulfilled. What happens if a will has been made and then the relationship breaks down? In theory, the answer is simple: a new will should be made. In practice, the obvious danger is that this will be overlooked (as with joint tenancies, unexpected deaths pose the greatest problems) so that on death the property passes to the estranged spouse or partner. This is exactly the same outcome as with an unsevered joint tenancy. The lawyer who sees the problem is as likely to sever a joint tenancy as to urge the making of a new will. In other words, the problems will be just as severe whether a joint tenancy or tenancy in common is employed. Any legal structure which provides for property to go a particular person is apt to malfunction if the relationship with that person has broken down. It is difficult to avoid the conclusion that positive steps must be taken to change the destination of the property and that those steps are in fact not taken in many cases. Indeed, one may argue that joint tenancy is much more likely to produce the correct result because of the court's ability to find a suitable agreement or course of dealing to achieve severance; implying terms into wills is far more difficult. [. . .]

The main advantages of joint tenancies lie in fulfilling the wishes of co-owners when one dies during the relationship. Both joint tenancy and tenancy in common can cause inappropriate results once the relationship breaks down. It seems likely that breakdown of relationships has become more common. This is reflected in the growth of divorce rates and is likely to be related to greater numbers living together outside marriage. These changes tend to reduce the advantages of the joint tenancy.

64 Smith (2005), p 85.

As this extract shows, the underlying problem is not with the joint tenancy itself, but with the failure of the parties to utilize legal devices to ensure that their intentions are met. While the joint tenancy remains apt to give effect to the parties' intentions where the relationship continues at the time of death, the tenancy in common places the onus on the parties, in all cases, to ensure that their intentions are reflected in an up-to-date will. The arguments for and against abolition of the beneficial joint tenancy appear finely balanced and dependent on many variables. Smith suggests that the case for abolition has not been made out,[65] but he acknowledges that evidence as to the true intentions of purchasers, the incidence of relationship breakdown, and the use of wills may all affect our perception of where the balance currently lies.[66]

5 TRUSTS AND CO-OWNERSHIP

Whenever land is co-owned, whether co-ownership arises in relation to the legal title, the beneficial interests, or both, the land is held on trust. As was noted in section 1, the imposition of a trust in all cases is a dominant feature of the regulation of co-ownership in English law. All co-ownership trusts now constitute 'trusts of land' and are governed by the TOLATA 1996—an Act that originated in Law Commission recommendations.[67] Of its time, and in terms of its effect on the conceptual scheme of land law, the Act was described as 'the most significant measure of property law reform since the legislation of 1925'.[68] Prior to the 1996 Act, co-ownership trusts were almost invariably classified as 'trusts for sale'—a form of trust regulated by the LPA 1925. To understand the significance of the TOLATA 1996, it is therefore necessary to consider how the trust of land differs from this previous form of regulation.

The Law Commission succinctly highlighted the key differences, both in substance and ethos in its report.

Law Commission Report No 181, Transfer of Land: Trusts of Land (1989, [3.1]–[3.5])

PART II

THE TRUST OF LAND

Concurrent interests

At present, most concurrent interests fall under a trust for sale, either expressly or by implication. The defining feature of the trust for sale, at least as it was originally designed, is that the trustees are under a duty to sell the trust land. Implicit in this is the notion that this land should be held primarily as an investment asset rather than as a 'use' asset.

65 Ibid, p 89.

66 Ibid.

67 Law Commission No 181 (1989). For general discussions of the Act, see Oakley, 'Towards a Law of Trusts for the Twenty-First Century' [1996] Conv 401; Hopkins, 'The Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996' [1996] Conv 411; Clements, 'The Changing Face of Trusts: The Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996' (1998) 61 MLR 56.

68 Harpum, 'The Law Commission and Land Law' in Land Law Themes and Perspectives (eds Bright and Dewar, 1998), p 169.

> This formulation may well have been suitable or convenient for the purposes which it was designed to serve. However, since the passing of the 1925 property legislation, social conditions have altered to such an extent that the invariable imposition of a duty to sell now seems wholly artificial. This is largely because the incidence of owner-occupation has, over the last sixty-three years, risen to such a level that most dwellings are now owner-occupied. Most of these are occupied by joint owners. One consequence of this is that the imposition of a duty to sell seems clearly inconsistent with the interests and intentions of the majority of those who acquire land as co-owners. In such cases the intention will rarely be that the land should be held pending a sale; it is much more probable that it will be retained primarily for occupation. In other words, the property will not be held simply as an investment asset, but rather as a 'use' asset.
>
> The courts have sought to neutralise this artificiality by developing the principle that, where the 'collateral purpose' of the trust is, for example, to provide a family of matrimonial home, and where that purpose still subsists, the court may, in the exercise of its discretion under section 30 of the Law of Property Act 1925, refuse to order a sale. In that a single trustee is no longer able to force a sale (as against occupiers' interests) the 'use' value of the property is given recognition. It is, however, somewhat illogical that the courts should be required to develop and maintain a doctrine which takes as its foundation the artificiality of the trust for sale.
>
> As a corollary of the duty to sell, and in accordance with the doctrine of conversion, any interest held under a trust for sale is an interest in the proceeds of the sale of the land. Consequently, the beneficiaries are deemed not to have an interest in the land as such. Once again, the courts have intervened to mitigate the artificiality of the position. This intervention has, however, resulted in an unsatisfactory division between those circumstances in which an interest under a trust for sale will be held to be an interest in land and certain others in which it will not, or might not.
>
> Our proposals in relation to concurrent interests are focused upon two features of the trust for sale. Our principal recommendations are, firstly, that all land which previously would have been held under an implied trust for sale should now be held under the new system by trustees with a power to retain and a power to sell, and, secondly, that the doctrine of conversion should cease to apply. Thus, the main purpose of the trust will no longer be the realisation of the capital value of the land. Although this purpose is often seen as a merely notional one, judicial interpretation has not been so consistent as to exclude the occasional reappearance of the 'old' approach. The new system will be more readily intelligible to non-lawyers than the trust for sale. The point here is not simply that it should be easier for practitioners to explain the law to their clients, but also that co-ownership should take a form which non-lawyers can make sense of for themselves.

Section 30 of the LPA 1925 concerning the powers of the court under a trust for sale, referred to in this extract, has been repealed by the TOLATA 1996, and replaced by ss 14 and 15 of that Act.

Hence, as a matter of policy, the trust of land represents a shift to a form of regulation that is more suited to the use of land as a home, reflecting modern trends of home ownership. This shift is marked, in particular, by the removal of the duty to sell—the defining characteristic of the trust for sale—together with the abolition, in this context,[69] of the doctrine of conversion (which is further discussed in section 5.3 below). Against this background, the key provisions of the 1996 Act can be considered.

[69] Ibid, p 173. He notes that the sidenote to the Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996, s 3, which reads 'Abolition of doctrine of conversion' has 'excited some attention amongst academic commentators'. In fact, the Act only purports to abolish the doctrine in the specific context of its application to trusts for sale.

5.1 SCOPE OF THE TRUST OF LAND

While we are considering trusts of land in the context of co-ownership trusts, it is important to note that the trust of land itself is broader in scope. One of the principal objectives of the Law Commission was to replace the prevailing tripartite scheme with a single form of regulation for all trusts of land.[70] Prior to the TOLATA 1996, in addition to the trust for sale governing (principally) co-ownership trusts, trusts under which the beneficiaries are entitled in succession (discussed in Chapter 20) were usually regulated by the Settled Land Act 1925.[71] Bare trusts, in which there is one adult beneficiary, fell outside both of these schemes of regulation.

The scope of the trust of land is defined in s 1 of the TOLATA 1996.

Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996, s 1

(1) In this Act—

(a) "trust of land" means (subject to subsection (3)) any trust of property which consists of or includes land; and

(b) "trustees of land" means trustees of a trust of land.

(2) The reference in subsection (1)(a) to a trust—

(a) is to any description of trust (whether express, implied, resulting or constructive), including a trust for sale and a bare trust, and

(b) includes a trust created, or arising, before the commencement of this Act.

(3) The reference to land in subsection (1)(a) does not include land which (despite section 2) is settled land or which is land to which the Universities and College Estates Act 1925 applies.

Through this section, all trusts that consist of or include land are brought within the scope of the 1996 Act, whether express or created, for example, through the doctrines of resulting and constructive trust considered in Chapters 11 and 16. The application of the Act was extended to trusts in existence at the date of its commencement (1 January 1997). All trusts for sale and bare trusts in existence at that date were turned into trusts of land. But by s 1(3), existing successive interest trusts governed by the Settled Land Act 1925 remain unaffected.

5.2 TRUSTEES' POWERS

The powers of trustees of land are set out in broad terms in s 6 of the TOLATA 1996.

70 Law Commission No 181 (1989), [8.1].

71 Settled Land Act 1925, s 1(7), precluded the application of that Act to trusts for sale, enabling successive interest trusts to be expressly created as trusts for sale.

Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996, s 6

(1) For the purpose of exercising their functions as trustees, the trustees of land have in relation to the land subject to the trust all the powers of an absolute owner.

[...]

(3) The trustees of land have power to acquire land under the power conferred by section 8 of the Trustee Act 2000.

[...]

(5) In exercising the powers conferred by this section trustees shall have regard to the rights of the beneficiaries.

(6) The powers conferred by this section shall not be exercised in contravention of, or of any order made in pursuance of, any other enactment or any rule of law or equity.

(7) The reference in subsection (6) to an order includes an order of any court or of the [Charity Commission]

(8) Where any enactment other than this section confers on trustees authority to act subject to any restriction, limitation or condition, trustees of land may not exercise the powers conferred by this section to do any act which they are prevented from doing under the other enactment by reason of the restriction, limitation or condition.

(9) The duty of care under section 1 of the Trustee Act 2000 applies to trustees of land when exercising the powers conferred by this section.

The Law Commission acknowledged that many trustees, particularly of a co-owned home, considered themselves to be 'owners'. Hence, s 6 represents an attempt to reflect this, while ensuring that general equitable duties imposed on trustees are respected.[72] The trustees have the same powers as an absolute owner, but these are conferred on them specifically in their capacity as trustees of the land, not as absolute owners entitled to enjoy the land (by occupation or receipt or profits) themselves.[73] Hence, the powers are to be exercised with regard to the rights of the beneficiaries[74] and in a manner consistent with any other enactment or rule of law or equity.

Section 8 of the TOLATA 1996 enables further limitations to be imposed on the trustees' powers where the trust is expressly created.[75] Under that section, the settlor of the trust may remove or restrict the trustees' powers, or make their exercise subject to obtaining consent.

Section 6 has the effect of removing the duty to sell imposed under a trust for sale: the powers of an owner include the power to sell or to retain the land.[76] While these are equally weighted, the Act is, in fact, biased against sale,[77] reflecting the recognition that land is commonly held on trust for use as a home, rather than as an investment. Section 8 conceivably enables the settlor of a trust to exclude the power of sale and, by so doing, make land

[72] Law Commission No 181 (1989), [10.4]. [73] Hopkins (1996), p 413.

[74] On the interpretation of s 6(5) see Ferris and Bramley, 'The Construction of Sub-section 6(5) of the Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996: When is a "Right" not a "Right"?' [2009] Conv 39.

[75] Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996, s 8, applies to trusts 'created by a disposition'. This may not, in fact, cover all express trusts. As Clements notes (1998, p 58), the need for a 'disposition' may exclude the situation in which a settlor declares him or herself to be holding on trust. The section would then be confined to express trusts created where the settlor transfers the land to trustees on trust. There is, however, no logical reason for drawing such a distinction.

[76] Law Commission No 181 (1989), [10.6]. [77] Hopkins (1996), p 414.

inalienable. In contrast, a settlor cannot compel trustees to sell. While a duty to sell can be expressly imposed, in any such trust, s 4 of the Act provides the trustees with a power to postpone the sale and indefinite protection against liability for so doing.[78]

The limitations on the trustees' powers—both general, within s 6, and any expressly imposed by the terms of the trust, through s 8—have a limited impact on purchasers of the land. In this respect, a clear distinction is drawn between the internal regulation of the trust and its effect on third parties. Trustees who act contrary to limitations on their powers may be held personally liable to the beneficiaries for breach of trust. As regards purchasers, s 16 provides specific protection in the context of unregistered land. Purchasers are not concerned with whether s 6(5) has been complied with, and are protected against a conveyance carried out in contravention of ss 6(6) and (8) or contrary to limitations on the trustees' powers imposed through s 8, unless they have actual notice of the contravention or limitation. Section 16 does not apply to registered land where, under the general operation of the Land Registration Act 2002 (LRA 2002), a purchaser would be affected only by a limitation on the trustees' powers entered as a restriction on the register.[79]

5.3 BENEFICIARIES' RIGHTS

The TOLATA 1996 confers two key rights on beneficiaries. Firstly, it confers a right to be consulted by the trustees, who are directed in s 11(1)(b) to give effect to the wishes of the majority (in terms of the parties' beneficial shares) 'so far as consistent with the general interest of the trust'. By s 11(1)(a), this right is enjoyed by all adult co-owners. It is of practical significance to a beneficiary who is not also a legal owner and who does not therefore play a direct role in the management of the trust: for example, where A holds the parties' home on trust for A and B, s 11(1)(a) requires A to consult B in the exercise of his or her powers as trustee. The right to be consulted may be excluded in express trusts.[80] It does not apply to all trusts that were in existence at the commencement of the 1996 Act.[81]

Secondly, the most important right conferred on beneficiaries is the right to occupy the land. Where co-owners hold their home on trust, it seems remarkable to have to question whether, as beneficiaries, they have a right to occupy—but the imposition of a trust for sale brought the beneficiaries' right to occupy into question. As the Law Commission noted in [3.4] of its report (extracted above), the doctrine of conversion had the effect that beneficiaries under a trust for sale had an interest in the proceeds of sale, not in the land. The application of the doctrine arose through a combination of the trustees' duty to sell and equity's maxim 'equity looks upon as done that which ought to be done'. Because the trustees ought to sell, equity treated the parties as though sale had already taken place. So if the beneficiaries had no interest in the land, on what basis could they claim a right to occupy?

78 Ibid.

79 Full discussion of the purchaser protection provisions is provided in Chapter 19, section 4.2.

80 As with the Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996, s 8, s 11(2)(a) applies where a trust is 'created by a disposition'. Whether this includes all express trusts is dependent on the same comment made in relation to the previous provision above fn 75.

81 Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996, s 11(2)(b) and (3), excludes the requirement of consultation from express trusts (with provision for the settlors of those trusts to opt in to the new arrangements) and will trusts created prior to the commencement of the Act. This ensures that settlors who relied on the previous law (where a duty to consult would not be imposed unless expressly provided) are respected.

In practice, the courts did not invariably apply the doctrine of conversion.[82] It was clear that trustees for sale, in the exercise of their powers of management, could allow the beneficiaries to occupy. Further, a right to occupy was acknowledged to exist in leading case law,[83] although the basis of the right was uncertain. In particular, it remained unresolved as to whether occupation was a right enjoyed by all beneficial co-owners, or only in circumstances in which the trust had been created for the purpose of his or her occupation.[84] The abolition of the doctrine of conversion, and the shift to a scheme of regulation focused on the use of trust land as a home, paved the way for the introduction of a statutory right to occupy. This is provided for in s 12 of the TOLATA 1996.

Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996, s 12

(1) A beneficiary who is beneficially entitled to an interest in possession in land subject to a trust of land is entitled by reason of his interest to occupy the land at any time if at that time—

- (a) the purposes of the trust include making the land available for his occupation (or for the occupation of beneficiaries of a class of which he is a member or of beneficiaries in general), or
- (b) the land is held by the trustees so as to be so available.

(2) Subsection (1) does not confer on a beneficiary a right to occupy land if it is either unavailable or unsuitable for occupation by him.

(3) This section is subject to section 13.

Hence, the existence of a right to occupy is dependent on the criteria in s 12(1) and (2) being fulfilled. As regards the interpretation of these criteria, the purpose of the trust may be derived from the declaration of an express trust, or be ascertained by the circumstances. The alternative criterion of availability enables the right to be claimed where the land is available for occupation, even if this is not within the purposes of the trust. For the trustees to make land available for occupation contrary to the express wishes of the settlor would, however, constitute a breach of trust and therefore would be outside the trustees' powers within s 6(6).[85] The additional requirement, in all cases, that the land is 'suitable' for occupation enables the subjective characteristics of the beneficiaries to be taken into account: for example, no right to occupy will arise if the land is a farm and the beneficiary is not a farmer.[86]

Where two or more beneficiaries are entitled to occupy, s 13 of the 1996 Act enables the trustees to exclude or restrict one or more of those entitled, but at least one qualifying beneficiary must be allowed to occupy. In exercising their powers, trustees may impose [82] For example, in Williams v Glyn's Bank v Boland [1981] AC 487, the House of Lords held that Mrs Boland's beneficial interest under a trust for sale was an 'interest in land' protected as an overriding interest through her occupation.

[83] The existence of the right was acknowledged by the House of Lords in Williams v Glyn's Bank v Boland [1981] AC 487 and City of London Building Society v Flegg [1988] AC 54.

[84] Ross Martyn, 'Co-owners and their Entitlement to Occupy their Land Before and After the Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996: Theoretical Doubts are Replaced by Practical Difficulties' [1997] Conv 254.

[85] Hopkins (1996, p 421); Pascoe, 'Right to Occupy Under a Trust of Land: Muddled Legislative Logic' [2006] Conv 54, 59.

[86] This has been a popular example in highlighting the interpretation of the right since first raised by Smith 'Trusts of Land Reform' [1989] Conv 12, 19. See further Pascoe (2006), p 62.

'reasonable conditions'[87] on the beneficiary or beneficiaries in occupation, including the payment of compensation to those excluded from occupation.[88] Prior to the enactment of the TOLATA, the only route to payment of an occupation rent was the general doctrine of equitable accounting. The statutory provision is 'forward looking' enabling the trustees to make provision at the point at which a right to occupy is excluded or restricted, while equitable accounting is generally 'backward looking' and enables the court to take into consideration costs incurred and benefits enjoyed by the parties when apportioning proceeds of sale.[89] The relationship between the statute and the general law was initially unclear, but it has now been established that s 13 operates to the exclusion of equitable accounting in respect of cases within its scope, leaving equitable accounting available for those outside the provision.[90] This is important because, as Bright explains, statutory compensation and equitable accounting differ in relation to the 'gateway' to liability and quantum.[91] Statutory compensation is available only where the trustees have excluded or restricted a right to occupy arising under s 13. Equitable accounting was initially confined to cases of exclusion or ouster of one joint tenant, but it has developed to apply, 'in any case where [an occupation rent] is necessary to do broad justice or equity between the parties'.[92] While the gateway to statutory compensation is, therefore, narrower than equitable compensation, the quantum of liability is potentially higher. The trustees are directed to have regard to a number of 'wider-non-property concerns',[93] including the intentions of the settlor(s), the purposes for which the land is held, and the circumstances and wishes of beneficiaries who have a right to occupy.[94] In contrast equitable accounting is generally confined to the rental value of the property. This difference in quantum is explained by Bright as a shift from 'property to welfare'.[95] However, she notes that this shift does not in fact appear to have impacted on the quantum of awards made by the court under the statutory scheme.[96] Rental value remains attractive to the court as it is 'a relatively objective value on which evidence can easily be supplied'.[97] An alternative and equally objective basis on which compensation may be quantified is the cost incurred by the excluded beneficiary in obtaining alternative accommodation.[98]

A novel question on the application of s 13 arose in the following case: does the section enable trustees to restrict each beneficiary to occupying part of the trust land?

87 Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996, s 13(3). 88 Ibid, s 13(6).

89 Bright 'Occupation Rents and the Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996: from Property to Welfare' [2009] Conv 378, pp 378–9.

90 In Stack v Dowden [2007] 2 AC 432 at [94] Baroness Hale noted that, '[t]hese statutory powers replaced the old doctrines of equitable accounting under which a beneficiary who remained in occupation might be required to pay an occupation rent to a beneficiary who was excluded from the property'. See further, Murphy v Gooch [2007] 3 FLR 934. The suggestion that s 13 was, therefore, an exclusive regime for the availability of compensation was rejected in French v Barcham [2009] 1 WLR 1124. There, Blackburne J explained 'But it is important to note that she [Baroness Hale] referred to both parties having a right of occupation. It was in that context that she was addressing her remarks. I do not understand her to have been suggesting that in cases where one of the parties has no statutory right of occupation, the statutory provisions have the effect that that party can no longer claim an occupation rent in any circumstances whatever' [2009] 1 WLR 1124, [19]. See Bright 'Occupation Rents and the Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996: from Property to Welfare' [2009] Conv 378, 386.

91 Bright, ibid. 92 Murphy v Gooch [2007] 2 FLR 934, [10], per Lightman J.

93 Bright 'Occupation Rents and the Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996: from Property to Welfare' [2009] Conv 378, 390.

94 TOLATA, s 13(4).

95 Bright 'Occupation Rents and the Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996: from Property to Welfare' [2009] Conv 378.

96 Ibid, 393–4. 97 Ibid, 394. 98 Stack v Dowden [2007] 2 AC 432, [157].

Rodway v Landy
[2001] Ch 703, CA

Facts: Drs Rodway and Landy held the premises of their surgery on trust for themselves in equal shares. In proceedings following the termination of their business partnership, Dr Landy suggested that each of the parties should be given exclusive occupation of part of the surgery.

Peter Gibson LJ

At 712–13

I accept that the limitation on the power to exclude or restrict is expressed as a limitation on the number of beneficiaries who may be excluded or restricted. Plainly it would make no sense if there was no beneficiary left entitled to occupy land subject to a trust of land as a result of the exercise of the power under section 13. That is the force of the words "(but not all)". But if an estate consisting of adjoining properties, Blackacre and Whiteacre, was held subject to a trust of land and A and B were entitled to occupy the estate, it would be very surprising if the trustees were not able under section 13 to exclude or restrict B's entitlement to occupy Blackacre and at the same time to exclude or restrict A's entitlement to occupy Whiteacre, thereby leaving A alone entitled to occupy Blackacre and B Whiteacre. So also I do not see why, in relation to a single building which lends itself to physical partition, the trustees could not exclude or restrict one beneficiary's entitlement to occupy one part and at the same time exclude or restrict the other beneficiary's entitlement to occupy the other part. Each part is land subject to a trust of land and the beneficiaries are entitled to occupy that part until the entitlement of a beneficiary is excluded or restricted by the exercise of the power under section 13. So construed section 13(1) seems to me to make good sense and to provide a useful power which trustees might well wish to exercise in appropriate circumstances so as to be even-handed between beneficiaries. In contrast, I can see no good reason why Parliament should want to confine the trustees to the all or nothing approach [. . .]

The Court ordered that the premises should be divided to provide each of the doctors with a self-contained surgery.[99]

In exercising their powers under s 13 of the TOLATA 1996, the trustees must act reasonably and with regard to the intentions of the settlor (in an express trust), the purposes for which land is held, and the circumstances and wishes of beneficiaries who have a right to occupy.[100] Occupying beneficiaries may be required to make monetary payments to those excluded.[101] In all cases, the trustees may also impose reasonable conditions on beneficiaries in occupation, including, for example, requiring them to meet any expenses arising in relation to the land.[102]

[99] The outcome in this case may be contrasted with partition of the land under the Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996, s 7. Partition would have involved the physical subdivision of the surgery into two separate properties, each with its own legal title, with the parties receiving legal title to their part of the property. The trust would therefore come to an end.

[100] Ibid, s 13(2) and (4).

[101] Ibid, s 13(6).

[102] Ibid, s 13(6).

Section 12 remains controversial, both as regards the interpretation of its terms and, more broadly, whether a statutory right of occupation was, in fact, necessary.[103] Pascoe considers the value of the introduction of this right, in its broader context.

Pascoe, 'Right to Occupy Under a Trust of Land: Muddled Legislative Logic'
[2006] Conv 54, 55–7

> The introduction of a statutory right may be viewed as mirroring social, cultural and economic developments in society, reflecting a contemporary concern with the maximisation of material welfare. The significance of the imperative of an increasingly secular and materialistic age is revealingly, if unconsciously, reflected in the very language of the post-war European Convention on Human Rights, which guarantees the entitlement of every natural or legal person to the "peaceful enjoyment of his possessions". The emphasis is thus on the "use" value of property rather than the "exchange" or capital value and the changing social consensus on the importance of residential utility and residential security has led to the materialisation of this statutory right. Property law is the basic legal expression of the nature of economic life in all its aspects and this development has to be understood in relation to the social context in which it gains its significance as a mode of regulating behaviour. [. . .]
>
> The right to occupy represents part of a shift in power from trustees to beneficiaries. With the abolition of conversion, this right emphasises that beneficiaries under trusts of land have rights in the land. Gray and Gray term this the democratisation of the trust. Where the doctrine of conversion prevailed under trusts for sale, consistency dictated that the trustees would remain the prime decision-makers, but with increasing judicial emphasis on the "use" value of property, the emancipation of beneficiaries inevitably followed as a logical consequence of this progression.

As Pascoe illustrates, in so far as the right to occupy shifts power from the trustees to the beneficiaries, it is logically consistent with the ethos of the trust of land as emphasizing the use value, rather than the investment value, of land. But Pascoe convincingly demonstrates the absence of doctrinal cohesiveness underlying the new right. This arises largely as a result of the preconditions of the right provided in s 12(1) and (2): that either the purposes of the trust include occupation, or the land is held by the trustees to be available for occupation, and, in all cases, that it is suitable for occupation.

Pascoe, 'Right to Occupy Under a Trust of Land: Muddled Legislative Logic'
[2006] Conv 54, 63

> Section 12 represents an amalgam and jumble of principles derived from the old law intermingled with explicitly new concepts of availability and suitability to constitute a qualified right, which may be the subject of great uncertainty and thus litigation due to the impreciseness of drafting of the section. The merits of such a hotchpotch of concepts challenges the sagacity and utility of instituting a new right which displays three conflicting characteristics: beneficiary autonomy, trustee authoritarianism and settlor interposition.

103 Barnsley, 'Co-owners' Rights to Occupy Trust Land' (1998) 57 CLJ 123. He argues that, in fact, a broader right to occupy was available under the previous law (as not subject to the conditions imposed by s 12) and that beneficiaries' may still seek to invoke non-statutory rights of occupation.

As was noted above, under the trust for sale, uncertainty remained as to whether a right to occupy was conferred on all beneficiaries, or only those for whom the purposes of the trust anticipated occupation.

The TOLATA 1996 continues to send conflicting messages. The right to occupy is conferred by s 12(1) on a beneficiary 'by reason of his interest', but this is immediately made conditional on an assessment of the purpose of the trust, or the availability of the land for occupation, and its suitability for occupation by the beneficiaries.

Ross Martyn explains the effect of this.

Ross Martyn, 'Co-owners and their Entitlement to Occupy their Land Before and After the Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996: Theoretical Doubts are Replaced by Practical Difficulties' [1997] Conv 254, 260

Inevitably trustees will form their own judgment as to whether or not land is unavailable or unsuitable for a particular beneficiary who requests occupation. In doing so, they will be carrying out much the same process as trustees carried out before the 1996 Act, when exercising their discretion whether or not to accede to the request of a beneficiary to go into occupation. They would have made their decision on the basis of whether they thought the land was or was not available and suitable for occupation by the beneficiary in question.

The crucial difference now is that paragraph (b) of section 12(1) and section 12(2) treat unavailability and unsuitability as objective criteria, depriving a beneficiary of an entitlement that he would otherwise have, and not as considerations for the exercise of a discretion.

The beneficiaries' position is made more certain by s 12, in so far as their right to occupy is now derived from statute. Practically, however, their position may be no more secure than under the trust for sale. They have a right to occupy subject to meeting criteria that will be assessed, in the first instance, by the trustees, with disputes resolved by the court under s 15 of the TOLATA 1996.

5.4 APPLICATIONS TO COURT

Section 14 of the TOLATA 1996 enables an application to be made to the court by a trustee or a person with an interest in the trust property 'relating to the exercise by the trustees of any of their functions'. Section 15 then provides guidance to the court of the factors for the court to take into account when making decisions.

Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996, s 15

(1) The matters to which the court is to have regard in determining an application for an order under section 14 include—

(a) the intentions of the person or persons (if any) who created the trust,

(b) the purposes for which the property subject to the trust is held,

(c) the welfare of any minor who occupies or might reasonably be expected to occupy any land subject to the trust as his home, and

(d) the interests of any secured creditor of any beneficiary.

(2) In the case of an application relating to the exercise in relation to any land of the powers conferred on the trustees by section 13 the matters to which the court is to have regard also include the circumstances and wishes of each of the beneficiaries who is (or apart from any previous exercise by the trustees of those powers would be) entitled to occupy the land under section 12.

(3) In the case of any other application, other than one relating to the exercise of the power mentioned in section 6(2), the matters to which the court is to have regard also include the circumstances and wishes of any beneficiaries of full age and entitled to an interest in possession in property subject to the trust or (in case of dispute) of the majority (according to the value of their combined interests).

(4) This section does not apply to an application if section 335A of the Insolvency Act 1986 (which is inserted by Schedule 3 and relates to applications by a trustee of a bankrupt) applies to it.

A wide range of matters may be referred to the court under s 14. It was on the basis of s 14, for example, that the court resolved the issue of the beneficiaries' occupation in Rodway v Landy. In particular, however, s 14 is the basis on which the courts will consider disputes as to whether the land should be sold. In Chapter 18, we consider applications for sale brought by third parties to the trust: in particular, creditors and trustees in bankruptcy of the beneficiaries. In this chapter, however, we are concerned with how disputed sales are determined when the parties to the trust refer the matter to the court themselves. This may arise, for example, where A and B are co-owners of their home, and, following a breakdown of the parties' relationship, A wishes to remain in the home (either alone or with children), while B wants the house to be sold.

In addition to their practical importance, such disputes may also raise directly the tension between the house as a home and as an investment. Ultimately, in the example outlined, the question that arises is in what circumstances A's desire to remain in the home takes precedence over B's wish to realize his or her capital investment. To answer this question, it is necessary first to consider the general principles and then to address specifically situations in which the welfare of minor children need to be taken into account through s 15(1)(c). We will then consider the extent to which s 15 represents a change in the law from the position under the trust for sale. This is a matter to which we return in Chapter 18, where we consider whether s 15 has changed the law from the position under the trust for sale if the application for sale is made by a third party, such as a creditor, rather than by one of the beneficiaries themselves.

5.4.1 General principles

In all applications, s 15 of the TOLATA 1996 directs the court to have regard to the intentions of the persons who created the trust (s 15(1)(a)), the purposes for which the property is held (s 15(1)(b)), and the interests of secured creditors (s 15(1)(d)).

Arden LJ considered the interpretation of the first two of these factors, and the difference between them, in the following case.

White v White
[2003] EWCA 924, CA

Facts: Mr and Mrs White were co-owners of their home. Following the breakdown of their relationship, Mr White remained in occupation of the home with the couple's young daughters. Mrs White sought an application for sale of the home. The welfare of the children fell to be considered under s 15(1)(c) and this aspect of the decision is considered below. In this extract, Arden LJ considers whether the provision of a home for the children constituted the intentions of the Whites within s 15(1)(a), or the purposes for which they held the home within s 15(1)(b). The home had been purchased before the children were born.

Arden LJ

At [22]–[24]

[Arden LJ cited s 15 and continued] [. . .] Where more than one person created the trust, the intention for the purposes of section 15(1)(a) must, as I see it, be the intention of all the persons who created the trust and be an intention which they had in common. This is because the subsection speaks of "the intentions of the person or persons [. . .] who created the trust". This may be contrasted with the reference in section 15(1)(c) to the welfare of "any minor". The use of the definite article and the word "person" or "persons" in subsection (1) (a) to my mind make it clear that the intention referred to in section 15(1)(a) must be the intention of the persons who created the trust if more than one in common.

The question then remains whether the intention could include intention subsequently come to, as Mr Routley submits. I do not myself consider that this is the correct construction. Parliament has used the word "intention" which speaks naturally to the intentions of persons prior to the creation of the trust. If that were not its meaning, then it is not clear whether the court should be looking at the parties' intention at the date of the hearing or at some other antecedent point in time and, if so, what date. If Parliament meant the present intention, it would have used some such word as "wishes" rather than the word "intention" which implies some statement or opinion as to the future. In all the circumstances, I consider that the appellant's submissions on the point of law on this point are not correct.

I turn now to what I have termed the third point of law, and it was put in this way. It is that the judge had failed to deal with a submission by the father that there was an additional purpose come to after the property was purchased and the parties had been living there. This was based primarily on paragraph 11 of the father's statement of 22nd February 2001, in which he stated that the trust was entered into to provide a home for the mother and himself but subsequently there arose an additional purpose, namely to provide a home for the children. I would accept that, for the purposes of section 15(1)(b), purposes could have been formulated informally, but they must be the purposes subject to which the property is held. The purpose established at the outset of the trust which, on the judge's finding, did not include the provision of a home for children, could only change if both parties agreed. There was no evidence from which the judge could find that the mother agreed to the additional purpose spoken to by the father. Nor was the assertion that there was such a purpose ever put to the mother. Notwithstanding Mr Routley's submission, I would not accept the argument that the judge's omission to deal with the additional purpose undermines his decision.

Hence, while the 'intentions' of the persons who created the trust are fixed and determined at the time of creation, the purposes can change by agreement of the parties. In Rodway v Landy, the Court of Appeal noted that the relevant purposes are those in existence at the time that the application is considered.[104] As we will see below, the interests of the children in White v White were still taken into account by the Court through the specific reference to the welfare of children in s 15(1)(c).

104 [2001] Ch 703, 711.

As regards the interests of secured creditors, it is important to note that these are relevant even in applications brought by the parties to the trust. In Anneveld v Robinson,[105] the practical impossibility of a large mortgage being paid by one of the parties, if allowed to remain in occupation, was a significant factor in the court's order of sale on the breakdown of their relationship.

Although the 'circumstances and wishes of the beneficiaries' are referred to in s 15(2) only in respect of the trustees' exercise of powers under s 13 (right to occupy) they may implicitly be relevant in the context of sale. This is because to be effective an order of sale requires vacant possession, which necessarily impacts on the beneficiaries' right to occupy.[106]

In addition to the factors mentioned in s 15, the court should have regard to any other relevant matter. The matters referred to in s 15 are non-exhaustive In White v White, for example, the Court had regard to Mrs White's circumstances and her wish to raise money to provide a home for herself. Arden LJ explained that there is no weighting of the factors within s 15:[107] the responsibility lies with judges to determine how much weight to afford to all relevant factors, including those not specifically referred to in s 15.

5.4.2 Disputed sales and child welfare

Section 15(1)(c) specifically directs the court to have regard to the welfare of minor children who are in occupation of the home, or may be expected to be so. This ensures that the needs of such children are taken into account even where, as in White v White, the provision of a home for them was not the intention of the parties and is not an agreed, current purpose of the trust. Section 15(1)(c) is significant in so far as it ensures that the welfare of children is considered. It is consistent with the underlying ethos of the TOLATA 1996 as providing a scheme of regulation for trusts that reflects the fact that much co-owned land is the parties' home.

As we have noted, however, the factors for the court to be take into account in determining applications are not weighted. Other factors may favour sale despite the occupation of children. In White v White, the Court of Appeal confirmed an order of sale by the judge at first instance. The Court noted that the judge had correctly taken into account both the interests of the children in remaining in their home and Mrs White's need to realize her only capital asset. In that case, the judge was also satisfied that, following the sale, cheaper suitable accommodation would be available.

5.4.3 Has s 15 changed the law?

Prior to the TOLATA 1996, under the trust for sale, disputes as to sale were considered by the court under s 30 of the LPA 1925. Against the background of the duty to sell, the starting point for the courts was that sale should be ordered unless the trustees unanimously agreed to exercise their power to postpone sale.[108] This was, however, significantly qualified by the courts' recognition that trusts for sale were often created for a purpose other than sale (often referred to as the 'secondary', or 'collateral', purpose of the trust, but, in fact, representing its primary purpose). As a general principle, sale would not be ordered for so long as a collateral [105] [2005] WL 3142400 (county court), judgment 12 August 2005.

[106] Miller Smith v Miller Smith [2010] 1 FLR 1402, [17].

[107] [2003] EWCA 924, [26].

[108] Re Mayo [1943] 1 Ch 302.

purpose could still be achieved.[109] Hence, the key issues for the courts in settling disputes was the identification of the purposes of the trust and an assessment of whether any of those purposes could still be achieved. Where children were present, a particularly contentious issue was whether the provision of a home for children formed part of the purposes of the trust or whether their interests were 'only incidentally to be taken into consideration [...] so far as they affect the matter between the two persons entitled to the beneficial interests'.[110] Both views could claim support from conflicting Court of Appeal judgments.[111] The balance of the authorities suggested that, where a house was occupied by one of the beneficiaries with minor children, sale would not be ordered unless alternative (cheaper) accommodation could then be provided.[112]

In its recommendations that led to s 15, the Law Commission considered the relationship between the new provision and the secondary purpose case law.

Law Commission Report No 181, Transfer of Land: Trusts of Land (1989, [12.9])

> As regards the exercise of these powers [i.e., the powers conferred by s 14 of the Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996], it is our view that the court's discretion should be developed along the same lines as the current 'primary purpose' doctrine. This approach was moulded to practical requirements, and we consider that it gets the balance more or less right. Nevertheless, we recommend that [s 15] should set out some guidelines for the exercise of the court's discretion, the aim being to consolidate and rationalise the current approach. The criteria which the courts have evolved for settling disputes over trusts for sale are ones which will continue to have validity in the context of the new system. One function of the guidelines will be to put these criteria on a statutory footing. [...]

In Mortgage Corporation v Shaire,[113] in an application for sale brought by a creditor, the court concluded that s 15 of the TOLATA 1996 had changed the law (the case is discussed in Chapter 18, section 3). It is certainly true to say that s 15 has changed the focus of judgments. The court is no longer constrained by a presumption of sale and a need artificially to treat every other purpose as secondary to sale. The purpose or purposes of the trust have become one of a number of factors to which the court is to have regard. Importantly, s 15 has also resolved the issue of the relevance of the welfare of children. It is more difficult to assess the extent to which these changes translate into different outcomes of cases as opposed to the reasoning for those outcomes. There remains relatively little case law concerning disputes between co-owners and as a result it is difficult to draw conclusions.[114] Following a review

109 Jones v Challenger [1960] 2 WLR 695.

110 Burke v Burke [1974] 1 WLR 1063, 1067, per Buckley LJ.

111 In Browne v Pritchard [1975] 1 WLR 1366, Williams v Williams [1976] 3 WLR 494, and Re Evers' Trust [1980] 1 WLR 1327, sale was refused where, following the breakdown of the parties' relationship, a home was occupied by one beneficiary and children. Burke v Burke [1974] 1 WLR 1063 stands alone as a case in which sale was ordered in such circumstances. This approach was also supported in Re Holliday [1981] Ch 405, although the case itself concerned an application by a trustee in bankruptcy, rather than by one of the parties to the trust.

112 Williams v Williams [1976] 3 WLR 494, 499.

113 [2001] Ch 743.

114 Hopkins 'Regulating Trusts of the Home: Private Law and Social Policy' (2009) 125 LQR 310, p.325; Dixon, 'To Sell or Not to Sell: That is the Question. The Irony of the Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996' (2011) 70 CLJ 579, 586.

of the case law, Dixon suggests that there are, however, 'indications of a general approach', which he summarizes in the following extract.[115]

Dixon, 'To Sell or Not to Sell: That is the Question. The Irony of the Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996' (2011) 70 CLJ 579, p 589

> An assessment of the relatively modest case law available suggests that the courts adopt a highly flexible, circumstance dependent approach to two-party disputes when acting under section 14 Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996. The court clearly looks at the factors listed in section 15 as an aid to the exercise of its discretion, but is not prevented from considering other matters. There is no evidence to suggest that the default position of sale as pertained under section 30 Law of Property Act 1925 now carries any force [. . .] The intention of the parties still carries sway, as does the majority interest holding, but neither appears decisive. [. . .] The parties stand level in law and it is the court's task to weigh the factors within section [15] and such additional factors as may be relevant.

5.5 REGULATION OF CO-OWNERSHIP OUTSIDE OF THE TRUSTS OF LAND AND APPOINTMENT OF TRUSTEES ACT 1996

This chapter has focused on the regulation of co-ownership as a matter of property law through the TOLATA 1996. The rights of co-owners may also fall to be regulated by other legislation: for example, within the regime of family law. Where this is the case, questions arise as to the resolution of overlaps between the jurisdictions. These have been addressed by the court in the context of rights to occupy and applications for sale.

In relation to occupation, in addition to the right conferred by s 13 of the TOLATA considered in section 5.3 of this chapter, we have seen in Chapter 16 that rights to occupy a home may be derived from the Family Law Act 1996 (FLA 1996). There is an overlap between the FLA 1996 and the TOLATA 1996 in two respects. First (as noted in Chapter 16), a spouse or civil partner who is a beneficiary, but does not own legal title, may be entitled to a right to occupy ('home rights') under the FLA 1996. Secondly, s 33 of the FLA 1996 enables the court to regulate occupation of a house that is, or has been, or was intended to be, the home of the applicant and 'another person with whom he is associated'. This expression covers a wide range of people, including existing (and former) married couples, civil partners and cohabitants, and others who have shared a home otherwise than through a commercial relationship.[116]

An application may be made to the court under s 33 by (amongst others) a person entitled to occupy as a beneficiary or through holding 'home rights' conferred by the FLA 1996.[117] Hence, a beneficiary who is entitled to occupy a home under the TOLATA 1996 may apply to the court for an order regulating occupation under the FLA 1996. An overlap in jurisdictions arises because occupation by beneficiaries is also subject to regulation by the court under ss 13 and 14 of the TOLATA 1996.

The range of orders that can be made by the court, and the factors that the court is directed to take into account, differ under each statute. The resolution of this overlap was considered in the following case.

[115] Ibid, p 586. [116] Family Law Act 1996, s 62(3). [117] Ibid, s 33(1).

Chan v Leung*, unreported
30 November 2001, HC

Facts: The case arose following the breakdown of a relationship between Miss Chan and Mr Leung, in the course of which, for a period of time, they had lived together in a house that was the subject of the action. Miss Chan had remained in the house and was pursuing university studies. The court held that Miss Chan had a beneficial interest in the house and then considered what order should be made in relation to occupation. The issue arose of whether this matter should be dealt with under TOLATA or the Family Law Act 1996.

HH Judge McGonigal

Where a court is addressing the question of occupation of a house subject to a trust or the alternative of sale, in my view the court should approach it primarily in the context of s 33 of the Family Law Act 1996. It is in this Act that Parliament addresses the question of occupation of the home in most detail. The court is required by s 33(6) to have regard to all the circumstances. These will include the fact that it is a trust property, so that ss 14 and 15 apply to it. Accordingly, the matters specifically referred to in s 15 of the Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996 and any other relevant consideration arising from the fact that it is a trust property, including the terms of the trust, should be taken into account by the court when considering the question of continued occupation or sale.

Hence, where the jurisdictions overlap, precedence is afforded to the FLA 1996—but the matters that the court would be required to refer to under the TOLATA 1996 are taken into account as part of the circumstances of the case. On the facts, the court issued an order enabling Miss Chan to continue to occupy, to the exclusion of Mr Leung, for the duration of her current studies, following which the house would be sold. The judge's order was affirmed on appeal, although without discussion by the Court of Appeal of the overlap between the jurisdictions.[118]

In Miller Smith v Miller Smith the Court of Appeal considered how an application for sale bought by a beneficiary under s 14 should be treated where divorce proceedings were pending. In addition to an application for sale under the TOLATA, the applicant had sought to obtain sale under s 17 of the Married Woman's Property Act 1882 and an order under s 33 of the Family Law Act 1996 prohibiting his wife from occupying the property.

Miller Smith v Miller Smith
[2010] 1 FLR 1402

Wilson LJ

At [18]

I am clear that, confronted with an application under TOLATA between separated spouses, the court should embark upon the discretionary exercise by asking itself whether the issue raised by the application can reasonably be left to be resolved within an application for > ancillary relief following divorce. It is in principle much more desirable that an issue, as here, about sale of the home should be resolved within an application for ancillary relief. For there the court will undertake a holistic examination of all aspects of the parties' finances, needs, contributions etc; will devise the fairest set of arrangements for the future housing and finances of each of them; and, to that end, will provide for the transfer of capital, as well perhaps as for payment of future income, from one to the other. By an order under TOLATA , on the other hand, the court lays down only one piece of the jigsaw, namely that the home be sold, without its being able to survey the whole picture by laying down the others. So at this threshold stage of the enquiry into an application under TOLATA between spouses the court will, in particular, have regard to the question whether, within a time-frame tolerable in all the circumstances, the parties will become able to apply for ancillary relief. Furthermore if, at first sight, there appears to the court to be any measurable chance that, on an application for ancillary relief made within that time-frame, the respondent to the application for an order for sale under TOLATA will be able to preserve her or his occupation of the home by securing an outright transfer of ownership of it or a variation of the trust, it is hard to conceive that an order for sale would reflect a proper exercise of discretion.

118 Chan v Leung [2003] 1 FLR 23.

On the facts, Wilson LJ was satisfied that the application should be dealt with under the TOLATA. Mrs Miller Smith contested the divorce and it was unlikely that an application for ancillary relief would be held within a year. In the meantime, Mr Miller Smith remained liable for a £7 million mortgage secured against the property, which appeared to be his only substantial asset. Further, there was 'no measureable chance' that the outcome of ancillary relief would enable Mrs Miller Smith to continue in occupation.[119] Wilson LJ explained that the same factors were also likely to be determinative of the application.[120]

In Chan v Leung,[121] we have seen that in determining a right of occupation under the Family Law Act 1996 the court considered that the factors referred to in TOLATA would be taken into account as part of the circumstances of the case. In Miller Smith v Miller Smith, without reference to that case, it was argued that in determining the application for sale, the court was required to consider whether an occupation order would be obtained against Mrs Miller Smith under the Family Law Act 1996. While this argument was rejected by the Court of Appeal, Wilson LJ noted that 'it would be surprising if an order that in effect a spouse should give vacant possession of a matrimonial home under TOLATA were to be made in circumstances in which the applicant could not have secured an occupation order'.[122] He appeared to consider that the breadth of discretion conferred by s 15 was sufficient to ensure adequate protection without a specific requirement for the judge to cross-refer to s 33 of the Family Law Act 1996.

Where different jurisdictions are involved, the outcome of the decision in one may also impact on the application of the TOLATA. This is illustrated by White v White.[123] In that case, as has been seen in section 5.4.1, the court ordered sale of a home on an application by Mrs White despite the fact that the house remained occupied by Mr White and the couple's young daughters. Mr White had applied under the Children Act 1989 for a transfer of Mrs White's beneficial interest during their daughters' minority. That application had been suspended pending the outcome of Mrs White's case under the TOLATA 1996.[124] The consequence of the order for sale was to resurrect Mr White's application. If successful, it would necessarily appear to override the order for sale, because Mrs White would no longer hold the beneficial interest that provided the linchpin of her claim.

119 [2010] 1 FLR 1402, [19]. 120 Ibid, [20]. 121 Unreported, 30 November 2001, HC.
122 Miller Smith v Miller Smith [2010] 1 FLR 1402, [23].
123 [2003] EWCA Civ 924, CA. 124 Ibid, [5].

QUESTIONS

1. What do you consider to be the main advantages and disadvantages of the joint tenancy and tenancy in common as forms of co-ownership? What factors would you take into account in advising co-owners whether to hold their home as beneficial joint tenants or tenants in common?
2. Assess the methods by which a joint tenancy may be severed: (i) unilaterally, by one joint tenant; and (ii) mutually, by all of the joint tenants. What changes, if any, do you consider desirable to simplify the current law?
3. How does the underlying ethos of the trust of land differ from that of the trust for sale? To what extent is this change in ethos reflected in the rights of the beneficiaries?
4. In what circumstances is the court likely to order sale of a home on an application by one co-owner?

FURTHER READING

Barnsley, 'Co-owners' Rights to Occupy Trust Land' (1998) 57 CLJ 123

Bright 'Occupation Rents and the Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996: from Property to Welfare' [2009] Conv 378

Clements, 'The Changing Face of Trusts: The Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996' (1998) 61 MLR 56

Cooke, Land Law (Oxford: OUP, 2006, ch 5)

Dixon, 'To Sell or Not to Sell: That is the Question. The Irony of the Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996' (2011) 70 CLJ 579.

Hopkins 'Regulating Trusts of the Home: Private Law and Social Policy' (2009) 125 LQR 310

Hopkins, 'The Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996' [1996] Conv 411

Law Commission Report No 181, Transfer of Land: Trusts of Land (1989)

Oakley, 'Towards a Law of Trusts for the Twenty-First Century' [1996] Conv 401

Smith, Plural Ownership (Oxford: OUP, 2005, chs 3–8)

18

CO-OWNERSHIP AND THIRD PARTIES: APPLICATIONS FOR SALE

CENTRAL ISSUES

1. Third parties may make an application for sale of co-owned land. The most likely third parties to do so are creditors and trustees in bankruptcy of one of the beneficiaries.
2. Since the Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996, applications made by creditors are considered under the general provisions of that Act, while those by trustees in bankruptcy are considered under the Insolvency Act 1986.
3. As regards applications by creditors, there has been judicial acknowledgment that the 1996 Act has changed the law from the previous practice, which was heavily weighted in favour of sale. The outcome of cases, however, casts doubt on the extent of any such change.
4. In relation to trustees in bankruptcy, under the Insolvency Act 1986, there is a presumption in favour of sale after an initial one-year adjustment period. Sale may be postponed if there are exceptional circumstances, although this criterion has been narrowly construed.
5. In determining applications for sale of a home the court must have regard to the rights of those affected by the sale under Art 8 ECHR. Where the application is by a creditor it must also be borne in mind that they have a right of property under Article 1 Protocol 1.
6. Where sale is discretionary, the courts have the opportunity to undertake a proportionality balance required to ensure compatibility of the sale with the ECHR. This leaves vulnerable to challenge applications by trustees in bankruptcy under s 335A of the Insolvency Act 1986 where the need to demonstrate exceptional circumstances is a precondition to the existence of discretion.

1 INTRODUCTION

In Chapter 17, we considered how the courts determine applications for the sale of co-owned land where the application is brought by one of the co-owners. It may be recalled that applications for sale (like all other applications relating to the exercise of their functions by trustees of land) are made to the court under s 14 of the Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996 (TOLATA 1996). Section 15 provides a non-exhaustive list of factors for the court to take into account. In this chapter, we consider applications for sale that are brought by third parties to the trust. Any person with 'an interest in property subject to a trust of land' may bring an application under s 14. Other than the co-owners themselves, the most likely persons to have an interest in the property are creditors and trustees in bankruptcy of one of the co-owners. As regards creditors, only those whose debt is secured over a beneficial share have 'an interest' in the property. A creditor may have had a security interest from the outset. Alternatively, the creditor may initially be unsecured, but obtain a charging order over the debtor's land. The effect of a charging order is to turn an unsecured debt into a secured one. Charging orders are discussed in Chapter 28, section 4, where we note that in the context of the recession their use has increased. The circumstances in which such creditors can force sale have become correspondingly more significant.

On an application for sale by a creditor or trustee in bankruptcy, the court must decide whether the beneficiary should be able to remain in the home, or whether the home should be sold to enable debts to be paid. The resulting case law raises interesting policy questions as to the relative weight that should be given to the desire to remain in the home and the purely financial interests of creditor. An appropriate balance between these interests is all the more difficult to determine given the factual context in which disputes typically arise. The beneficiary resisting sale and the applicant for sale may both be 'victims' of another co-owner's fraud or undue influence, or may be suffering the fallout caused by that co-owner's financial crisis.

As far as creditors with a security interest from the outset are concerned, it is possible for a beneficial tenant in common to grant an equitable charge (or mortgage) over his or her share, but such arrangements are not necessarily commercially attractive to lenders. As will be seen in the case law in this chapter, such interests are more likely to arise because a purported grant of a legal mortgage over the entire estate fails: for example, because one co-owner (A) has exerted undue influence over the other (B),[1] or has forged B's signature to procure a mortgage.[2] The result of the undue influence or forgery is that the charge takes effect only against A's beneficial share. Where a creditor succeeds in obtaining an application for sale, the proceeds of sale are divided proportionately between the beneficiaries in accordance with their respective beneficial shares. Only those proceeds representing the debtor's share are used to discharge the debt.[3] If the co-owners were joint tenants, then the creation of the equitable charge by one co-owner, or the grant of a charging order, constitutes an act operating on the joint tenant's share to sever the joint tenancy (as discussed in Chapter 17).

[1] For example, First National Bank plc v Achampong [2003] EWCA 487, in which a presumption of undue influence was drawn under the tests provided in Royal Bank of Scotland v Etridge (No 2) [2001] UKHL 44.

[2] For example, Mortgage Corporation v Shaire [2001] 4 All ER 364.

[3] An exceptional decision is Bank of Ireland Home Mortgages Ltd v Bell [2001] 2 FLR 908. In that case, an equitable charge arising as the result of Mr Bell's forgery of his wife's signature was, notwithstanding, held to have priority over both parties' beneficial shares. This meant that, on a sale of the home, the debt would be paid out of the full proceeds, not only the part representing Mr Bell's beneficial interest. The Court of Appeal doubted the decision of the first instance judge in this respect, but that aspect of his decision was not subject to appeal.

Where a co-owner becomes bankrupt, all of his or her property vests in the trustee in bankruptcy, who is under a statutory duty to realize the assets. As is the case with creditors, on a sale, only the proceeds of sale representing the bankrupt's share are used to discharge his or her debts. Where the beneficiary is a joint tenant, we have seen in Chapter 17 that bankruptcy also severs the joint tenancy as an (involuntary) act operating on the joint tenant's share.

The starting point in determining an application by a third party is s 15 of the TOLATA 1996.

Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996, s 15

(1) The matters to which the court is to have regard in determining an application for an order under section 14 include—

(a) the intentions of the person or persons (if any) who created the trust,

(b) the purposes for which the property subject to the trust is held,

(c) the welfare of any minor who occupies or might reasonably be expected to occupy any land subject to the trust as his home, and

(d) the interests of any secured creditor of any beneficiary.

[. . .]

(3) In the case of any other application, other than one relating to the exercise of the power mentioned in section 6(2), the matters to which the court is to have regard also include the circumstances and wishes of any beneficiaries of full age and entitled to an interest in possession in property subject to the trust or (in case of dispute) of the majority (according to the value of their combined interests).

(4) This section does not apply to an application if section 335A of the Insolvency Act 1986 (which is inserted by Schedule 3 and relates to applications by a trustee of a bankrupt) applies to it.

The effect of s 15 is that applications by creditors and trustees in bankruptcy are treated differently. The court deals with applications by creditors under s 15. By virtue of s 15(4), however, applications by a trustee in bankruptcy fall to be decided under s 335A of the Insolvency Act 1986. Therefore, each type of application must be considered separately.

To an extent, however, applications by creditors and trustees in bankruptcy raise the same policy considerations. It is useful to highlight these before analysing the case law concerning the different applicants for sale.

2 POLICY CONSIDERATIONS

In Chapter 17, we noted that the policy underlying the TOLATA 1996 was to provide a form of regulation for trusts of land more suited than the trust for sale to the use of a land as a home. We noted that where a dispute as to sale arises between the co-owners, this raises the tension between one party's wish to maintain his or her 'home' and the other's desire to realize his or her investment. The tension between the 'use' and 'investment' functions of a home are all the more apparent when the application for sale is brought by a creditor or trustee in bankruptcy of a co-owner, for whom the property has only ever represented a commercial investment.[4]

Fox highlights the opposing concerns of creditors, on the one hand, and of co-owners, on the other, and is critical of the law's track record in protecting the home.

Fox, Conceptualising Home: Theories, Laws and Policies (2007, pp 14–15, 23–5)

The concerns of the creditor

It is a truism that, in disputes between creditors and occupiers, the creditor almost invariably wins. Legislative and judicial policy makers have routinely favoured the interests of creditors over those of occupiers, thus demonstrating the greater weight attributed to the concerns of creditors over those of occupiers. It is not difficult to understand why this has been the case. For one thing, the creditor has a legitimate expectation, when he lends money against the security of real property, that the debt will be satisfied or the security honoured. Furthermore, there are a series of policy arguments to bolster the creditor's case, for example, the potentially adverse consequences of diminishing the legal protection of creditors; interests on the availability of credit secured against domestic property, either for acquisition of the property itself or as business capital. By contrast, the occupier's interest in the property which a creditor is seeking to realise as a home is not only inconvenient—operating as it could to subjugate the claims of creditors, whose economic clout weights heavily on the balancing scales—but also difficult to ascertain or represent, relative to the creditor's interest. While the creditor's concerns, which essentially revolve around their economic claim on the property as capital, are relatively straightforward, the occupier's interest in retaining the home for use and occupation is much more complex, and, with its many dimensions—financial, practical, emotional, psychological, social and so on—more difficult to quantify. [. . .]

The concerns of the occupier

While the creditor's concerns are relatively straightforward, the home interests of occupiers are much more complex and difficult to quantify. [. . .] By drawing upon understandings of the meaning of 'home' as they have developed in other disciplines, legal scholars can begin to appreciate that an occupier's desire to retain the property for use and occupation as a home is not merely sentimental but may also encompass multi-emotional, psychological, social and cultural matters. These meanings can operate to intensify the occupier's attachment to their home, and to exacerbate the experience of losing the home through actions at the hands of a creditor.

However, attempts to argue 'home' interests in law, particularly when positioned against financial interests, are beset by difficulties. Although interdisciplinary research has established the authenticity of home meanings, the relationship between an occupier and his or her home—inherently intangible and difficult to define—is not readily comprehensible to lawyers. For one thing, as home scholars in other disciplines have recognised, an occupier's interest in his or her home is:

> a relative concept, not an absolute one that can be defined in a dictionary or by a linguist. Given that it transcends quantitative, measurable dimensions and includes qualitative subjective ones, it is a complex, ambiguous concept that generates confusion.

[4] For further discussion see Hopkins, 'Regulating Trusts of the Home: Private Law and Social Policy' (2009) 125 LQR 310.

> It is often difficult to verbalise ideas about home, since they are highly personal, and this adds to the analytical obstacles. Perhaps even more significantly, particularly in the legal domain, the idea of personal attachment to one's home can be portrayed as sentimental and emotional, and as a consequence can become trivialised, particularly when measured against the objective and quantifiable claims of creditors to the capital value of the property. These characteristics provide a ready argument against attempts to develop a coherent legal concept of home. Nevertheless, even setting aside our instinctive appreciation of the importance of home, the proposition that home is a meaningful site and the authenticity of the attachment of occupiers to their homes have been firmly established in other disciplines. In light of this scholarship and the centrality of home to legal discourse, the idea that the subject of 'home' is too difficult for law to comprehend is indefensible.

While Fox refers to creditors, the concerns of the parties are the same whether the application for sale is brought by the creditors themselves or by a trustee in bankruptcy. As we will see, however, under the applicable statutory schemes, the ability of the court to take into account the concerns of the occupier is greater in a dispute with a creditor. Where a creditor has obtained a charging order over one co-owner's beneficial share, a further policy dimension is added to the claim: should the beneficiary resisting the sale (whose interest is not affected by the charging order) lose their home to enable the repayment of debts that were initially unsecured? While the initial status of the debt is a point acknowledged by the courts, in practice it does not appear to have had an impact on the courts decisions.[5]

3 APPLICATIONS BY CREDITORS

Applications for sale by a creditor are considered under s 15 of the TOLATA 1996. In applying that section, the responsibility lies with the judge to determine how much weight to afford to each of the factors listed in the provision and all other relevant matters.[6]

Prior to the 1996 Act, applications for sale by creditors and trustees in bankruptcy were considered by courts under s 30 of the Law of Property Act 1925 (LPA 1925). In applying that provision, it was held that no distinction should be made between the applications. It had been established, in Re Citro,[7] that, on an application by a trustee in bankruptcy, sale would be ordered unless the circumstances were exceptional (a criterion that is discussed at sections 4.1 and 4.2 below). In Lloyds Bank v Byrne,[8] the Court of Appeal considered that the same rule should apply in relation to creditors.

The 1996 Act distinguishes between these applications, because those by creditors are considered under s 15 of that Act, while applications for sale by trustees in bankruptcy are now dealt with under s 335A of the Insolvency Act 1986. Against this background, Neuberger J considered in the following case whether s 15 of the TOLATA 1996 had changed the law.

5 See Close Invoice Finance Ltd v Pile [2008] EWHC 1580; [2009] 1 FLR 873; Forrester Ketley & Co v Brent [2009] EWHC 2441 (Ch); C Putnam & Sons v Taylor [2009] EWHC 317 (Ch); National Westminster Bank plc v Rushmer [2010] EWHC 554 (Ch); [2010] 2 FLR 362.

6 White v White [2003] EWCA 924, [26]. See further the discussion in Chapter 17, section 5.4.1.

7 [1991] Ch 142.

8 [1993] 1 FLR 369.

Mortgage Corporation v Shaire
[2001] 4 All ER 364, HC

Facts: Mrs Shaire and Mr Fox were joint legal owners of their home. Unknown to Mrs Shaire, Mr Fox had forged her signature to secure mortgages over the house. As a result of the forgery, these took effect only against his beneficial share, which the court assessed as being 25 per cent. Following Mr Fox's death, the mortgagee sought sale of the house.

Neuberger J

At 378–80

To my mind, for a number of reasons, Mr Asif is correct in his submission, on behalf of Mrs Shaire, that s 15 has changed the law.

First, there is the rather trite point that if there was no intention to change the law, it is hard to see why Parliament has set out in s 15(2) and, indeed, on one view, s 15(3), the factors which have to be taken into account specifically, albeit not exclusively, when the court is asked to exercise its jurisdiction to order a sale.

Secondly, it is hard to reconcile the contention that Parliament intended to confirm the law as laid down in Byrne's case with the fact that, while the interest of a chargee is one of the four specified factors to be taken into account in s 15(1)(d), there is no suggestion that it is to be given any more importance than the interests of the children residing in the house (see s 15(1)(c)). As is clear from the passage I have quoted from the judgment of Nourse LJ in Re Citro as applied to a case such as this in light of Byrne's case, that would appear to represent a change in the law.

Thirdly, the very name 'trust for sale' and the law as it has been developed by the courts suggests that under the old law, in the absence of a strong reason to the contrary, the court should order sale. Nothing in the language of the new code as found in the 1996 Act supports that approach.

Fourthly, it is clear from the reasons in Byrne's case and indeed the later two first instance cases to which I have referred, that the law, as developed under s 30 of the Law of Property Act 1925, was that the court should adopt precisely the same approach in a case where one of the co-owners was bankrupt (Re Citro) and a case where one of the co-owners had charged his interest (Byrne's case). It is quite clear that Parliament now considers that a different approach is appropriate in the two cases-compare ss 15(2) and 15(3) of the 1996 Act with s 15(4) and the new s 335A of the Insolvency Act 1986.

Fifthly, an indication from the Court of Appeal that the 1996 Act was intended to change the law is to be found in (an albeit plainly obiter) sentence in the judgment of Peter Gibson LJ in Banker's Trust Co v Namdar [1997] CA Transcript 349. Having come to the conclusion that the wife's appeal against an order for sale had to be refused in light of the reasoning in Re Citro and Byrne's case, Peter Gibson LJ said:

> 'It is unfortunate for Mrs Namdar, that the very recent Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996 was not in force at the relevant time [i.e. at the time of the hearing at first instance] [. . .]'

Of course it would be dangerous to build too much on that observation, but it is an indication from the Court of Appeal and indeed from a former chairman of the Law Commission, as to the perceived effect of the 1996 Act.

Sixthly, the leading textbooks support the view that I have reached. In Megarry & Wade on the Law of Real Property p 510 (para 9–064) one finds this:

> 'Although the authorities on the law prior to 1997 will therefore continue to provide guidance, the outcome will not in all cases be the same as it would have been under the previous law. This is because the legislature was much more specific as to the matters which a court is required to take into account.'

Emmet on Title (19th edn, January 1999 release) para 22–035, contains this:

> 'Cases decided on pre-1997 law may be disregarded as of little, if any, assistance [. . .] because the starting point [. . .] was necessarily a trust for sale implied or expressed as a conveyancing device enabling the convenient co-ownership of the property [. . .]'

Seventhly, the Law Commission report which gave rise to the 1996 Act, Transfer of Land, Trusts of Land (Law Com No 181, 8 June 1989), tends to support this view as well. It is fair to say that the Law Commission did not propose a new section in a new Act such as s 15 of the 1996 Act, but a new s 30 of the Law of Property Act 1925. It is also fair to say that the terms of the proposed new s 30 were slightly different from those of s 15. However, in my judgment, the way in which the terms of the 1996 Act, and in particular s 15, have been drafted suggests that the Law Commission's proposals were very much in the mind of, and were substantially adopted by, the legislature. In para 12.9 of the report, the Law Commission describe the aim as being to 'consolidate and rationalise' (my emphasis) the current approach. When commenting on the proposed equivalents of what are now s 15(2) and (3), the Law Commission said (note 143):

> 'Clearly, the terms of these guidelines may influence the exercise of the discretion in some way. For example, it may be that the courts' approach to creditors' interests will be altered by the framing of the guideline as to the welfare of children. If the welfare of children is seen as a factor to be considered independently of the beneficiaries' holdings, the court may be less ready to order the sale of the home than they are at present.'

Finally, the Law Commission said (para 13.6):

> 'Within the new system, beneficiaries will be in a comparatively better position than beneficiaries of current trusts of land. For example, given that the terms governing applications under section 30 will be less restrictive than they are at present, beneficiaries will have greater scope to challenge the decisions of the trustees and generally influence the management of the trust land.'

Eighthly, to put it at its lowest, it does not seem to me unlikely that the legislature intended to relax the fetters on the way in which the court exercised its discretion in cases such as Re Citro and Byrne's case, and so as to tip the balance somewhat more in favour of families and against banks and other chargees. Although the law under s 30 was clear following Re Citro and Byrne's case, there were indications of judicial dissatisfaction with the state of the law at that time. Although Bingham LJ agreed with Nourse LJ in Re Citro, he expressed unhappiness with the result ([1990] 3 All ER 952 at 965, [1991] Ch 142 at 161), and Sir George Waller's dissatisfaction went so far as led him to dissent ([1990] 3 All ER 952 at 965–966, [1991] Ch 142 at 161–163). Furthermore, there is a decision of the Court of Appeal in Abbey National plc v Moss [1994] 2 FCR 587, which suggests a desire for a new approach.

All these factors, to my mind, when taken together point very strongly to the conclusion that s 15 has changed the law. As a result of s 15, the court has greater flexibility than heretofore, as to how it exercises its jurisdiction on an application for an order for sale on facts such as those in Re Citro and Byrne's case. There are certain factors which must be taken into account (see s 15(1) and, subject to the next point, s 15(3)). There may be other factors in a particular case which the court can, indeed should, take into account. Once the relevant factors to be taken into account have been identified, it is a matter for the court as to what weight to give to each factor in a particular case.

The only indication the other way is a decision of Judge Wroath in the Newport, Isle of Wight, County Court in TSB plc v Marshall [1998] 2 FLR 769 at 771–772, where he said this, having referred to Byrne's, Moss', and Hendricks' cases:

> 'Those three cases were all decided where the applications to the court were under s 30 of the Law of Property Act. However, it has been submitted that the principles established are applicable to an application under s 14, and I accept that submission.'

It does not appear clear to what extent the matter was argued before him, or, indeed, whether it was argued before him. With all due respect to Judge Wroath, I disagree with his conclusion.

A difficult question, having arrived at this conclusion, is the extent to which the old authorities are of assistance, and it is no surprise to find differing views expressed in the two textbooks from which I have quoted. On the one hand, to throw over all the wealth of learning and thought given by so many eminent judges to the problem which is raised on an application for sale of a house where competing interests exist seems somewhat arrogant and possibly rash. On the other hand, where one has concluded that the law has changed in a significant respect so that the court's discretion is significantly less fettered than it was, there are obvious dangers in relying on authorities which proceeded on the basis that the court's discretion was more fettered than it now is. I think it would be wrong to throw over all the earlier cases without paying them any regard. However, they have to be treated with caution, in light of the change in the law, and in many cases they are unlikely to be of great, let alone decisive, assistance.

Applying s 15 of the 1996 Act, Neuberger J noted that the intentions of Mrs Shaire and Mr Fox when the house was acquired (within s 15(1)(a)) were to provide a home for themselves and for Mrs Shaire's son from a previous relationship. The property was now held (within s 15(1)(b)) both as a home and an asset for Mrs Shaire, with 75 per cent of the beneficial interest, and as security for the loan as regards Mr Fox's 25 per cent share. The interest of the creditor fell to be considered under s 15(1)(d), while Mrs Fox's son was now an adult and therefore his position could not be taken into account. Under s 15(3), it was also relevant that Mrs Shaire had the majority of the beneficial interest.

Weighing up these factors, Neuberger J noted,[9] on the one hand, that for Mrs Shaire to leave her home of nearly twenty-five years 'would be a real and significant hardship, but not an enormous one'; on the other hand, for the mortgagee to be 'locked into a quarter of the equity of a property would be a significant disadvantage unless they had a proper return and a proper protection as far as insurance and repair is concerned'. He therefore proposed a solution under which the mortgage would be converted into a loan, on which Mrs Shaire would pay interest pending any future sale. Failing agreement on this (or Mrs Shaire's ability to pay), sale would be ordered.

The careful balancing act conducted by Neuberger J stands in contrast to how applications for sale by creditors were considered prior to the TOLATA 1996 under s 30 of the LPA 1925. There is no doubt that the facts of the case do not demonstrate 'exceptional circumstances' such as would have prevented sale under s 30.

[9] [2001] 4 All ER 364, 383.

Pascoe is critical of Neuberger J's decision. The Law Commission had envisaged that s 15 of the 1996 Act would consolidate and rationalize the approach developed by the courts under s 30 of the 1925 Act.[10] Against this background, Pascoe considers that Neuberger J's conclusion that s 15 has changed the law is likely to be read with 'some surprise and bewilderment'.[11] Her concern lies with the consequences of the decision for secured creditors and, in particular, whether these consequences have been fully considered.

Pascoe, 'Section 15 of the Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996: A Change in the Law' [2000] Conv 315, 327–8

> Neuberger J.'s approach is radical: it recognises more rights for beneficiaries and their children in relation to the land which is arguably a more accurate reflection of the ideals and purposes behind modern home ownership. In his view, section 15 has done more than to codify judicial practice which had been working in the restrictive framework of the 1925 legislation. The new trust of land will therefore better reflect and protect the different expectations which have arisen with the change in our perception of the social role of land. Neuberger J's approach is not one of consolidation and rationalisation; rather he is wiping the slate clean and starting afresh with secured creditors the likely casualties of the new approach. It will be a welcome change in the law for spouses, partners and children living in the property, but an inexpedient, prejudicial and financially detrimental development if one is a secured creditor. Secured creditors must be asking whether the guidelines in section 15 were enacted with proper consideration and deliberation. It must be questionable whether section 15 has abdicated too much responsibility to the judiciary. Perhaps policy should have been formulated by Parliament, rather than relying on ad hoc developments in case law. This will inevitably have commercial and financial repercussions as creditors absorb the effects of the change. Only time will tell if judges are prepared to implement the consequences of Neuberger J.'s judgment and let a fresh wind blow away the remnants of the harshness for families of section 30 of the Law of Property Act 1925 when faced with applications by secured creditors.

Has s 15 of the TOLATA 1996 changed the law? Neuberger J's arguments may appear persuasive, although Pascoe raises legitimate concerns. To the extent that Shaire indicates a more sympathetic approach to beneficiaries in actions by creditors, the decision may have been a false dawn. Despite Mrs Shaire's 75 per cent beneficial interest and long-term occupation of the house as her home, sale would only be prevented if the mortgagee's interest could satisfactorily be protected.

3.1 APPLICATIONS FOR SALE BY CREDITORS POST-SHAIRE

It is useful to consider the contrasting outcomes in the subsequent cases of First National Bank plc v Achampong[12] and Bank of Ireland Home Mortgages Ltd v Bell,[13] on the one hand, and Edwards v Lloyds TSB,[14] on the other. The following extracts from these decisions show how the courts have exercised their discretion under s 15 of the TOLATA 1996. Analysed [10] Law Commission Report No 181, Transfer of Land: Trusts of Land (1989), [12.9] (the paragraph is extracted in Chapter 17, section 5.4.3).

[11] Pascoe, 'Section 15 of the Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996: A Change in the Law' [2000] Conv 315, 316.

[12] [2003] EWCA 487.

[13] [2001] 2 FLR 809.

[14] [2004] EWHC 1745.

together with Shaire, the significance attached by the courts to the interest of the secured creditor in determining applications for sale becomes apparent.

First National Bank plc v Achampong
[2003] EWCA 487, CA

Facts: Mrs and Mrs Achampong were co-owners of their home. The parties had granted a mortgage over their home, but Mrs Achampong successfully argued that her agreement had been obtained through the presumed undue influence of her husband. As a result, the mortgage took effect only against his 50 per cent beneficial share. Mr Achampong had returned to Ghana, leaving Mrs Achampong in occupation of the home, with two of the parties' adult children (one of whom was mentally disabled) and three infant grandchildren. Blackburne J considered whether sale should be ordered under s 14 of the 1996 Act.

Blackburne J

At [65]

[. . .] I regard it as plain that an order for sale should be made. Prominent among the considerations which lead to that conclusion is that, unless an order for sale is made, the bank will be kept waiting indefinitely for any payment out of what is, for all practical purposes, its own share of the property. While it is relevant to consider the interests of the infant grandchildren in occupation of the property, it is difficult to attach much if any weight to their position in the absence of any evidence as to how their welfare may be adversely affected if an order for sale is now made. It is for the person who resists an order for sale in reliance on section 15(1)(c) to adduce the relevant evidence. Insofar as the Achampongs' intention in creating the trust of the property was to provide themselves with a matrimonial home, and insofar as that was the purpose for which the property was held on trust, that consideration is now spent. Given the many years' absence of contact between Mr and Mrs Achampong, the fact that there has not yet been a divorce cannot disguise the reality that theirs is a marriage which has effectively come to an end. The possibility, therefore, that the property may yet serve again as the matrimonial home can be ignored. Insofar as the purpose of the trust—and the intention of the Achampongs in creating it—was to provide a family home and insofar as that is a purpose which goes wider than simply the provision of a matrimonial home, I am unpersuaded that it is a consideration to which much if any weight should be attached. The children of the marriage have long since reached adulthood. One of them is no longer in occupation. It is true that the elder daughter, Rosemary, is a person under mental disability and remains in occupation but to what extent that fact is material to her continued occupation of the property and therefore to the exercise of any discretion under section 14 is not apparent.

Bank of Ireland Home Mortgages v Bell
[2001] 2 FLR 809, CA

Facts: Mr and Mrs Bell were co-owners of their home with, respectively, a 90 per cent and 10 per cent beneficial share. Mr Bell forged Mrs Bell's signature to obtain a mortgage. He had subsequently left the property and the parties had divorced. Mrs Bell, who was in poor health, remained in occupation, with the parties' son. At first instance, the judge had refused an order of sale. This was overturned on appeal.

Peter Gibson LJ

At [26]–[31]

Further, the judge does not mention the fact that the debt was at the time of the trial some £300,000, and increasing daily, no payment of either capital or interest having been received from Mr Bell (or Mrs Bell for that matter) since June 1992. Mrs Bell's beneficial interest is only about 10 per cent at the very most, as Mr De la Rosa conceded, and there is no equity in the property which would be realised for her on a sale of the property. In effect, therefore, the bank would take all the proceeds on a sale. That is a most material consideration to which the judge should have given great weight.

Second, the judge referred to the property being purchased as a family home. Let me accept that as a finding of fact, although Mr Jackson was able to point to other inconsistent evidence from Mrs Bell as to why the property was purchased. Let me assume that the judge thereby had regard to section 15(1)(a), the intentions of the persons creating the trust. But that purpose ceased to be operative once Mr Bell left the family, either in 1991 or at any rate by 1992 when possession proceedings started. Mrs Bell is now divorced from Mr Bell. Therefore that purpose is not a matter to which the judge could properly have regard.

Third, the judge referred to the occupation of the property by Mrs Bell and her son. Let me assume that thereby the judge was referring to section 15(1)(b), the purposes for which the property is held. But that is not an operative purpose of the trust since the departure of Mr Bell. The reference to the son may also be a reflection of section 15(1)(c), the welfare of a minor occupying the property. But the son at the time of the trial was not far short of 18 and therefore that should only have been a very slight consideration.

Fourth, the judge referred to Mrs Bell's poor health. At the time of the trial she was facing an operation. I accept that the judge could properly have regard to this, but it would provide a reason for postponing a sale rather than refusing sale.

Fifth, the judge referred to Lloyds Bank as second chargee. But in my judgment that was not a relevant consideration. There was no obligation to give notice to a subsequent encumbrancer. Nor has it ever been the practice of the court when giving effect to a mortgagee's request for an order for sale to hear the views of subsequent encumbrancers. In theory a subsequent encumbrancer might wish to redeem the prior encumbrance, but in practice there was no possibility of that in the circumstances of the present case given the size of the debt.

Prior to the 1996 Act the courts under section 30 of the Law of Property Act 1925 would order the sale of a matrimonial home at the request of the trustee in bankruptcy of a spouse or at the request of the creditor chargee of a spouse, considering that the creditors' interest should prevail over that of the other spouse and the spouse's family save in exceptional circumstances. The 1996 Act, by requiring the court to have regard to the particular matters specified in section 15, appears to me to have given scope for some change in the court's practice. Nevertheless, a powerful consideration is and ought to be whether the creditor is receiving proper recompense for being kept out of his money, repayment of which is overdue (see The Mortgage Corporation v Shaire, a decision of Neuberger J on 25th February 2000). In the present case it is plain that by refusing sale the judge has condemned the bank to go on waiting for its money with no prospect of recovery from Mr and Mrs Bell and with the debt increasing all the time, that debt already exceeding what could be realised on a sale. That seems to me to be very unfair to the bank.

Edwards v Lloyds TSB
[2004] EWHC 1745

Facts: Mr and Mrs Edwards were co-owners of their home. Following the parties' separation, Mrs Edwards remained in occupation of the home, with the couple's children (now aged 15 and 13). Mr Edwards had forged his wife's signature on a mortgage of the property, which therefore took effect only against his 50 per cent share. Mr Edwards could no longer be traced. The bank sought an application for sale. Park J held that sale should be postponed for five years, until the youngest child reached the age of 18.

Park J

At [31]–[33]

In this case the bank has applied for an order for sale, and Mrs Edwards has opposed the application. I must weigh up the various factors which are relevant and do the best I can to reach a balanced conclusion. I mention now two particular points on the facts of this case which were (I believe) not present in any of the three cases to which I was referred. First, if the house was sold now it is hard to see how Mrs Edwards could find the money to buy another smaller one. In the other cases it appears to have been different. For example in The Mortgage Corporation v Shaire (supra) Neuberger J said that if the house was sold Mrs Shaire would still have a substantial sum which she could put towards a smaller home. In the present case, in contrast, the house is a two-bedroom house in which Mrs Edwards already has to share a bedroom with her daughter. The house is obviously at the lower end of the range of prices for houses in the area where she lives. If there was a sale and the husband's debt to the bank was taken out of half of the net proceeds before the balance was available to Mrs Edwards, I very much doubt that she would be able to find another house which she could afford to buy and which would be adequate to accommodate her and her children.

Second, whereas in the other three cases it appears that the debt owed to the bank already exceeded the value of the interest over which the bank had an equitable charge, in the present case that is not so. On the figures which I gave in paragraph 12 above the value of the bank's security (a 50% interest in the house) would be (if the entirety were sold) about £70,000. The husband's debt to the bank (£15,000 plus interest plus costs) is unlikely at present to be more than £40,000. It is true that interest is not currently being paid to the bank on the debt owed to it, but interest continues to accrue on the debt, and now and for some time to come the security will be sufficient to cover the increasing amount of the debt.

In the circumstances I do not want to order an immediate sale, because I believe that that would be unacceptably severe in its consequences upon Mrs Edwards and her children. But equally I believe that I should make some order which, admittedly later rather than sooner, should enable the bank to recover its debt with accrued interest upon it.

Two points are notable about these decisions. The first point to note is the courts' differing approach to the purposes of the trusts. In Achampong, Blackburne J was not prepared to afford weight to any subsisting purposes of the trust of providing a 'family' home following the effective termination of the marriage by Mr Achampong's return to Ghana. Similarly, in Bell, the departure of Mr Bell was considered to have ended the purpose of the trust. In contrast, in Edwards, Park J was satisfied that, following Mr Edwards' departure, 'in part the purpose still survives, because the house is still the home for Mrs Edwards and the two children'.[15] These differing attitudes to the purpose are significant, because the continuing purpose of the trust is the factor that enables the occupying beneficiary to have his or her interests weighed against those of the creditors under s 15 of the 1996 Act. Where the purpose is considered to have come to an end, the likelihood of sale being postponed appears remote, unless there are children present whose interests fall for consideration under s 15(1)(c).

Probert considered the consequences of the narrow approach to the purpose of the trust in Achampong and Bell in a discussion of the latter case.

Probert, 'Creditors and Section 15 of the Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996: First Among Equals' [2002] Conv 61, 66–7

> The danger in the reasoning lies in the way that it downgrades the purpose of providing a family home as against the interests of the creditors. If the purpose of providing a family home comes to an end upon the departure of one of the parties and only the original purposes are to be taken into account, then where one party has left the property and there are no children, the only relevant factor remaining is the interests of the creditors. Even where there are children the dispute is reduced to a straightforward contest between the welfare of any minors who might wish to occupy the property and the interests of the creditors. If these two factors are given equal weight then it is possible that either may prevail in the short term. In the long term, the minors will grow up and their interests will cease to be a relevant concern. Moreover, if the interests of those nearing 18 are "only a very slight consideration" then the creditors' interests may prevail even before the former reach adulthood. If the statement that the creditors interests are a "powerful consideration" indicates that more weight is given to this factor than any other, then there is the risk that the interests of creditors will trump the rights of even very young children, once the factors listed in (a) and (b) are negated. If this interpretation of section 15 prevails then the wind has changed and blown us back to where we started.

Does the wider approach to the purpose of the trust adopted in Edwards ensure that the interests of the occupying beneficiary (in addition to the welfare of children) are weighed against those of the creditor? The difficulty with the decision lies in understanding when the wider approach to the purpose will be taken. Objectively, the only difference between the three cases as regards the courts' identification of the purpose is the continuing occupation, in Edwards, of the couple's young children. It seems likely that this affected the courts' attitude towards the purpose of the trust, despite the fact that the welfare of children should be taken into account independently through s 15(1)(c) of the TOLATA 1996. Even under Edwards it remains unlikely that the purpose of providing a family home will be considered to continue where one beneficiary remains in occupation without children. In such cases, as Probert notes, the only remaining factor under s 15 is the interests of the creditors. However, it is important to recall that the factors listed in s 15 are non-exhaustive. On appropriate facts a factor not specifically referred to in s 15 may justify postponing sale.

The second notable point about the decisions is the differing position of the creditors in each case, as highlighted by Park J in Edwards. In Shaire, as we have seen, the decision not to order sale was dependent on an arrangement being reached under which the creditor would not be prejudiced; in Edwards, it was clear that this criterion was also met. In contrast, in Achampong, the debt had reached a level of £180,000. It was enforceable against only a 50 per cent share of the home, which, at the time of the judgment, had a full value of only £195,000; similarly, in Bell, as we have noted, the debt already exceeded the value of the house. The cases illustrate a consistent approach by the courts that while the interests of creditors is only one factor for the court to take into account, it will be difficult to resist sale unless the creditor will not be prejudiced. Hence, in C Putnam & Sons v Taylor, the judge ordering sale noted that if he refused to do so, 'I would be condemning the [creditor] to go on waiting for its money with no prospect of recovery from any other source and with the debt increasing all the time'.[16]

[15] Edwards v Lloyds TSB [2004] EWHC 1745, [29].

3.2 APPLICATIONS BY CREDITORS: THE HUMAN RIGHTS DIMENSION

An application by a creditor for sale of a home under s 14 engages Art 8 of the ECHR (the right to respect for private and family life) in respect of those who will be affected by the sale. 'Home' has an autonomous meaning within Art 8 and all those with 'sufficient and continuing' links to the home must be taken into account, not only those with property rights.[17] Hence, for example, any children in occupation have a right under Art 8 as well as the debtor's co-owner. Against this, however, must be balanced the secured creditor's right of property under Art 1 Protocol 1 of the ECHR, which may be infringed by refusing to enable the creditor to realize their interest. We have examined these human rights in Chapter 3. There we have seen that these rights are not absolute, although any interference must be for a legitimate aim and must be proportionate to that aim. In National Westminster Bank plc v Rushmer, Arnold J noted that as a result of the discretion conferred on the court by s 15 the proportionality of the application with Art 8 can undoubtedly be considered. In his view, the balance would necessarily be drawn by taking into account the factors referred to the court under s 15. He explained, '[I]n my judgment, it will ordinarily be sufficient [. . .] for the court to give due consideration to the factors specified in section 15 of TOLATA. That will ordinarily enable the court to balance the creditor's rights, which include its rights under Article 1 of the First Protocol, with the Article 8 rights of those affected by an order for sale. I would not rule out the possibility that there may be circumstances in which it is necessary for the court explicitly to consider whether an order for sale is a proportionate interference with the Article 8 rights of those affected, but I do not consider that this will always be necessary'.[18] There, a creditor had obtained a charging order against Mr Rushmer and had subsequently successfully applied for sale of a home that he jointly owned with his wife. Arnold J rejected a claim that the order should be set aside because there had been no explicit discussion of the rights of Mrs Rushmer and of the couple's children under Art. 8. By weighing all the factors required under s 15, due regard had necessarily been given to the family's Art 8 rights.[19]

[16] [2009] EWHC 317 (Ch), [34].

[17] See Chapter 3, section 4.1.1.

[18] [2010] EWHC 554 (Ch); [2010] 2 FLR 362, [50].

[19] Ibid, [51]. There is no reported case in which sale on an application by a creditor under the TOLATA, s 14 has been considered a disproportionate interference with art 8. For examples where Art 8 has explicitly been addressed by the court see Forrester Ketley & Co v Brent [2009] EWHC 3441 and C Putnam & Sons v Taylor [2009] EWHC 317 (Ch).

3.3 HAS S 15 OF THE TRUSTS OF LAND AND APPOINTMENT OF TRUSTEES ACT 1996 CHANGED THE LAW?

On the basis of this analysis of applications for sale by creditors post-Shaire, we can assess Neuberger J's conclusion that s 15 of the TOLATA 1996 has 'changed the law' from the courts' previous practice under s 30 of the LPA 1925. The decisions in these cases may cast doubt on the extent of any such change. As we have noted, in applications for sale by a creditor under s 30 of the 1925 Act, Re Citro established that sale would be ordered unless the circumstances were exceptional. As we will see below, at the time of that decision, the only reported case in which this criterion was met was one in which a postponement of sale would not prejudice the interest of the creditor.[20] In view of this, it seems that the decisions in Achampong, Bell, and Edwards are entirely consistent with the courts' previous practice. In considering applications for sale, courts have continued to stress the discretionary nature of the jurisdiction under s 15.[21] But despite Neuberger J's conclusion in Shaire, the decision in that case may stand alone as one in which the 1996 Act has made a practical difference to the outcome.[22]

Two factors may account for the pattern of decisions since Shaire. Firstly, the utility of developing a flexible approach under s 15 of the 1996 Act is dependent on creditors bringing their applications under that provision. It was predicted at the time of the Act that s 15 would operate as an incentive for creditors to obtain an order of bankruptcy, enabling them to rely on the more favourable provision in s 335A of the Insolvency Act 1986.[23] Radley-Gardner[24] notes that, by the time of the decision in Achampong, the ability of mortgagors to circumvent s 15 by making the defaulting beneficiary bankrupt had become apparent. This is illustrated by Alliance and Leicester plc v Slayford,[25] in which a wife's beneficial interest was binding against a mortgagee, because she had entered into a transaction through her husband's undue influence. The court held that it was not an abuse of process for the mortgagee to sue the husband on his personal covenant to pay the debt, with a view to bankrupting him and bringing an application for sale under the Insolvency Act 1986. Hence, as Radley-Gardner explains: '[E]ven if a more flexible approach had emerged under section 15, it would have been a paper tiger, easily undercut by recourse to the insolvency regime.'

Secondly, the decisions in the cases echo Fox's comment, in the extract above, of the difficulty in balancing the qualitative and emotional concerns of occupiers against the quantitative and financial interests of the creditor. In the balancing exercise under s 15, creditors have nothing to prove: their interest in obtaining sale is unarguable. Pitted against this are the more nebulous concepts of the intentions and purposes of the trust, the 'welfare' of children, and a host of matters that may be pleaded to supplement the specific factors listed in s 15. In Achampong, little weight was attached to the occupying grandchildren in the absence of evidence as to how their welfare would be affected by sale. In C Putnam & Sons v Taylor Judge Purle was satisfied that after numerous delays and adjournments, while

20 Re Holliday [1981] Ch 405.

21 See Forrester Ketley & Co v Brent [2009] EWHC 3442 (Ch), [52].

22 The decision in Edwards v Lloyds TSB [2004] EWHC 1745 may be contentious in this regard. The case shares some analogies with Re Citro [1991] Ch 142 (in which sale was ordered under s 30) in so far as the application was made despite the continuing purpose of the trust, but the fact the creditors in Edwards would not be prejudiced may have been sufficient, in light of Re Holliday [1981] Ch 405, to distinguish the cases even under s 30: see Hopkins, 'Regulating Trusts of the Home: Private Law and Social Policy' (2009) 125 LQR 310, 331.

23 Hopkins, 'The Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996' [1996] Conv 411, 425.

24 Radley-Gardner, 'Section 15 of TOLATA, or, the Importance of Being Earners' [2003] 5 Web JCLI.

25 (2001) 33 HLR 66.

Mr Taylor received treatment for cancer, no further delay was required when further treatment became necessary.[26] Less surprisingly, there is no direct response by the judge to Mrs Taylor's concern as to the trauma a forced sale was likely to cause her cat.[27]

4 APPLICATIONS BY TRUSTEES IN BANKRUPTCY

Where there is a trust of land, applications for sale by a trustee in bankruptcy are considered by the court under s 335A of the Insolvency Act 1986.

Insolvency Act 1986, s 335A

(1) Any application by a trustee of a bankrupt's estate under section 14 of the Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996 powers of court in relation to trusts of land) for an order under that section for the sale of land shall be made to the court having jurisdiction in relation to the bankruptcy.

(2) On such an application the court shall make such order as it thinks just and reasonable having regard to—

- (a) the interests of the bankrupt's creditors,
- (b) where the application is made in respect of land which includes a dwelling house which is or has been the home of the bankrupt or the bankrupt's spouse or civil partner or former spouse or former civil partner—
  - (i) the conduct of the [spouse, civil partner, former spouse, or former civil partner], so far as contributing to the bankruptcy,
  - (ii) the needs and financial resources of the [spouse, civil partner, former spouse, or former civil partner], and
  - (iii) the needs of any children; and
- (c) all the circumstances of the case other than the needs of the bankrupt.

(3) Where such an application is made after the end of the period of one year beginning with the first vesting under Chapter IV of this Part of the bankrupt's estate in a trustee, the court shall assume, unless the circumstances of the case are exceptional, that the interests of the bankrupt's creditors outweigh all other considerations.

(4) The powers conferred on the court by this section are exercisable on an application whether it is made before or after the commencement of this section.

The circumstances to be taken into account under s 335A of the 1986 Act therefore differ from those under s 15 of the TOLATA 1996. In particular, the intentions of the settlors and the purposes for which the land is held (the criteria contained in s 15(1)(a) and (b) of the 1996 Act) cease to be relevant on bankruptcy. In the following extract, Henderson J considered how the references in s 335A to the 'needs' of various parties should be interpreted.

[26] [2009] EWHC 317 (Ch), [39].

[27] Ibid, [7].

Everitt v Budhram
[2009] EWHC 1219 (Ch)

Facts: Mr and Mrs Budhram had both been declared bankrupt. Both parties suffered from chronic medical conditions. An application for sale of their co-owned home was brought against Mrs Budhram (proceedings against her husband had been stayed through his lack of capacity until legal representation was appointed). Under s 335A the court is directed to disregard the 'needs' of the bankrupt (Mrs Budhram) but take into account those of the bankrupt's spouse (Mr Budhram).

Henderson J

At [36]–[37]

Counsel for the trustee submits that the reference to the "needs of the bankrupt" must be broadly construed and refer to needs of every kind, including not only financial needs but also medical needs and needs of any other description, such as emotional, psychological or mental needs. He submits that this wide construction must be what Parliament intended because, immediately before that, there is a reference to "the needs of any children" as one of the matters that the court should have regard to. He submits, in my view correctly, that the needs of children must be given a very broad interpretation and refer to needs of any kind, and is certainly not confined to needs of a financial nature. Further support for that approach is found in the preceding sub-paragraph, with its reference to "the needs and financial resources of the spouse" of the bankrupt. Again, he submits, and again I would agree, that "needs" should there be given a wide interpretation, and appears to be at least potentially distinct from financial needs or resources, which are the subject of separate express mention. It is true that the reference is to "financial resources" rather than financial needs, but nevertheless the point is still one of some force.

Curiously enough, there seems to be no authority, so far as the researches of counsel have been able to uncover, on the meaning of the word "needs" in this subsection. However, I consider that counsel for the trustee is substantially correct in his submission and that the needs of the bankrupt in paragraph (c) should be broadly interpreted, just as the same word should be broadly interpreted in sub-paragraphs (b)(ii)(iii). Accordingly, the court must disregard not only the financial needs of the bankrupt but also, relevantly for present purposes, the medical and psychological needs of the bankrupt.

On the facts this meant that neither the financial nor medical needs of Mrs Budhram could be taken into account. It is also worth noting that as Mr and Mrs Budhram had both been made bankrupt, if proceedings had continued against both of them, neither of their needs could have been considered. On the facts, however, as Mr Budhram was not a party to the proceedings a broad approach could be taken to interpreting his needs as the bankrupt's spouse. The allowance made by the judge in respect of Mr Budhram's needs is considered in section 4.1.

Through s 335A(3) of the Insolvency Act 1986, as long as the application for sale is brought at least a year after the bankruptcy, the interests of the creditors prevail and sale is therefore ordered unless the circumstances are exceptional. Only if exceptional circumstances are present is the court required to balance the factors listed in the provision.[28]

[28] Compare Dixon, 'Trusts of Land, Bankruptcy and Human Rights' [2005] Conv 161, 164. He notes that this is the manner in which the courts have, in fact, approached s 335A, although he suggests that a 'less Although s 335A was inserted into the Insolvency Act 1986 by the TOLATA 1996, it is an extension of a provision contained in the original Act, the origins of which lie with the Cork Report. The discussion of the family home in that report remains instructive in understanding the policy represented by s 335A.

Insolvency Law and Practice: Report of the Review Committee (The Cork Report) (Cmnd 8558, 1982, [1118], [1120]–[1123])

The family home

It would be clearly wrong to allow a debtor or his family to continue to live in lavish style at the expense of the debtor's creditors for an extended period. Nevertheless considerable personal hardship can be caused to the debtor's family by a sudden or premature eviction, and we believe it to be consonant with present social attitudes to alleviate the personal hardships of those who are dependent on the debtor but not responsible for his insolvency, if this can be achieved by delaying for an acceptable time the sale of the family home. We propose therefore to delay, but not to cancel, enforcement of the creditors' rights.

[...]

Nevertheless we consider that any new Insolvency Act should confer on the Court a specific power to postpone a trustee's rights of possession and sale of the family home. In exercising this power the Court should have particular regard to the welfare of any children of the family and of any adult members of the family who are ailing or elderly [...] Giving this power to the Court will, we hope and expect, serve to support the natural inclination of the usually sympathetic [trustee in bankruptcy], and to protect the debtor's family in those cases where lack of sympathy with, or anger at, the debtor produces unfortunate and undeserved consequences for his family.

Where there are dependents, the Court should not order an immediate sale unless satisfied that no avoidable hardship to them will be caused by the sale of the family home. That is not to say that application need be made to the Court in every case; once the correct principles have been established, we believe that in only a very small minority of cases will the Court be concerned.

When an application does come before the Court, we consider that the Court must have wide discretion to enable it to make whatever order may be just and equitable in the great variety of circumstances that may arise. While the Court will first consider the dependants—and the greater their vulnerability the greater will be the protection needed—creditors' rights should be postponed only in order to prevent injury to the welfare of those dependants; not to preserve for them any particular standard of life.

No two cases will be alike; the Court must therefore have complete discretion to do what seems to it to be appropriate. Such guidelines as can be given must of necessity be in the most general terms and, indeed, little more than an indication of the factors for consideration. While some of us have considered that there should be a statutory limit on the length of time for which a postponement could be ordered, all of us are agreed that, in practice, any very lengthy postponement should be rare. The majority of us have concluded that the Court's powers should not be limited in duration. In the reported cases, both under the matrimonial legislation and (more rarely) under the bankruptcy law, much importance has been attached to the ages, welfare and educational prospects of the children.

preconceived interpretation' would be that the factors listed should always be balanced, even though the 'scales are heavily tilted' in favour of sale after the initial one-year period.

The report undoubtedly envisages a less prescriptive regime than that provided for in s 335A,[29] while acknowledging the strength of the creditors' claims following bankruptcy. But s 335A does reflect the underlying idea in this extract of alleviating the hardship of a sudden eviction. The effect of s 335A is to provide the bankrupt (and his or her family) with an initial one-year adjustment period, following which the financial claim of the creditors becomes paramount.

The key issue of interpretation arising from s 335A is the meaning of 'exceptional circumstances', which may result in the postponement of sale after the initial year. We will first consider the courts' general approach to defining 'exceptional circumstances' and then address a developing argument that human rights considerations may require the courts to extend this general interpretation.

4.1 THE COURTS' GENERAL APPROACH TO DEFINING 'EXCEPTIONAL CIRCUMSTANCES'

The test of exceptional circumstances has its origins in the courts' case law under s 30 of the LPA 1925. In applications under that section, Re Citro established the general principle that, on an application by a trustee in bankruptcy, sale would be ordered unless there are exceptional circumstances. In doing so, Nourse LJ offered the following definition.

Re Citro
[1991] Ch 142, CA

Nourse LJ

At 157

What then are exceptional circumstances? As the cases show, it is not uncommon for a wife with young children to be faced with eviction in circumstances where the realisation of her beneficial interest will not produce enough to buy a comparable home in the same neighbourhood, or indeed elsewhere. And, if she has to move elsewhere, there may be problems over schooling and so forth. Such circumstances, while engendering a natural sympathy in all who hear of them, cannot be described as exceptional. They are the melancholy consequences of debt and improvidence with which every civilised society has been familiar. It was only in In re Holliday [1981] Ch. 405 that they helped the wife's voice to prevail, and then only, as I believe, because of one special feature of that case. One of the reasons for the decision given by Sir David Cairns was that it was highly unlikely that postponement of payment of the debts would cause any great hardship to any of the creditors, a matter of which Buckley L.J. no doubt took account as well.

Implicit in Nourse LJ's definition is that 'exceptional' requires something 'out of the ordinary course, or unusual, or special, or uncommon'.[30]

[29] Compare, for example, the 'wide discretion' and the 'complete discretion to do what seems [. . .] appropriate' in the extract with the actual provision in the Insolvency Act 1986, s 335A. Further, as is noted by Omar, 'Security Over Co-Owned Property and the Creditor's Paramount Status in Recovery Proceedings' [2006] Conv 157, 168, some of the factors the Cork Committee specifically envisaged being taken into account were held in Re Citro [1991] Ch 142 not to constitute exceptional circumstances.

[30] Hosking v Michaelides [2004] All ER (D) 147, per Judge Morgan QC.

In the following case, Judge Sumption QC explained further.

Re Bremner
[1999] 1 FLR 912

Judge Sumption QC

At 915

The test is whether the problems which would result from an eviction are within the broad range of problems, necessarily distressing, which can be expected to arise from the process of bankruptcy and the resultant realisation of the bankrupt's assets, or whether they lie wholly outside that range.

The clearest example of exceptional circumstances is chronic ill health on the part of the bankrupt, or the bankrupt's spouse or partner. In Claughton v Charalambous,[31] the bankrupt and his wife were beneficial co-owners of their home. Mrs Charalambous was in poor health, with consequential mobility problems that the couples' home had been altered to accommodate. She had a reduced life expectancy. The judge considered these circumstances to be exceptional and postponed sale for so long as Mrs Charalambous continued to live in the property.[32] In Re Bremner, the bankrupt himself was elderly and terminally ill with inoperable cancer. This case raised a specific issue because, under s 335A, the interests of the bankrupt are not themselves a relevant consideration.[33] But the court accepted that the bankrupt's wife, who was also his carer, had a distinct need to continue to provide that care in their home. Sale was postponed until three months after the bankrupt's death.

In the extract from Re Citro (above), Nourse LJ notes that, in Re Holliday[34] (the only reported case at the time in which exceptional circumstances had been found), the creditors would not be prejudiced by the postponement of sale. In that case, sale was postponed for five years until the bankrupt's children reached 17 years of age, at which point, the proceeds of sale represented by the bankrupt's beneficial share would still be sufficient to pay his debts with interest. An immediate sale, however, would leave his former wife with insufficient funds to obtain alternative accommodation.

The fact that creditors will not be prejudiced by a sale is not, in itself, an exceptional circumstance enabling courts to postpone sale.[35] Where exceptional circumstances are present, however, the impact of any delay on the creditors remains a significant factor in the courts' willingness to postpone sale under s 335A. A review of case law under s 335A suggests that the protection of creditors is a point of synergy between applications under that provision and those by creditors under s 15 of the TOLATA 1996.

31 [1999] 1 FLR 740.

32 Contrast Foenander v Allan [2006] BPIR 1392. The bankrupt co-owned his home with his brother, who was suffering from progressive dementia. This was not sufficient to postpone sale. Judge Strauss QC noted, at [34], that the house was the only asset available in the bankruptcy and that the Registrar had left open the possibility of sale being delayed as long as necessary to ensure alternative accommodation was provided. Sale was, however, postponed on other grounds discussed below.

33 There was no co-ownership trust in this case, because Mr Bremner was the sole owner of the home. The case was decided under the Insolvency Act 1986, s 336, which is identical in all relevant respects to s 335A.

34 [1981] Ch 40.

35 Donohoe v Ingram [2006] EWHC 282.

In Re Bremner, the court noted that sale would not necessarily have been delayed if the bankrupt had been younger, or less ill, or had a longer life expectancy. The expected short period of the delay meant that any prejudice to creditors was likely to be modest.[36] In Everitt v Budhram,[37] the judge considered that the mental and physical needs of Mr Budhram, including those related to a stroke and diabetes, constituted exceptional circumstances, which he would take into account 'to a limited extent'.[38] Sale was postponed for a year, or until three months after a possession order was obtained against Mr Budhram (who had also been made bankrupt). In the context of a history of non-co-operation with the trustee in bankruptcy, Henderson J noted that '[i]f I am too generous, there is a risk that the matter will continue to drag along without anyone taking any serious steps to deal with it. Equally, if I am too severe, I will not give sufficient recognition to the exceptional circumstances which I have found to exist'.[39]

In Foenander v Allan[40] and Martin-Sklan v White,[41] a postponement of sale in light of exceptional circumstances was not expected to prejudice creditors, because the sum realized on sale would still be sufficient to repay the outstanding debt. In Martin-Sklan, the postponement maintained the 'web of support' provided to the bankrupt's partner, an alcoholic; Foenander is an unusual case in which the exceptional circumstances were financial, rather than personal. In that case, an immediate sale would raise sufficient proceeds to repay creditors with a modest surplus. Sale was postponed on condition that an insurance claim for subsidence was likely to be met in a reasonable period. This would significantly increase the value of the home, enhancing the surplus available to the bankrupt and his brother, with whom the house was co-owned.

In Nicholls v Lan,[42] sale was delayed for a minimum of eighteen months to give the bankrupt's wife, a chronic schizophrenic, an opportunity to raise funds by the sale of another property, which would enable her to buy out the bankrupt's share. Her medical circumstances meant that a forced sale could have specific psychiatric effects. The case is notable in so far as the sale was postponed despite the fact that the proceeds realized by sale would be insufficient to pay the outstanding debts.

4.2 EXCEPTIONAL CIRCUMSTANCES: THE HUMAN RIGHTS DIMENSION

In section 3.2 above we have seen that the wide discretion conferred on the courts by s 15 of the TOLATA ensures that due regard is given to the Art 8 ECHR rights of those affected by the sale. Where the application is made by a trustee in bankruptcy more than a year after the bankruptcy the courts do not necessarily have discretion. Under s 335A of the Insolvency Act 1986, a presumption in favour of the creditors arises after one year, unless there are exceptional circumstances. Only if such circumstances are present does the court have discretion whether to order sale. Further, the courts have defined exceptional circumstances narrowly, as meaning circumstances outside those expected to arise on a bankruptcy. Even before the compatibility of s 15 of TOLATA with Art 8 had been raised, in Barca v Mears the argument was advanced that the absence of any ability by the court to undertake a proper balancing of interests under s 335A constituted an infringement of Art 8. This argument attracted support by the court, although, on the facts, it was not sufficient to prevent sale.

[36] The eventual sale of the house would still provide sufficient proceeds with which to pay the secured creditors the sum due, plus interest, and pay unsecured creditors, with the loss of statutory interest.
[37] [2010] Ch 170. [38] Ibid, [57]. [39] Ibid, [59]. [40] [2006] BPIR 1392.
[41] [2007] BPIR 76. [42] [2007] 1 FLR 744.

Barca v Mears
[2004] EWHC 2170, HC

Judge Strauss QC

At [39]–[42]

Clearly, in many or perhaps most cases, the sale of a bankrupt's property in accordance with bankruptcy law will be justifiable on the basis that it is necessary to protect the rights of others, namely the creditors, and will not be a breach of the Convention. Nevertheless, it does seem to me to be questionable whether the narrow approach as to what may be 'exceptional circumstances' adopted in Re Citro (Domenico) (a Bankrupt) [1991] Ch 142, is consistent with the Convention. It requires the court to adopt an almost universal rule, which prefers the property rights of the bankrupt's creditors to the property and/or personal rights of third parties, members of his family, who owe the creditors nothing. I think that there is considerable force in what is said by Ms Deborah Rook in Property Law and Human Rights (Blackstone Press, 2001), at pp 203–205 to which Mr Gibbon very fairly referred me:

> 'It is arguable that, in some circumstances, [s 335A(3)] may result in an infringement of Article 8. The mortgagor's partner and children have the right to respect their home and family life under Article 8 even though they may have no proprietary interest in the house [. . .] therefore it is possible that the presumption of sale in s 335A and the way that the courts have interpreted it, so that in the majority of cases an innocent partner and the children are evicted from the home, violates Convention rights [. . .]'

The eviction of the family from their home, an event that naturally ensues from the operation of the presumption of sale in s 335A, could be considered to be an infringement of the right to respect of the home and family life under Article 8 if the presumption is given absolute priority without sufficient consideration being given to the Convention rights of the affected family. Allen [Mr T Allen in "The Human Rights Act (UK) and Property Law" in Property and the Constitution (Hart Publishing, 1999), at p 163] observes that:

> "As the law currently stands, the right to respect for family life and the home receives almost no consideration after the one year period. Whether such a strict limitation is compatible with the Convention is doubtful".

[. . .] it may be that the courts, in applying s 335A [. . .] will need to adopt a more sympathetic approach to defining what constitutes "exceptional circumstances". If an immediate sale of the property would violate the family's rights under Article 8, the court may be required in compliance with its duty under s 3 of the HRA 1988 to adopt a broad interpretation of "exceptional circumstances" [. . .] to ensure the compatibility of this legislation with Convention rights.'

In particular, it may be incompatible with Convention rights to follow the approach taken by the majority in Re Citro (Domenico) (a Bankrupt) [1991] Ch 142, in drawing a distinction between what is exceptional, in the sense of being unusual, and what Nourse LJ refers to as the 'usual melancholy consequences' of a bankruptcy. This approach leads to the conclusion that, however disastrous the consequences may be to family life, if they are of the usual kind > then they cannot be relied on under s 335A; they will qualify as 'exceptional' only if they are of an unusual kind, for example where a terminal illness is involved.

>
> It seems to me that a shift in emphasis in the interpretation of the statute may be necessary to achieve compatibility with the Convention. There is nothing in the wording of s 335A, or the corresponding wording of ss 336 and 337, to require an interpretation which excludes from the ambit of 'exceptional circumstances' cases in which the consequences of the bankruptcy are of the usual kind, but exceptionally severe. Nor is there anything in the wording to require a court to say that a case may not be exceptional, if it is one of the rare cases in which, on the facts, relatively slight loss which the creditors will suffer as a result of the postponement of the sale would be outweighed by disruption, even if of the usual kind, which will be caused in the lives of the bankrupt and his family. Indeed, on one view, this is what the Court of Appeal decided in Re Holliday (a Bankrupt) ex parte Trustee of the Property of the Bankrupt v Holliday and Another [1981] Ch 405.
>
> Thus it may be that, on a reconsideration of the sections in the light of the Convention, they are to be regarded as merely recognising that, in the general run of cases, the creditors' interests will outweigh all other interests, but leaving it open to a court to find that, on a proper consideration of the facts of a particular case, it is one of the exceptional cases in which this proposition is not true. So interpreted, and without the possibly undue bias in favour of the creditors' property interests embodied in the pre-1998 case-law, these sections would be compatible with the Convention.

It is important to emphasize that the objection raised to s 335A is essentially procedural. The possible incompatibility with Art 8 arises where the court is unable to balance the bankrupt's interests against those of the creditors because of the absence of exceptional circumstances. In Nicholls v Lan,[43] in which exceptional circumstances were present, Judge Morgan suggested that the balancing exercise that he was therefore required to undertake under s 335A 'precisely captures what is required' by Art 8. In view of this, while the objection raised is procedural, the solution may lie in a substantive alteration of the definition of exceptional circumstances. By extending the definition of exceptional circumstances the court gains access to the discretion conferred by s 335A of the Insolvency Act 1986 and is therefore able to undertake the balancing exercise required by Art 8 of the ECHR. Where, even on a wide interpretation of the term, there are no exceptional circumstances, it may be presumed that sale is a proportionate interference with Art 8 rights. In this respect, the existence of the one-year adjustment period before the creditor's interests prevail may be significant. Even in such cases, however, the absence of discretion remains problematic as it excludes any consideration of Art 8. Further, the difference in treatment between applications by creditors on the one hand and trustees in bankruptcy on the other may raise a question of compliance with Art 14 (non-discrimination) unless the difference in treatment can be justified.

Despite these concerns the human rights argument in Barca v Mears remains undeveloped. Commenting on the decision, Dixon doubted that it would necessarily lead to an erosion of the preference for commercial claims.[44] Indeed, there is no reported case in which the wide interpretation of exceptional circumstances advocated by Judge Strauss QC has led to sale being postponed to protect an occupier's Art 8 rights. In Donohoe v Ingram, as in Barca v Mears, the court considered that even on a broad approach to exceptional circumstances,

43 Ibid, [43].
44 Dixon, 'Trusts of Land, Bankruptcy and Human Rights' [2005] Conv 161.

sale would still be ordered.[45] Baker is critical of the reception Barca v Mears has had. On his analysis, the subsequent case law 'evidences only a variety of alluring yet ultimately unpersuasive defences of the status quo, intended to keep the Barca objection at bay'.[46] He advocates stronger engagement by the courts with Art 8, whilst acknowledging that decisions on the proportionality balance are inevitably subjective. He suggests, '[a] genuine look at the issue is the least that the blameless victims of debt and improvidence can legitimately expect'.[47]

4.3 A 'FRESH START' FOR BANKRUPTS

Section 335A of the Insolvency Act 1986 must now be read in conjunction with ss 283A and 313A. These provisions were introduced into the Act by the Enterprise Act 2002 and reflect the policy of that Act of providing a 'fresh start' for bankrupts. Under s 313A, sale will not be ordered where the value of the bankrupt's share is below a prescribed level and, therefore, of marginal benefit to the creditors.[48] Under s 283A of the 1986 Act, the beneficiary's share in his or her home is returned to him or her after three years unless the trustee 'realises' the interest by, for example, applying for sale. As we have seen in section 4 above, under s 335A where an application for sale is made by a trustee in bankruptcy more than a year after the bankruptcy, sale is ordered unless there are exceptional circumstances. This gives the bankrupt a one-year adjustment period. Read together, the practical effect of ss 283A and 335A is that the trustee in bankruptcy has a two-year period during which sale will be ordered in the absence of exceptional circumstances. The meaning of 'realises' was considered by the Court of Appeal in the following case.

Lewis v Metropolitan Properties Realisations Ltd
[2010] Ch 148

Facts: Mr and Mrs Lewis were joint tenants of their home. Mr Lewis had become bankrupt. On the day before the third anniversary of his bankruptcy the trustee assigned Mr Lewis's beneficial interest in the home to the respondent for £1 and 25 per cent of the proceeds of any eventual sale. The Court of Appeal was asked whether the trustee had thereby realized the interest to prevent it from revesting in Mr Lewis.

Laws LJ

At [10]–[11], [22], [24], [27], and [29]

All words which require construction or interpreting have to be placed in their proper context. The same is true of "realise" in subsection (3)(a) of the 1986 Act. The question that we have to consider is whether, in its context, it is capable of covering a transaction where there is a deferred monetary consideration during the period before that consideration comes in. None the less, it is an ordinary English word and it is appropriate to start with a consideration of what the normal English meaning of the word is.

[45] [2006] EWHC 282.
[46] Baker, 'The Judicial Approach to "Exceptional Circumstances" in Bankruptcy: The Impact of the Human Rights Act' [2010] Conv 352, 366.
[47] Ibid, 368. [48] Ibid, 169–70.

The Oxford English Dictionary definition of "realise" is: "convert into cash or money". That is a good starting point for the Lewises' case. Alternative definitions are recorded by the judge as being "sell out" and "fetch as a price", which she described as being more general, but we still think that they import the general impression of a completed transaction as opposed to one where the price is still outstanding.

If one pulls these strands together the scheme of section 283A begins to emerge. It is as follows. We assume for the purposes of this paragraph a jointly owned home, and put on one side for the moment the possibility of a sale of the interest at a deferred consideration. (i) The section only applies to that part of the bankrupt's estate comprising his or his spouse/civil partner's dwelling house. It does not apply to other property. (ii) The trustee has three years to decide what to do where the estate has such an interest. (iii) If he does nothing, then (subject to the provisions of subsection (6), which presumably allow for special cases which we do not consider further) the estate loses the property interest. (iv) If the interest is of low value (within the meaning of the 1986 Act) the trustee, while technically owning the interest, will in practice have no enforcement mechanism available to him. If he does nothing, the interest reverts to the bankrupt under section 283A. If he starts proceedings (whether for an order for sale or a charging order), that will technically keep his interest alive while the proceedings are pending (section 283A(3)(b)(d)) but the interest will revest when the proceedings are dismissed under section 313A, as amended: see section 283A(4). (v) If the interest is of significant value, the trustee can do the following. (a) Apply for an order for sale. This keeps the interest out of the scope of section 283A while the proceedings are alive and gives the co-owner the opportunity to buy the trustee out at the then value. Alternatively the property will be ordered to be sold and the trustee gets the then value. (b) Apply for a charging order (if the conditions of section 313 are fulfilled). This secures the then value to the trustee, with future increases going to the bankrupt. (c) Reach an agreement with the bankrupt under section 283A(3)(e)—in effect, sell to the bankrupt. That will obviously reflect the then value and secure future increases for the bankrupt. (vi) Sell the interest to someone other than the bankrupt or the civil partner/spouse at a price payable and paid on sale. It is accepted by the Lewises that this would be a realisation. It would be a sale at the then value, with future increases accruing to the purchaser. (vii) It should not be forgotten that he might agree with the co-owner to sell, or the co-owner might want to sell anyway, in which case the trustee gets the estate's interest at its then value.

There may be some other permutations, but that is the basic scheme which emerges from a consideration of the section. The central feature which emerges is that which appears in the underlined words—the trustee, if he can achieve anything worthwhile at all, gets the equivalent of the then value of the property and is not allowed to hang on for ever as a co-owner, waiting to see property values rise. The provisions also achieve a reasonable degree of certainty for the bankrupt and the co-owner in that by the end of the third year (or the end of litigation commenced within three years) they will by and large know whether the property has to be sold, how much the trustee will get out of the property, that the trustee will no longer be a co-owner, and that the opportunity to make money out of a rising market will not remain with the trustee (giving him an incentive to hang on for some considerable time) but will enure to the benefit of the bankrupt, the co-owner or some other assignee.

Against that background it is now necessary to consider whether a sale of the beneficial interest in exchange for a future price, or a partially future price, would fit into that apparent background. Can it have been intended that such a transaction is a realisation within subsection (3)(a) ? It seems to us that it cannot, for the following reasons. (i) For the reasons given above, it would extend the meaning of "realises" beyond its normal English sense. (ii) It would be an unusual transaction for Parliament to have contemplated in these circumstances.

Section 283A is designed to deal with a real world problem, operating in a world of real, not fanciful, commercial transactions. A sale of a beneficial interest to an outsider is unusual enough. A sale with fixed monetary consideration left outstanding would be even more unusual. It is hard to imagine who would do such a thing. (iii) A sale with a contingent monetary consideration left outstanding is more conceivable, particularly if the consideration is dependent on a future sale of the property and is otherwise not payable, as the present case demonstrates. But the contingency of the obligation makes it look even less like a "realisation" in everyday terms (pending the fulfilment of the contingency), and it seems to create the very uncertainty that the rest of the scheme seems, by and large, to seek to remove. While the scheme is not spelled out and has to be inferred, and while it is not perfect, this sort of transaction sticks out like a sore thumb against the background of the rest of the section.

We therefore conclude that "realises" in the subsection involves getting in the full cash consideration for the deal.

QUESTIONS

1. Compare and contrast the rules applicable to applications for sale made by creditors and those made by trustees in bankruptcy. Do you consider differences between the applications to be justified by the status of the applicants?
2. In considering applications for sale by creditors, have the courts paid sufficient regard to the interests of beneficiaries who wish to prevent sale of their home? In what circumstances do you consider beneficiaries to be most vulnerable to a sale of their home being ordered?
3. Assess the view that arguments founded on human rights have had little practical impact on the courts' jurisdiction to order sale of the home on an application by a creditor or trustee in bankruptcy.

FURTHER READING

Baker, 'The Judicial Approach to "Exceptional Circumstances" in Bankruptcy: The Impact of the Human Rights Act 1998' [2010] Conv 352

Dixon, 'Trusts of Land, Bankruptcy and Human Rights' [2005] Conv 161

Fox, Conceptualising Home: Theories, Laws and Policies (Oxford: Hart, 2007)

Fox, 'Creditors and the Concept of a "Family Home": A Functional Analysis' (2005) 25 LS 201

Hopkins, 'Regulating Trusts of the Home: Private Law and Social Policy' (2009) 125 LQR 310.

Omar, 'Equitable Interests and the Secured Creditor: Determining Priorities' [2006] Conv 509

Omar, 'Security Over Co-Owned Property and the Creditor's Paramount Status in Recovery Proceedings' [2006] Conv 157

19

CO-OWNERSHIP AND PRIORITIES: THE DEFENCES QUESTION

CENTRAL ISSUES

1. Where co-owned land is sold or mortgaged, a question of priority may arise between a beneficiary who is not a party to the transaction and the purchaser. In co-owned land, priority is determined primarily by the mechanism of overreaching.
2. This mechanism, which applies to registered and unregistered land, enables the purchaser to take free from beneficial interests as long as certain conditions are met. As such, it operates as a defence to a pre-existing equitable interest in land. The beneficiaries' interests are removed from the land and attach to the proceeds of sale.
3. Where overreaching does not occur, priority between the beneficiary and purchaser is determined using the separate rules of registered and unregistered land.
4. The preconditions for overreaching include a requirement that any purchase money is paid to a minimum of two trustees. As a result, a practical distinction is drawn between one and two trustee trusts. In two-trustee trusts, priority is determined by overreaching, while in one-trustee trusts, the separate priority rules of unregistered and registered land are applied.
5. The prevailing view is that the basis of overreaching lies in the trustees' powers of disposition and its operation is therefore dependent on the trustees acting within their powers.
6. Purchasers and mortgagees may often benefit from statutory protection even where trustees have acted ultra vires, although the level of protection differs between registered and unregistered land.
7. The operation of overreaching against beneficiaries in occupation continues to be contentious and may remain vulnerable to challenge under the Human Rights Act 1998.

1 INTRODUCTION

This chapter is concerned with the priority rules applicable where co-owned land is sold or mortgaged. It considers the circumstances in which the beneficial interests of those who are not party to the sale or mortgage as legal owners are binding against the purchaser or mortgagee. In this book, we have conceptualized priority rules as part of the defences question (see Chapter 12, section 3). In that respect, this chapter is concerned with when a purchaser or mortgagee has a defence against the enforcement of pre-existing beneficial interests.

The priority between beneficiaries and third parties is determined primarily by the mechanism of overreaching. Overreaching is a mechanism enabling purchasers to take title free from certain property interests, particularly beneficial interests under a trust. In other words, as we noted in Chapter 12, section 3.3, it provides the purchaser or mortgagee with a defence against the enforcement of those interests. The interests are removed from the land and attached instead to the proceeds of sale.

Overreaching applies in relation to both personal property and land, although we are concerned only with its application to land. It applies as long as two conditions are met: firstly, the interest must be capable of being overreached; and secondly, the transaction must be one that has overreaching effect. Where these conditions are met, overreaching applies to the exclusion of other priority rules. Importantly, it applies both to registered and unregistered land. Only where one of the conditions is not met is the enforcement of the beneficial interest against the purchaser determined by the separate priority rules of registered and unregistered land that have been examined in Chapters 13 and 14. The priority rules discussed in those chapters are therefore wholly subsidiary to the overreaching mechanism.

In this chapter, we will focus on the particular form of overreaching that applies where a purchaser or mortgagee deals with land held on trust. In such cases, a key element of the requirement that a transaction has overreaching effect is that any capital money is paid to a minimum of two trustees. The practical effect of overreaching is thus to draw a division between transactions undertaken by a single trustee and those executed by two or more trustees. Where there are two or more trustees, issues of priority between a purchaser and beneficiary are determined by overreaching. Where there is a single trustee, priority between a purchaser and the beneficiaries generally falls to be considered under the separate priority rules governing registered and unregistered land.

This chapter focuses on the operation of the overreaching mechanism. The final part of the chapter, section 7, then briefly notes how issues of priority are determined where overreaching does not take place and addresses a specific issue that arises on a sale by a sole surviving legal joint tenant.

2 OVERREACHING

The effect of overreaching is explained in Wolstenholme and Cherry in the following terms.

Wolstenholme and Cherry's Conveyancing Statutes: Vol I (12th edn, ed Farrand, 1972, p 51)

> In such cases [where overreaching operates] the purchaser is not concerned with the title to the equitable interest or power, or to obtain the concurrence of the owner thereof. On the other hand, the equitable interest or power is not defeated or destroyed by the disposition, but is shifted so as to become a corresponding interest or power in or over the proceeds [. . .] The conveyance to the purchaser is then said to 'overreach' the equitable interest or power [. . .] An overreaching conveyance must be distinguished from one which wholly destroys some interest or right.

The key aspect of this explanation lies in the idea that overreaching operates to shift the interest from an interest in land to an interest in the proceeds of the conveyance. The purchaser or mortgagee thus obtains title to the land unencumbered by the interest. The holder of the overreached interest no longer has any proprietary claim in the land, but a beneficial interest in the moneys received by the trustees. His or her interest has shifted from an interest in land to an interest in money. In this way, overreaching draws a clear distinction between the beneficiaries' rights against purchasers, on the one hand, and their rights against their trustees, on the other.

Overreaching operates within a complex statutory framework and implements fundamental principles of the trust curtain and security of transactions, both for purchasers and, more particularly (in the leading cases), mortgage lenders. Because the application of the mechanism has been stretched to (and, some would argue, beyond) its legitimate limits, its continuing fitness for purpose is being called into question, together with its compliance with the Human Rights Act 1998 (HRA 1998).

So why do we have overreaching? In the following case, it was considered that the consequences of not giving full effect to overreaching would be as follows.

City of London Building Society v Flegg
[1988] 1 AC 54

> Lord Oliver
>
> At 76–7
>
> [To reverse, by judicial decision] the legislative policy of the 1925 legislation of keeping the interests of beneficiaries behind the curtain and confining the investigation of title to the devolution of the legal estate [. . .] financial institutions advancing money on the security of land will face hitherto unsuspected hazards, whether they are dealing with registered or unregistered land.

This comment reflects the twin objectives of implementing the trust curtain and ensuring security of transactions.

In this chapter, we first consider the general scope of overreaching, and then address the operation of overreaching in two particular circumstances: where the beneficiaries are in occupation of the land, and where the transaction is executed ultra vires (outside) the trustees' powers or in breach of trust. Following an assessment of whether overreaching remains fit for its purpose, we consider the future of the mechanism.

2.1 THE SCOPE OF OVERREACHING

For overreaching to take place, two conditions must be met: firstly, the interest must be capable of being overreached; secondly the transaction must be one that has overreaching effect. Both of these requirements are apparent from the terms of s 2 of the Law of Property Act 1925 (LPA 1925).

Law of Property Act 1925, s 2

(1) A conveyance to a purchaser of a legal estate in land shall overreach any equitable interest or power affecting that estate, whether or not he has notice thereof, if—

(i) the conveyance is made under the powers conferred by the Settled Land Act, 1925, or any additional powers conferred by a settlement, and the equitable interest or power is capable of being overreached thereby, and the statutory requirements respecting the payment of capital money arising under the settlement are complied with;

(ii) the conveyance is made by trustees of land and the equitable interest or power is at the date of the conveyance capable of being overreached by such trustees under the provisions of subsection (2) of this section or independently of that subsection, and the requirements of section 27 of this Act respecting the payment of capital money arising on such a conveyance are complied with;

(iii) the conveyance is made by a mortgagee or personal representative in the exercise of his paramount powers, and the equitable interest or power is capable of being overreached by such conveyance, and any capital money arising from the transaction is paid to the mortgagee or personal representative;

(iv) the conveyance is made under an order of the court and the equitable interest or power is bound by such order, and any capital money arising from the transaction is paid into, or in accordance with the order of, the court.

(1A) An equitable interest in land subject to a trust of land which remains in, or is to revert to, the settlor shall (subject to any contrary intention) be overreached by the conveyance if it would be so overreached were it an interest under the trust.

(2) Where the legal estate affected is subject to [a trust of land], then if at the date of a conveyance made after the commencement of this Act by the trustees, the trustees (whether original or substituted) are either—

(a) two or more individuals approved or appointed by the court or the successors in office of the individuals so approved or appointed; or

(b) a trust corporation,

any equitable interest or power having priority to the trust shall, notwithstanding any stipulation to the contrary, be overreached by the conveyance, and shall, according to its priority, take effect as if created or arising by means of a primary trust affecting the proceeds of sale and the income of the land until sale.

(3) The following equitable interests and powers are excepted from the operation of subsection (2) of this section, namely—

(i) Any equitable interest protected by a deposit of documents relating to the legal estate affected;

(ii) The benefit of any covenant or agreement restrictive of the user of land;

(iii) Any easement, liberty, or privilege over or affecting land and being merely an equitable interest (in this Act referred to as an "equitable easement");

(iv) The benefit of any contract (in this Act referred to as an "estate contract") to convey or create a legal estate, including a contract conferring either expressly or by statutory implication a valid option to purchase, a right of pre-emption, or any other like right;

(v) Any equitable interest protected by registration under the Land Charges Act, 1925, other than—

(a) an annuity within the meaning of Part II, of that Act;

(b) a limited owner's charge or a general equitable charge within the meaning of that Act.

(4) Subject to the protection afforded by this section to the purchaser of a legal estate, nothing contained in this section shall deprive a person entitled to an equitable charge of any of his rights or remedies for enforcing the same.

(5) So far as regards the following interests, created before the commencement of this Act (which accordingly are not within the provisions of the Land Charges Act, 1925), namely—

(a) the benefit of any covenant or agreement restrictive of the user of the land;

(b) any equitable easement;

(c) the interest under a puisne mortgage within the meaning of the Land Charges Act, 1925, unless and until acquired under a transfer made after the commencement of this Act;

(d) the benefit of an estate contract, unless and until the same is acquired under a conveyance made after the commencement of this Act;

a purchaser of a legal estate shall only take subject thereto if he has notice thereof, and the same are not overreached under the provisions contained or in the manner referred to in this section.

2.2 INTERESTS CAPABLE OF BEING OVERREACHED

The remainder of the section substantially curtails the initially broad statement in s 2(1) of the LPA 1925. Firstly, subs (3) excludes certain equitable interests from the scope of overreaching. The general effect of this subsection is to remove from the operation of overreaching most equitable interests that do not take effect under a trust. Discussing the scope of overreaching in Birmingham Midshires Mortgage Services Ltd v Sabherwal,[1] Robert Walker LJ indorsed a distinction drawn by Megarry and Wade[2] between 'commercial' and 'family' interests. Family interests, such as beneficial interests under a trust, can readily be represented by money; in contrast, commercial interests (which Robert Walker LJ considered to be exemplified by equitable easements and rights of entry) 'cannot sensibly shift from the land'. They are logically inseparable from the land over which they are intended to be exercised. In this respect, the effect of subs (3) is to exclude such commercial interests from the initially broad wording of s 2(1).

The second respect in which the broad statement in s 2(1) of the 1925 Act is curtailed is that an interest must be 'capable of being overreached' through the particular transactions

1 (2000) 80 P & CR 256, [28].

2 Citing from Megarry and Wade: The Law of Real Property (5th edn, ed Harpum, 1984), p 409.

listed in s 2(1)(i)–(iii).[3] Hence, it is necessary to identify which interests are 'capable of being overreached' by each type of transaction mentioned. Paragraphs (i) and (iii) can be dealt with briefly in this regard. As regards para (i), the interests capable of being overreached by a conveyance made under the Settled Land Act 1925 are identified by s 72 of that Act. This includes (but is not limited to) the beneficial interests under the settlement. It is not discussed further, because, as we will see in Chapter 20 the Settled Land Act 1925 is in the process of being phased out.[4]

As regards para (iii), in relation to mortgages, this provision ensures that an exercise of the power of sale overreaches the mortgagor's equity of redemption and any subsequent mortgages.[5] Its operation is further discussed in Chapter 30, section 3.1.2.[6]

Of much greater significance is para (ii), which provides for overreaching on a conveyance by trustees of land. Beneficial interests under a trust of land are 'capable of being overreached' on a conveyance by the trustees where overreaching is provided for by s 2(2) or 'independently of that subsection'. Section 2(2) provides for overreaching of interests already in existence at the time the trust was created. This is a concept of extended overreaching that may be invoked only by a trust corporation, or by trustees approved or appointed by the court for the purpose. Section 2(2) does not, however, provide for overreaching of the beneficial interests under the trust: the most common and practically significant use of the mechanism, and the use with which we are concerned in this chapter. The basis for overreaching beneficial interests under a trust of land must therefore be found outside the terms of s 2.

On what basis are the beneficial interests under a trust of land 'capable of being overreached'? Four theories have been advanced, three of which are consistent with the view that overreaching has the same basis and scope in registered and unregistered land. These three theories are:

- that overreaching is provided for by s 27(1) of the LPA 1925;
- that it is based on the doctrine of conversion; or
- that overreaching is inherent in the trustees' powers of disposition.

It will be seen that only the last of these provides a convincing basis for overreaching of the beneficial interests under a trust of land.

The fourth theory is that, while the trustees' powers of disposition provide the basis of overreaching in unregistered land, the Land Registration Act 1925 (LRA 1925) provided—and the Land Registration Act 2002 (LRA 2002) now provides—its own basis for the operation of the mechanism in registered land. On this fourth view, the basis of overreaching and, as a consequence, its scope differs between registered and unregistered land.

2.2.1 Overreaching and s 27(1) of the Law of Property Act 1925

The first theory is that s 27(1) of the LPA 1925 provides the basis of overreaching.

[3] The analogous requirement in para (iv) is found in the requirement that the interest is 'bound by' the court order.

[4] A full discussion of the scope of the Settled Land Act, s 72, is provided in Megarry and Wade: The Law of Real Property (7th edn, eds Harpum et al, 2008), [A-093]–[A-100].

[5] Personal representatives have the same functions as trustees of land (by virtue of the Administration of Estates Act 1925, s 9(1)(ii)) and therefore the interests capable of being overreached on an exercise of these powers are the same as those overreached on a sale by trustees of land.

[6] The effect of such overreaching is considered in Horsham Properties Group Ltd v Clark [2008] EWHC 2327, [50]–[51].

Law of Property Act 1925, s 27(1)

(1) A purchaser of a legal estate from trustees of land shall not be concerned with the trusts affecting the land, the net income of the land or the proceeds of sale of the land whether or not those trusts are declared by the same instrument as that by which the trust of land is created.

From Harpum's seminal analysis of overreaching[7] (parts of which are extracted below), it is apparent that there are at least two difficulties with using s 27(1) as the basis of the mechanism. Firstly, while we are concerned only with the operation of overreaching in relation to land, the same mechanism is applied to trusts of personal property. Therefore, it cannot have its basis in legislation, such as s 27(1), which is applicable only to land. Secondly, overreaching itself pre-dates the 1925 legislation and therefore its basis must be found outside that legislation.[8]

What, then, is the effect of s 27(1)? It appears to serve two purposes. Firstly, it seems likely that it was intended merely as a declaration of the existing law.[9] It provides a statement of the effect of a conveyance that complies with the conditions of overreaching, but it does not provide the basis for the mechanism itself, nor does it negate the need to show that those conditions have been complied with.[10] Secondly, it absolves the purchasers from any need to ensure that the trustees apply the purchase money in accordance with the terms of the trust.

2.2.2 Overreaching and the doctrine of conversion

The second theory is that the basis of overreaching lies in the doctrine of conversion. That doctrine, which applied to trusts for sale, had the effect that, from the inception of the trust, the beneficiaries were considered to have an interest in the proceeds of sale of the land, rather than the land itself.[11] The doctrine was abolished by s 3 of the Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996 (TOLATA 1996).

If the doctrine of conversion provided the basis of overreaching of beneficial interests under a trust for sale, then overreaching should not be possible where trustees hold land under a trust of land, rather than under a trust for sale. This would mean that the 1996 Act, in removing the statutory trust for sale formerly imposed in cases of co-ownership of land, would have dramatically limited the applicability of overreaching. Such a consequence would be wholly unintended. In its report that led to the 1996 Act, the Law Commission specifically envisaged the application of overreaching to trusts of land.[12]

On an initial analysis, there appears to be a logical connection between the doctrine of conversion, providing that beneficiaries have only an interest in proceeds of sale from the inception of the trust, and overreaching, which leaves beneficiaries with a claim against the

7 Harpum, 'Overreaching, Trusteees' Powers and the Reform of the 1925 Legislation' (1990) 49 CLJ 277.
8 Ibid, 278.
9 Explained in the annotation of the section provided by Wolstenholme and Cherry, Conveyancing Statutes (11th edn, 1932).
10 Hopkins, 'Overreaching and the Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996' [1997] Conv 81, 82.
11 The doctrine is further explained in Chapter 17, section 5.3.
12 Law Commission Report No 181, Transfer of Land: Trusts of Land (1989), [6.1].

proceeds on sale. But despite this apparent connection between conversion and overreaching, it seems that conversion did not, in fact, provide the basis on which overreaching took place within a trust for sale. Indeed, Harpum dismissed any suggestion of a connection between the doctrines as a misconception.

Harpum, 'Overreaching, Trustees' Powers and the Reform of the 1925 Legislation' (1990) 49 CLJ 277, 278–9

> The second misconception is that overreaching is connected with the doctrine of conversion, at least in relation to trusts for sale. Because of that doctrine, it is said that the interests of the beneficiaries are from the inception of the trust in the proceeds of sale. Such a view is untenable as an explanation of overreaching. First, a disposition under a mere power of sale will overreach just as much as a disposition under a trust for sale, and this is so even though the doctrine of conversion has no application to powers of sale. Secondly, the doctrine of conversion is usually relevant to determine whether beneficial interests are in land or in personalty. Overreaching applies as much to trusts for sale of personalty as to trusts of realty. Thirdly, overreaching is concerned to transfer trusts from the original subject-matter of the trust to the actual proceeds after sale. The beneficial interests of those entitled under a trust for sale, by reason of the doctrine of conversion, are regarded for certain purposes as interests in the notional proceeds of sale from the date of the creation of the trust. There is no inevitability about the application of the doctrine of conversion to trusts for sale, and indeed the doctrine suffers from inherent logical flaws. The correct approach in every case is, it is suggested, to ask whether, as a matter of policy and for the particular purpose in issue, the interests of the beneficiaries should be regarded as interests in the subject matter of the trust or in the proceeds. It is not easy to predict whether the doctrine of conversion will ever again be used to explain overreaching. Lord Oliver, who in analysing the interests of tenants in common in City of London Building Society v. Flegg, favoured a strict application of the doctrine of conversion, certainly assumed that overreaching occurred on sale, but at the same time cited with approval the statement that "[t]he whole purpose of the trust for sale is to make sure, by shifting the equitable interests away from the land and into the proceeds of sale, that a purchaser of the land takes free from the equitable interests".

2.2.3 Overreaching and trustees' powers of disposition

The third theory is that the basis of overreaching of beneficial interests under a trust is the trustees' powers of disposition. Harpum, who describes overreaching as a 'necessary concomitant' of such powers, favours this theory.[13] In relation to trusts of land, this means that the basis of overreaching of beneficial interests under such trusts is the powers of disposition conferred on trustees by s 6 of the TOLATA 1996.

Locating the basis of overreaching in the trustees' powers has now attracted a significant degree of acceptance.[14] Ultimately, in view of the shortfalls identified in the other two theories, this view provides the most satisfactory explanation of the basis of overreaching of beneficial interests under a trust of land that can be applied to both registered and unregistered land. The theory is not, however, without its own difficulties. For example, as Sparkes notes,[15] there is nothing in the 1996 Act to say that trustees, having exercised a power of sale, hold the proceeds on trust for the beneficiaries. There is no doubt that such a trust exists, because the trustees cannot take the proceeds themselves, but because the trust is the necessary consequence of overreaching, this omission appears odd if the exercise of powers conferred by the 1996 Act provides the basis through which the mechanism operates.[16]

[13] Harpum (1990), p 277.

[14] See Snell's Equity (32nd edn, ed McGhee, 2010), [4.013]; Smith, Plural Ownership (2005), pp 184–5, Fox, 'Overreaching' in Breach of Trust (ed Birks and Pretto, 2002), ch 4; McFarlane, The Structure of Property Law (2008), pp 394–404.

Further, using the trustees' powers as the basis of overreaching has also given rise to one of the key remaining issues on the scope of the mechanism. If the basis of overreaching lies in the trustees' powers, it follows that overreaching can take place only when the trustees are acting within those powers. We consider below the different arguments that have been raised as regards dispositions by trustees that are ultra vires their powers of disposition.

2.2.4 Overreaching in registered land

The final theory to consider is that the LRA 1925 provided its own basis of overreaching for registered land, which has been carried over into the LRA 2002.

Jackson has advanced this argument.[17]

Jackson, 'Overreaching in Registered Land Law' (2006) 69 MLR 214, 227–8

Any purchaser from a trustee also takes a title under section 20 [of the Land Registration Act 1925], whether he has notice of adverse equities or not: 'and the disposition shall operate in like manner as if the registered transferor or grantor were [. . .] entitled to the registered land in fee simple in possession for his own benefit'. Benjamin Cherry, in his evidence to the Royal Commission on the Land Transfer Acts, describes this as the 'overreaching' effect of registration. Apart from restrictions, which prevented registration of a transfer that did not comply with their terms, trusts were kept off the face of title. Section 94(1) of the Land Registration Act 1925 provided that trustees are registered as proprietors, not as trustees. There was also a direction in section 74 to keep trusts, as far as possible, off the face of the register. [. . .]

The effect of sections 20, 74 and 94 is to bring about a substantive alteration in the nature of the beneficial interest from a proprietary claim to a claim solely against the substitute property or proceeds of sale in the hands of the trustee(s). Some minor interests could become burdens on the land by registration against the title. Other matters could not be protected against a purchaser in this way, such as interests under a trust for sale or settlements. Such interests could be protected by entries on the register that restricted the registered owner's freedom to deal with the land. The intention behind these restrictions was to ensure that the land was dealt with in accordance with the terms of the trust or settlement. The nature of the beneficiary's interest changed from a proprietary right to a mere restriction or 'restraint on alienation'. But the default position was that trustee proprietors would be able to deal with the land as any ordinary proprietor could.

[15] Sparkes, A New Land Law (2nd edn, 2003), [13.51]. He notes the contrast with the trust for sale, where a trust of the proceeds was express within the terms of the trust.

[16] Although see the explanation provided by McFarlane (2008), pp 400–1.

[17] This argument is not without support in previous literature. For example, see the discussion of the Land Registration Act 1925, s 18, by Harpum (1990), p 308. His comments on s 18 were, however, rejected by Ferris and Battersby, 'The Impact of the Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996 on Purchasers of Registered Land' (1998) Conv 168, 180–4, further developed in their subsequent work 'Overreaching and the Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996: A Reply to Mr Dixon' [2001] Conv 221 and 'General Principles of Overreaching and the Reforms of the 1925 Legislation' (2002) 118 LQR 270, 281–2.

In essence, Jackson's argument is that, in registered land, overreaching arises through the process of registration itself. It is the cumulative effect of provisions aimed at keeping trusts off the register and those protecting purchasers from matters that have not been entered on the register as a restriction on how land can be dealt with. While the statutory provisions upon which Jackson's argument is based have changed in the LRA 2002, she suggests that the same scheme of overreaching has been maintained.[18]

If Jackson is correct, a chasm has been created between the operation of overreaching in registered and unregistered land. The basis and scope of overreaching in each would need to be separated. Two significant practical consequences follow. Firstly, if overreaching is not based on the trustees' powers of disposition, then it arises regardless of whether the trustees are acting within their powers.[19] The discussion of this matter (in section 4 below) would be an issue only for unregistered land.

Secondly, a disposition by a single trustee in registered land would overreach beneficial interests. The need for any capital money to be paid to two trustees would not apply to registered land unless, again, entered as a restriction on the register. The discussion (below) of this requirement would also be confined to unregistered land.[20]

Jackson's theory, as she acknowledges, is against the current authorities and the 'universally unquestioned' view that ss 2 and 27 of the LPA 1925 apply equally to registered and unregistered land.[21] To date, courts have not differentiated the operation of overreaching in each scheme of land. To do so now (with the practical consequences that would follow) would require a fundamental reversal of current understanding. It is notable that Jackson's argument is developed around the LRA 1925. If that Act was intended to provide a self-contained scheme of overreaching, which has therefore not been properly applied by the courts, the LRA 2002 provided an opportunity to reassess the position. In the absence of any clarification provided by that Act, it seems unlikely that Jackson's argument will find acceptance by the courts. Therefore, it is suggested that the better view remains that, for both registered and unregistered land, the basis of overreaching lies in the trustees' powers of disposition.

2.2.5 Other interests capable of being overreached

In addition to the interests for which overreaching is provided in s 2 of the LPA 1925, it has been accepted that some interests claimed under proprietary estoppel must also be capable of being overreached.

Birmingham Midshires Mortgage Services Ltd v Sabherwal
(2000) 80 P & CR 256, CA

Facts: Mrs Sabherwal lived in a house with her two sons and their families. Legal title to the house was vested in the sons who had defaulted on charges granted to BMMS to raise [18] Jackson, 'Overreaching in Registered Land Law' (2006) 69 MLR 214, 241, fn 183.

[19] A consequence confirmed by Jackson, 'Overreaching and Unauthorised Disposition of Registered Land' [2007] Conv 120. She says, at 129: 'I contend that an unauthorised disposition by trustees of registered land would always overreach.'

[20] In this respect, it should be noted that while the Law of Property Act 1925, s 2(1)(ii), refers to a conveyance by 'trustees of land' in the plural, this is no bar to an argument for overreaching by a single trustee. The Interpretation Act 1978, s 6(c), provides 'words in the singular include the plural and words in the plural include the singular'.

[21] Jackson (2007), p 229.

money to support their business ventures. Mrs Sabherwal sought to establish that she had a proprietary interest in the house binding against BMMS. One argument made was that she had an interest through proprietary estoppel, which, in contrast to a beneficial interest under a trust of land, was not capable of being overreached.

Robert Walker LJ

At [24]–[32]

On the facts of this case, Mrs Sabherwal plainly made a substantial financial contribution to all the properties successively owned by the family. She could rely on a resulting trust and had no need to rely on proprietary estoppel (if and so far as the two are, in the context of the family home, distinct doctrines: see the observations of Sir Nicolas Browne-Wilkinson V-C in Grant v Edwards [1986] 1 Ch 638, [1986] 2 All ER 426 at 656 of the former report). If she had made no financial contribution, but had nevertheless acted to her detriment in reliance on her sons promises, she might have obtained (through the medium of estoppel rather than through the medium of a trust) equitable rights of a proprietary nature. Her actual occupation of the house would then have promoted those rights into an overriding interest. That, I think, is not conceded by counsel for the respondents but I assume that to be the case. On that basis, it would have been a remarkable result if those more precarious rights were incapable of being overreached, on a sale by trustees, under s 2(1)(ii) of the Law of Property Act 1925.

Mr Beaumont has however contended for that result, citing what Lord Wilberforce said in Shiloh Spinners v Harding [1973] AC 691, [1973] 1 All ER 90 at 721 of the former report:

> "All this seems to show that there may well be rights, of an equitable character, outside the provisions as to registration and which are incapable of being overreached."

Lord Wilberforce had just before referred to ER Ives Investment Ltd v High [1967] 2 QB 379, [1967] 1 All ER 504. In that case a boundary dispute between neighbours had been settled by an informal agreement including the grant of a right of way. The agreement about the right of way was never completed by a deed of grant, and was never registered. The Court of Appeal held that it was binding despite the lack of registration. Similarly, Shiloh Spinners v Harding was concerned with an equitable right of entry for enforcement of a covenant arising in what Lord Wilberforce called a dispute [. . .] of a commonplace character between neighbours.

Equitable interests of that character ought not to be overreached, since they are rights which an adjoining owner enjoys over the land itself, regardless of its ownership from time to time. The principle is in my view correctly stated in Megarry and Wade, The Law of Real Property 5th ed p 409:

> "In fact the only examples of such equities likely to occur are commercial (as opposed to family) interests, which it is absurd to speak of overreaching. Two instances are an equitable right of way which is yet not an equitable easement, and an equitable right of entry to secure performance of a covenant, and there are probably others. To overreach such interests is to destroy them [. . .]"

The footnotes to this passage refer to ER Ives Investment Ltd v High and Shiloh Spinners v Harding (cases which were cited to the House of Lords in Flegg—see especially counsels argument at p 63—but are not referred to in any of the speeches of their Lordships). The essential distinction is, as the authors of Megarry and Wade note, between commercial and family interests. An equitable easement or an equitable right of entry cannot sensibly shift from the land affected by it to the proceeds of sale. An equitable interest as a tenant in common can do so, even if accompanied by the promise of a home for life, since the proceeds of sale can be used to acquire another home.

Mr Beaumont has also argued that, although in Grant v Edwards the Vice-Chancellor regarded interests in the family home created by equitable estoppel or by a constructive trust as closely similar, if not interchangeable, his remarks do not apply to a resulting trust arising from a monetary contribution. This is an area of the law in which the terminology is unfortunately far from uniform, but I do not accept that the Vice-Chancellors remarks were limited in that way. On the contrary, immediately after his reference to proprietary estoppel he said (see [1986] Ch 657, H-658A):

> "Identifiable contributions to the purchase [price] of the house will of course be an important factor in many cases."

Similarly, in Lloyds Bank v Rosset [1991] 1 AC 107, [1990] 1 All ER 1111 Lord Bridge (in a very well-known passage at pp 132–3 of the former report) referred to direct contributions to the purchase price by [a party] who is not the legal owner, as readily justifying the creation of a constructive trust. Such a trust, however labelled, does not then leave room for a separate interest by way of equitable estoppel: compare the remarks of Morritt LJ in Lloyds Bank v Carrick [1996] 4 All ER 630, [1996] 2 FLR 600 at p 639C-E of the former report. To do so would cause vast confusion in an area which is already quite difficult enough. The confusion is avoided if what Lord Wilberforce said in Shiloh Spinners v Harding is limited, as in my judgment it must be, to some unusual types of equitable interest arising in commercial situations. In this type of family situation, the concepts of trust and equitable estoppel are almost interchangeable, and both are affected in the same way by the statutory mechanism of overreaching, the substance of which is not affected by the 1996 Act.

In these circumstances I do not find it necessary to consider how far the judges findings in this area (which were largely limited to a general acceptance of Mrs Sabherwal's evidence) would establish the necessary conditions for proprietary estoppel. I assume in favour of Mrs Sabherwal that they would do so.

On the basis of this decision, family interests under a proprietary estoppel are capable of being overreached, while commercial interests are not. To have held otherwise would have created a significant lacuna in the operation of overreaching: the mechanism could be avoided simply by claiming an interest through proprietary estoppel rather than constructive trust. To that extent, the decision seems correct—but questions may still arise as to its scope and therefore to the extent to which interests claimed through proprietary estoppel can be overreached. It is unclear whether the category of 'family' interests to which overreaching is extended is limited to those circumstances, exemplified by the facts of Sabherwal, in which claims to estoppel and constructive trusts coincide, or could apply to other circumstances in which estoppel claims arise in relation to a home. Robert Walker LJ's definition of a family interest is sufficiently broad to cover such cases.

Harpum considered the scope of the judgment. Although generally adopting a restrictive approach, his comment implies that the case is not limited to situations in which trusts and estoppel coincide.

Harpum, 'Overreaching, Trusts of Land and Proprietary Estoppel'
(2000) 116 LQR 341, 344–5

Thus in determining whether an inchoate equity arising by estoppel is overreached by a disposition to two or more owners, it is necessary to consider the manner in which the court

> might have given effect to that equity. Robert Walker L.J. considered that the essential difference was between "commercial and family interests". The latter but not the former were overreachable. That may, however, be an oversimplification. If effect would be given to the equity by the creation or transfer of a legal estate in land or by the grant of a legal or equitable right over land, then the equity should be incapable of being overreached. However, if the appropriate way of giving effect to the equity was by means of an interest that could properly be converted into money on sale, such as an interest under a trust of land or a lien, the equity should be overreachable.

The scope of Sabherwal must be considered to remain uncertain. Overreaching of interests claimed through estoppel where a constructive trust would not also be available appears to be outside the ratio of the decision. Because the basis of overreaching is the trustees' powers of disposition, there is a difficulty in extending the operation of the mechanism to situations in which no trust could be claimed. On that view, there is simply no basis on which an equitable interest not arising under a trust can be overreached. Indeed, even if overreaching is limited in that way, it is not necessary to extend overreaching to interests under estoppel. The same result can be achieved by reliance on the suggestion in Lloyds Bank v Carrick[22] (referred to in the judgment extracted above and discussed in Chapter 13, section 5.8) that the existence of a constructive (or resulting) trust precludes any further claim to an interest through estoppel.

2.3 TRANSACTIONS WITH OVERREACHING EFFECT

Once it is established that an interest is capable of being overreached, overreaching will take place only if the transaction is one that has such effect. Three requirements must be met. Firstly, there is an overarching requirement, reflecting the fact that overreaching has its basis within the trustees' powers, that the transaction is one that is within the powers of the trustees. We consider below the effect of transactions that do not fulfil this requirement.

The second and third requirements are drawn from the LPA 1925. The second requirement is that the transaction must be one of those listed in s 2(1)(i)–(iv) of the Act (extracted above) as having overreaching effect. The third is that s 2(1)(i) and (ii) provides that, to overreach beneficial interests under a trust, statutory requirements as regards payment of capital money must be complied with. These requirements are contained in s 27(2) of the 1925 Act.

Law of Property Act 1925, s 27(2)

> (2) Notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the instrument (if any) creating a trust of land or in any trust affecting the net proceeds of sale of the land if it is sold, the proceeds of sale or other capital money shall not be paid to or applied by the direction of fewer than two persons as [trustees], except where the trustee is a trust corporation, but this subsection does not affect the right of a sole personal representative as such to give valid receipts for, or direct the application of, proceeds of sale or other capital money, nor, except where capital money arises on the transaction, render it necessary to have more than one trustee.

[22] [1996] 4 All ER 630.

This provision, like s 2, applies equally to registered and unregistered land. In registered land, trustees should enter a restriction on the register preventing a disposition unless s 27(2) is complied with. But (contrary to Jackson's argument, discussed above) the absence of a restriction does not remove the need for the requirement to be complied with in order for a purchaser to rely on the overreaching mechanism.

Neither ss 2 nor 27 state in their terms that there must be capital money for overreaching to take place. They impose requirements to be met when such money does arise. The fact that capital money will be paid may be thought to be inherent in overreaching as a process of 'shifting' beneficial interests from the land to money: if no money is paid, into what can the beneficial interests shift? In identifying the trustees powers of disposition as the basis of overreaching of the beneficial interests under a trust, however, Harpum indicated that this was not, in fact, the case.

Harpum, 'Overreaching, Trusteees' Powers and the Reform of the 1925 Legislation' (1990) 49 CLJ 277, 282

[T]he interest created or the estate granted by the exercise of the power takes priority over the estates and interests under the settlement. The exercise of a power which does not give rise to any capital monies—such as an exchange of land—overreaches just as much as a transaction which does.

This statement proved prescient when the application of overreaching to a transaction in which no capital money arose came to be decided in the following case. The Court of Appeal cited Harpum's comment with approval in holding that such a transaction still has overreaching effect.

State Bank of India v Sood
[1997] Ch 276, CA

Facts: Mr and Mrs Sood were registered proprietors of their home. They granted a charge over the home for existing and future liabilities of themselves and their business. No capital money was advanced contemporaneously with this disposition, but, over a period of time, Mr and Mrs Sood accrued debts of over £1m and the State Bank of India (to which the benefit of the charge had been assigned by the Punjab National Bank) sought to enforce the charge. The five children of the couple (the third to seventh defendants) argued that they were beneficiaries under a trust of land and that their beneficial interests had not been overreached.

Peter Gibson LJ

At 279–90

The question can be formulated in this way: where two trustees for sale hold registered land for themselves and other beneficiaries and mortgage the land as security for existing and future liabilities of themselves and other persons, are the equitable interests of the beneficiaries overreached, notwithstanding that no money was advanced by the mortgagee to or at the direction of the trustees contemporaneously with the mortgage? The judge in effect answered that question in the negative. [. . .]

There is no dispute that the equitable interests of the third to seventh defendants were at the date of the legal charge capable of being overreached. That condition of section 2(1)(ii) was therefore satisfied. Most of the argument has turned on the final condition of that paragraph relating to compliance with the statutory requirements respecting the payment of capital money. [. . .]

I accept that a novel and important point of law is raised by this appeal. Lending institutions regularly take security from businessmen in the form of a legal charge on property (which very frequently means that the matrimonial home is charged) to secure existing and future indebtedness, and very commonly that property will be registered land held by two registered proprietors on trust for sale with no restriction registered in respect of their power to transfer or mortgage that property. It was not suggested that it had ever been the practice of mortgagees to make inquiries of occupiers of the property as to any claimed rights. Yet if the third to seventh defendants are right, that is what the mortgagees must do if they are not to take subject to the beneficial interests of the occupiers. [. . .]

The crucial issue is the true construction of the final condition of section 2(1)(ii) relating to compliance with statutory requirements respecting the payment of capital money. There is no dispute that if capital money does arise under a conveyance by trustees for sale to a purchaser it must be paid to or applied as section 27(2) dictates. But for overreaching to occur, does capital money have to arise on and contemporaneously with the conveyance?

The judge appears to have assumed that there could be no overreaching if no capital money arose.

He said:

> "we have to look to see whether capital money was paid [to] or applied by the direction of the two trustees. If it was, then the defendants have no defence; if it was not, then the bank cannot overreach and they have an arguable defence on the evidence."

Mr. Havey and Mr. Williams submitted that was indeed the position and they said that the arising of capital money on the conveyance was the assumption on which section 2(1)(ii) was drafted. Mr. Crawford's initial submission accorded with that view, but he sought to escape the consequences by contending that capital money arose whenever the Punjab National Bank advanced money, even if before the legal charge was executed. However, I cannot accept that what was done prior to the legal charge has any relevance to the condition that "the statutory requirements respecting the payment of capital money arising under a disposition upon trust for sale are complied with." Nor can I accept Mr. Crawford's further submission that the debt existing at the date of the legal charge was not materially different from the secured debt which existed at the date of the mortgage in Flegg and was discharged in that case out of the money raised. The circumstances are wholly different.

Mr. Crawford however had recourse to a further submission, adopting a point suggested by the court, that the relevant condition in section 2(1)(ii) should be construed as applying only to those cases where there was capital money arising under a disposition upon trust for sale, the statutory requirements of section 27(2) being simply irrelevant to a transaction under which no capital money arises. There are several types of conveyance to a purchaser (within the statutory meanings of those terms) other than a charge to secure existing and future debt which do not give rise to capital money, for example, an exchange or a lease not at a premium. Why should the legislature have intended to exclude such conveyances from having an overreaching effect? It is interesting to note that the precursor of section 2(1), viz. section 3(2)(ii) of the Law of Property Act 1922, used as one of the conditions for overreaching to occur the formula "If any capital money arises from the transaction [. . .] the requirements of this Act respecting the payment of capital money arising under a trust for sale [. . .] are complied with." However the form of section 3(2) differed in a number of respects from section 2(1) of the Act of 1925 and it may not be safe to infer that the later provision was intended to re-enact the substance of the earlier provision. But it points to the relevant condition of section 2(1) being worded in surprisingly oblique fashion if what was intended was that capital money must arise so that the statutory requirements can be complied with. Mr. Havey drew attention to the word "any" in connection with "capital money" in section 2(1)(iii) and (iv) and suggested that its omission from the reference to "capital money" in section 2(1)(i) and (ii) was significant. But the structure of those paragraphs is quite different from section 2(1)(iii) and (iv) and the draftsman could not have achieved the effect of section 3(2) of the Act of 1922 by adding "any" before "capital money" in section 2(1)(i) or (ii).

The relevant condition in section 2(1)(ii) is the same as that in section 2(1)(i). The overreaching powers conferred by the Settled Land Act 1925 include power to convey by an exchange or lease as well as by a mortgage or charge where capital money may not arise (see section 72 of that Act). The statutory requirements governing capital money (to be paid to or applied by the direction of not less than two individuals or a trust corporation: sections 94 and 95 of that Act) can only apply to those conveyances giving rise to capital money. The same interpretation must apply to the condition in section 2(1)(i) as it does to the conveyancing condition in section 2(1)(ii).

A more substantial argument of policy advanced on behalf of the third to seventh defendants is that if overreaching occurs where no capital money arises, the beneficiaries' interests may be reduced by the conveyance leaving nothing to which the interests can attach by way of replacement save the equity of redemption, and that may be or become valueless. I see considerable force in this point, but I am not persuaded that it suffices to defeat what I see to be the policy of the legislation, to allow valid dispositions to overreach equitable interests. In my judgment on its true construction section 2(1)(ii) only requires compliance with the statutory requirements respecting the payment of capital money if capital money arises. Accordingly I would hold that capital money did not have to arise under the conveyance.

The judge further said:

> "I consider that overreaching must take place at the time of the execution. I think that the plaintiff does not object to that in principle, but says that the defendants' right simply attaches to the equity of redemption; but I do not think one can have a condition of over-reaching on moneys which may or may not be drawn down later. For overreaching to take effect all parts of section 27(2) must be complied with; it is a two stage process which requires, first, the existence of either proceeds of sale or capital moneys and, secondly, those are either to be paid to the two trustees or applied at their discretion. The plaintiff says it does not matter-because there was a general direction for application in the charge-if it comes into existence or is applied at a subsequent time. I think that is wrong; it is necessary for the moneys to be in existence at the time of the charge so that those moneys can either be received or applied at the trustees' directions."

[. . .]

Both Mr. Harvey and Mr. Williams supported the judge's conclusion that some capital money must arise contemporaneously with the conveyance for there to be overreaching. They said that if a conveyance provided only for deferred payment, that would not suffice. They further submitted that provided some capital money arose contemporaneously with the conveyance and section 27(2) was complied with, overreaching would occur even though other money was subsequently advanced under the conveyance. Thus if a £1m facility was secured by a mortgage and in the course of time was fully drawn on but at the time of the mortgage only £100 was advanced, there would nevertheless be overreaching in respect of the whole £1m thereby secured, whereas if the £100 had not been advanced at the time of the mortgage, there would have been no overreaching. I do not believe that the statutory language supports a requirement producing such a surprising and illogical result. Mr. Havey > drew our attention to a large number of provisions in the Settled Land Act 1925 which, he said, showed that money arising from a transaction must be received or applied at the same time as the transaction. I cannot agree, though I of course accept that to be paid or applied, capital money must be in hand. If and to the extent that capital money arises after the conveyance, section 27(2) must be complied with for the mortgagee to obtain a good receipt. If it is not, for example if an advance is made after a mortgage has been executed but under a facility provided for by the mortgage but is not paid to or at the direction of two or more trustees or a trust corporation, that would not affect the overreaching which would have occurred on the mortgage. [. . .]

>
> The correct analysis of the position in the present case is that on the execution of the legal charge, the interests of the third to seventh defendants were overreached and attached to the equity of redemption. The legal estate in the property was by the legal charge made subject to the rights thereunder of the Punjab National Bank which were subsequently assigned to the plaintiff, including the right to sell the property. The value of the equity of redemption on the execution of the legal charge would reflect the then existing liabilities thereby secured. That value would be further reduced as further liabilities arose and were secured under the legal charge. In the light of City of London Building Society v. Flegg [1986] Ch. 605; [1988] A.C. 54 it follows from the overreaching that section 70(1)(g) does not avail the third to seventh defendants and that their defence on this point cannot succeed and should be struck out. On the assumption that they were not consulted about the legal charge by the first and second defendants, it may be that they have the right to obtain redress against the trustees.
>
> Much though I value the principle of overreaching as having aided the simplification of conveyancing, I cannot pretend that I regard the resulting position in the present case as entirely satisfactory. The safeguard for beneficiaries under the existing legislation is largely limited to having two trustees or a trust corporation where capital money falls to be received. But that is no safeguard at all, as this case has shown, when no capital money is received on and contemporaneously with the conveyance. Further, even when it is received by two trustees as in City of London Building Society v. Flegg [1986] Ch. 605; [1988] A.C. 54, it might be thought that beneficiaries in occupation are insufficiently protected. Hence the recommendation for reform in the Law Commission's report, "Transfer of Land, Overreaching: Beneficiaries in Occupation" (1989) (Law Com. No. 188), that a conveyance should not overreach the interest of a sui juris beneficiary in occupation unless he gives his consent. Mr. Harpum in the article to which reference has been made proposed an alternative reform, limiting the power of trustees to mortgage. Whether the legislature will reform the law remains to be seen. I should add for completeness that we were assured by counsel that the recent Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996 was of no assistance and we have not considered its effect.

In the absence of capital money, there may still be a shifting of the beneficial interests. In Sood, the interests shifted to the equity of redemption. To the extent that this may be valueless, where the debt equals or exceeds the value of the property, the result is no harsher than that in a case, exemplified by City of London Building Society v Flegg,[23] in which capital money is paid to the trustees, but is dissipated by them.

In Sood, two trustees executed the charge. If s 27(2) applies only to dispositions in which capital money is paid, however, it seems that a sole trustee (in registered and unregistered land) can overreach beneficial interests through dispositions that do not involve payment of capital money.[24] There is no independent statutory requirement that the transaction must be undertaken by at least two trustees.[25] It is, however, worth noting that if the third party provides nothing in return for the right received from the trustees, overreaching will not occur, because the third party has not acquired a right 'for valuable consideration'.[26]

[23] [1988] AC 54.

Commenting on the decision in Sood, Thompson suggested that the outcome prevents the need to distinguish between different types of mortgage and thus avoids the 'strange results' that Peter Gibson LJ's judgment highlights would result from drawing such distinctions.[27] But if a single trustee can overreach beneficial interests through mortgages (and other dispositions) that do not involve payment of capital money, then the effect of Sood is that it is, in fact, necessary to distinguish between such mortgages. The 'strange results' avoided by the decision in trusts with at least two trustees will arise in sole-trustee trusts. Hence, for example, a mortgage by a sole trustee, with £100 advanced at the outset and debts of £1m subsequently accrued, would not overreach (because the application of s 27(2) would be triggered by the initial payment of capital money), while a mortgage in which the level of borrowing reached the same amount, but with no initial advanced payment, would overreach, because the absence of capital money precludes the application of s 27(2). While it must be doubted that such results are intended, there is no statutory basis for limiting overreaching to transactions undertaken by at least two trustees unless s 27(2) is applied. The unfortunate result is that transactions in which beneficiaries appear most vulnerable are also those in which they are least protected.

Having outlined the general scope of overreaching, we can now consider its application in the specific context of a home occupied by the beneficiaries under a trust of land.

3 CO-OWNERSHIP, OVERREACHING, AND OCCUPYING BENEFICIARIES

We have seen that one of the interests capable of being overreached is the beneficial interest under a trust of land. Indeed, overreaching of such interests is probably the most common and practically important use of the mechanism. The shifting of beneficial interests from land to money appears neither controversial, nor problematic, where the function of the trust property is to provide an investment fund for the beneficiaries. The physical identity of the trust property itself is, then, not of central concern; what is more important is the wealth that it represents. It is of no particular significance to the beneficiaries whether their interest is in any particular piece of land or other type of property; what is important is that the value of the trust fund is maintained by the profitable sale of the land and the reinvestment of the proceeds in other lucrative investments. The trustees' equitable and statutory duties under the Trustee Act 2000 are defined with that objective in mind.

But a trust of land will also arise where co-owners hold land with the intention that they will occupy it as their home. In the common situation in which a couple purchase a home

24 See McFarlane (2008), pp 397–400.

25 Statutory references to 'trustees', e.g. in the Law of Property Act 1925, s 2, may considered by reference to the Interpretation Act 1978, s 6(3), to include a single trustee.

26 Section 2(1) limits overreaching to cases in which the third party is a 'purchaser of a legal estate in land' (this includes a mortgagee); s 205(1)(xxi) of the Law of Property Act 1925 states that, unless the context otherwise requires, a 'purchaser' means a purchaser for 'valuable consideration'.

27 Thompson, 'Overreaching without Payment' [1997] Conv 134.

in their joint names, they are both the legal and beneficial co-owners, and this trust creates no difficulties. Indeed, the couple is likely to be unaware that they deal with the property as trustees for the benefit of themselves as beneficial co-owners.

By contrast, a very real tension can arise where co-owners hold the legal estate on express or implied trust for themselves and others. This is a situation that can occur, for example, where a home is purchased for an extended family, where individuals within the family take the legal estate on trust for themselves and the remaining family members take as beneficial co-owners. The beneficiaries may be concerned not only with the value of their trust property, but also with its identity as their home. Yet overreaching does not recognize this concern. Their interests are assumed to be adequately protected, firstly, by the continued representation of their proprietary rights in the proceeds of sale by the process of overreaching itself, and secondly, by the requirement that at least two trustees receive those proceeds to guard against a misappropriation of the trust property or other breach of duty. If a misappropriation or other breach of duty does occur, the beneficiaries' proprietary interests are placed in jeopardy against a purchaser by overreaching, but the beneficiaries retain their personal remedies against the trustees to redress any loss in value of the trust fund.

The tension between trust property as a home for beneficiaries and the wealth that it represents came to a head in the following case. The Fleggs' main arguments focused on the need to afford protection to their occupation of the trust property as their home, by treating investment and occupation trusts differently. They argued, relying on William & Glyn's Bank v Boland,[28] that their beneficial interests bound the mortgagees as an overriding interest, and that an overriding beneficial interest should not be overreached. Further, they suggested that s 14 of the LPA 1925 operated to protect the interests of occupiers. If the land had been unregistered, the Fleggs would have argued that their occupation gave a purchaser constructive notice of their interest, so as to confer priority under the doctrine of notice. The House of Lords rejected these arguments. Overreaching operated, provided that the statutory conditions were satisfied. At that point, the Fleggs' beneficial interest in their home was transferred to the proceeds of sale so that there simply was no interest in the land that their occupation (or, indeed, any entry on the register) could protect.

City of London Building Society v Flegg
[1988] AC 54, HL

Facts: Mr and Mrs Flegg sold their home of 28 years and, in 1982, contributed the £18,000 proceeds to the purchase of Bleak House as a new home for themselves, and their daughter and son-in-law, Mrs and Mrs Maxwell-Brown. The balance of the £34,000 purchase price was funded by a mortgage. Despite their solicitor's advice that Bleak House should be registered in the names of all four parties, it was, in fact, registered in the joint names of Mr and Mrs Maxwell-Brown, who, given the Fleggs' contribution to the purchase price, held the house as joint tenants on resulting trust for themselves and Mr and Mrs Flegg. Bleak House was occupied and became the home of all four parties. The Maxwell-Browns ran into financial difficulties and, without the knowledge or consent of the Flegg's, remortgaged the house to the City of London Building Society to raise £37,500. The Fleggs must have been suspicious and, before the mortgage could be registered, they entered a caution against dealings at the Land Registry. Unfortunately, the Maxwell-Browns were unable to meet the repayments under the mortgage, and the building society sought a declaration that the mortgage bound and could be enforced against the Fleggs' interest, and an order for possession.

[28] [1981] 1 AC 487.

Lord Templeman

At 71–4

The respondents resist the claim of the appellants to possession of Bleak House and rely on section 14 of the Law of Property Act 1925. Sections 27 and 28 of that Act which overreach the interests of the respondents under the trust for sale of Bleak House are to be found in Part I of the Act. Section 14 provides:

> "This Part of this Act shall not prejudicially affect the interest of any person in possession or in actual occupation of land to which he may be entitled in right of such possession or occupation."

The respondents were in actual occupation of Bleak House at the date of the legal charge. It is argued that their beneficial interests under the trust for sale were not overreached by the legal charge or that the respondents were entitled to remain in occupation after the legal charge and against the appellants despite the overreaching of their interests. [. . .]

If the argument for the respondents is correct, a purchaser from trustees for sale must ensure that a beneficiary in actual occupation is not only consulted but consents to the sale. Section 14 of the Law of Property Act 1925 is not apt to confer on a tenant in common of land held on trust for sale, who happens to be in occupation, rights which are different from and superior to the rights of tenants in common, who are not in occupation on the date when the interests of all tenants in common are overreached by a sale or mortgage by trustees for sale. [. . .]

In my view the object of section 70 was to reproduce for registered land the same limitations as section 14 of the Law of Property Act 1925 produced for land whether registered or unregistered. The respondents claim to be entitled to overriding interests because they were in actual occupation of Bleak House on the date of the legal charge. But the interests of the respondents cannot at one and the same time be overreached and overridden and at the same time be overriding interests. The appellants cannot at one and the same time take free from all the interests of the respondents yet at the same time be subject to some of those interests. The right of the respondents to be and remain in actual occupation of Bleak House ceased when the respondents' interests were overreached by the legal charge save in so far as their rights were transferred to the equity of redemption. As persons interested under the trust for sale the respondents had no right to possession as against the appellants and the fact that the respondents were in actual occupation at the date of the legal charge did not create a new right or transfer an old right so as to make the right enforceable against the appellants.

One of the main objects of the legislation of 1925 was to effect a compromise between on the one hand the interests of the public in securing that land held in trust is freely marketable and, on the other hand, the interests of the beneficiaries in preserving their rights under the trusts. By the Settled Land Act 1925 a tenant for life may convey the settled land discharged from all the trusts powers and provisions of the settlement. By the Law of Property Act 1925 trustees for sale may convey land held on trust for sale discharged from the trusts affecting the proceeds of sale and rents and profits until sale. Under both forms of trust the protection and the only protection of the beneficiaries is that capital money must be paid to at least two trustees or a trust corporation. Section 14 of the Law of Property Act 1925 and section 70 of the Land Registration Act 1925 cannot have been intended to frustrate this compromise and to subject the purchaser to some beneficial interests but not others depending on the waywardness of actual occupation. The Court of Appeal took a different view, largely in reliance on the decision of this House in Williams & Glyn's Bank Ltd. v. Boland [1981] A.C. 487. In that case the sole proprietor of registered land held the land as sole trustee upon trust for sale and to stand possessed of the net proceeds of sale and rents and profits until sale upon trust for himself and his wife as tenants in common. This House held that the wife's beneficial interest coupled with actual possession by her constituted an overriding interest and that a mortgagee from the husband, despite the concluding words of section 20(1), took subject to the wife's overriding interest. But in that case the interest of the wife was not overreached or overridden because the mortgagee advanced capital moneys to a sole trustee. If the wife's interest had been overreached by the mortgagee advancing capital moneys to two trustees there would have been nothing to justify the wife in remaining in occupation as against the mortgagee. There must be a combination of an interest which justifies continuing occupation plus actual occupation to constitute an overriding interest. Actual occupation is not an interest in itself.

Lord Oliver

At 80–1

My Lords, the ambit of section 14 is a matter which has puzzled conveyancers ever since the Law of Property Act was enacted [...] For my part, I think that it is unnecessary for present purposes to seek to resolve the conundrum. What section 14 does not do, on any analysis, is to enlarge or add to whatever interest it is that the occupant has "in right of his occupation" and in my judgment the argument that places reliance upon it in the instant case founds itself upon an assumption about the nature of the occupying co-owners' interest that cannot in fact be substantiated. The section cannot of itself create an interest which survives the execution of the trust under which it arises or answer the logically anterior question of what, if any, interest in the land is conferred by the possession or occupation [...] the section cannot, in my judgment, have the effect of preserving, as equitable interests in the land, interests which are overreached by the exercise of the trustees' powers or of bringing onto the title which the purchaser from trustees for sale is required to investigate the equitable interest of every beneficiary who happens to be in occupation of the land. That would be to defeat the manifest purpose of the legislature in enacting the sections to which reference has already been made. [...]

At 90–1

Considered in the context of a transaction complying with the statutory requirements of the Law of Property Act 1925 the question of the effect of section 70(1)(g) of the Land Registration Act 1925 must, in my judgment, be approached by asking first what are the "rights" of the person in occupation and whether they are, at the material time, subsisting in reference to the land. In the instant case the exercise by the registered proprietors of the powers conferred on trustees for sale by section 28(1) of the Law of Property Act 1925 had the effect of overreaching the interests of the respondents under the statutory trusts upon which depended their right to continue in occupation of the land. The appellants took free from those trusts (section 27) and were not, in any event, concerned to see that the respondents' consent to the transaction was obtained (section 26). If, then, one asks what were the subsisting rights of the respondents referable to their occupation, the answer must, in my judgment, be that they were rights which, vis-à-vis the appellants, were, eo instante with the creation of the charge, overreached and therefore subsisted only in relation to the equity of redemption. I do not, for my part, find in Boland's case [1981] A.C. 487 anything which compels a contrary conclusion.

Granted that the interest of a co-owner pending the execution of the statutory trust for sale is, despite the equitable doctrine of conversion, an interest subsisting in reference to the land the subject matter of the trust and granted also that Boland's case establishes that such an interest, although falling within the definition of minor interest and so liable to be overriden by a registered disposition, will, so long as it subsists, be elevated to the status of an overriding interest if there exists also the additional element of occupation by the co-owner, I cannot for my part accept that, once what I may call the parent interest, by which alone the occupation can be justified, has been overreached and thus subordinated to a legal estate properly created by the trustees under their statutory powers, it can, in relation to the proprietor of the legal estate so created, be any longer said to be a right "for the time being subsisting." Section 70(1)(g) protects only the rights in reference to the land of the occupier whatever they are at the material time—in the instant case the right to enjoy in specie the rents and profits of the land held in trust for him. Once the beneficiary's rights have been shifted from the land to capital moneys in the hands of the trustees, there is no longer an interest in the land to which the occupation can be referred or which it can protect. If the trustees sell in accordance with the statutory provisions and so overreach the beneficial interests in reference to the land, nothing remains to which a right of occupation can attach and the same result must, in my judgment, follow vis-à-vis a chargee by way of legal mortgage so long as the transaction is carried out in the manner prescribed by the Law of Property Act 1925, overreaching the beneficial interests by subordinating them to the estate of the chargee which is no longer "affected" by them so as to become subject to them on registration pursuant to section 20(1) of the Land Registration Act 1925. In the instant case, therefore, I would, for my part, hold that the charge created in favour of the appellants overreached the beneficial interests of the respondents and that there is nothing in section 70(1)(g) of the Land Registration Act 1925 or in Boland's case which has the effect of preserving against the appellants any rights of the respondents to occupy the land by virtue of their beneficial interests in the equity of redemption which remains vested in the trustees.

Although the decision in Flegg remains the leading authority on the application of overreaching against the overriding interests of occupiers, the framework of the law has moved on. The TOLATA 1996 has reformed trusts of land, including co-ownership trusts. The Fleggs would no longer hold a beneficial interest under a trust for sale, but under a trust of land, and their beneficial interests would be clearly in the land, in respect of which they would have a right of occupation.[29]

In Sabherwal the Court of Appeal considered that the 1996 Act does not affect the application of overreaching. We will see in section 4.1.1 that the matter is not, however, entirely beyond doubt.

Birmingham Midshires Mortgage Services Ltd v Sabherwal
(2000) 80 P & CR 256, CA

Walker LJ

At 261

The judge gave ten reasons for concluding that the decision in Flegg has not been affected by the 1996 Act. Since that conclusion is not directly challenged in this court, at any rate on > the grounds that the judge considered, it is sufficient to mention three of the most cogent of his reasons. First, the overreaching effect of the legal charges took place when they were executed in July 1990, and cannot be ousted by the coming into force of the 1996 Act over six years later. Second, the 1996 Act contains nothing to exclude the essential overreaching provision contained in section 2(1)(ii) of the Law of Property Act 1925. On the contrary, that provision is amended so as to meet the new terminology of the 1996 Act (see section 25(1) and Schedule 3 paragraph 4(1)) and so is in effect confirmed, with that new terminology, by the 1996 Act. Third, the abolition of the doctrine of conversion (by section 3 of the 1996 Act) is irrelevant for reasons stated by Lord Oliver in Flegg. However, the abolition of that doctrine does explain the amendment of s.27(1) of the Law of Property Act 1925, on which some reliance has been placed.

[29] Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996, ss 5, 12, and 13. The beneficiaries' right to occupy is considered in Chapter 17, section 5.3.

The 1996 Act does confer wider implied powers of disposition upon trustees[30] than were conferred by the LPA 1925 and, furthermore, provides protection to the purchasers of unregistered land from the trustees.[31] The LRA 2002 replaces the LRA 1925 and preserves the protection afforded to the interests of occupiers as an overriding interest.[32] It also defines the abilities of the registered owner, including trustees, to dispose of the registered land[33] and provides protection to purchasers dealing with the registered owner, even where the registered owner is a trustee.[34]

4 OVERREACHING AND BREACH OF TRUST

The interplay between a breach of trust and overreaching has been the subject of considerable academic debate.[35] The fact that overreaching is founded upon the trustees' powers of disposition places in question its operation where the trustees are acting in breach of their powers or the duties to which they are required to adhere when exercising those powers. Almost all of the cases on overreaching have concerned unauthorized mortgages by trustees, which have been entered into to raise finance unconnected with the purchase of the property. Unauthorized sales by trustees tend not to lead to the same problems for occupying beneficiaries, although the danger from overreaching exists. A purchaser of land will generally wish to obtain vacant possession of the land and will conduct enquiries to that end, thus invariably revealing the occupying beneficiaries. The purchaser can then take steps to ensure that the occupying beneficiaries are prepared to vacate the property before proceeding with their purchase.[36]

30 Ibid, s 6.
31 Ibid, s 16.
32 Ibid, Sch 3, para 2.
33 Land Registration Act 2002, s 23.
34 Ibid, s 26.
35 The debate is led by a series of articles by Ferris and Battersby: 'The Impact of the Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996 on Purchasers of Registered Land' (1998) Conv 168; 'Overreaching and the Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996: A Reply to Mr Dixon' (2001) Conv 221; 'General Principles of Overreaching and the Reforms of the 1925 Legislation' (2002) 118 LQR 270; 'The General Principles of Overreaching and the Modern Legislative Reforms 1996–2002' (2003) 119 LQR 94; and Ferris, 'Making Sense of Section 26 of the Land Registration Act 2002' in Modern Studies in Property Law: Vol 2 (ed Cooke, 2003), p 101. See also Dixon, 'Overreaching and the Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996' [2000] Conv 267 and Pascoe, 'Improving Conveyancing by Redrafting Section 16' [2005] Conv 140.
36 Harpum (1990), p 312.

4.1 TRUSTEES' ABILITY, AUTHORITY, AND DUTIES

Ferris and Battersby[37] make the crucial point that it is important, at the outset, to understand the different ways in which we refer to trustees' powers and the different consequences that result from a misuse of these powers. A reference to the powers of trustees may be used to define the ability of the trustees to undertake a certain disposition. Trustees as holders of the legal estate are able to deal with that estate, but they do not have ability to deal with the beneficiaries' equitable interests unless given authority to do so on behalf of the beneficiaries, either by the terms of the trust instrument or by statute. Thus, when we are talking about trustees' powers, we are usually referring to their authority to affect the beneficiaries' equitable interests rather than their ability to deal with the legal estate.[38]

Harpum demonstrated that it has long been the law that a disposition beyond the trustees' authority (ultra vires) cannot overreach the beneficial interests and nor can the purchaser claim the protection of s 2 of the LPA 1925.[39] Other mechanisms are thus necessary if a purchaser is to be protected against the risk that a trustee is acting ultra vires his or her authority.

Trustees may also act within their authority, but, in so doing, misapply the trust property or otherwise breach their duties as trustees. For example, we have seen that, in Flegg, the Maxwell-Browns, although they had authority to mortgage Bleak House, acted in breach of trust in doing so without consulting the Fleggs and with the object of discharging their own personal debts, rather than in pursuance of their duty to act for the benefit of the trust.

Trustees may also fail to act in accordance with their statutory duty of care, as defined by s 1 of the Trustee Act 2000, or they may breach their equitable fiduciary duties. For example, the trustees may fail to exercise due care in obtaining the true market value for the property, or they may allow their personal interests to conflict with their fiduciary duty to give undivided loyalty to the beneficiaries' interests by dealing with the land for their own benefit. The TOLATA 1996 underlines both the need for the trustees to act in the interests of the beneficiaries, and in accordance with their legal and equitable duties, by reiterating these duties in s 6(5) and (6). These types of breach of duty are sometimes referred to as 'intra vires' breaches of trust, because they are within the ability and authority of the trustees, but are nevertheless proscribed. Ferris and Battersby[40] suggest that overreaching is unaffected by breaches of trust of this nature, because the purchaser can look to the protection of s 2 of the LPA 1925. Where the trust moneys are misapplied, the protections provided both by s 27(1) of that Act and of s 17 of the Trustee Act 1925 should absolve a purchaser from liability.[41]

Being clear about the ability and authority of the trustees to act, on the one hand, and their duties when acting in exercise of that ability or authority, on the other, underlines the matters upon which we need to concentrate when considering the impact of a breach of duty on overreaching. Firstly, the dispositive powers of the trustees are important in defining their authority to deal with the equitable estate and so overreach the beneficial interests. Secondly, if a purchaser cannot rely on the protection of s 2 of the LPA 1925, 37 Ferris and Battersby (2002) 118 LQR 270, 273–80.

38 Contrast the mortgagee's power of sale, discussed in Chapter 30. Mortgagees must be given both the ability to deal with the legal estate and the authority to deal with the borrower's equity of redemption.

39 Harpum (1990), pp 283–5, 294–6.

40 Ferris and Battersby (2002), pp 283–94. Smith (2005), p 198 suggests that such protection is unnecessary.

41 Harpum (1990), p 309.

because the trustees have acted ultra vires, then we need to look at what other protection is available to them.

4.1.1 The source of trustees' powers of disposition

The trustees' authority is defined by the trust instrument and/or implied by statute. Originally, s 28 of the LPA 1925 granted trustees for sale all of the powers that were conferred upon a tenant for life and trustees under the Settled Land Act 1925, so that the purchaser would not necessarily have to examine the trust instrument in order to determine the width of the trustees' authority.[42]

Section 28 of the LPA 1925 has now been repealed and replaced by s 6 of the TOLATA 1996. As we have seen in Chapter 17, section 5.2, s 6(1) of the 1996 Act confers on the trustees 'all the powers of an absolute owner', though these powers must be exercised for the benefit of the trust and in a manner consistent with any other enactment of law or equity. Hence, in contrast to the previous law, rather than limiting the trustee's powers by authorizing only particular transactions, the 1996 Act authorizes all types of transaction. Consequently, at first sight, it might be thought that ultra vires transactions are less likely to result. But s 6(1) does not stand alone: s 8 enables a settlor to limit the width of the authority conferred by s 6(1).

Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996, s 8

(1) Sections 6 and 7 do not apply in the case of a trust of land created by a disposition in so far as provision to the effect that they do not apply is made by the disposition.

(2) If the disposition creating such a trust makes provision requiring any consent to be obtained to the exercise of any power conferred by section 6 or 7, the power may not be exercised without that consent.

Thus, s 8 enables the settlor to limit the trustees' powers by, for example, providing that the trustees cannot act without the consent of a third party, or even by limiting or entirely excluding the implied statutory powers. Thus, where the statutory powers have been limited pursuant to s 8, a sale or mortgage that exceeds these powers will not overreach the beneficial interests and the purchaser or mortgagee will have to find protection elsewhere.

The changes made to the trustees' powers of disposition by the TOLATA 1996 may have a direct impact on the likelihood of an ultra vires disposition arising in the context of a co-owned home. Where co-ownership arises through the joint purchase of a home, the owners are unlikely to limit their own powers as trustees under s 8. As a result, an ultra vires disposition is unlikely to arise. An intra vires breach of duty or the misapplication of trust property, as exemplified by Flegg, is more likely to arise in such trusts. This is, however, subject to one further argument advanced by Ferris and Battersby.[43] They argue, although others [42] Ibid, p 290. If the disposition contemplated was outside the s 28 (Law of Property Act 1925) powers, the purchaser could demand to see the trust instrument to check if the disposition was nevertheless within the express authority conferred by the trust deed.

[43] Ferris and Battersby (2002), pp 283–94. Smith (2005), p 198 suggests that such protection is unnecessary.

disagree,[44] that the powers conferred by s 6(1) are also circumscribed by further statutory conditions: in particular, s 6(6), which provides that the powers of the trustees conferred by s 6(1) shall not be exercised in contravention of any rule of law or equity, and s 11, which imposes a duty of consultation upon the trustees. Thus, they suggest, the apparent wide authority conferred by s 6(1) is illusory and there is, in fact, a greater risk of transactions that are ultra vires the trustees' authority and thus unable to overreach the beneficial interests.[45] The argument is an important one beacuse if correct it means that the effect of the 1996 Act is to reverse Flegg.[46] This reversal would be confined to registered land since, as we will see in section 4.2.1 below, purchasers in unregistered land are protected by s 16 of the TOLATA. It has gained prescience as a result of the decision in HSBC Bank plc v Dyche.[47] There, Mr and Mrs Dyche held title to a house on trust for Mr Collelldevall, Mrs Dyche's father. Upon their divorce, they transferred the property into the sole name of Mrs Dyche who used the property as security for a mortgage in favour of HSBC. The question for the court was whether the transfer overreached Mr Collelldevall's beneficial interest. The transfer to Mrs Dyche and the grant of the mortgage constituted a breach of trust. Judge Purle held that '[o]n the footing that the [. . .] transfer was unauthorised, it is difficult to see how that could as a matter of general principle overreach Mr Collelldevall's interest'.[48] Gravells suggests that in so holding, 'the judge seems to adopt, without acknowledgement and without any serious debate, the contentious argument of Ferris and Battersby that, in the context of registered land, the Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996 has expanded the scope of ultra vires dispositions by trustees that will be ineffective to overreach equitable interests under the trust, (thereby reversing, albeit inadvertently, City of London Building Society v Flegg*)*'.[49] It is extremely doubtful, if the opportunity arises, that such a significant change will be endorsed without full discussion. On the facts, there are other grounds on which overreaching would not have taken place. In particular, as we have seen in section 2.3, overreaching requires capital money to be paid to at least two trustees. Judge Purle noted that this requirement had not been met as the capital money had been paid by one trustee (Mrs Dyche) to the other (Mr Dyche).[50]

4.2 PROTECTION OF PURCHASERS

Prior to the 1925 legislation, purchasers were in a particularly vulnerable position.[51] In order to overreach the beneficial interests, the purchaser had to be satisfied that the sale was intra vires and that the sale moneys were to be properly applied in accordance with the trust. The burden placed on purchasers was indeed onerous, particularly because they could be fixed with constructive notice of a breach of trust that the law considered they should have discovered. The LPA 1925 did not relieve a purchaser of the need to check the trustees' authority to sell, but it did try to ensure that purchasers, once they knew that they were dealing with trustees, could easily satisfy themselves of the trustee's authority by relying on the s 28 powers.

44 Pascoe (2005); Smith (2005), p 196; Dixon (2000).

45 'The Impact of the Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996 on Purchasers of Registered Land' [1998] Conv 168, 169–76, developed further in 'The General Principles of Overreaching and the Modern Legislative Reforms 1996–2002' (2003) LQR 94, 95–108.

46 Ferris and Battersby [1998] Conv, pp 184–8.

47 [2009] EWHC 2954 (Ch).

48 Ibid, [37].

49 Gravells, 'HSBC Bank plc v Dyche: Getting Your Priorities Right' [2010] Conv 169, 173.

50 [2009] EWHC 2954 (Ch), [41].

51 Harpum (1990), pp 283–7.

A purchaser could, however, be protected from the more difficult to discover intra vires breaches of trust by sheltering under the protection of s 2, provided that he or she followed the prescribed overreaching machinery by paying any capital moneys to two trustees.[52] The purchaser must also be acting in good faith, as the reference to purchaser in s 2 is subject to the definition contained in s 205 of the LPA 1925.[53] This sophisticated framework came under strain with the increased prevalence of implied trusts (particularly of domestic property) that emerged in the latter half of the twentieth century. Where the trust is implied, purchasers may not know they are dealing with trustees and may thus be unaware that they should satisfy themselves that the trustees are acting within their authority.[54]

Differing statutory provisions, depending upon whether the land is unregistered or registered, have addressed this need for greater purchaser protection.

4.2.1 Unregistered land

The protection of purchasers is governed by s 16 of the TOLATA 1996.

Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996, s 16

(1) A purchaser of land which is or has been subject to a trust need not be concerned to see that any requirement imposed on the trustees by section 6(5), 7(3) or 11(1) has been complied with.

(2) Where—

(a) trustees of land who convey land which (immediately before it is conveyed) is subject to the trust contravene section 6(6) or (8) but

(b) the purchaser of the land from the trustees has no actual notice of the contravention, the contravention does not invalidate the conveyance.

(3) Where the powers of trustees of land are limited by virtue of section 8—

(a) the trustees shall take all reasonable steps to bring the limitation to the notice of any purchaser of the land from them, but

(b) the limitation does not invalidate any conveyance by the trustees to a purchaser who has no actual notice of the limitation.

(4) Where trustees of land convey land which (immediately before it is conveyed) is subject to the trust to persons believed by them to be beneficiaries absolutely entitled to the land under the trust and of full age and capacity—

(a) the trustees shall execute a deed declaring that they are discharged from the trust in relation to that land, and

(b) if they fail to do so, the court may make an order requiring them to do so.

(5) A purchaser of land to which a deed under subsection (4) relates is entitled to assume that, as from the date of the deed, the land is not subject to the trust unless he has actual notice that the trustees were mistaken in their belief that the land was conveyed to beneficiaries absolutely entitled to the land under the trust and of full age and capacity.

52 Ibid and Ferris and Battersby (2002).

53 HSBC Bank plc v Dyche [2009] EWHC 2954 (Ch), [39]–[40].

54 Ferris and Battersby (2002), pp 297–301.

(6) Subsections (2) and (3) do not apply to land held on charitable, ecclesiastical or public trusts.

(7) This section does not apply to registered land.

Hence, purchasers of unregistered land from trustees are protected by the terms of s 16 provided that they do not have actual knowledge of the trustees' breach of trust. The terms of s 16 have, however, been subject to some criticism and are certainly not framed in the clearest terms.[55]

4.2.2 Registered land

Much of the controversy that has, in the past, surrounded the protection of purchasers of registered land[56] has been sidelined by the enactment of ss 23 and 26 of the LRA 2002.[57]

Land Registration Act 2002, s 23

(1) Owner's powers in relation to a registered estate consist of—

(a) power to make a disposition of any kind permitted by the general law in relation to an interest of that description, other than a mortgage by demise or sub-demise, and

(b) power to charge the estate at law with the payment of money.

(2) Owner's powers in relation to a registered charge consist of—

(a) power to make a disposition of any kind permitted by the general law in relation to an interest of that description, other than a legal sub-mortgage, and

(b) power to charge at law with the payment of money indebtedness secured by the registered charge.

(3) In subsection (2)(a), "legal sub-mortgage" means—

(a) a transfer by way of mortgage,

(b) a sub-mortgage by sub-demise, and

(c) a charge by way of legal mortgage.

Land Registration Act 2002, s 26

(1) Subject to subsection (2), a person's right to exercise owner's powers in relation to a registered estate or charge is to be taken to be free from any limitation affecting the validity of a disposition.

(2) Subsection (1) does not apply to a limitation—

(a) reflected by an entry in the register, or

(b) imposed by, or under, this Act.

55 Ferris and Battersby (2003), pp 108–19; Pascoe (2005); Smith (2005), p 197.

56 Harpum (1990), pp 304–9; Ferris and Battersby (2002), pp 283–94; Dixon (2000).

57 Land Registration Act 2002, s 52, which deals with dispositions by a registered chargee, is considered in Chapter 30, section 3.2.6.

(3) This section has effect only for the purpose of preventing the title of a disponee being questioned (and so does not affect the lawfulness of a disposition).

Hence, s 23 confers upon the registered owner almost unfettered ability to dispose of the registered estate. Section 26 provides that no limitation upon a person's right to exercise an owner's power of disposition, including a trustee's authority to deal with the registered estate, will affect a purchaser unless that limitation is protected by the entry of a restriction on the register. The purchaser is thus no longer concerned with any ultra vires lack of authority that is not revealed by the entry of a restriction.

The wide terms of s 26 have already been noted:[58] in particular, the section provides no saving for overriding interests, nor does it call for the purchaser or other person dealing with the trustees to be registered. The provision does not specify that the purchaser must provide value to be protected and therefore appears to provide volunteers with the same degree of protection as purchasers. But a purchaser must provide value to qualify for overreaching under s 2 of the LPA 1925.[59] Further, the defence of lack of registration (including as regards the entry of a restriction) is conferred by s 29 of the LRA 2002 only in respect of registered dispositions made for valuable consideration. Through these routes, it may, in fact, be confined in its scope to purchasers.

4.3 SUMMARY

The liability of a buyer purchasing, or a lender taking a mortgage, from trustees who are acting ultra vires is no longer dependent upon the trustees' powers of disposition, but upon the protection afforded by statute. The nature of that protection differs according to whether the land is registered or unregistered. A person purchasing, or acquiring an interest in, registered land will be protected against an ultra vires breach of trust unless the limitation of the trustees' authority is recorded on the register by the entry of a restriction. Common restrictions call for the purchase money to be paid to two trustees, thus triggering overreaching, or a requirement to obtain the consent of a third party. In the absence of a restriction on the register, overreaching will continue to operate, even though the person dealing with the trustees has knowledge of a limitation upon the trustees' authority. By contrast, a purchaser of unregistered land will only be protected if he or she has no actual notice that the trustees are acting in excess of their authority. Actual notice is unlikely where the trust is implied, because the trustees will enjoy the unlimited powers of disposition enjoyed by an absolute owner conferred by the TOLATA 1996. Even where the trust is express, the purchaser is not required to scrutinize the trust instrument to confirm the nature of the trustees' authority.

Purchasers, but not volunteers, of both registered and unregistered land continue to be protected against intra vires breaches of trust by s 2 of the LPA 1925 provided that any capital moneys are paid to two trustees. It has been suggested (but is not yet established) that s 26 of the LRA 2002 might also provide protection to both purchasers and volunteers against intra vires breaches of trust.[60] Doubt is placed on whether a volunteer would be protected under s 26 by the framework of provisions within which the provision operates.

58 Ferris (2003), p 101. See also Smith (2005), p 194.

59 See above, fn 26.

60 Cooke, The New Law of Land Registration (2003), p 60.

5 IS OVERREACHING JUSTIFIED?

We have noted that overreaching serves the twin objectives of implementing the trust curtain and ensuring security of transactions. Purchasers need not investigate the existence or terms of any trust affecting land. Title is taken unencumbered from such interests as long as overreaching occurs. We have further seen that where land is held on trust as an investment, the shifting of the beneficial interests from land to money is not problematic. In such cases, the effect of overreaching is entirely consistent with the purpose of the trust, because the beneficiaries' key concern is with the maintenance of the trust fund, rather than any particular item of property.

Overreaching is, however, more contentious when it is applied to land held on trust to be used as a home. Even in this context, the mechanism is problematic only in those cases, such as Flegg, in which the home is held on trust for the legal owners and others, and a sale or (typically) mortgage is arranged without the knowledge or consent of all of the beneficiaries. It is in these situations that the effect of overreaching, and the underlying assumption that the beneficiaries' concern lies in the maintenance of a fund, clashes with the purpose of the trust.

The spread of co-ownership of the home could not have been predicted at the time of the 1925 legislation. Both the trust for sale and the overreaching mechanism reflected the use of land as an investment. The shift from investment trusts to trusts of the home was a key impetus in the replacement of the trust for sale with the trust of land through the TOLATA 1996.[61] But in making the recommendations that led to that Act, the Law Commission envisaged the continuing operation of overreaching. That view has since been endorsed by the Court of Appeal in Sabherwal, although Dyche has cast doubt on the effect of the Act in registered land. The Law Commission did, however, identify the need to consider separately the impact of overreaching on beneficiaries in occupation and published these recommendations in a separate report.

Law Commission Report No 188, Transfer of Land. Overreaching: Beneficiaries in Occupation (1989, [3.1]–[3.3], [4.1]–[4.3])

PART III

NEED FOR REFORM

Change of circumstances

The 1925 legislation compromise between the need to protect beneficiaries under trusts of land and the demand for certainty and simplicity in conveyancing was satisfactory, and perhaps ideal, in the circumstances in which it was intended to operate. A purchaser from the trustees could ignore the beneficial interests so long as he was careful to observe simple precautions in paying the price. This successfully hid the terms of the settlement "behind the curtain". Buying from trustees became as simple as buying from a single beneficial legal owner which it certainly had not been previously. At the same time, the financial interest of the beneficiary was safeguarded by transferring his claim to the proceeds of sale. So long as the trustees properly conducted the affairs of the settlement, it was not important to the beneficiary by what assets his interest was secured.

[61] Chapter 17, section 5.

Doubts about these provisions arise now because, over the years, the patterns of land ownership and the use of settlements have changed. Although the rules with which we are concerned affect all types of real property, the changes relating to residential property are most significant. Since 1925, both the number of dwellings in England and Wales and the percentage of them which are owner-occupied have jumped dramatically. Couples have increasingly bought owner-occupied housing in their joint names, and this trend was accelerated by the decision in Williams & Glyn's Bank Ltd v. Boland, following which lending institutions encouraged borrowers to buy jointly so that they, the institutions, had the advantage of the statutory overreaching rules. These couples are technically trustees for sale, whether they hold on trust only for themselves, as is often the case, or whether there are others with beneficial interests.

For this reason, there is now a very large number of cases in which trust beneficiaries occupy trust property as their homes. Sometimes, also, the trust property is where they carry on business. Generally, the trust is a conveyancing technicality, imposed by the Law of Property Act 1925 as part of the scheme to confine normal conveyancing to legal estates. Most individuals in this position would be surprised to hear themselves referred to as trustees or as beneficiaries; they regard themselves simply as joint owners. The changes in circumstances have exposed the 1925 rules for the device which they are. "If the framers of the property legislation in 1925 had been able to foresee the growth in joint ownership of property which, coupled with the vast increase in the breakdown of marriage, has exposed the artificiality of the statutory trust for sale, they might have made clearer provision for the protection of beneficial interests without widening the enquiries needed to be made by a purchaser".

PART IV

REFORM PROPOSALS

Principal recommendation

We have concluded that the present protection of the interests of equitable owners in occupation of property is, in some circumstances, inadequate. The owner of an equitable interest which carries a right of occupation is entitled to two distinct benefits: a right to the value of the interest and that right to enjoy occupation. When the owner of a legal estate is in a similar position, the law protects each right separately: if the owner opts to remain in possession, he cannot be obliged to rely solely on the alternative financial right. The effect of overreaching is, however, to oblige the equitable owner to surrender his occupation right in favour of his financial one, without the chance to make a choice. We see no reason why equitable owners should be at a disadvantage in this respect

We are, however, conscious of the need to maintain arrangements which will not unduly interfere with conveyancing. This leads us to place our emphasis on protecting the rights of owners of equitable interests who are in actual occupation of the property. That very fact of occupation can be used to alert prospective purchasers and mortgagees to the claims of the equitable owners. It means that the protection of occupation rights does not extend to those who, while they are entitled to occupy, are not currently exercising the right. While that means that equitable owners will sometimes be at a disadvantage, when compared with legal owners, it seems to us to be a reasonable compromise. It offers the right to continue in occupation, to those who are already there, so it is likely to extend the new protection to those who most need it, and of course protection extends to those who enter later.

Our principal recommendation, to protect the occupation rights of those with an equitable interest in property, can be succinctly stated:

> A conveyance of a legal estate in property should not have the effect of overreaching the interest of anyone of full age and capacity who is entitled to a beneficial interest in the property and who has a right to occupy it and is in actual occupation of it at the date of the conveyance, unless that person consents.

We examine below the detailed effects of the recommendation.

The Law Commission's proposals represent a logical extension of the reasoning underlying the introduction of the TOLATA 1996. In this report, as in its report leading to the Act, the Law Commission sought to provide a scheme of regulation for land held on trust that reflects the likely use of that land as a home. The government announced however, that the recommendations on overreaching would not be implemented.[62]

It must be questioned why there is resistance to this proposal. As Smith highlights,[63] a requirement of obtaining consent is not necessarily onerous. Indeed, making enquiries of occupiers is standard procedure in other aspects of conveyancing practice. It is one of the ways in which a balance is sought between protecting the interests of beneficiaries (and other persons with subsisting property rights) and purchasers. It may be suggested that, where overreaching is concerned, there is a clear imbalance in favour of purchasers. The importance of the trust curtain and security of transactions has, it seems, superseded any concerns at the mismatch between a trust of a home and the investments ideals that underpin overreaching. This is contrary to the ethos that underlies TOLATA and leaves an inconsistency in legislative policy towards the home between TOLATA on the one hand and the overreaching mechanism on the other.[64]

6 THE FUTURE OF OVERREACHING

We conclude this discussion of overreaching by considering possible future developments of overreaching and the rules affecting the broader context in which the mechanism operates. Firstly, we consider how the scope of overreaching could be restricted or qualified; secondly, we highlight recent arguments as to whether overreaching is compliant with the HRA 1998; finally, we consider alternative causes of action that may be available to beneficiaries.

6.1 QUALIFYING AND RESTRICTING THE SCOPE OF OVERREACHING

We have seen that the Law Commission's recommendation to qualify the operation of overreaching in relation to a particular type of beneficiary (those in actual occupation), through the imposition of a requirement of consent, has been rejected. Harpum has suggested an alternative means of qualifying the mechanism. If the rationale for overreaching is found in the powers of disposition of the trustees, a more logical means of qualification might lie

62 (1998) 587 HL Deb WA213.

63 Smith (2005), p 191.

64 Hopkins, 'Regulating Trusts of the Home: Private Law and Social Policy' (2009) 125 LQR 310, 318–20.

in restricting those powers. It has already been pointed out, and the cases demonstrate, that the most acute tension between overreaching and the interests of the beneficiaries occurs where the trustees utilize the land, which the beneficiaries occupy as their home, as security for a loan that is applied to discharge personal or business debts, rather than towards the acquisition or improvement of the property. Harpum advocated limiting the trustees' power to mortgage the land to first mortgages to secure the purchase, improvement, or repair of the land.[65]

Harpum, 'Overreaching, Trustees Powers and The Reform of the 1925 Legislation' (1990) 49 CLJ 277, 330–1

> [T]he Law Commission has been forced to take the path of requiring the consent of beneficiaries in actual occupation because it has failed to appreciate the basis on which overreaching rests. Overreaching is the necessary concomitant of a power of disposition. If the trustees have no power to make a disposition, that disposition will not overreach. The present writer believes that this principle could provide a more effective means of securing the objectives which the Law Commission seeks.
>
> [...]
>
> The powers of the trustees could be limited [...] these powers would draw a distinction between those transactions which should be facilitated and which are unlikely be detrimental to the interest of beneficiaries, and those dispositions which should not be encouraged and which may harm those interested in the land. There seems no reason to restrict the trustees' powers to sell and lease. If the trustees have to give vacant possession they will necessarily have to obtain the consent of persons in actual occupation who will thereby be involved in the decision-making process. [...] The mortgaging powers of the trustees would however be limited. The principal mortgaging powers that should be given to trustees would be to execute a first mortgage of the land to enable them to purchase the land, and a power to raise money for the improvement or repair of the property. There should be no power to execute a second mortgage.

Neither the TOLATA 1996 nor the LRA 2002 has adopted the approach advocated by Harpum. As we have seen, the 1996 Act confers upon trustees all of the powers of an absolute owner, unless expressly restricted, whilst the 2002 Act protects a purchaser against any express limitation of the trustees' powers, which is not evident by way of a restriction on the register.

6.2 HUMAN RIGHTS AND OVERREACHING

Given that the policy of overreaching with regard to occupying beneficiaries has raised concerns, it is no surprise that it has attracted attention as potentially incompatible with fundamental human rights contained in Art 8 (respect for the home) and Art 1 of the First Protocol (deprivation of property) of the European Convention on Human Rights.

[65] See also Thompson (1997). Smith (2005), p 191 suggests a hybrid approach depending both upon a limitation of the trustees' powers of disposition and the consent of occupiers.

The issue was raised both in Sabherwal[66] and in National Westminster Bank Plc v Malhan.[67] The court rejected the submission in both cases on the simple ground that the HRA 1998 did not have retrospective effect and thus could not affect either of the mortgages, which were both entered into before the Act came into force.[68] Whilst Robert Walker LJ showed little sympathy with the substantive force of human rights in Sabherwal, Morritt VC in Malhan lent a more sympathetic ear 'finding much force in the submissions', although his comments were obiter, because Mrs Malhan was unable to establish a beneficial interest.

As we have seen in Chapter 3, a claim based upon a breach of the 1998 Act needs to clear a number of hurdles: firstly, we need to establish the horizontal effect of that Act; secondly, we need to prove that one of the Articles of the ECHR is engaged; and finally, we need to examine whether the interference can be justified by the stated qualifications to the enshrined rights. These lie within the government's margin of appreciation, with a requirement that the interference is proportionate in both its aim and its impact upon the individual, which calls for adequate procedural safeguards..

The horizontal effect of the HRA 1998 is established by the dictates of s 3, which requires the court to interpret legislation in a manner that is compatible with the ECHR '[s]o far as it is possible to do so'. Further, s 4 empowers a court to declare a statutory provision incompatible with the ECHR. We have examined a number of statutory provisions upon which overreaching and its effect on purchasers is dependent. Sections 2 and 27 of the LPA 1925 define the scope of overreaching. In the TOLATA 1996, we find, in s 6, the authority of the trustees to overreach by the exercise of their powers of disposition, and in s 16, the protection of purchasers of unregistered land against the effects of an unauthorized disposition. The protection of the purchasers of registered land against an unauthorized disposition is found in s 26 of the LRA 2002. There is thus considerable scope for the courts to examine the compatibility of overreaching with the ECHR.

Article 8 and Art 1 of the First Protocol are the prime targets for engagement. But the argument in Malhan was based upon the discriminatory effect of overreaching where there are two trustees in comparison with the failure of overreaching where there is only one trustee. Article 8 and Art 1 of the First Protocol were thus to be read with Art 14 (prohibition of discrimination). In the past, this difference in treatment has been justified by the protection said to be afforded to beneficiaries by two trustees: firstly, as a guard against the commission of a breach of trust; and secondly, by providing two, rather than one, pockets against which to pursue any personal claim for damages. In reality, this so-called 'protection' has proved illusory. This is the case, for example, where the trust is implied and the trustees are ignorant of their responsibilities. Equally, the protection is illusory where, in the face of financial difficulties, an action for breach against the trustees (who may be family members) is worthless. But we have seen that the need for two trustees has been questioned both in the Sood situation, in which there are no capital moneys, and possibly (although less convincingly) where, in the absence of an appropriate restriction, a sole proprietor of a registered title deals with the land. The picture is thus rather more complex than the argument in Malhan suggests.

[66] (2000) 80 P & CR 256. [67] [2004] EWHC 847.
[68] Wilson v Secretary of State for Trade & Industry [2003] UKHL 40.

In Malhan, counsel was driven to rely on Art 14 because it had conceded that a submission based upon Art 8 or Art 1 of the First Protocol alone would not succeed. In the light of more recent cases, this concession may not have been prudent.[69]

Possession proceedings against a beneficiary in occupation by a purchaser or mortgagee claiming the benefit of overreaching will engage Art 8 as the most extreme interference with the respect due to an occupier's home. The appropriate enquiry is whether there is a justification for that interference on the policy grounds either of the economic well-being of the country, in maintaining a well-balanced property and lending market, or the protection of the rights and freedoms of others—namely, purchasers and mortgagees.

The operation of overreaching by shifting the beneficial interest from the land to the capital moneys (if any) may also be capable of engaging Art 1 of the First Protocol as a deprivation of property, although the issue has not been resolved. It could be argued that the beneficiary's trust interest as a possession is inherently limited by the disposal powers of the trustees from which overreaching springs and so there is no interference with that possession.[70] If that argument did not succeed, it will be recalled from Chapter 3 that a deprivation of possession encompasses both the loss of ownership and controls over the use that interfere with the peaceful enjoyment of the possession.[71] Overreaching shifts, but does not terminate, the beneficiary's interest. This is the case even though, either because there are no proceeds (as in Sood) or the proceeds are dissipated (as in Flegg), the property to which the interest notionally shifts is of no value to the beneficiaries. Overreaching will effect the peaceful enjoyment of property by controlling the identity of the property in which the beneficial interest vests and against which attendant ownership rights can be asserted. An occupying beneficiary's occupation of his or her home is disturbed, because his or her interest is no longer in the land, but in the capital moneys (if any).

If Art 1 of the First Protocol is engaged, then both the operation of overreaching, by depriving the beneficiary of his or her property, and the process by which that deprivation is achieved must be justified as being in the public interest: for example, in securing a fair and efficient conveyancing system.

Any justification, whether required under Art 8 or Art 1 of the First Protocol, must strike a proportionate balance, within the State's margin of appreciation, between the interests of the beneficiary (particularly the beneficiary in occupation) and the purchaser or mortgagee. In addition, the proportionality of the interference upon the personal circumstances of the individual occupier against the proprietary rights of the purchaser or mortgagee will also need to be considered by an adequate process before an independent tribunal clothed with the necessary discretion to make that judgment.

Whether the courts will be inclined to question the policy of overreaching, under Art 8 and/or Art 1 of the First Protocol, is a most difficult issue. We have seen in Chapter 3 that the courts will show deference to the policy choices of Parliament in shaping property law, which has evolved over many centuries and which, in the case of statutory rules, have been considered by Parliament. Both the TOLATA 1996 and the LRA 2002 have enabled a recent appraisal of overreaching both by the Law Commission and Parliament. Thus the courts are likely to be particularly cautious in questioning the policy of overreaching.

[69] Manchester CC C Pinnock [2010] UKSC 35, [2010] 3 WLR 1441; Hounslow LBC v Powell: Leeds CC v Hall, Birmingham CC v Frisby [2011] UKSC 8, [2011] 2 WLR 287 (re Art 8); JR Pye (Oxford) Ltd v UK (2006) 43 EHRR 3 (re Art 1 of the First Protocol).

[70] See Goymour, 'Proprietary Claims and Human Rights: A Reservoir of Entitlement?' (2006) 65 CLJ 696, 714–5.

[71] See Sporrong and Lonroth v Sweden (1982) 8 EHRR 123, explored in Chapter 3.

If a challenge were to be mounted, there are two respects in which overreaching appears vulnerable:[72] firstly, the width of the trustees' powers of disposition under s 6 of the 1996 Act, coupled with the width of the protection of purchasers conferred by s 26 of the 2002 Act (for registered land), particularly when contrasted with s 16 of the 1996 Act (for unregistered land). The variation in protection between registered and unregistered land might itself provide a possible ground for a challenge based on discrimination under Art 14.

Secondly, the automatic trigger of overreaching by the payment of any capital moneys to two trustees might also be challenged, not only on the basis raised in Malhan, but also as a process that provides no opportunity for the rights, or the personal circumstances, of a beneficiary occupying the trust property as his or her home to be protected, or to be balanced against those of the purchaser or mortgagee. It is this lack of procedural safeguards that represents the most serious grounds for the human rights incompatibility of overreaching, particularly with Art 8.[73]

6.3 ALTERNATIVE CAUSES OF ACTION

Overreaching does not exist in a legal vacuum. In Chapter 14, in the context of our discussion of the priority rules of registered land, we highlighted the possibility of new direct rights being imposed on a purchaser on a transfer of land. These rights, arising from a myriad of alternative causes of action, include personal liability being imposed on the trustees and other parties where the sale constituted a breach of trust, and proprietary claims over assets purchased by trustees using the proceeds of sale. Hence, one partial solution to concerns as regards the scope of overreaching is to ensure that these alternatives are developed and used. As we will see, however, each of these actions has its own limitations.

6.3.1 Breach of trust

Trustees who act in breach of trust are personally liable to the beneficiaries. In practice, however, the utility of this form of liability is dependent on the financial circumstances of the trustees. For example, we have noted that, in Flegg, the Maxwell-Browns acted in breach of trust towards the Fleggs in mortgaging the parties' joint home—but, as a result of the Maxwell-Brown's financial circumstances, an action against them for this breach was of no practical use.

6.3.2 Knowing receipt and dishonest assistance

A purchaser who takes trust property knowing that it is dealt with in breach of trust, or some other person who dishonestly assists in the breach of trust itself, may find him or herself called upon personally to account for the loss suffered by the trust through the equitable doctrines of knowing receipt and dishonest assistance. The beneficial interests continue to be overreached, but a distinct personal liability is imposed, which requires the purchaser or interfering third party to be held to account as if he or she were the trustee committing the breach of trust.

[72] See, however, McFarlane (2008) p 404, who is sceptical as to the likely success of human rights challenges to overreaching.

[73] See our discussion of the need for procedural safeguards in possession proceedings by a social landlord in Chapter 3, section 4.2.2.

The interplay between statutory defences against the enforcement of property rights in registered land and the imposition of personal liability is not beyond doubt; particularly as regards recipient liability.[74] In Farah Constructions Pty Ltd v Say-Dee Pty Ltd the High Court of Australia refused to impose recipient liability against a defendant who had statutory protection against the beneficiaries' equitable interests.[75] In Chapter 14 we have seen that s 29 of the LRA 2002 provides a registered proprietor who has obtained title through a registered disposition of a registered estate for valuable consideration with a defence against pre-existing property rights held by third parties (subject to statutory exceptions explored in that chapter). Conaglen and Goymour suggest that s 29 simultaneously protects the registered proprietor against personal liability for knowing receipt.[76] The basis of their argument is that this form of personal liability is not based solely on wrongdoing by the recipient proprietor, but instead 'the fundamental purpose of the claim seems to be to vindicate the pre-existing property rights that have been lost as a result of the wrongful disposition'.[77] As the personal claim is 'parasitic'[78] on the property right, they argue that it would be 'inherently inappropriate' to impose personal liability in knowing receipt on a purchaser who takes free from the property interests under s 29.[79] They acknowledge, however, that personal liability imposed on a dishonest assistant is founded entirely on wrongdoing and, therefore, its operation is not affected by s 29. Further, they note that in some instances a recipient of property transferred in breach of trust may also be a dishonest assistant in the breach and, where that is the case, s 29 will not shield the recipient from liability based on their dishonest assistance.[80]

6.3.3 Tracing

Tracing is the process by which beneficiaries can track their proprietary interest into a substitute asset that the trustees may have acquired with the proceeds of sale, following a disposition by the trustees in breach of trust.[81] Once the beneficiaries have done so, they may be able to claim proprietary interests in those substitute assets.

Tracing may be available to beneficiaries in two situations, although the process will only be of any practical assistance to a beneficiary where there are substitute assets. Furthermore, any claim that the beneficiaries may have in relation to those assets is subject to a significant limitation through the defence of bona fide purchaser.

The first situation in which tracing is available is that in which trustees make a disposition that is an ultra vires breach of trust. An unauthorized disposition will not overreach, but, in light of the protection available to purchasers, a beneficiary is unlikely to be able to assert his or her interest in the property disposed of. A beneficiary may be able to trace the proceeds of sale of an unauthorized disposition received by the trustees into any substitute asset acquired with those proceeds.[82]

[74] This basis for liability is suggested by Dixon (2000), p 270 and although initially disputed by Ferris and Battersby (see [2001] Conv 221, 224), they subsequently acknowledged its availability (see (2003) 119 LQR 94, 122).

[75] [2007] HCA 222 at [193]–[198]; McFarlane (2008), p 418.

[76] Conaglen and Goymour, 'Knowing Receipt and Registered Land' in Resulting and Constructive Trusts (ed Mitchell, 2009).

[77] Ibid, p 172. [78] Ibid, p 174. [79] Ibid. [80] Ibid, pp 177–81.

[81] Foskett v McKeown [2001] AC 102.

[82] See ibid, Cave v Cave (1880) 15 Ch D 639, and Ffrench's Estate (1887) 21 LR (Ir) 283, referred to by Fox (2002).

Secondly, tracing may also assist the beneficiaries once overreaching has occurred and the trustees hold proceeds of sale on trust. Overreaching shifts the beneficial interests into the proceeds of sale. If the trustees then apply those proceeds in breach of trust, the beneficiaries may be able to trace their proprietary interest into assets acquired through that breach. As we have seen, s 27(1) of the LPA 1925 absolves the purchaser of any liability in this regard.

As Fox explains, the effect of tracing looks very similar to overreaching's effect in allowing a beneficiary a claim against the proceeds of sale acquired by the trustees.[83] There are, however, important differences between the mechanisms, particularly as regards their effect on the beneficiaries' title. Where overreaching takes place, the beneficiaries have the same interest in the proceeds of sale as they previously had in the land and that interest vests immediately upon overreaching. Where beneficiaries trace funds into a substitute asset, they have a right to elect between a beneficial interest in the asset (a proportionate share of an asset purchased in part with trust finds) or a lien to enforce their personal claim against the trustees for breach of trust.[84] It will not be until they have made that election that their appropriate interest will vest and, prior to that election, their interest is inchoate.

7 PRIORITY RULES WHERE OVERREACHING DOES NOT TAKE PLACE

Where overreaching does not take place, the rules determining the enforcement of a beneficial interest are dependent on whether the title is registered or unregistered. In unregistered land, enforcement of a beneficial interest is determined by the doctrine of notice (see Chapter 13, section 4). Occupation of the home by the beneficiary may be sufficient to fix the purchaser with constructive notice of the interest.[85] In registered land, the curtain principle precludes entry of a notice of a beneficial interest on the register.[86] A beneficial interest that is not overreached may bind a purchaser as an overriding interest where the beneficiary is in occupation (see Chapter 14, section 5.1).[87]

A specific issue arises where, through the process of survivorship (discussed in Chapter 17, section 2.2), legal title remains in a sole surviving joint tenant. A beneficiary may have severed his or her equitable joint tenancy prior to his or her death. A transfer by the sole trustee will not have overreaching effect, leaving a purchaser vulnerable to a claim that the severed beneficial interest is binding against him or her through notice (in unregistered land) or as overriding interests (in registered land). In unregistered land, a statutory solution is provided.

Law of Property (Joint Tenants) Act 1964, s 1

(1) For the purposes of section 36(2) of the Law of Property Act 1925, as amended by section 7 of and the Schedule to the Law of Property (Amendment) Act 1926, the survivor of two or more joint tenants shall, in favour of a purchaser of the legal estate, be deemed to be solely and beneficially interested if [...] the conveyance includes a statement that he is so interested.

83 Fox (2002). See also McFarlane (2008), pp 400–1.
84 Fox (2002), p 102.
85 Kingsnorth Finance Co v Tizard [1986] 1 WLR 783.
86 Land Registration Act 2002, s 33(a).
87 Ibid, Sch 3, para 2.

> Provided that the foregoing provisions of this subsection shall not apply if, at any time before the date of the conveyance by the survivor—
>
> (a) a memorandum of severance (that is to say a note or memorandum signed by the joint tenants or one of them and recording that the joint tenancy was severed in equity on a date therein specified) had been endorsed on or annexed to the conveyance by virtue of which the legal estate was vested in the joint tenants; or
>
> (b) a bankruptcy order made against any of the joint tenants, or a petition for such an order, had been registered under the Land Charges Act 1925, being an order or petition of which the purchaser has notice, by virtue of the registration, on the date of the conveyance by the survivor.
>
> (2) The foregoing provisions of this section shall apply with the necessary modifications in relation to a conveyance by the personal representatives of the survivor of joint tenants as they apply in relation to a conveyance by such a survivor.

Hence, as long as the purchaser falls outside of the provisos to s 1(1), he or she is protected against a priority claim by a beneficiary. Although not so described in the statute, Cooke notes[88] that the effect of the provision is that the beneficial interest is overreached, because the beneficiary would have a claim against the proceeds of sale.

The Law of Property (Joint Tenants) Act 1964 is confined in its application to unregistered land. No equivalent statutory protection is provided to a purchaser of registered land. This may be an oversight, explicable on the basis that the prospect of a beneficial interest binding a purchaser in registered land as an overriding interest became apparent only with the decision in Williams & Glyn's Bank v Boland,[89] some years after the enactment of the 1964 Act.

Cooke suggests that the problem is a small one and that the solution is simple.

Cooke, 'Beneficial Joint Tenants and the Protection of Purchasers: An Unsolved Problem' [2004] Conv 41, 48

> Obviously a simple extension of the 1964 Act to registered land by repealing s.3 will not work; there is no way of making a memorandum of severance on the conveyance or transfer to the vendor and the deceased joint tenant, nor could the purchaser see that memorandum, since he has access only to the register and not to previous title deeds. All that is needed is a corresponding provision to the effect that the surviving joint tenant vendor will be deemed to be solely and beneficially entitled if:
>
> (a) the transfer states that the vendor is solely and beneficially interested in the land;
>
> (b) the purchaser obtains a clean bankruptcy search, exactly as in the 1964 Act;
>
> (c) there is no restriction on the register preventing a disposition by the survivor of the two trustees.
>
> The requirement of the absence of a memorandum of severance is thus matched by the requirement of the absence of a restriction. Neither is in fact conclusive; in unregistered land, severance could have been effected without the making of a memorandum, just as in registered land there could be a severance without the entry of a restriction. In both cases something inconclusive is deemed, for the protection of a purchaser, to be conclusive.

[88] Cooke, 'Beneficial Joint Tenants and the Protection of Purchasers: An Unsolved Problem' [2004] Conv 41, 42.

[89] [1981] AC 487.

The application of the Act appears to have been qualified by the following case—the first in which a purchaser sought to rely on the protection provided.

Grindal v Hooper
(unreported judgment 6 December 1999, HC)

Facts: Two sisters, Vera and Sheila, were legal and beneficial joint tenants of a house occupied by Vera. She severed the beneficial joint tenancy by written notice, and, on her death, left her estate to her brother, Brian and other siblings. Sheila, as sole legal owner through survivorship, sold the house to Brian for £600, the market value being in the region of £70,000. Brian knew of the trust and of the severance, but no memorandum had been placed on the conveyance to Vera and Sheila. Following Brian's death, the question arose whether, under the 1964 Act, he was solely entitled to the house (so that it would pass under the terms of his will), or whether he held title on trust for himself and Vera's estate, each estate now entitled to a 50 per cent share.

Judge Jarvis QC

Mr Charman says that Brian in these circumstances is the purchaser of the legal estate, and in order to be a purchaser who is protected by the assumptions given by law under s.1 of the 1964 Act he must fall within the definition of a purchaser under s.205 of the Law of Property Act 1925. At definition 21 a purchaser is defined to mean:

> "a purchaser in good faith for valuable consideration [...] and valuable consideration includes marriage but does not include a nominal consideration in money."

In short, Mr Charman says that Brian had notice of the severance before he entered into the agreement to purchase the property. Notice of severance is in these circumstances a notice of the fact that the property was no longer jointly held and therefore that Sheila held the property on trust as to one half for herself and one half for Vera. In those circumstances, where a person has actual notice of circumstances he cannot be said to take in good faith. [...]

It seems to me that on the facts of this case Brian had full notice of the fact that Vera's interest was held on trust by Sheila, and that to acquire the property in these circumstances could not satisfy the definition of a purchaser for good faith under the Act. He, without doubt, purchased the property at a gross under value with actual notice of the estate's interest, and the only inference that I can draw is that that was a transaction which would be designed to deprive the estate of its interest in the property. I conclude that in any event Brian's estate could not take this property without being bound by the equitable interest of Vera's estate.

As Gravells notes, it is doubtful whether actual notice alone should deny the purchaser statutory protection.

Gravells, 'Co-ownership, Severance and Purchasers: The Law of Property (Joint Tenants) Act 1964 on Trial' [2000] Conv 461, 470

[It] might be questioned whether actual notice is or should be sufficient in itself to negative good faith. It might be argued that, in so far as the operation of section 1(1) is excluded where there is an endorsement of the notice of severance, the 1964 Act provides a means of protection for a beneficial tenant in common following the severance of the joint tenancy; that such endorsement may be seen as a form of "quasi-registration"; and that, if the beneficial tenant in common fails to take advantage of that protection, a purchaser should not be bound by the beneficial interest on the basis of actual notice without more. The view that a purchaser who has actual notice of a protectable but unprotected interest cannot be in good faith has been severely criticised and rejected in analogous circumstances.

As is apparent from the observation at the end of the extract from Gravells, the question of the relationship between good faith and actual notice is not unique to the Law of Property (Joint Tenants) Act 1964. We have explored the relationship between those concepts further in Chapter 13 in our discussion of Midland Bank plc v Green.[90]

QUESTIONS

1. Outline the rules that would be used to determine the enforcement of a beneficial interest against a purchaser where purchase money is paid to: (i) one trustee; and (ii) two trustees.
2. To what extent does the requirement that purchase money must be paid to two trustees for overreaching to take place protect the beneficiaries against dissipation of funds by trustees?
3. Does a disposition by trustees in breach of trust (ultra vires or intra vires) have overreaching effect? What is the position of the purchaser following such a disposition?
4. Assess the arguments for and against enabling overreaching of the interests of beneficiaries in occupation. What advice would you give an occupying beneficiary who is concerned that his or her trustee(s) may sell the land?
5. What are the dangers for a purchaser who buys land from a sole surviving joint tenant? To what extent have these dangers been overcome?

FURTHER READING

Cooke, Land Law (Oxford: OUP, 2006, ch 3)

Conaglen and Goymour, 'Knowing Receipt and Registered Land' in Resulting and Constructive Trusts (ed Mitchell, 2009)

Ferris, 'Making Sense of Section 26 of the Land Registration Act 2002' in Modern Studies in Property Law: Vol 2 (ed Cooke, Oxford: Hart, 2003)

Ferris and Battersby, 'General Principles of Overreaching and the Reforms of the 1925 Legislation' (2002) 118 LQR 270

Ferris and Battersby, 'The General Principles of Overreaching and the Modern Legislative Reforms 1996–2002' (2003) 119 LQR 94

[90] [1981] AC 513. See Chapter 13, section 5.6.

Harpum, 'Overreaching, Trusteees' Powers and the Reform of the 1925 Legislation' (1990) 49 CLJ 277

Jackson, 'Overreaching and Unauthorised Disposition of Registered Land' [2007] Conv 120

Jackson, 'Overreaching in Registered Land Law' (2006) 69 MLR 214

Pascoe, 'Improving Conveyancing by Redrafting Section 16' [2005] Conv 140

20

SUCCESSIVE OWNERSHIP

CENTRAL ISSUES

1. Successive ownership arises under a trust in which the beneficiaries are entitled to possession in succession, rather than concurrently. While it retains practical significance, successive ownership has been superseded by co-ownership in social and economic importance.
2. Central to successive ownership is the existence of a life estate—that is, a period of ownership of land measured by the life of the beneficiary entitled in possession. The life estate is commercially unattractive and other devices can be used to confer rights of ownership or occupation for life.
3. Successive interest trusts can be created in the same way as other trusts of land. Those created after the commencement of the Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996 are regulated by that Act.

1 INTRODUCTION

In Chapter 17, we examined the regulation of co-ownership, arising where two or more people are concurrently entitled to legal or beneficial title to land. We saw that the defining characteristic of co-ownership is unity of possession: each co-owner is concurrently entitled to possession of the whole of the land. Successive ownership arises where two or more people are entitled to possession of land in succession to each other, rather than concurrently: for example, where land is held on trust for A for life and thereafter for B. In such a case, A alone is entitled to possession of the land for his or her life (the nature of A's 'life interest' is considered in section 4 below) and, on A's death, B's interest comes into possession. Successive ownership necessarily arises under a trust of the legal estate with A and B's interests arising in equity. Therefore, this chapter is concerned with successive beneficial ownership.

Beyond its own practical significance, an understanding of the operation of successive ownership enhances our appreciation of the concept of ownership of an estate in land (discussed in Chapter 4). It is the recognition, through the doctrine of estates, that ownership can be divided by periods of time that makes it possible to divide ownership of land successively. Further, successive ownership provides a useful bridge between our current focus on the home and Part F of this book, in which we consider leases. This is because some of the arrangements for ownership of land that would previously have been achieved through successive ownership of an estate may now be achieved through leasehold arrangements, as illustrated by Ingram v Inland Revenue Commissioners.[1] In that case, Lady Ingram wished to make a gift of her land during her lifetime to avoid inheritance tax, whilst simultaneously securing her own occupation until her death. Lifetime occupation could be secured through a lease or through successive beneficial ownership, but the former alone protected the estate from inheritance tax.[2]

2 THE SIGNIFICANCE OF SUCCESSIVE OWNERSHIP

Historically, the regulation of successive ownership was an important feature of land law. At its core, lay the family 'strict settlement' within which the forms of successive ownership (considered in section 3 below) were used in combination to keep land within the family for generation after generation.[3]

As Simpson explains, the rules governing settlements were developed by lawyers with conflicting desires to create a market in land to buy, but then retain that land within the family.[4] Additionally, however, the family settlement provided an important means of protecting women at a time of legal subservience. While the social and legal environments in which successive ownership and co-ownership have flourished are very different, in this respect alone, there is some parallel between their legal histories.

Simpson, A History of the Land Law (2nd edn, 1986, p 209)

> Many settlements of property were created on the occasion of a marriage between dynastic families, and here what was needed was compromise between the interests of the families concerned. Given the legal subservience of women, the bride's family required of property law some security both for their daughter and for her children and grandchildren. This could only be achieved if the husband's rights over the family land were in some degree restricted, so that the landed endowment of the family would pass down to the next generation. Indeed the whole history of settlements can only be made intelligible if we remember that although the family as such was not treated as a legal entity by the common law, which dealt only in individual property rights, landed society did nevertheless view property as ultimately belonging to the family in some moral sense, and the legal system reflected this.

The historical significance of the strict settlement appears beyond doubt even though, as Simpson acknowledges, its precise effects remain uncertain.

1 [1999] 1 AC 293.

2 Ibid, at 300. The effect of the decision was subsequently reversed by statute. For discussion of this, see Lee, 'Inheritance Tax: An Equitable Tax No Longer—Time for Abolition?' [2007] LS 678, 686.

3 A simplified example of a typical strict settlement is outlined by Simpson, A History of the Land Law (2nd edn, 1986), pp 236–7.

4 Ibid, p 209.

Simpson, A History of the Land Law (2nd edn, 1986, p 239)

> The strict settlement, by perpetuating and consolidating the wealth and power of the wealthy families, and by preserving their estates intact through the years, had an immense effect upon the social and political life of the country until very recent times. Precisely what effect is somewhat controversial. The settlement was the legal regime of the landed interest, powerful in both national and local political life; there is inevitably a problem in saying whether the legal institution was cause or effect of the political and social phenomenon. Death duties have in this century brought about the destruction of the social structure which the strict settlement enshrined, though the institution still lingers on.

As regards fiscal regulation, 'death duties' have been replaced by inheritance tax, which has retained disadvantageous treatment for successive interests. In particular, on the death of a lifetime beneficiary, inheritance tax is calculated on the basis that he or she was entitled to the entire estate.[5]

The decline in the significance of the strict settlement is mirrored by the growth of co-ownership. In modern law, co-ownership has superseded the strict settlement both in its social and economic importance. Despite the decline of the strict settlement, other instances of successive ownership remain of practical significance. A simple instance may arise in which, on the death of a sole owner, a home is left on trust for the deceased's spouse for life and thereafter to the couples' children.

3 FORMS OF SUCCESSIVE OWNERSHIP

Since the Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996 (TOLATA 1996) came into force on 1 January 1997, trusts of successive interests take two principal forms: firstly, a legal estate in land may be held on trust for A for life, remainder to B; secondly, a legal estate may be held on trust for A for life and then revert back to the settlor of the trust (see Figure 12).

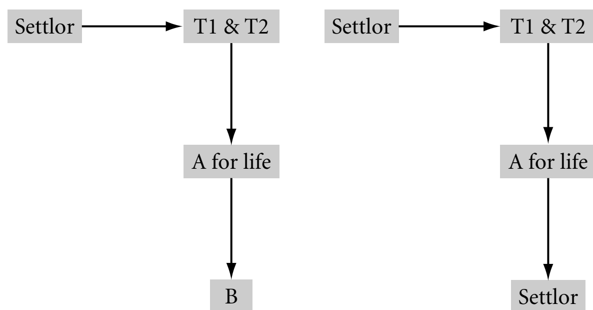

Figure 12 Successive interests in remainder and in reversion

5 Inheritance Tax Act 1984, s 49.

In both examples, the trustees hold legal title as legal joint tenants.[6] A and B (in the first example), or A and the settlor (in the second example), have successive interests. In both examples, A has a life estate (or life interest) in possession. In the first, on A's death, the freehold estate is held on trust for B, who is described during A's life as having an interest 'in remainder'. This form of trust may be used, for example, on the settlor's death, to provide for his or her spouse for life and thereafter for their child.

In the second example, on A's death, the trust returns the freehold estate to the settlor. During A's life, the settlor is described as having an interest 'in reversion', because the estate will revert or return back to the settlor on A's death. Such a trust may be used, for example, to provide housing for an elderly relative.

In each example, on A's death, B's interest 'in remainder', or the settlor's interest 'in reversion', becomes an interest 'in possession'.

Numerous variations on these basic examples are possible. Hence, the settlor may declare him or herself trustee of the trust and the number of trustees may vary, subject to the maximum number of four legal owners.[7] The successive interests of A and B (or of A and the settlor) may be combined with co-ownership of their respective estates. For example, adapting the first example, the freehold estate may be held on trust for A and X for their lives (ending on the death of the longest surviving), with remainder to B and Y. More than one life estate may be granted in succession before the remainder or reversion. Hence, in a different variation of our first example, a settlor may create a trust for A (his or her child) for life, then to B (A's child) before granting the remainder to C. But attempts to use successive interests in this way to keep land within generations of a family are likely to fall foul of the rule against perpetuities.

3.1 THE RULE AGAINST PERPETUITIES

The rule against perpetuities places a limit on the period of time within which a future interest in property may vest or take effect, from the time of the disposition creating the interest. The rule is borne from an ongoing battle between settlors, who wish to continue to exercise control of their property from beyond the grave, and courts keen to ensure alienation of land.

Megarry and Wade: The Law of Real Property (7th edn, eds Harpum et al, 2008, [9-012])

> It has commonly been the ambition of landowners to dictate to posterity how their land is to devolve in the future, and so to fetter the powers of alienation of those to whom they may give it; and it has always been the purpose of the courts, as a matter of public policy, to confine such settlements within narrow limits and to frustrate them when they attempt to reach too far into the future.

6 Legal title is vested in the trustees under the scheme of regulation provided by the Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996, which is examined in section 6 below. As has been seen in Chapter 17, section 2, legal co-owners are necessarily joint tenants.

7 Trustee Act 1925, s 34(2). This provision is discussed in Chapter 17, section 2.

A full discussion of the rule against perpetuities, which applies both to trusts of land and those of personal property, lies beyond the scope of this book and the following text is confined to providing a brief account.[8]

As a result of consecutive legislative reforms, which operate only prospectively, there are now three distinct sets of perpetuity rules. The set of rules that apply is generally dependent on the date that the instrument creating the successive interest comes into effect or, in the case of wills, the date the will is executed. The Perpetuities and Accumulations Act 2009, which came into force on 6 April 2010, provides a single perpetuity period of 125 years. This period applies irrespective of any other period being given in the instrument.[9] The rule operates on a 'wait and see' basis (adopted by previous legislation) so that if an interest 'might not become vested until too remote a time' it is treated as valid unless and until it becomes void for failing to vest within 125 years.[10] The Act is based on recommendations made by the Law Commission that were published in 1998.[11] It represents a considerable simplification of the previous two sets of rules, both of which revolved around the identity of 'lives in being'. The relevant lives in being must be living or conceived at the time that the instrument takes effect. The settlor may identify them, in the absence of which they are determined by rules. The operation of the previous perpetuities rules was outlined by the Law Commission in making its recommendations for reform.

Law Commission Report No 251, The Rules Against Perpetuities and Excessive Accumulations (1998)

The rule against perpetuities has to be stated in two parts. For dispositions made before the 1964 Act came into force on 16 July 1964, the rule is as follows—

1. A future interest in any type of property will be void from the date that the instrument which attempts to create it takes effect, if there is any possibility that the interest may vest or commence outside the perpetuity period.
2. For these purposes, the perpetuity period consists of one or more lives in being plus a period of 21 years and, where relevant, a period of gestation.

Where an instrument creates a future interest after 15 July 1964—

1. that interest will only be void where it must vest or take effect (if at all) outside the perpetuity period;
2. it is therefore necessary to "wait and see", if need be for the whole perpetuity period, to determine whether the interest is valid; and
3. an alternative perpetuity period of up to 80 years may be employed instead of a life in being plus 21 years. [...]

8 A full account is provided in Megarry and Wade: The Law of Real Property (7th edn, Harpum et al, 2008), [9-012]–[9-136]; Cheshire and Burn's Modern Law of Real Property (17th edn, eds Burn and Cartwright, 2006), ch 16.

9 Perpetuities and Accumulations Act 2009, s 5.

10 Perpetuities and Accumulations Act 2009, s 7.

11 Law Commission Report No 251, The Rules Against Perpetuities and Excessive Accumulations (1998).

3.2 ENTAILED INTERESTS

A third form of successive ownership is the 'entailed interest'. The TOLATA 1996 prohibits the creation of new entailed interests, although those in existence remain unaffected by that Act.[12]

The entailed interest is an estate in land that passes successively through direct lineal descendants. It represents the clearest attempt to keep land tied up for future generations. In this respect, its chief advantage over the creation of successive life interests is that the entail lies outside the scope of the rule against perpetuities. In its most traditional form, the entailed interest follows the primogeniture principles exemplified by the passing of the British Crown: from eldest surviving son to eldest surviving son, passing to the eldest surviving daughter only where there is no male heir. Variations may limit the estate to the male or female line.

4 THE NATURE OF THE LIFE ESTATE

Central to successive ownership is the existence of a life estate. As has been seen in Chapter 4, an estate denotes the period of time for which rights of ownership are enjoyed in relation to land. A life estate therefore denotes a period of ownership measured by the life of the party entitled in possession. A life estate can exist only in equity and is given effect under a trust of the legal title.[13] Since the coming into force of the 1996 Act, the trust is a trust of land, and the rights and duties of the trustees and beneficiaries are governed by the terms of that Act. These have been discussed in Chapter 17 and their specific application to successive ownership trusts is highlighted in section 6 below.

The limited nature and uncertain duration of the life estate impact both the rights of the beneficiary and the commercial value of the estate. The nature of a life estate can be understood by analogy with a trust of money. If trustees hold £100,000 on trust for A for life, remainder to B, then A and B's rights are located respectively in the income generated from the fund (A) and the capital sum on A's death (B). In essence, the same distinction between income and capital denotes the respective rights of A and B where the trust consists of land. A alone is entitled in possession of the land (akin to the income) for his or her life. A's right to possession may be enjoyed through physical occupation, or through receipt of rents and profits generated from the land. If the land is sold, then A is entitled to the income generated from the proceeds of sale. The land (the capital) or the proceeds of sale of the land must, however, be preserved for B. A's life estate is a property right, with which A is free to deal in the same way as any other estate in land: for example, A can sell his or her life estate, transfer it as a gift, or use it as security for a loan. Practically, however, the uncertain duration of the estate imposes a limit on its commercial value. Where a life estate is sold or transferred to a third party, the purchaser or transferee is described as holding an estate pur autre vie (for the life of another).

[12] Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996, Sch 1, para 5. Whether the provision does, in fact, prevent the creation of new entailed interests is doubted by Pascoe, 'Solicitors: Be Bold: Create Entailed Interests' [2001] Conv 396.

[13] Law of Property Act 1925, s 1(1), provides that only the freehold and leasehold estates are capable of existing at law. By virtue of s 1(3), all other estates are equitable. This provision is discussed in Chapter 4.

McCaffery compares the rights of the holder of a life estate with those of the holder of the freehold by reference to six incidents of ownership identified by Pound. (The numbers listed in the extract below refer to the six rights of ownership listed by Pound.)

McCaffery, 'Must We Have a Right to Waste?' in New Essays in the Legal and Political Theory of Property (ed Munzer, 2001, p 79)

> Most of the six rights readily extend to a life estate owner, or to any other present interest of limited duration. A life estate holder can possess the property (1), exclude others from it (2), dispose of her life estate (3), use the property (4), and enjoy its fruits or profits (5). One can think of these as the present-oriented rights of ownership, for they use or affect the present interest.
>
> A fee simple absolute adds but two powers to the life estate. One is the power to direct where the property is to go on the termination of the life estate: that is, a jus disponendi (3) as to the remainder, or future, interest. Two is the jus abutendi or right of waste (6). We could add a third difference—the right to sell or alienate the entire estate in fee simple absolute. But although the ability to sell the whole property is of immense practical importance, it is entailed in the rights set out above. One can sell what one has. A life estate owner already has the jus disponendi as to her life estate. What she lacks is the right of disposition as to the remainder, which, when combined with what it is that she does have, would give her a right of disposing of the whole.
>
> This all follows from the fact that the fee simple absolute owner owns the remainder interest, but the life estate holder does not. The jus disponendi as to the whole and the jus abutendi are rights that affect the remainder interest as well as the present one—one can think of them as the future-oriented rights of ownership. Under a life estate conception of ownership, the property holder cannot waste the property or direct where the remainder is to go.

One of the key differences between the estates therefore consists in what McCaffery refers to as the 'right to waste'. The purpose of McCaffery's essay is to encourage a rethinking of ownership in which a life estate is seen as an attractive form.[14] In this respect, he argues that a right to waste should not be recognized.[15] As McCaffery notes,[16] waste is usually understood in the negative, as a doctrine against waste. Waste generally denotes an act or omission that affects the value of the freehold (negatively or positively), or changes the nature of the land.[17] Historically, waste determined the rights of the holder of a life estate, together with the relationship between him or her and the holder of the interest in remainder or reversion. The holder of a life estate would be liable to the holder of the estate in remainder or reversion for some types of waste (for example, conduct that reduces the value of the land), but not others (including permissive waste, resulting from an omission to keep the land in good repair).[18]

In modern law, the provisions of the TOLATA 1996 govern the relationship between the parties. The broad powers of management conferred on trustees appear effectively to preclude resort to the law of waste.[19]

14 McCaffery, 'Must We Have a Right to Waste?' in New Essays in the Legal and Political Theory of Property (ed Munzer, 2001), pp 78–9.

15 Ibid, p 105.

16 Ibid, p 84.

17 McCaffery's own concept of waste is broader: ibid, p 77.

18 A brief summary is provided by Smith, Plural Ownership (2004), p 20.

19 Ibid, pp 20–1.

5 THE CREATION OF SUCCESSIVE INTERESTS

Successive interests take effect under a trust and can be created in the same way as any other trust of land. Hence, a successive ownership trust can be created expressly through compliance with s 53(1)(b) of the Law of Property Act 1925 (LPA 1925), which requires the declaration of trust to be evidenced in writing, signed by the settlor, or through a validly executed will. Successive interest trusts may also arise impliedly: for example, through a common intention constructive trust of the type that we have considered in Chapter 16 in relation to co-ownership.

As we have seen in Chapter 16, the elements of the common intention trust are a common intention to share beneficial ownership, coupled with detrimental reliance on the part of the claimant. In most cases, the agreement to share will reflect an intention to co-own the home, but, exceptionally, an agreement will be consistent with successive ownership.

Ungurian v Lesnoff
[1990] Ch 206, HC

Facts: At the time that the relevant facts took place, Poland was under Communist rule. Mrs Lesnoff, a Polish national, gave up her Polish nationality, a flat in Poland in which she could have remained in occupation for her life, and her career, to move to London to live with Mr Ungurian. The couple lived in a house, registered in Mr Ungurian's sole name, together with Mrs Lesnoff's sons and one of Mr Ungurian's sons, Paul. During the course of the parties' four-year relationship, Mrs Lesnoff carried out considerable improvements to the property. On the breakdown of the relationship, Mrs Lesnoff argued that the house was held on trust for her or, at the least, that she was entitled to remain in occupation for her life.

Vinelott J

At 223–4

In summary, therefore, I am not satisfied that the house was bought by Mr. Ungurian with the intention that it would belong to Mrs. Lesnoff, either immediately or when she gave up her flat in Poland and obtained permission to live permanently abroad; but I am satisfied that it was bought with the common intention that Mrs. Lesnoff would be entitled to live there with her children, sharing it with Mr. Ungurian when he was in England, and with any of his children who were here for the purpose of being educated. I am satisfied that Mrs. Lesnoff went through with this plan, initiated in Beirut and later elaborated, in the expectation that Mr. Ungurian would provide her with a secure home and that she burnt her boats by giving up her flat in Wraclow in the belief that he had done so. The question is whether these facts, and the work subsequently done by Mrs. Lesnoff, give rise, either to a constructive trust under which Mrs. Lesnoff became entitled to a beneficial interest in the house, or to a licence to reside, or to an estoppel preventing Mr. Ungurian from denying her right to reside in the house. [. . .]

In my judgment, the inference to be drawn from the circumstances in which the property was purchased and the subsequent conduct of the parties—the intention to be attributed > to them—is that Mrs. Lesnoff was to have the right to reside in the house during her life. It would be to that extent her house, and although the expectation was that Mr. Ungurian would live there with her when he was in England, and that Paul, and possibly in due course his younger son also, would be accommodated there while they were being educated, that result would flow from the continued relationship between Mrs. Lesnoff and Mr. Ungurian and would be dependent on it. It must be borne in mind that Mr. Ungurian was a man of considerable means with flats in Beirut, Amman and Switzerland. He was providing a house as a home for a woman much younger than himself who would be likely to survive him. I do not think that full effect would be given to this common intention by inferring no more than an irrevocable licence to occupy the house. I think the legal consequences which flow from the intention to be imputed to the parties was that Mr. Ungurian held the house on trust to permit Mrs. Lesnoff to reside in it during her life unless and until Mr. Ungurian, with her consent, sold the property and bought another residence for her in substitution for it.

The factual background to Ungurian v Lesnoff is unusual. The extreme lengths required of Mrs Lesnoff to be able to leave Poland during the time of Communist rule highlighted her particular need for security of accommodation. The case also illustrates that there are different ways in which occupation for life can be given effect. Vinelott J notes the possibility of finding a constructive trust, a licence, or a claim to estoppel. As regards estoppel, if Vinelott J were to have found that Mr Ungurian was estopped from denying Mrs Lesnoff a right to reside, he would then have had a discretion as to the appropriate remedy to award in satisfaction of the claim.[20] The remedy could take the form, for example, of a licence or a trust. Lifetime occupation may also be given effect through the grant of a lease, with provision for the lease to be terminated on an individual's death.[21]

Prior to the TOLATA 1996, the informal creation of a life estate gave rise to a trust governed by the Settled Land Act 1925. Such a trust was imposed in Ungurian v Lesnoff. The effect of the Settled Land Act 1925 is considered in section 6 below. It is sufficient to note that it conferred upon the holder of the life estate greater powers of management over the land than may have been appropriate.[22] The TOLATA 1996 has superseded that legislation. That Act removes the difficulties encountered under the Settled Land Act 1925 and the informal creation of a successive ownership trust is therefore less problematic. But the question still arises whether a life estate, licence, or lease is the most appropriate means of securing occupation for life. As Table 4 shows, each differs as regards the method of creation and the extent of security conferred on the occupier.

[20] The nature of the courts' discretion is considered in Chapter 10.

[21] A lease 'for life' is not itself valid, because a lease must have a fixed maximum duration. This requirement is considered in Chapter 22.

[22] A full discussion of the debate surrounding the application of the Settled Land Act 1925 to life occupancy is now largely of historical interest. Useful discussions of Ungurian v Lesnoff [1990] Ch 206 that highlight the issues are provided by Hill, 'The Settled Land Act 1925: Unresolved Problems' (1991) 107 LQR 596, 596–600, and Sparkes, 'Beneficial Interest or Licence for Life' [1990] Conv 223. For discussion of the earlier case law, see Hornby, 'Tenancy or Life or Licence' (1977) 93 LQR 561.

Table 4 Legal mechanisms to provide occupation and/or ownership of land for life

	Life estate	Licence to occupy for life	Lease determinable on death
Legal status	Proprietary estate—equitable, given effect under trust	Personal	Proprietary—legal or equitable
Duration	Life	Life	Fixed term, with provision for determination by freeholder (landlord) on tenant's death
Creation	Express trust (during settlor's lifetime or by will) Implied trust, e.g. constructive trust	No specific formality requirements	Legal—dependent on duration of fixed term, but likely to require deed and registration (Law of Property Act 1925, ss 52 and 54; Land Registration Act 2002, s.4) Equitable—through existence of valid contract to create a lease, in compliance with Law of Property (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1989, s 2 See discussion of lease formalities in Chapter 22
Enforcement against third parties	Overreached on sale if requirements of overreaching are met. Possible enforcement only if not overreached: • registered land—possible protection as an overriding interest within Land Registration Act 2002, Sch 3, para 2 • unregistered land—doctrine of notice See Chapters 13, 14, and 19	Not enforceable against third parties, but note possible imposition of constructive trust on sale, see Chapter 21	Registered land—dependent on duration of fixed term, but possible entry as Land Registry notice (Land Registration Act 2002, ss 32 and 33(b)), or protection as an overriding interest within Land Registration Act 2002, Sch 3, paras 1 and 2 Unregistered land—legal lease binds all purchasers; equitable lease, an estate contract governed by Land Charges Act 1972, Class C(iv), see Chapters 13 and 14
Principal source of regulation	Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996, see Chapter 17 and section 6 below	Personal agreement	Terms of lease/implied covenants, see Chapter 24

6 REGULATION OF SUCCESSIVE OWNERSHIP

Prior to the TOLATA 1996, trusts involving successive ownership were generally regulated by the Settled Land Act 1925. That Act applied to all instances of successive ownership (whether created through an express trust or arising informally through, for example, a constructive trust)[23] unless the trust was expressly created as a trust for sale.[24] One of the key aims of the 1996 Act was to provide a single scheme of regulation for all trusts of land, including both co-ownership and successive ownership trusts.[25] The scheme of regulation under the Settled Land Act 1925 differed from the trust for sale as regards the location of the legal title and powers of management over the land.[26] In a trust for sale—and, now, under a trust of land—legal title is vested in the trustees, who exercise powers of management. Under the Settled Land Act 1925, legal title and the powers of management were vested in the 'tenant for life'—that is, the beneficiary currently entitled in possession.[27] The trustees of the settlement exercised specific functions (including executing a deed of discharge on the termination of the settlement), received and held capital moneys on sale, and played a general supervisory role.[28]

This scheme of regulation was subject to specific criticism for the position of the tenant for life.

Law Commission Report No 181, Transfer of Land: Trusts of Land (1989, [1.3], citing Law Commission Working Paper No 94, Trusts of Land, 1985, [3.16])

> Conflict of interest. It has been suggested that there is an inherent conflict involved in the position of the tenant for life. The legal estate and all the powers of dealing with it are vested in him and under s.16 of the Settled Land Act 1925 he is a trustee. Yet he is, at the same time, the principal beneficiary. While it is quite usual for a trustee to be a beneficiary, given the lack of any other restraints on the tenant's powers, the conflict may become real. It seems that where there is a conflict of interests, the tenant of life is not treated like an ordinary trustee. It has been held that the court will not intervene if the tenant for life allows the estate to become derelict, but only if there is evidence that he has refused to exercise his powers. Thus the remaindermen may inherit an estate much diminished in value and have no remedy. Similarly the interests of the remaindermen may be adversely affected by a sale of the settled land at a low price. Again, they may have no effective remedy as they may not discover the sale until years after it took place and, even if they could establish a breach of trust, the tenant for life may be dead and his estate not worth suing. While it is clear that the courts, recognising the risks arising from conflicts of interest, usually make 23 The application of the Settled Land Act 1925 to informal trusts was controversial, because it circumvented the strict formality requirements otherwise specified in s 4 of the Act. But Ungurian v Lesnoff [1990] Ch 206 is one of a number of cases in which the Act was applied to an informally created settlement. For further discussion of this point, see the literature listed at fn 22 above.

24 Settled Land Act 1925, s 1(1) and (7).

25 Law Commission Report No 181, Transfer of Land: Trusts of Land (1989), [1.4].

26 The content of the powers was the same, because trustees for sale were conferred with the same powers of management as a tenant for life in relation to land held on trust: Law of Property Act 1925, s 28(1) (repealed by the Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996).

27 Settled Land Act 1925, s 19(1). Where the beneficiary was a minor, the powers of management were vested in other persons by s 26.

28 For a full list of the functions of trustees of the settlement, see Megarry and Wade (2008), [A-092].

the purchase of trust property by a trustee virtually impossible, in one case where the tenant for life purchased the settled land without the proper procedure being adopted, the sale was simply allowed to stand.

Successive ownership trusts created on or after the commencement of the TOLATA 1996 are trusts of land and are within the scheme of regulation provided by that Act.[29] Successive ownership trusts that were in existence on the date of commencement of that Act, and which were governed by the Settled Land Act 1925 at that time, remain regulated by the 1925 Act.[30] Hence the 1925 Act has not been repealed, but it is in the process of being phased out.

The scheme of regulation provided under the 1996 Act has been examined in Chapter 17 in the context of co-ownership trusts. It has been seen that the Act confers certain powers on the trustees as regards the management and sale of the land, and confers rights on the beneficiaries. A full discussion of the trustees' powers and the beneficiaries' rights is provided in Chapter 17, sections 5.2 and 5.3; in this chapter, it is necessary only to outline how these powers and rights apply in the specific context of successive ownership.

Under the 1996 Act, the legal title and powers of management are vested in the trustees of land. This removes the conflict of interest for the beneficiary entitled in possession created by the Settled Land Act 1925. As we have seen in Chapter 17, section 5.2, trustees of land are vested with 'all the powers of an absolute owner'. These powers must be exercised with regard to the rights of the beneficiaries (s 6(5) of the 1996 Act) and in a manner that is consistent with any other enactment or rule of law or equity (s 6(6)). The settlor of an express trust may also impose limitations on the trustees' powers.[31]

The courts have not yet considered the application of these provisions in the context of successive ownership. It is suggested that difficulties may arise in applying the general limitations on trustees' powers in the context of successive owners: what 'rights' are enjoyed by beneficiaries whose interest is in remainder or reversion? We have seen, in Chapter 17, section 5.3, that the 1996 Act confers two key rights on beneficiaries: a right to be consulted by the trustees, and a right to occupy the trust land. These rights are conferred on those beneficiaries who are 'beneficially entitled to an interest in possession in the land'.[32] Hence, these rights are limited to the holder(s) of the life estate in possession, to the exclusion of those whose interest is in reversion or remainder. The rights of beneficiaries to which the trustees must have regard in the exercise of their powers by virtue of s 6(5) are not necessarily confined to the rights conferred by the Act.[33] There is, however, no clear source of rights outside of the 1996 Act, beyond any specific rights that may be conferred by the settlor of an express trust. Beneficiaries with an interest in remainder or reversion may have to rely on the general equitable duties imposed on trustees, to which the trustees must have regard through s 6(6), in order to safeguard their interest.

29 Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996, s 1(2)(a) and (3).

30 Successive ownership trusts expressly created as a trust for sale prior to the commencement of the 1996 Act, like all express trusts for sale, became trusts of land on 1 January 1997: Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996, s 1(2)(b).

31 Ibid, s 8.

32 Ibid, ss 11(1)(a) and 12(1). (The right to be consulted is further limited by s 11(1)(a) to beneficiaries of full age.)

33 See the annotation to ibid, s 6(5), by Kenny and Kenny, in Current Law Statutes (1997). The annotation suggests that the 'rights' referred to would include those conferred by the settlor of the trust. This implicitly accepts that the rights of the beneficiaries to which the trustees are to have regard are not confined to those conferred by the Act.

We have seen, in Chapter 17, section 5.4, that disputes relating to the exercise of powers by trustees may be referred to the court on an application under s 14 of the 1996 Act. An application may be made (amongst others) by 'any person who [...] has an interest in property subject to a trust of land'. This provision is not confined to parties with an interest in possession. Therefore, a beneficiary with an interest in remainder or reversion may bring an application to court under s 14: for example, this would enable such a beneficiary to bring an action to challenge a decision by the trustees to sell the land. But it remains open to question how much emphasis the courts will place on the wishes of a beneficiary with an interest in remainder or reversion. Although not exhaustive of the factors that may be taken into account by the court, s 15(3) directs the court to consider the wishes of beneficiaries with an interest in possession.

QUESTIONS

1. Compare and contrast successive ownership and concurrent ownership. While both take effect under a trust regulated by the Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996, what differences may remain in the application of that Act to each type of trust?
2. When might it be appropriate to confer: (i) a life estate; (ii) a licence to occupy; and (iii) a lease determinable on death?

FURTHER READING

Burn and Cartwright (eds), Cheshire and Burn's Modern Law of Real Property (17th edn, Oxford: OUP, 2006, ch 16)

Law Commission Report No 251, The Rules Against Perpetuities and Excessive Accumulations (1998)

McCaffery, 'Must We Have a Right to Waste?' in New Essays in the Legal and Political Theory of Property (ed Munzer, Cambridge: CUP, 2001)

Simpson, A History of the Land Law (2nd edn, Oxford: OUP, 1986)

Smith, Plural Ownership (Oxford: OUP, 2004, ch 2)

This page intentionally left blank

PART F

LICENCES AND LEASES

This page intentionally left blank

21

LICENCES

CENTRAL ISSUES

1. In Part F, we will look first at the licence; then, in the next three chapters, we will examine the lease. Licences and leases are linked as they each provide a means by which B may occupy A's land. Indeed, in many cases, a licence or a lease may provide the basis on which B occupies his or her home. There is, however, a fundamental difference between a licence and a lease; only the latter can currently count as a property right in land.
2. A licence exists where one party (B) has a liberty to use land belonging to another (A). In considering licences, we need to examine: the rights that B has against A; the rights that B has against X, a stranger who interferes with B's use of A's land; and the rights that B has against C, a party who acquires a right from A and then interferes with B's use of the land.
3. Licences can be grouped into a number of categories. A bare licence exists where B has only a liberty to use A's land. The law governing such a licence is straightforward. It can be revoked by A, and B cannot assert it against X or C.
4. A contractual licence exists where B has a liberty to use A's land and A is under a contractual duty to B not to revoke that liberty. A's contractual duty is clearly important when considering what rights B has against A. The crucial question is whether the existence of this contract can also affect B's rights against X and C. This has been a controversial question.
5. In considering what rights B, a party with a contractual licence, may have against X or C, we need to keep in mind the two different ways in which it may be possible for B to assert a right against such a party. Firstly, B may be able to assert a new, direct right against X or C, arising as a result of X or C's conduct. Such a right may arise under a 'constructive trust'—but controversy surrounds both the source and nature of this trust.
6. Secondly, if B is unable to assert a direct right against X or C, he or she will have to argue that his or her contractual licence counts as a legal or equitable property right in land. The current position is that a contractual licence does not count as such a right—but this is another controversial area. A number of arguments have been made in favour of the view that at least some types of contractual licence should count as an equitable interest in land. One of these arguments involves a comparison with a third type of licence: an estoppel licence.
7. When examining licences to use land, we also need to consider statutory licences and licences coupled with an interest. The latter category, however, is of dubious value.

1 THE NATURE OF A LICENCE

Let us say that A, a freehold owner of land, invites B to his house for dinner. When B is on A's land, he is described as having a licence. The word 'licence' simply means permission. Because A has a legal estate in the land, B, like the rest of the world, is under a prima facie duty not to make any use of A's land (see Chapter 4, section 1). If, however, A gives B permission to make a particular use of A's land, B's duty disappears: an act that would otherwise be wrongful (coming onto A's land) becomes permissible.

Thomas v Sorrell
(1673) Vaugh 330, Exchequer Chamber

Facts: Mr Thomas, acting on behalf of the Crown, demanded payment from Mr Sorrell on the basis that Mr Sorrell had sold wine in the parish of Stepney without a licence. Mr Sorrell claimed that he had a licence to sell wine in his capacity of a member of the 'Masters, Warden, Freemen, and Commonality of the Mystery of Vintners of the City of London'. Vaughan CJ considered the meaning of the term 'licence'.

Vaughan CJ

At 351

A dispensation or licence properly passeth no interest, nor alters or transfers property in any thing, but only makes an action lawful which, without it, had been unlawful. As a licence to go beyond the seas, to hunt in a man's park, to come into his house, are only actions, which without licence, had been unlawful.

So, even when B is enjoying his dinner at A's home, we need to be careful in saying that B has a 'right' to be on A's land.

The great American jurist Hohfeld noted that we use the word 'right' to cover many different situations.[1] For example, if we say that B has a right that A must not poison B's food, we mean that A is under a duty to B not to poison B's food. In such a case, in Hohfeld's terms, B has a particular form of right: a claim right. In contrast, if we say that B has a right to be on A's land, we mean something different. In our example, after all, A is not under a duty to allow B to stay on his land. So, if B makes a controversial comment over dinner, A is free to ask B to leave without any dessert. So, when we say that B has a right to be on A's land, what we really mean is that, at least until A revokes his permission, B is not under a duty to A not to be on A's land. In such a case, in Hohfeld's terms, B has a particular form of right: a privilege or liberty.

[1] See Hohfeld, Fundamental Legal Conceptions as Applied in Judicial Reasoning (1920; based on (1913) 23 Yale LJ 16 and (1917) 26 Yale LJ 710).

Hohfeld, 'Faulty Analysis in Easement and License Cases'[2] (1917) Yale LJ 66, 94

> Suppose that A says to B, "I give you permission to walk across my land, Longacre." This language in and of itself purports merely to create in B the privilege, or more strictly, series of privileges, of walking across A's land. In correlative terms, A's right that B stay off the land is extinguished, and no-rights substituted. The important point is that the permission constitutes a grant to B of privileges alone: B is not granted any accompanying rights (or claims) that A or other persons shall not interfere with B's entering on the land, Longacre, and walking across. If, therefore, B succeeds in entering on the land, no rights (or claims) of A are violated; but if on the other hand, A closes the gate in the high stone wall, or bars the one and only path midway, no rights (or claims) of B are violated; and so also if some third party locks the gate or bars the path halfway across Longacre.

All licences thus involve a liberty of B to make some use of A's land.[3] There are, however, situations in which B has a liberty to use A's land and is not treated as having a licence. We can modify Hohfeld's example so that A, instead of simply giving B permission to walk across his land, grants B a legal easement that allows B to walk across A's land. If B has a legal easement, he has a liberty to make some use of A's land, and A is under a duty not to interfere with B's liberty, and the rest of the world is also under a duty not to interfere with B's liberty. These duties are imposed on A and the rest of the world because, as we saw in Chapter 4, sections 5 and 6, B's easement counts as a legal interest in land. In such a case, we would not say that B has a licence. The term 'licence' is thus reserved for cases in which B has a liberty to make some use of A's land, and that liberty is not part of a legal or equitable property right held by B.

So, in Street v Mountford,[4] a case that we will examine in Chapter 22, section 1.1.1, the House of Lords considered a situation in which, in return for payment from B, A made a contractual promise to allow B to occupy A's land for a limited period. The contract described B's right as a 'licence'—but the House of Lords held that, because B had a right to exclusive possession of the land for a limited period, A had instead given B a lease. This meant that B had more than permission to make some use of A's land: he had a legal property right in A's land. So, during the period fixed by the contract, A and the rest of the world had a duty not to interfere with B's occupation of the land.

Strictly speaking, then, to define a 'licence', we also need to define property rights such as an 'easement' or a 'lease'. We will consider those definitions in Chapters 25 (the easement) and 22 (the lease). In the meantime, we can define a licence as follows.

B has a licence where he has:

- a liberty to make some use of A's land; and
- that liberty is not part of a property right held by B.

[2] 'License' is the American English spelling for the noun. In British English usage, 'licence' is the noun and 'license' the verb (hence 'licensor' for a party granting a licence and 'licensee' for a party with the benefit of a licence).

[3] Hohfeld preferred the term 'privilege' to refer to the right of a party, such as B in the extract above, who has a special liberty not held by others. On this view, almost all licences give B a privilege. But the term 'liberty' is used in this chapter, because it can also encompass cases in which B has a licence not because of his special position, or any dealings with A, but because of a general rule permitting a particular use of A's land.

[4] [1985] AC 809.

Within that general definition, we can then identify different forms of licence. There are five main varieties: bare licences; contractual licences; estoppel licences; statutory licences; and licences coupled with an interest.

2 BARE LICENCES

A bare licence is the simplest form of licence. It exists where B has a liberty to make some use of A's land and A is free to revoke that liberty—that is, A is not under a duty to B not to revoke B's permission to use A's land. When A invites B to A's house for dinner, B has a bare licence. As we have seen, A is free to revoke B's liberty and may do so either before B arrives or during B's visit. A bare licence may also be implied: for example, although not expressly invited by A, a collector for a charity, unless expressly warned otherwise,[5] has a bare licence to come onto A's land and knock on A's door to pursue his lawful business.

2.1 B'S RIGHTS AGAINST A

The key feature of a bare licence is that A is under no duty to B not to revoke the licence: as Alderson B put it in Wood v Leadbitter:[6] '[A] mere licence is revocable.' So, if A invites B around for dinner, A can change his mind and revoke the invitation. If B decides to come anyway, B commits the tort of trespass: he breaches his duty to A not to interfere with A's land.[7] If B is already on A's land when A revokes his invitation, there is a problem with saying that B immediately becomes a trespasser. If that were the case, A would immediately be able to use reasonable force to remove B from the land. It would, of course, be unfair on B if A could use such force before giving B a reasonable time in which to leave A's land. So, given A's initial invitation and B's reliance on that invitation by coming onto A's land, the law does not allow A's revocation of the licence to turn B immediately into a trespasser.

Winter Garden Theatre (London) Ltd v Millennium Productions Ltd
[1948] AC 173, HL

Facts: Winter Garden Theatre (London) Ltd owned the Winter Garden Theatre, Drury Lane, London. In July 1942, the company made a contractual promise to Millennium Productions Ltd to allow Millennium to use the theatre for six months, with an option to renew the licence for a further six months. The contract stated that, at the end of those two six-month periods, Millennium would have the option to continue the licence at a flat weekly price of £300. The contract stipulated that, in such a case, Millennium would have to give Winter Garden one month's notice if it wished to terminate the licence. The written agreement said nothing, however, about Winter Garden's ability, in such a case, to revoke the licence. The licence did, indeed, continue for more than a year and was still in operation by the start of September 1945. Millennium entered a contract with a production company allowing it to put on performances of a play

[5] For example, if A puts up a notice expressly denying permission to such callers to enter A's land, no licence can be implied.

[6] (1845) 13 M & W 838, 844.

[7] That is the case even if B is unaware that A has revoked the invitation and so honestly believes that he is entitled to come onto A's land.

(Young Mrs Barrington)[8] from 5 September 1945 until January 1946. On 13 September, however, Winter Garden (A Ltd) decided to revoke the licence of Millennium (B Ltd). A Ltd gave B Ltd one month's notice, but demanded that it leave by 13 October. B Ltd sought a declaration that A Ltd had breached its contractual duty, because either: (i) the licence could be revoked only if B Ltd breached one or more of its terms; or (ii) even if the licence could be revoked, A Ltd had not given it a reasonable period of notice. The House of Lords rejected both of these arguments and found in favour of A Ltd.

Viscount Simon

At 188–9

The effect of a licence by A to permit B to enter upon A's land or to use his premises for some purpose is in effect an authority which prevents B from being regarded as a trespasser when he avails himself of the licence (Thomas v Sorrell). Such a licence may fall into one of various classes. It may be a purely gratuitous licence in return for which A gets nothing at all, e.g., a licence to B to walk across A's field. Such a gratuitous licence would plainly be revocable by notice given by A to B. Even in that case, however, notice of revocation conveyed to B when he was in the act of crossing A's field could not turn him into a trespasser until he was off the premises, but his future right of crossing would thereupon cease.

Lord Macdermott

At 204

It is, I think, safe, as well as desirable for the decision of this case, to say that one who remains on the land of another after his licence to use it has terminated will not be considered a trespasser before he has had a reasonable time in which to vacate the premises [...] This period of grace can, of course, be the subject of agreement, but it exists for gratuitous as well as for contractual licensees and, on that account, must, I think, be generally ascribed to a rule of law rather than to an implied stipulation.

The courts have consistently reached the conclusion that A's revocation does not immediately turn B into a trespasser. As Hill notes, this conclusion has been reached in a number of different ways.

Hill, 'The Termination of Bare Licences' [2001] Cambridge LJ 87, 89

The position with regard to bare licences should be more straightforward [...] As the fundamental feature of a bare gratuitous licence is that it is not based on a contract, it might be supposed that a bare licence imposes no obligations on the licensor. If this were the case, once revocation has occurred, the licensee [...] would, on failing to vacate the land, immediately become a trespasser. There are, however, four aspects of the law which indicate that the law relating to bare licences is not quite as simple as this.

First, through the operation of the doctrine of proprietary estoppel, the licensor may be estopped from revoking the licence. Second, a licence which has been acted upon is not > revocable. Third, on revocation of a bare licence, the licensee must be given a reasonable 'period of grace' or 'packing up period' and only at the end of this period does a licensee, who has failed to vacate the land, become a trespasser. Fourth, it is sometimes said that a bare licence may be revoked only 'on reasonable notice'.

8 A play by Warren Chetham Strode. The part of 'Arthur Barrington' was played by Peter Hammond, who went on to direct many of the well-known television adaptations of Sherlock Holmes stories (starting Jeremy Brett in the title role) from 1986–94.

Hill goes on to examine these four methods, each of which has been used to ensure that, when A revokes or attempts to revoke B's bare licence, B does not immediately become a trespasser. His conclusion is that only two of those methods should be used: the notion of a 'packing up' period, and the idea that the doctrine of proprietary estoppel may impose a duty on A to B. In doing so, he divides bare licences into two categories. The first is that in which the doctrine of proprietary estoppel does not impose a duty on A: he refers to these cases as involving a 'one-sided' licence.

Hill, 'The Termination of Bare Licences' [2001] Cambridge LJ 87, 107

> Cases involving this type of 'one sided' licence present fewest problems, both doctrinally and practically. If the licensee has not acted to his detriment there is no policy reason why the licensor's freedom of action should be unduly circumscribed. In terms of fairness, the only rationale for the law's intervention is to ensure that the licensee is given a reasonable period in which to make alternative arrangements (where necessary). The packing-up period provides the mechanism whereby the law can achieve an appropriate balance between the licensor's interest in determining the licence and the licensee's interest in not suffering excessive disruption.

Hill's second category consists of cases in which the doctrine of proprietary estoppel does impose a duty on A. Hill includes those cases in his discussion of bare licences, because he defines any non-contractual licence as a bare licence. Given the duty imposed on A, however, we will treat estoppel licences as distinct from bare licences and examine them separately in section 4 below. Nonetheless, it is worth noting Hill's conclusion that the courts' handling of this second class of cases can be explained by using only two ideas: firstly, the concept of a 'packing up' period applied in the first category; secondly, the idea that the doctrine of proprietary estoppel imposes a duty on A.

Hill, 'The Termination of Bare Licences' [2001] Cambridge LJ 87, 107–8

> The second category, which might be termed 'two-sided' licences, includes cases where, although there is no contractual bargain between the parties, the licensee, as a consequence of the (express or implied) licence, undertakes some activity or incurs some expenditure which otherwise he would not have undertaken or incurred. The courts have dealt with cases falling within this category in one of three ways: the largely forgotten common law doctrine of a licence acted upon, the equitable doctrine of proprietary estoppel; the licensor's obligation to give reasonable notice. In policy terms, it is far from clear that the licensor's obligation to give reasonable notice is required to ensure that a "two-sided" licensee does not suffer hardship as a consequence of the licence's summary termination; the doctrine of proprietary estoppel and the packing-up period provide the court with sufficient tools to enable the licensee's reasonable expectations to be protected.

> All the cases in which the basis of the court's decision has been either the doctrine of a licence acted upon or the licensor's obligation to give reasonable notice could have been decided equally or more satisfactorily by the proper application of the doctrine of proprietary estoppel or the packing-up period. Furthermore, there is no argument of principle in support of the proposition that a licensor should be under an obligation to give the licensee a period of notice before revocation of a bare licence is to take effect [...] When bare licences are located in the broader picture of rights in relation to land, the notion that a bare licensee is entitled to a period of notice is illogical [...]

Whilst we can question his terminology (Hill's second class of bare licences is perhaps better seen as a class of estoppel licences), Hill's analysis is otherwise persuasive. In a simple bare licence case, in which the doctrine of proprietary estoppel does not apply, the concept of a 'packing up' period is the only concept that a court needs to explain why A's revocation of a bare licence whilst B is on A's land does not immediately turn B into a wrongdoer.

2.2 B'S RIGHTS AGAINST X

If B has a bare licence, then, as Hohfeld noted, in the extract above, that licence does not impose any duty on X, a stranger, not to interfere with B's use of A's land. In some cases, however, B can acquire a property right in addition to his bare licence; that property right will then impose a duty on X. For example, let us say that A goes on holiday for a week and asks B to 'house-sit'. A and B's arrangement is that B is under no duty to do so, and that, if he does choose to house-sit, A will not pay him. If B does go onto and occupy A's land for that week, X is under a duty not to interfere with B's occupation of the land. This is confirmed by Lord Upjohn's analysis, in National Provincial Bank v Ainsworth,[9] of the position of Mrs Ainsworth after Mr Ainsworth moved out of the family home (see Chapter 1, section 5.1, and Chapter 5, section 5.4, for discussion of this case). His Lordship stated that 'in this case in truth and in fact the wife at all material times was and is in exclusive occupation of the home. Until her husband returns she has dominion over the house and she could clearly bring proceedings against trespassers'.[10]

In such a case, however, X's duty does not arise because of B's licence; instead, it arises because B, as a result of having possession of A's land, has a legal estate in land—that is, a freehold. That right is acquired independently of A: B acquires the right simply by taking possession of the land (see Chapter 4, section 4, for discussion of the concept of independent acquisition). This means that B acquires such a right even if he takes possession of the land without A's permission and therefore has no licence. We will explore this point further in Chapter 8, when examining how B can independently acquire a legal estate in land.

2.3 B'S RIGHTS AGAINST C

If B has a bare licence and A then gives C an inconsistent right—for example, by transferring his freehold of the land to C—we have an example of the priority triangle (Figure 13) (see Chapter 12).

9 [1965] AC 1175, 1232.

10 That view was confirmed by the Court of Appeal in Manchester Airport plc v Dutton [2000] QB 133.

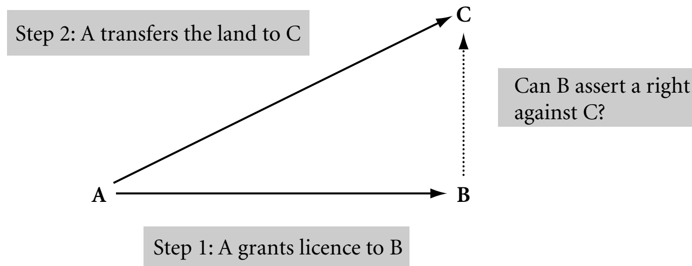

Figure 13 Bare licences and the priority triangle

As we saw in Chapters 6 and 12, there are two ways in which B may have a right against C: firstly, it may be that C has acted in such a way as to give B a new, direct right against C; secondly, it may be that B has a pre-existing property right that he can assert against C.

2.3.1 Direct rights

There are many different ways in which B may acquire a direct right against C. As we saw in Chapter 6, section 2, however, all of these methods depend on C's conduct: there must be something in the way that C behaves that justifies B's acquisition of a new, direct right against C. For example, if C, when acquiring his freehold from A, enters into a contract with B to allow B to continue using the land, B will acquire a direct contractual right against C. In practice, however, that situation will almost never arise. If B simply has a bare licence, there is no reason why A, when transferring the land to C, would insist on C making such a contractual promise to B. And there is no obvious reason why C would, on his or her own initiative, make such a promise to B.

2.3.2 A pre-existing property right?

If B's bare licence counts as a property right, then it will be prima facie binding on C. It is clear, however, that a bare licence does not count as a property right. Firstly, as we saw in Chapter 4, section 6, and Chapter 5, section 5.4, the numerus clausus principle, confirmed by ss 1 and 4 of the Law of Property Act 1925 (LPA 1925), means that there is a closed list of legal and equitable property rights in land. As confirmed by the House of Lords in National Provincial Bank v Ainsworth, licences do not form part of this list. Further, it is very unlikely that a bare licence will ever be admitted into the list of property rights: it cannot meet the criteria laid down by Lord Wilberforce in the following extract.

National Provincial Bank v Ainsworth
[1965] AC 1175, HL

Lord Wilberforce

At 1247–8

Before a right or interest can be admitted into the category of property, or of a right affecting property, it must be definable, identifiable by third parties, capable in its nature of assumption by third parties, and have some degree of permanence or stability.

If B simply has a bare licence, his right clearly lacks that quality of 'permanence and stability'; after all, as we have seen, it can simply be revoked by A.

3 CONTRACTUAL LICENCES

A contractual licence exists where B has a liberty to make some use of A's land and A is under a contractual duty to B in relation to A's power to revoke that liberty. This means that—in some circumstances, at least—A is under a contractual duty to B not to revoke B's licence. For example, let us say A and B make an agreement that B, in return for paying A £500 up front, can share occupation of A's house for three months. As we will see in Chapter 22, section 1.1.1, such an arrangement will not give B a lease: because he can only share occupation of A's house, B does not have a right to exclusive possession of any land. B does, however, have more than a bare licence: A is also under a contractual duty not to revoke B's permission to occupy during the next three months. Of course, A's duty is not absolute: even if they have not expressly agreed it, A will have an implied power to revoke B's permission in certain circumstances—for example, if he discovers that B is stealing from him.

The distinction between a bare licence and a contractual licence thus turns on the question of whether A is under a contractual duty to B. Contractual duties can be implied as well as expressed and, in some cases, the courts have been very creative in finding such a contract.

Tanner v Tanner
[1975] 1 WLR 1346, CA

Facts: Mr Tanner (described by Lord Denning MR as a 'milkman by day and a croupier by night') entered into an extramarital relationship with Miss Macdermott. She later gave birth to twins fathered by Mr Tanner and changed her name to 'Mrs Tanner'—but the two never married. Mr Tanner bought a house in which Mrs Tanner and the twins were to live. To move into this house, Mrs Tanner gave up her rent-controlled tenancy on the basis that she and the twins would be allowed to remain in the new house, at least until the twins left school. Mr Tanner and his first wife divorced, but Mr Tanner then married another woman and decided to remove Mrs Tanner from the house. He offered her £4,000 to leave, but she refused. Mr Tanner (A) brought proceedings to remove Mrs Tanner (B). A succeeded at first instance and B (with the children) moved into local authority accommodation. B appealed, arguing that A was under a contractual duty to allow B to remain, at least until the twins left school. B did not, however, ask the Court of Appeal for an order forcing A to let her back into occupation. The Court of Appeal found that, in removing B and the twins, A had breached his contractual duty to B and so should pay B damages of £2,000.

Lord Denning MR

At 1350

It is said that [B and the twins] were only licensees—bare licensees—under a licence revocable at will; and that [A] was entitled in law to turn her and the twins out on a moment's notice. I cannot believe that this is the law [. . .] I think he had a legal duty towards them. Not only towards the babies but also towards their mother. She was looking after them and bringing them up. In order to fulfil his duty towards the babies, he was under a duty to provide for the mother too. She had given up her flat where she was protected by the Rent Acts [...] at his instance so as to be able the better to bring up the children. It is impossible to suppose that in that situation she and the babies were bare licensees whom he could turn out at a moment's notice. He recognised this when he offered to pay her £4,000 to get her out.

What then was their legal position? She herself said in evidence: 'The house was supposed to be ours until the children left school.' It seems to me [...] that in all the circumstances it is to be implied that she had a licence—a contractual licence—to have accommodation in the house for herself and the children so long as they were of school age and the accommodation was reasonably required for her and the children. There was, it is true, no express contract to that effect, but the circumstances are such that the court should imply a contract by him [...] whereby they were entitled to have the use of the house as their home until the girls had finished school. It may be that if circumstances changed—so that the accommodation was not reasonably required—the licence might be determinable. But it was not determinable in the circumstances in which he sought to determine it, namely to turn her out with the children and to bring in his new wife with her family. It was a contractual licence of the kind which is specifically enforceable on her behalf, and which he can be restrained from breaking; and he could not sell the house over her head so as to get her out in that way.

If therefore the lady had sought an injunction restraining him from determining the licence, it should have been granted [...]

It is important to note that a contemporary court is unlikely to adopt the very creative approach to finding a contractual licence taken by Lord Denning MR in Tanner v Tanner.[11] In that case, the contractual licence seems to have been imposed as a means to the end of imposing a duty on Mr Tanner to provide some form of financial assistance to Mrs Tanner and the twins (in the case itself, Mrs Tanner's only claim was for damages). Nowadays, because Parliament has recognized that particular policy need, there are statutory means by which a party such as Mr Tanner can come under a duty to make financial provision for his children.[12] As a result, there is no longer a need to bend doctrinal rules, as in Tanner v Tanner, in order to find a contractual licence. Indeed, under the Children Act 1989, s 15 and Sch 1, it is possible to impose a duty on a party such as Mr Tanner to allow his children (and their mother) to remain in occupation of a particular home until leaving school. As a result, there is no longer a need to stretch the concept of a contractual licence.

3.1 B'S RIGHTS AGAINST A

The Court of Appeal's decision in Tanner v Tanner provides a good example of the protection available to B if he has a contractual licence. Lord Denning MR indicated that, if B had applied to court in time, a court would have prevented A from breaching his contractual duty not to revoke B's liberty to occupy A's land. In Tanner itself, it was too late for the court to protect B in that way. As a result, A was ordered to pay B damages; those damages had the 11 Indeed, in Horrocks v Forray [1976] 1 WLR 230, a differently constituted Court of Appeal, faced with a similar case, distinguished Tanner v Tanner.

12 See Children Act 1989, Sch 1.

aim of putting B, as far as possible, in the position in which she would have been had A kept his contractual promise.[13]

In assessing B's position against A, there are two key questions: firstly, is A's actual or threatened action a breach of his contractual duty to B? Secondly, if it is, or would be, a breach, how will a court respond?

3.1.1 Is A's actual or threatened conduct a breach of contract?

Of course, this will depend on the precise terms of the contract between A and B. It is vital to note that, in most cases, it may be possible, in certain circumstances, for A to revoke B's liberty to use A's land without breaching his contract with B.

Winter Garden Theatre (London) Ltd v Millennium Productions Ltd
[1948] AC 173, HL

Facts: See section 2.1 above.

Viscount Simon

At 191

[W]hen the clauses of the present licence are carefully studied, the proper inference from the language used is that the licence was not perpetual but that the intention of the parties, to be inferred from the document, though not expressly stated, was that, upon [A Ltd] indicating their decision that the permission given by the licence would be withdrawn, [B Ltd] were to have a reasonable time to withdraw after which they would become trespassers.

Lord Porter

At 194

It is one thing to say that a limited and temporal licence remains in force until the particular object for which it is given is fulfilled or the definite period of time has elapsed, it is quite a different matter to allege that a licence once given in general terms can never be terminated.

Lord Macdermott

At 206

[T]he conclusion I reach is that in this contract there should be implied a stipulation to the effect that, after the expiration of the first year, the licence might be terminated by the licensors on the expiration of a reasonable notice period duly communicated to the licensees. That, to my mind, is what accords best with the express terms of the contract and the nature of the transaction.

The House of Lords further found that the one-month notice given by A Ltd was a reasonable notice period and so A Ltd, although it had revoked B Ltd's licence, had not breached its contract in doing so.

13 In very rare cases, as a result of A's breach of contract, B can obtain damages based on the gain that A has made by the breach: see A-G v Blake [2001] 1 AC 268.

3.1.2 If A's conduct is a breach, how will a court respond?

We have already seen that, in Tanner v Tanner, Lord Denning MR stated that, if approached in time, a court would have issued an injunction to prevent A's breach of B's contractual licence. Lord Uthwatt also considered this question in Winter Garden.

Winter Garden Theatre (London) Ltd v Millennium Productions Ltd
[1948] AC 173, HL

Lord Uthwatt

At 202

The settled practice of the courts of equity is to do what they can by an injunction to preserve the sanctity of a bargain. To my mind, as at present advised, a licensee who has refused to accept the wrongful repudiation of the bargain which is involved in an unauthorised revocation of the licence is as much entitled to the protection of an injunction as a licensee who has not received any notice of revocation.

This preference for specifically protecting B's contractual licence (rather than allowing A to breach it and leaving B to claim money from A) can also be seen in cases in which, in contrast to Tanner and Winter Garden, B has not yet started to make use of A's land.

Verrall v Great Yarmouth Borough Council
[1981] QB 202, CA

Facts: Great Yarmouth Borough Council owned a hall (the Wellington Pier Pavilion) in that seaside town. It made a contractual promise in April 1979 to allow the National Front to use the hall for its two-day national conference in October. Following a change in its political control, the council (A) attempted, in May, to revoke the National Front's licence. Mr Verrall (B), suing on his own behalf and representing all members of that organization, applied for an order forcing A to perform its contractual promise. Such an order was granted. The council appealed unsuccessfully to the Court of Appeal.

Lord Denning MR

At 216

Since the Winter Garden case, it is clear that once a man has entered under his contract of licence, he cannot be turned out. An injunction can be obtained against the licensor to prevent his being turned out. On principle it is the same if it happens before he enters. If he has a contractual right to enter, and the licensor refuses to let him come in, then he can come to the court and in a proper case get an order for specific performance to allow him to come in. An illustration was taken in the course of the argument. Supposing one of the great political parties—say, the Conservative Party—had booked its hall at Brighton for its conference in September of this year: it had made all its arrangements accordingly: it had all its delegates coming: it had booked its hotels, and so on. Would it be open to the local council to repudiate that agreement, and say that the Conservative Party could not go there? Would the only remedy be damages? Clearly not. The court would order the council in such a case to perform its contract. It would be the same in the case of the Labour Party, or whoever it may be. When arrangements are made for a licence of this kind of such importance and magnitude affecting many people, the licensors cannot be allowed to repudiate it and simply pay damages. It must be open to the court to grant specific performance in such cases.

It should not be assumed, however, that a court will always specifically protect B's contractual licence. After all, a court has a discretion as to whether to give B an equitable remedy such as specific performance or an injunction. And, in some circumstances, it may be inappropriate to prevent A from revoking B's contractual licence.

Thompson v Park [1944] KB 408, CA

Facts: Mr Thompson and Mr Park each owned a school. The schools were amalgamated and the new school was set up on the site of Mr Thompson's school, Broughton Hall, near Eccleshall, Staffordshire. Mr Thompson gave Mr Park, and twenty-five of Mr Park's pupils, permission to join the school. The working relationship between Mr Thompson and Mr Park broke down, and Mr Thompson attempted to revoke the licence of Mr Park and his pupils to remain at the school. Having initially left, Mr Park forced his way back onto the premises and refused to leave. Mr Thompson (A) brought proceedings for an injunction ordering Mr Park (B) to leave. A also asked for an interim injunction ordering B to leave before the court determined A's application for an injunction. The Court of Appeal granted the interim injunction.

Goddard LJ

At 409–10

If [B] thought that he had a grievance which could be lawfully asserted the courts were open to him. I am not saying what the result of any application by him would have been, for though this is not the sort of agreement which any court could specifically enforce—for the court cannot specifically enforce an agreement for two people to live peaceably under the same roof—yet, of course, if the contract is broken, [B] has got a common law remedy in damages, which, if he is right, might be heavy. [B], however did not seek the intervention of the court, but took the law into his own hands and remedied the grievances under which he felt he was suffering in a manner which seems to me to have been wholly deplorable, all the more so when one considers that he is in charge of small boys at a preparatory school and ought to be inculcating into them a respect for authority and discipline. It appears to me that on his own showing he has been guilty at least of riot, affray, wilful damage, forcible entry and, perhaps, conspiracy [. . .]

The strength of the argument which was put forward on [B]'s behalf was that, assuming that there had been a breach of contract on the part of [A], [B] had a right to be where he was. That is an entire misconception of the legal position, which was that the defendant was a licensee on the premises. That licence has been withdrawn. Whether it has been rightly withdrawn or wrongly withdrawn matters nothing for this purpose. The licensee, once his licence is withdrawn, has no right to re-enter on the land. If he does, he is a common trespasser.

It is important to separate out two questions, both discussed by Goddard LJ in Thompson v Park. The first is whether, if B had applied to court after leaving A's land, a court would order

A to perform his contractual promise to share occupation with B. Goddard LJ's statement is surely correct: 'the court cannot specifically enforce an agreement for two people to live peaceably under the same roof.'[14] It would be unduly onerous on A to force him to live with B, given the breakdown in their relationship. And B would not receive the full value of his promise: sharing occupation with A, after the two have fallen out, is clearly different from sharing occupation when A and B are on good terms. So, whilst A's action in revoking the licence may well be a breach of contract, B may have to settle for receiving money from A.

The second question is whether, if A revokes his licence in breach of contract, B can then insist on re-entering A's land. Goddard LJ thought not—but it is not clear that this is consistent with the decision in Verall v Great Yarmouth BC,[15] or with the reasoning of Viscount Simon in the following extract.

Winter Garden Theatre (London) Ltd v Millennium Productions Ltd
[1948] AC 173

Viscount Simon

At 189

[Viscount Simon referred to cases involving, for example:] the sale of a ticket to enter premises and witness a particular event, such as a ticket for a seat at a particular performance at a theatre or for entering private ground to witness a day's sport. In this last class of case, the implication of the arrangement, however it may be classified in law, plainly is that the ticket entitles the purchaser to enter and, if he behaves himself, to remain on the premises until the end of the event which he has paid his money to witness.

The point is that, even if a court would not order specific performance of A's contractual promise, once A has made such a promise, B does have a legal right to be on A's land for the duration of his contractual licence. In other words, even if the contract is not specifically enforced, A is under a contractual duty to B to allow B to use the land as promised.

This has important consequences.

Hurst v Picture Theatres Ltd
[1915] 1 KB 1, CA

Facts: On 17 March 1913, a film of Lake Garda[16] was shown at a cinema in High Street Kensington, London, owned by Picture Theatres Ltd. Mr Hurst bought a ticket. He did not misbehave, but was forced to leave by the manager of the cinema, who mistakenly believed that B had not paid for his seat. Mr Hurst (B) claimed that Picture Theatres Ltd (A), through the actions of its employee, had committed the tort of trespass to the [14] That statement was also approved by Megarry V-C in Hounslow LBC v Twickenham GD Ltd [1971] Ch 233, 250. The same concern is also clear in proprietary estoppel cases: when considering how to respond to a successful estoppel claim, a court will not make an order that forces parties who have since fallen out to live together: see Baker v Baker (1993) 25 HLR 408.

[15] [1981] 1 QB 202, 216.

[16] It is likely to have been a Kinemacolor film produced in 1910 (entitled Lake Garda, Italy), currently held by the Nederlands Filmmuseum and shown at the British Film Institute's Conservation Centre in February 2008.

person: it had breached its duty not to interfere with B's physical integrity. A argued that, once it had exercised its power to revoke B's licence, B became a trespasser and so A was permitted to use reasonable force to remove B from the land. A argued that even if its action in revoking the licence was a breach of contract, that did not change the fact that, once the licence was revoked, B was a trespasser on A's land and so reasonable force could be used to remove him. The Court of Appeal rejected that argument, affirming the decision of Channell J that B was entitled to substantial damages.

Buckley LJ

At 7

[B] in the present action paid his money to enjoy the sight of a particular spectacle. He was anxious to go into a picture theatre to see a series of views or pictures during, I suppose, an hour or a couple of hours. That which was granted to him was the right to enjoy looking at a spectacle, to attend a performance from its beginning to its end. That which was called the licence, the right to go upon the premises, was only something granted to him for the purpose of enabling him to have that which had been granted him, namely, the right to see. He could not see the performance unless he went into the building. His right to go into the building was something given to him in order to enable him to have the benefit of that which had been granted to him, namely, the right to hear the opera, or see the theatrical performance, or see the moving pictures as was the case here.

At 11

[A] had, I think, for value contracted that [B] should see a certain spectacle from its commencement to its termination. They broke that contract and it was a tort on their part to remove him. They committed an assault upon him in law. It was not of a violent kind, because, like a wise man, [B] gave way to superior force and left the theatre. They sought to justify the assault by saying that they were entitled to remove him because he had not paid. He had paid, the jury have so found. Failing on that question of fact, they say that they were entitled to remove him because his licence was revocable. In my opinion, it was not. There was, I think, no justification for the assault here committed. Under the circumstances it was for the jury to give him such a sum as was right for the assault which was committed upon him, and for the serious indignity to a gentleman of being seized and treated in this way in a place of public resort. The jury have found that he was originally in the theatre as a spectator, that the assault was committed upon him, and that it was a wrongful act.

An earlier decision, Wood v Leadbitter,[17] had held to the contrary on the basis that, because a contractual licence does not count as a property right in land, A remains free to revoke it. That approach is, however, impossible to defend; the decision in Hurst is clearly correct. A contractual licence is different from a bare licence: B has a liberty to use A's land and A is under a contractual duty to B not to revoke that liberty. So, even if A does attempt to revoke the licence by removing B, B's right (in Hohfeld's terms, a 'claim right') to be on the land remains. So A's attempt to revoke the licence does not turn B into a trespasser. That means that A is not allowed to use reasonable force to remove B from the land.

It is important to note that this analysis applies whether or not a court would grant an order of specific performance to protect B's contractual right. That point was made in the following case.

[17] (1845) 13 M & W 838.

Hounslow London Borough Council v Twickenham GD Ltd
[1971] 1 Ch 233

Megarry V-C

At 254–5

I have said nothing about an ejected licensee's right to claim damages for assault, for such issues do not arise in this case. All that I need say, in order to avoid possible misunderstanding, is that in light of the Winter Garden case I find it difficult to see how a contractual licensee can be treated as a trespasser so long as his contract entitles him to be on the land; and this is so whether or not his contract is specifically enforceable. I do not think that the licence can be detached from the contract, as it were, and separately revoked; the licensee is on the land by contractual right and is not as a trespasser. I may add that I say nothing about the rights of licensees against third parties.

It therefore seems clear that even if B's contractual licence would not be protected by an order for specific performance, B nonetheless has a right against A to be on A's land for the duration of his contractual licence. This suggests that the decision in Hurst v Picture Theatres Ltd should be the same whether or not A's contractual duty to B is specifically enforceable. This means that in a case like Thompson v Park, in which B's contractual licence allows him to share occupation of A's land with A, the following position applies if A and B fall out during the period of the contractual licence.

- If A attempts to revoke B's licence in breach of contract and B remains on the land, B does not become a trespasser—so A cannot use reasonable force to remove B from the land. Instead, A needs to apply to court for an order that B must leave. Because A's contractual duty is not specifically enforceable, a court is likely to grant such an order (although A will, of course, have to pay B damages for revoking B's licence in breach of contract).
- If A attempts to revoke B's licence in breach of contract and B is not on the land, B cannot force his way back onto the land. Instead, B needs to apply to court for an order that A must allow him back onto the land—but because A's contractual duty is not specifically enforceable, a court is unlikely to grant such an order.

3.2 B'S RIGHTS AGAINST X

In the passage from Hounslow LBC v Twickenham GD Ltd set out above, Megarry V-C concludes his survey of B's rights against A by stating that: 'I may add that I say nothing about the rights of licensees against third parties.' It is indeed very important to draw this distinction. For example, if we say that B has a right to be on A's land for the duration of his contractual licence, this means that B has a right against A to be on A's land. A thus has a duty not to interfere with B's use of the land. That does not mean that a third party, such as X, has a duty to B: after all, A's duty arises as a result of his contractual promise to B, and X has made no such promise.

This means that there is an important difference between a licence, even a contractual licence, and a legal lease. If B has a legal lease then the rest of the world is under a duty to B: for example, we will see in Chapter 22, section 1.1.2, that if X interferes with B's reasonable enjoyment of the land, X commits the tort of nuisance against B. As the House of Lords confirmed in Hunter v Canary Wharf,[18] however, the tort of nuisance does not protect B if he or she has only a licence.

We noted in section 2.2 above that, even if B only has a bare licence, X will be under a duty to B if B acquires a property right by taking physical control of A's land. Clearly, the same is true if B has a contractual licence; in such a case it is not the licence itself that binds X, but rather the property right that B acquires by taking physical control of A's land. The following decision of the Court of Appeal goes further: it assumes that, if A gives B a contractual licence permitting B to take physical control of A's land, X can be under a duty to B even before B goes onto A's land.

Manchester Airport plc v Dutton and ors
[2000] QB 133, CA

Facts: The National Trust owned some land adjacent to Manchester Airport. Manchester Airport plc was building a new runway. It needed to ensure that trees on the National Trust's land were cut down to prevent interference with flight paths to and from the new runway. The National Trust (A) gave Manchester Airport plc (B) and its authorized subcontractors permission to go onto the National Trust land to do the necessary work. Before B or its subcontractors entered the land, Mr Dutton (one of a number of environmental protestors) occupied the land with the intention of interfering with the planned work. Manchester Airport plc (B) applied for an order against Mr Dutton (X) for possession of the land, using the special summary procedure provided by Order 113 of the Rules of the Supreme Court.

Laws LJ (with whom Kennedy LJ agreed)

At 147–50

Now, I think it is clear that if [B] had been in actual occupation under the licence and the trespassers had then entered on the site, [B] could have obtained an order for possession; at least if it was in effective control of the land. Clause 1 of the licence confers a right to occupy the whole of the area edged red on the plan. The places where the trespassers have gone lie within that area. [B's] claim for possession would not, were it in occupation, fall in my judgment to be defeated by the circumstance that it enjoys no title or estate in the land, nor any right of exclusive possession as against [A] [. . .]

But if [B], were it in actual occupation and control of the site, could obtain an order for possession against the trespassers, why may it not obtain such an order before it enters into occupation, so as to evict the trespassers and enjoy the licence granted to it? As I understand it, the principal objection to the grant of such relief is that it would amount to an ejectment, and ejectment is a remedy available only to a party with title to or estate in the land; which as a mere licensee [B] plainly lacks [. . .]

But I think there is a logical mistake in the notion that because ejectment was only available to estate owners, possession cannot be available to licensees who do not enjoy de facto occupation. The mistake inheres in this: if the action for ejectment was by definition concerned only with the rights of estate owners, it is necessarily silent upon the question, what relief might be available to a licensee. The limited and specific nature of ejectment means only that it was not available to a licensee; it does not imply the further proposition that no remedy by way of possession can now be granted to a licensee not in occupation. Nowadays there is no distinct remedy of ejectment; a plaintiff sues for an order of possession, whether he is himself in occupation or not. The proposition that a plaintiff not in occupation may only obtain the remedy if he is an estate owner assumes that he must bring himself within the old law of ejectment. I think it is a false assumption.

[18] [1997] AC 665. See further Chapter 22, section 1.1.2.

I would hold that the court today has ample power to grant a remedy to a licensee which will protect but not exceed his legal rights granted by the licence. If, as here, that requires an order for possession, the spectre of history (which, in the true tradition of the common law, ought to be a friendly ghost) does not stand in the way. The law of ejectment has no voice in the question; it cannot speak beyond its own limits.

In my judgment the true principle is that a licensee not in occupation may claim possession against a trespasser if that is a necessary remedy to vindicate and give effect to such rights of occupation as by contract with his licensor he enjoys. This is the same principle as allows a licensee who is in de facto possession to evict a trespasser. There is no respectable distinction, in law or logic, between the two situations. An estate owner may seek an order whether he is in possession or not. So, in my judgment, may a licensee, if other things are equal. In both cases, the plaintiff's remedy is strictly limited to what is required to make good his legal right. The principle applies although the licensee has no right to exclude the licensor himself. Elementarily he cannot exclude any occupier who, by contract or estate, has a claim to possession equal or superior to his own. Obviously, however, that will not avail a bare trespasser.

Chadwick LJ (dissenting)

At 146–7

There was no material, in the present case, on which the judge could reach the conclusion that [B] was in de facto possession of the relevant part of [A's land]; and, for my part, I do not think that she did reach that conclusion. She treated the question as one which turned on the construction of the licence. In my view the judge was in error when she held, in a passage in her judgment to which I have already referred, that:

> 'The licence gives the right of possession and this is, I am satisfied, a right of possession which does not give absolute title, but it does nevertheless give a power against trespassers.'

She did not make the distinction, essential in cases of this nature, between a plaintiff who is in possession and who seeks protection from those who interfere with that possession, and a plaintiff who has not gone into possession but who seeks to evict those who are already on the land. In the latter case (which is this case) the plaintiff must succeed by the strength of his title, not on the weakness (or lack) of any title in the defendant.

All three members of the Court of Appeal thus agreed that if X interfered with B's use of A's land after B had gone into occupation of the land, B would be able to bring a claim for possession against X. That is certainly the case: it is simply an application of the point made in section 2.2 above—that is, whenever B takes possession of land, whether with the consent of an owner or not, he acquires a legal property right in that land and so the rest of the world comes under a prima facie duty to B not to interfere with B's use of the land. We examined this point in Chapter 8.

But Chadwick LJ and the majority disagreed about the answer in a situation in which, as in Manchester Airport itself, X interfered with B's use of A's land before B had gone into occupation. There is a strong argument in favour of Chadwick LJ's analysis. The crucial point is that, once B takes physical control of A's land—whether under a licence or not—B acquires a legal property right in A's land. Before that point, B has only a contractual right against A: there is no reason why A's contract with B should impose a duty on X.

Swadling makes this point in the following extract.

Swadling, 'Opening the Numerus Clausus' (2000) 116 LQ Rev 358

> [...] In Manchester Airport v Dutton Laws LJ asserted] that no logical distinction can be drawn between a licensee in and a licensee out of possession, so that if the former can bring trespass against third parties, so can the latter. With respect, it would have been appropriate at this point to consider why a licensee in possession is able to bring trespass; the reason is in fact one which cannot apply in the case of a licensee out of possession. The reason why a licensee in possession can bring an action for possession is that he has a right of possession which is completely independent of the licence under which he occupies the land.
>
> Take the deserted wife in Ainsworth's case [National Provincial Bank v Ainsworth[19]—see the discussion in section 2.2 above]. She is, we are told, entitled to sue those who interfere with her possession of the matrimonial home, from which it follows that she has a right to the possession of that matrimonial home. But from where does her right to possession spring? Not from her licence to be on the premises, for that is a right which the House of Lords held bound the husband alone. It must therefore be some other event which creates this right of possession [...] and this other event is her unilateral act of taking possession of the house. In other words, her right of possession arises from the fact of her possession [...]
>
> The error into which, with respect, Laws L.J. falls is in failing to notice that a contractual licensee in occupation of land has rights derived from two separate sources, some from the contract, some from the fact of possession. Those derived from the contract prevent the licensor from denying him possession of the land. But those rights, because of the doctrine of privity, and notwithstanding the recent reform of that doctrine, bind the licensor alone. It is the rights derived from the second source, from the fact of possession, which bind third parties [...] There is, therefore, a distinction which does still need to be drawn between a plaintiff whose right to occupy the land in question arises from title and one whose right arises from the contract alone.

It is thus possible to disapprove of the decision of the Court of Appeal in Manchester Airport plc v Dutton. Indeed, it is interesting to compare it to the decision of in Hill v Tupper,[20] which we examined in Chapter 4, section 1. In that case, the Basingstoke Canal Company (A) gave Mr Hill (B) an 'exclusive' contractual licence to hire boats out on the canal. The Exchequer Chamber made clear that A's contract with B did not give B a legal property right and so did not impose a duty to B on Mr Tupper (X), who had also hired out boats on the canal. So, if Mr Hill wanted to stop Mr Tupper from hiring out boats, he had to ask or force the Canal Company, as owner of the canal, to assert its property right against Mr Tupper.

The same analysis should apply in Manchester Airport plc v Dutton: the airport should use its contract with the National Trust to ask or force the National Trust to use its property right, as owner of the land, against Mr Dutton and the other protestors. The interesting point, of course, is that at least some members of the National Trust may have refused to support such an action against the protestors.[21]

[19] [1965] AC 1175. [20] (1863) 2 H & C 122.

[21] See McFarlane, The Structure of Property Law (2008), p 345, fn 22.

In Mayor of London v Hall and others,[22] the Mayor of London sought an order for possession of Parliament Square Gardens in London; the defendants had there set up a camp that they named 'Democracy Village'. One of the arguments made by the defendants was that, as legal title to the Gardens vested in the Crown, the Mayor had no property right on which he could base a claim for possession. In the end, the Court of Appeal upheld the possession order granted to the Mayor on the basis that ss 384 and 385 of the Greater London Authority Act 1999 gave the Mayor a statutory right to seek possession of the land. In an obiter part of the court's judgment, Lord Neuberger MR also considered the defendant's argument that the reasoning of the majority in Dutton could not be relied on by the Mayor, as authorities such as Hill v Tupper[23] had not been cited to the court in Dutton. Lord Neuberger MR noted that 'if the law governing the right to claim possession is governed by the same principles as those that governed the right to maintain a claim in ejectment, the [defendant's] argument seems very powerful.'[24] However, his Lordship went on to say that 'there is obvious force in the point that the modern law relating to possession claims should not be shackled by arcane and archaic rules relating to ejectment, and, in particular, that it should develop and adapt to accommodate a claim by anyone entitled to use and control, effectively amounting to possession, of the land in question [. . .]'.[25] Lord Neuberger MR thus granted his approval to the basic, but conceptually controversial, approach in Dutton: that if B has a right to use and occupy land, B should be able to remove a trespasser from that land, even if B's right is not a property right.[26]

The decision in Manchester Airport plc v Dutton could also be seen as part of a deliberate move to increase the protection given to a contractual licensee against third parties. Swadling criticizes the decision for blurring the divide between personal rights and property rights, but others see the decision as taking a welcome step towards allowing (at least some) contractual licences to count as property rights.[27] To that extent, one's view of the Manchester Airport decision depends on one's view as to the crucial question, to be examined in section 3.3.2 below, as to whether a contractual licence should count as a property right in land.

3.3 B'S RIGHTS AGAINST C

If B has a contractual licence and A then gives C an inconsistent right—for example, by transferring his freehold to C—we have an example of the priority triangle (Figure 14).

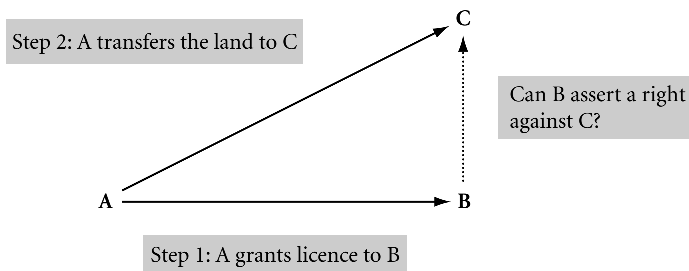

Figure 14 Contractual Licences and the Priority Triangle

[22] [2010] EWCA Civ 817. [23] (1863) 2 H & C 122. [24] [2010] EWCA Civ 817, [26].
[25] Ibid, [27].
[26] For criticism of Lord Neuberger MR's approach in Mayor of London v Hall, see Lochery, 'Pushing the Boundaries of Dutton?' [2011] Conv 74.
[27] See Gray and Gray, Elements of Land Law (5th edn, 2009), [10.5.13]–[10.5.15].

As we have seen, there are two ways in which B may have a right against C: firstly, it may be that C has acted in such a way as to give B a new, direct right against C; secondly, it may be that B has a pre-existing property right that he can assert against C.

3.3.1 Direct rights

In Chapter 6, section 2, we considered some of the means by which B can show that he has acquired a new, direct right against C. In this section, we will look at the principles most likely to be relevant where, prior to his dealings with C, A has given B a contractual licence.

The tort of procuring a breach by A of A's contract with B

As we noted in Chapter 6, section 2.4, the existence of a contract between A and B imposes a duty on the rest of the world not to procure a breach by A of A's contractual duty to B.[28] For example, if A has a contract to perform at B's theatre, and C, knowing about that contract, persuades A to breach it and to perform at C's theatre instead, C commits a wrong against B.[29] There is a very difficult question as to whether C commits this tort if he simply knows about A's contractual licence with B, and, despite that, goes ahead and acquires a right from A with the intention of not allowing B to continue using A's land. Megaw LJ noted the possibility, in passing, in Binions v Evans.[30] But his Lordship went on to note that: 'However, it may be that there are special technical considerations in the law relating to land that would require to be reviewed before one could confidently assert that the ordinary principles as to the protection of known contractual rights would apply.'

Certainly, as Roger Smith has pointed out,[31] there is a fear that allowing the tort to apply would make it far too easy for B to assert a direct right against C, and would thus undermine the protection due to a party acquiring a right in land. Indeed, Smith suggests that 'where real property principles accord priority to a contract or conveyance over an earlier contract, it should not be open to the earlier contracting party to rely on tort'.[32]

On that view, the tort should not be able to provide any protection to B's contractual licence, because such a right does not currently count as a property right in land. There is, however, at least one case in which the tort was applied to a case involving land in relation to which B did not have a property right. In Esso Petroleum Co Ltd v Kingswood Motors Ltd and ors,[33] Kingswood Motors Ltd (A) operated a petrol station. Esso Petroleum Co Ltd (B) supplied petrol to A. A was under a contractual duty to B: (i) to notify B before selling the petrol station; and (ii) to ensure that any purchaser also entered into an agreement to use only fuel supplied by B. A breached this duty by selling to Impact Motor Ltd (C) without taking those steps. It was held that, because C knew about B's contract with A, C had committed the tort of procuring a breach of contract. In fact, Bridge J ordered C to transfer the petrol station back to B, so that A could continue to assert its contractual rights against B.

The decision is discussed in the following extract, which makes clear that Esso v Kingswood is not a standard contractual licence case.

[28] See OBG Ltd v Allan [2007] 2 WLR 920. [29] See Lumley v Gye (1853) 2 E & B 216.
[30] [1972] Ch 359, 371.
[31] 'The Economic Torts: Their Impact on Real Property' (1977) 41 Conv 318.
[32] Ibid, 329. [33] [1974] QB 142.

McFarlane, The Structure of Property Law (2008, p 438)

> [T]he courts are willing to apply the wrong [of procuring a breach of contract] even where land is concerned. This is demonstrated by Esso Petroleum Co Ltd v Kingswood Motors Ltd [...] This willingness to apply the wrong even where land is concerned seems correct. The purpose of the wrong is to protect B's contractual right against A: it should therefore apply whenever B has a contractual right against A. It seems that the wrong is based on the need for the rest of the world to respect B's contractual relationship with A. There is no obvious reason why contractual rights relating to the use of land should attract less protection. For example, let's say that A, a cinema owner, makes a contractual promise to allow B to run a confectionary stall from part of that land for five years. That promise gives B a contractual licence: a personal right against A. However, if C, a competitor of B, pays A money to persuade A to breach the contract by removing B from the land, C commits the wrong of procuring a breach of the contract.
>
> However, this does not mean that C will necessarily commit the wrong if, in [a standard contractual licence case] he goes ahead and buys A's Freehold and then seeks to remove B from the land. There is an important difference between [a standard contractual licence case] and the situation in Kingswood Motors. In the latter case, A was under an explicit contractual duty not to transfer his Freehold to C unless certain conditions were met. A therefore breached his contractual duty to B as soon as he transferred that right to C: that is, as soon as A sold the land to C. C, by participating in a sale that he knew to breach those conditions, was actively facilitating A's breach of contract. In [a standard contractual licence case], however [...] A has not made a contractual promise not to transfer his Freehold unless certain conditions are met. As a result, the sale to C, by itself, does not breach A's contractual duty to B: that duty is breached only at a later stage: when C asserts his right and prevents B from using the land.

This analysis may provide a way in which to justify the courts' apparent reluctance to apply the tort of procuring a breach of contract in a standard contractual licence case. After all, as we saw in Chapter 6, section 2.6, the courts have been careful to ensure that the means by which B can acquire a direct right are not expanded to the point at which C can be bound simply as a result of his knowledge of B's pre-existing personal right against A.

The Contract (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999

The presence of a contractual licence between A and B may have a different, more significant impact on B's chances of acquiring a direct right against C. We noted in section 2.3.2 above that, if B has a bare licence, it is very unlikely that he will acquire such a right: C simply has no incentive to act in such a way as to give B such a right. But things may be different where B has a contractual licence. For example, let us say that A makes a contractual promise to B to allow B to make a particular use of A's land for five years. Two years later, A plans to sell the land to C. A knows that if he sells the land to C and C stops B from using the land, A will be in breach of his contractual promise to B. A will therefore have to pay money to B to put B in the position in which he would have been had A kept his promise to allow B to use the land for the full five years.[34] This gives A a reason to insist that C, when buying the land, makes a promise to allow B to continue using the land until the five years are up.

[34] See King v David Allen & Sons Billposting Ltd [1916] 2 AC 54, HL.

As we saw in Chapter 6, section 2.2, the Contract (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999 allows B, in certain circumstances, to acquire a direct right against C as a result of a contractual promise made by C to A. If C makes a contractual promise to A to allow B to continue to use the land for the remainder of the five years, that promise clearly 'purports to confer a benefit' on B. Section 1(1)(b) of the 1999 Act can therefore operate to give B a direct right against C even though: (i) C's promise to allow B to use the land is made to A not B; and (ii) consideration for the promise is provided by A not B. Section 1(5) of the 1999 Act means that the remedies available to B as against C can then be determined by applying the principles (examined in section 3.1 above) that govern the remedies available to B against A. It is true that, under s 2 of the 1999 Act, A and C may have a power to vary C's contractual promise and hence to weaken or remove B's right against C.[35] In our example, however, there is no reason for A to wish to do so: A's aim is to give B a right against C that will absolve A from having to pay damages for breach of contract to B.

For the 1999 Act to apply, C must make a contractual promise to A. If, as in our example, C's promise is made as part of the contractual deal in which A promises to transfer his land to C, C's promise only counts as a contractual promise if the formality rule set out by the Law of Property (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1989 (LP(MP)A 1989) is satisfied. We examined that rule in detail in Chapter 7, section 3. For present purposes, it suffices to note that if, when acquiring his right from A, C makes an oral promise A to allow B to continue using A's land, that promise will not be contractually binding on C.[36] If so, B will be unable to rely on the 1999 Act to acquire a direct right against C—but B may be able to rely on a different means of enforcing C's promise.

The 'constructive trust' principle in Binions v Evans

In Chapter 6, section 2.3, we examined cases in which B acquired a direct right against C as a result of C's promise to A without needing to rely on the Contract (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999. One such case was Binions v Evans.

Binions v Evans
[1972] Ch 359, CA

Facts: See Chapter 6, section 2.3, for the facts of the case. We saw that Lord Denning MR took the view that, even if Mrs Evans (B) had no legal or equitable property right that she could assert against Mr and Mrs Binions (C), the Binions could still be prevented from removing Mrs Evans from the cottage. That reasoning was based on the fact that, when acquiring a freehold of the cottage from the trustees of the Tredegar Estate (A), the Binions had made a promise to allow Mrs Evans to remain in the cottage for the rest of her life.

[35] There are limits to that power—e.g. it is lost if B has 'communicated his assent' to C's promise to C; if C is aware that B has relied on C's promise; or if B has relied on the promise and C could reasonably be expected to have foreseen such reliance: see s 2(1) of the 1999 Act.

[36] C's oral promise may be contractually binding if it seen as separate from the contract dealing with C's acquisition of a right from A and so counts as a 'collateral contract'. As we saw in Chapter 7, section 3.5, however, the courts are generally reluctant to view such promises as collateral to the main contract between A and C.

Lord Denning MR

At 367

[A] stipulated with [C] that [C was] to take the house 'subject to' [B's] rights under the agreement. [A] supplied [C] with a copy of the contract: and [C] paid less because of [B's] right to stay there. In these circumstances, this court will impose on [C] a constructive trust for [B's] benefit: for the simple reason that it would be utterly inequitable for [C] to turn [B] out contrary to the stipulation subject to which [C] took the premises. That seems to me clear from the important decision of Bannister v Bannister,[37] which was applied by the judge and which I gladly follow.

It is worth noting that there are a number of other possible explanations for the result in Binions v Evans. Firstly, the majority of the Court of Appeal (Megaw and Stephenson LJJ) found that B's initial agreement with A gave B more than a contractual licence: she had an equitable life interest in the land and that equitable interest was capable of binding C. On that analysis, the case has nothing to do with contractual licences.

Secondly, Lord Denning MR also contended that B's contractual licence counted, by itself, as an equitable interest in land. We will examine that argument in the next section. As we will see, it is, to say the least, somewhat controversial: it is therefore no surprise that Lord Denning MR also considered whether B had a new, direct right against C.

It is that suggestion on which we will focus here: the idea that B acquired a direct right against C, because, given that C acquired the land on the basis of allowing B to remain in occupation, it would be 'utterly inequitable' if C were now free to go back on that promise. As we saw in Chapter 6, section 2.3, that suggestion is consistent with a number of cases in which B acquires a direct right against C where:

- C acquires a property right in land from A; and
- prior to that, C made a promise to A to give B a right to make some use of that land; and
- as a result of that promise, A allowed C to acquire the property right in the land, or allowed C to acquire that right for a lower price.

As we noted in Chapter 6, section 2.3 (and as we saw in Chapter 11, section 4), the precise basis of the principle applied in these cases has been contested. Nonetheless, the following extract, from a Court of Appeal decision, confirms that this principle may be used in a case in which B initially has a contractual licence from A.

Ashburn Anstalt v Arnold

[1989] Ch 1, CA

Facts: Mr Arnold had a headlease of business premises. Arnold & Co went into possession of the land under a sublease from Mr Arnold. Cavendish Land Co Ltd then acquired the freehold of the land subject to Mr Arnold's headlease. Mr Arnold contracted to sell his headlease to Matlodge Ltd, who also contracted to buy Arnold & Co's sublease. As part of that sale, Matlodge made a contractual promise to Arnold & Co that it could remain in occupation of the land until it was needed for redevelopment. Cavendish Land Co Ltd then acquired the benefit of Matlodge's rights to both the headlease and the sublease, also taking on Matlodge's contractual duties to Arnold & Co. As a result, Cavendish now held the freehold free from the headlease and sublease, whilst Arnold & Co remained in occupation of the land. Cavendish was later taken over by Legal & General Assurance Society Ltd, which also took on the contractual duties to Arnold & Co. Legal & General (A) then sold its freehold to Ashburn Anstalt (C). Under the terms of the sale contract, C took its freehold 'subject to' the contractual rights of Arnold & Co (B) against A, arising as a result of the original agreement with Matlodge. C had no plans to redevelop the land, but sought possession from B. B's first argument was that its initial agreement with A gave B a property right (a lease) that was binding on C. As we will see in Chapter 22, section 1.1.3, the Court of Appeal accepted that argument and found in B's favour. The Court of Appeal also went on to consider B's argument that, even if its agreement with A gave it only a contractual licence, B could assert that contractual licence against C. As we will see in section 3.3.2, the Court of Appeal rejected that argument. It was pointed out, however, that, in some circumstances, a party with a contractual licence can acquire a right against C as a result of a promise made by C to A.

[37] [1948] 2 All ER 133.

Fox LJ

At 25–6

It is said that when a person sells land and stipulates that the sale should be 'subject to' a contractual licence, the court will impose a constructive trust upon the purchaser to give effect to the licence [...]

We do not feel able to accept that as a general proposition. We agree with the observations of Dillon J. in Lyus v. Prowsa Developments Ltd [1982] 1 W.L.R. 1044, 1051:

> 'By contrast, there are many cases in which land is expressly conveyed subject to possible incumbrances when there is no thought at all of conferring any fresh rights on third parties who may be entitled to the benefit of the incumbrances. The land is expressed to be sold subject to incumbrances to satisfy the vendor's duty to disclose all possible incumbrances known to him, and to protect the vendor against any possible claim by the purchaser [...] So, for instance, land may be contracted to be sold and may be expressed to be conveyed subject to the restrictive covenants contained in a conveyance some 60 or 90 years old. No one would suggest that by accepting such a form of contract or conveyance a purchaser is assuming a new liability in favour of third parties to observe the covenants if there was for any reason before the contract or conveyance no one who could make out a title as against the purchaser to the benefit of the covenants.'

The court will not impose a constructive trust unless it is satisfied that the conscience of the estate owner is affected. The mere fact that that land is expressed to be conveyed 'subject to' a contract does not necessarily imply that the grantee is to be under an obligation, not otherwise existing, to give effect to the provisions of the contract. The fact that the conveyance is expressed to be subject to the contract may often, for the reasons indicated by Dillon J., be at least as consistent with an intention merely to protect the grantor against claims by the grantee as an intention to impose an obligation on the grantee. The words 'subject to' will, of course, impose notice. But notice is not enough to impose on somebody an obligation to give effect to a contract into which he did not enter. Thus, mere notice of a restrictive covenant is not enough to impose upon the estate owner an obligation or equity to give effect to it [...]

> [. . .] In matters relating to the title to land, certainty is of prime importance. We do not think it desirable that constructive trusts of land should be imposed in reliance on inferences from slender materials. In our opinion the available evidence in the present case is insufficient. The deputy judge, while he did not have to decide the matter, was not disposed to infer a constructive trust, and we agree with him.
>
> So far as [A and B's initial agreement] is concerned, it created either a lease or some form of licence. If it created a lease, there was no need to impose any obligation upon [C] [. . .] If, on the other hand, the agreement created some form of licence and [A] was insisting that [C] assume an obligation to give effect to [A and B's initial agreement], it seems to us highly unlikely that it would have relied upon such vague words as 'subject to' without the addition of an express obligation. Thus, if [A] was concerned about the possibility of claims against either [A's predecessor] or itself, we would have expected a clearly expressed obligation imposed on [C] [. . .] [but] we see no indication in the 1973 agreement that [A] was concerned with the protection of [B] [. . .]
>
> In general, we should emphasise that it is important not to lose sight of the question: 'Whose conscience are we considering?' It is [C's], and the issue is whether [C] has acted in such a way that, as a matter of justice, a trust must be imposed. For the reasons which we have indicated, we are not satisfied that it should be.

This discussion makes the important point that B will not acquire a direct right against C simply because C acquires his land 'subject to' any rights that B may have against A. The key point of C's promise must be to protect B from a claim by C, not to protect A from a claim by C.

The provisions of the 1999 Act make the same distinction: under s 1, B acquires a right against C only if C's promise to A 'purports to confer a benefit' on B. So, the crucial question is whether C, when acquiring his land, made an express or implied promise to give B a new right.

As we saw in Chapter 6, section 2.3, Sir Christopher Slade summed up the crucial question when giving the judgment of the Court of Appeal in the following case.

Lloyd v Dugdale
[2002] 2 P & CR 13

> Sir Christopher Slade
>
> At [52]
>
> In deciding whether or not the conscience of the new estate owner is affected in such circumstances, the crucially important question is whether he has undertaken a new obligation, not otherwise existing, to give effect to the relevant incumbrance or prior interest. If, but only if, he has undertaken such a new obligation will a constructive trust be imposed.

There are two key questions about this principle. The first is whether it makes sense for B to acquire a direct right against C in these cases. We examined that question in Chapter 6, section 2.3, and also considered it in Chapter 11, section 4. Here, it is perhaps enough to note an argument made by Bright.

Bright, 'The Third Party's Conscience in Land Law' [2000] Conv 398, 417

> There are situations in which [B] ought, as a minimum, to be able to prevent [C] from suing in breach of the promise made to A. To allow [C] to succeed would effectively mean that the courts are sanctioning [C] to do the very thing that he promised not to do. This does not seem proper, nor does it seem just.

The second key question is whether it makes sense for B to acquire a right against C under a constructive trust. It was assumed by Lord Denning MR in Binions itself, and by the Court of Appeal in Ashburn Anstalt v Arnold, that, if the principle applies, B's right arises under such a trust. We examined constructive trusts in more detail in Chapter 11, section 4. As we saw in Chapter 5, sections 1 and 3, to say that C holds 'on trust' for B means that C (the trustee) has a right (the trust property or subject matter of the trust) and is under a duty to use that right for the benefit of B (or for B and others—that is, for the beneficiaries), as well as a duty not to use that right for C's own benefit.[38] In cases such as Binions, it is very difficult to see how the facts fit with that basic pattern.

Swadling, 'Property' in English Private Law (2nd edn, ed Burrows, 2007, [4.126])

> [I]t is not clear what might have been the subject matter of this constructive trust [i.e. the constructive trust in Binions]. The subject matter can hardly have been the title to the cottage for, were that to be so, it would have given [B] far more than she was ever intended to have. And it cannot have been the benefit of the licence either, for that was already vested in her, and it was [C] who we are told [is] the trustee. It might be argued that the subject matter of the trust was the benefit of the covenant in the conveyance of the fee simple title under which [C] promised [A] that [it] would respect [B's] rights, and, further, that [C's] liability for breach of this covenant could be enforced by [B] by compelling [A] to sue on it. But this analysis does not work either, for the benefit of the promise was in the hands of [A], not [C].

Why, then, does Lord Denning MR describe B's right in Binions as arising under a constructive trust? One explanation is that, as is evident from the passage from Binions set out above, his Lordship relied on the decision of the Court of Appeal in Bannister v Bannister.[39] In that case, as we saw in Chapter 6, section 2.3, C, when buying a freehold from A, had promised to hold that freehold on trust for A (only two parties were involved). So, when forcing C to keep that promise, the Court of Appeal found that C held his land on constructive trust for A. As we saw in Chapter 11, section 4.3.1, it makes sense to say that a trust arose in that case: after all, the court simply enforced C's promise, and C's promise was to hold his freehold on trust. In Binions, however, C had not promised to hold any rights on trust; he had simply promised to allow B to remain in occupation of the land. So, as confirmed in the following extracts, there should be no trust in a case such as Binions.

38 It is possible for there to be trusts in which C, as well as being a trustee, is also a beneficiary of the trust. In such a case, C is permitted to use the trust property for his own benefit (to the extent that he is a beneficiary).

39 [1948] 2 All ER 133.

Bright, 'The Third Party's Conscience in Land Law' [2000] Conv 398, 402

> [T]he Binions [. . .] use of the constructive trust raises conceptual difficulties which do not occur with the true Bannister constructive trust. With trusts, the legal and equitable titles are owned by different persons, and the trustee owes fiduciary duties. This is the model found in Bannister [. . .] where [C] holds the legal title subject to a (proprietary) beneficial interest for [A]. But if we look at Binions, [C] held the ownership interest, which was not split between legal and equitable title, and what was held on trust was [B's] 'right to remain'.

McFarlane, 'Constructive Trusts Arising on a Receipt of Property Sub Conditione' (2004) 118 LQR 667, 691

> [T]he fact that B can acquire a right against C will not always justify the imposition of a constructive trust. In cases where C's undertaking is to recognise that B has a beneficial interest in the property [. . .] then a constructive trust of the property will be appropriate. [. . .] Where C's undertaking is to confer a personal right on B, then a constructive trust of the property C has received will not be appropriate, as it will give B a property right. Rather, B's personal right should be enforced directly.

On this analysis, we have to assess the nature of C's promise. If C promises to hold his freehold on trust for B, as in Bannister, it is appropriate for C to hold subject to a constructive trust and B thus acquires an equitable interest in C's land. If C instead simply promises to allow B to remain on the land, as in Binions, C comes under a duty to honour B's licence. In such a case, there is no need for a trust. After all, when A makes a promise to B to allow B to use A's land, there is no trust; there is simply a licence.

In a case such as Binions, the use of the 'constructive trust' label can cause confusion. In particular, it may be very important if C, having promised to honour B's licence, then transfers his land to C2.[40] As we saw in Chapter 6, section 3, it is then very important to know if the direct right that B acquired against C is a personal right or, instead, a legal or equitable property right. If C held the land subject to a constructive trust in B's favour, as Binions suggests, then B's direct right against C is an equitable property right and is therefore prima facie binding on C2. But the answer suggested by the extracts above is that, if C promised simply to honour B's licence, there should be no constructive trust. On that view, B will only be protected against C2 if he can show that he has a second direct right, arising because of C2's conduct.[41]

3.3.2 A pre-existing property right?

The current position

We saw, in section 2.2, that a bare licence does not count as a property right—but does it make a difference if A is under a contractual duty to B not to revoke B's licence?

40 Such a situation was inconclusively considered by the Court of Appeal in Chattey v Farndale Holdings Inc [1997] 1 EGLR 153.

41 For further discussion, see McFarlane, The Structure of Property Law (2008), pp 434–5.

King v David Allan & Sons, Billposting Ltd
[1916] 2 AC 54, HL

Facts: Mr King owned land in Madras Place, Dublin.[42] He planned to build a cinema on the land and made a contractual promise to the David Allan & Sons billposting company allowing it to display posters on the wall of the cinema, when built. Mr King then gave a 40-year lease of the site to the Phibsboro' Picture House company. The cinema was completed in May 1914. In June 1924, David Allan & Sons (B) attempted to display its posters on its wall, but the Phibsboro' Picture House company (C) prevented B from doing so. B brought a claim for breach of contract against Mr King (A). A claimed that its action had caused B no loss, because B could simply assert its contractual licence against C. A decision in favour of B was affirmed by the Court of Appeal in Ireland. A appealed unsuccessfully to the House of Lords.

Lord Buckmaster LC

At 61

There is a contract between [A] and [B] which creates nothing but a personal obligation. It is a licence given for good and valuable consideration and to endure for a certain time. [. . .][T] he sole right is to fix bills against a flank wall, and it is unreasonable to attempt to construct the relationship of landlord and tenant or grantor and grantee of an easement out of such a transaction, and I find it difficult to see how it can be reasonably urged that anything beyond personal rights was ever contemplated by the parties. Those rights have undoubtedly been taken away by the action on the part of [C], who has been enabled to prevent [B] from exercising [its] rights owing to the lease granted by [A], and [A] is accordingly liable in damages, although it was certainly not with his will, and indeed against his own express desire, that [C] has declined to honour his agreement.

Earl Loreburn

At 62

But we must look at the [agreement between A and B], and it seems to me that it does not create any interest in land at all; it merely amounts to a promise on the part of [A] that he would allow the other party to the contract to use the wall for advertising purposes, and there was an implied undertaking that he would not disable himself from carrying out his contract. Now [A] has altered his legal position in respect of his control of this land. Those to whom he granted the lease have disregarded his wishes and refused to allow his bargain to be carried out, and they have been practically enabled to do so by reason of the demise that he executed. In these circumstances it seems to me that there has been a breach in law of the contract of July 1, and [A] has disabled himself from giving effect to it as intended by parting with his right to present possession.

In King, the House of Lords thus made clear that the contractual licence is not on the list of property rights in land. As a result, the contractual licence given to B by A was not capable of binding C, a successor in title to A. Section 1 of the Law of Property Act 1925 sets out the list of legal property rights in land; the contractual licence is not included; as we saw in Chapter [42] Madras Place was the base of Antoni Rabaiotti, whose ice-cream car is mentioned in Joyce's Ulysses (1922) ch 10. Joyce himself was a driving force behind The Volta, Dublin's first permanent cinema, which opened in 1909 and closed in 1910.

5, section 5.4, s 4(1) of the Act appears to state that a court cannot add to the list of equitable interests in land recognized at the time of the 1925 Act. So, because the contractual licence was not recognized as an equitable property right in land before the passing of the 1925 Act, it seems clear that it cannot be recognized as such after that Act. This point is forcefully made by Briggs:[43] 'If contractual licences are to bind purchasers as proprietary interests, then they must be shown so to have existed in pre-1926 land law (and King v David Allen makes that impossible) or section 4 must be conjured out of existence.'

This orthodox position continued to operate—it was, for example, confirmed by the Court of Appeal in Clore v Theatrical Properties Ltd[44]—until the judgment of Denning LJ in the following case.

Errington v Errington & Woods
[1952] 1 KB 290, CA

Facts: Mr Errington bought a house in Milvain Avenue, Newcastle, as a home for his son and daughter-in-law. Mr Errington paid £250 and the remaining £500 of the purchase price was financed by a mortgage loan. The mortgage instalments were paid by the son and daughter-in-law, who occupied the land. Mr Errington (A) promised the son (B1) and daughter-in-law (B2) that they could remain in occupation as long as they paid the mortgage instalments. He also promised them that, when all of the instalments were paid, the land would be theirs. A died and B1 left the home, moving in with A's widow, his mother. B2 remained in occupation. A's widow sought possession of the house from B2. The county court judge dismissed that claim for possession. A's widow unsuccessfully appealed to the Court of Appeal.

Denning LJ

At 295

Ample content is given to the whole arrangement by holding that [A] promised that the house should belong to the couple as soon as they paid off the mortgage. The parties did not discuss what was to happen if the couple failed to pay the instalments to the building society, but I should have thought it clear that, if they did fail to pay the instalments, [A] would not be bound to transfer the house to them. [A's] promise was a unilateral contract—a promise of the house in return for their act of paying the instalments. It could not be revoked by him once the couple entered on performance of the act, but it would cease to bind him if they left it incomplete and unperformed, which they have not done. If that was the position during [A's] lifetime, so it must be after his death. If [B2] continues to pay all the building society instalments, [B1 and B2] will be entitled to have the property transferred to them as soon as the mortgage is paid off; but if [B2] does not do so, then the building society will claim the instalments from [A's] estate and the estate will have to pay them. I cannot think that in those circumstances [A's] estate would be bound to transfer the house to them, any more than the [A] himself would have been.

At 298–9

[I]t seems to me that, although the couple had exclusive possession of the house, there was clearly no relationship of landlord and tenant. They were not tenants at will but licensees.

[43] 'Contractual Licences: A Reply' [1983] Conv 285, 290–1.

[44] [1936] 3 All ER 483, CA.

> They had a mere personal privilege to remain there, with no right to assign or sub-let. They were, however, not bare licensees. They were licensees with a contractual right to remain. As such they have no right at law to remain, but only in equity, and equitable rights now prevail. I confess, however, that it has taken the courts some time to reach this position. At common law a licence was always revocable at will, notwithstanding a contract to the contrary: Wood v Leadbitter.[45] The remedy for a breach of the contract was only in damages. That was the view generally held until a few years ago [. . .] The rule has, however, been altered owing to the interposition of equity.
>
> Law and equity have been fused for nearly 80 years, and since 1948 it has been clear that, as a result of the fusion, a licensor will not be permitted to eject a licensee in breach of a contract to allow him to remain: see Winter Garden Theatre v. Millennium Productions Ltd,[46] per Lord Greene, and in the House of Lords per Lord Simon [. . .] This infusion of equity means that contractual licences now have a force and validity of their own and cannot be revoked in breach of the contract. Neither the licensor nor anyone who claims through him can disregard the contract except a purchaser for value without notice [. . .]

The actual decision in Errington can be justified on a number of different grounds.[47] For example, A had made a contractual promise to transfer his land to B1 and B2. As we noted in Chapter 5, section 5.2, such a promise is acknowledged to give rise to an equitable property right, often known as an 'estate contract' (see Chapter 9 for more details). So there was no need for B2 to rely only on her contractual licence. Nonetheless, the reasoning of Denning LJ is important, because it constitutes one attempt to turn the contractual licence into an equitable property right. His Lordship's reasoning is based on the fact that a court will often protect B's contractual licence by ordering A not to revoke that licence in breach of his contract with B. Lord Denning assumes that B therefore has a right to use A's land for the duration of his contract, and so B has a right not only against A, but also in relation to A's land.

Whilst it has found some academic[48] and judicial[49] support, there is, however, a clear flaw in Denning LJ's argument.

McFarlane, 'Identifying Property Rights: A Reply to Mr Watt' [2003] Conv 473, 475

> [Denning LJ's argument] misunderstands the true effect of the availability of specific performance on the proprietary status of a right: it treats something which is at most a necessary condition of a right to use property's being proprietary as a sufficient condition of that consequence. When deciding if specific performance is available against A, a court is simply deciding on the most appropriate remedy to give in response to B's clear contractual right against A. In so doing, the court will have to balance the various interests of A and B and will consider, for example, any practical difficulties which may prevent specific performance of the contract and the adequacy of damages as a means to protect B's interests. If, in general, specific performance is not granted in cases where B has a particular type of right to use property, that right is unlikely to be viewed as proprietary—if B's enjoyment of the property itself does not merit protection as against A, the party who made a contractual promise to B, then there seems to be little reason why B's right to use the property should be capable of enduring [45] (1845) 13 M & W 838. [46] [1948] AC 173, 191.

[47] As noted by Fox LJ in Ashburn Anstalt v Arnold [1989] Ch 1, 17.
[48] See Watt, 'The Proprietary Effect of a Chattel Lease' [2003] Conv 61.
[49] See per Browne-Wilkinson V-C in Bristol Airport v Powdrill [1990] Ch 744, 759.

against C. However, the mere fact that specific performance is available against A does not prove that B's right must be proprietary. The question of whether to confer proprietary status on a right involves considerations additional to those addressed when deciding that specific performance is available against A. The needs of B must be balanced not just against those of A but also against those of actual and potential third parties. Most obviously, B must show why he should be protected as against a party who, unlike A, has made no contractual promise to him. Further, B's needs must be strong enough to overcome the disadvantages inherent in allowing the contract between A and B to impose a burden on the property and hence to restrict the ease of its transfer. This is not to say that no initially contractual right can ever gain proprietary status, but rather that the concerns to be addressed before allowing such a shift are additional to, and more serious than, those to be overcome before awarding B specific performance against his contractual partner. Hence, the mere fact that B can gain specific performance against A does not demonstrate that B's right has the proprietary status it needs to be protected from interference by C.

Lord Wilberforce also pointed out this flaw in Denning LJ's argument.

National Provincial Bank v Ainsworth
[1965] AC 1175, HL

Lord Wilberforce

At 1253

[T]he fact that a contractual right can be specifically performed, or its breach prevented by injunction, does not mean that the right is any the less of a personal character or that a purchaser with notice is bound by it: what is relevant is the nature of the right, not the remedy which exists for its enforcement.

As we saw in Chapter 9, there is a principle (it can be called the 'doctrine of anticipation') that allows B to acquire an equitable interest in land if A is under a specifically enforceable contractual duty to give B a legal estate or interest in land. But that principle cannot apply if A's contractual duty is simply not to revoke a licence: in such a case, there is no eventual grant of a legal property right for equity to anticipate.[50] It is therefore no surprise that, in the following case, the Court of Appeal rejected B's attempt to rely on Errington in order to show that a contractual licence could bind a third party.

Ashburn Anstalt v Arnold
[1989] Ch 1, CA

Fox LJ

At 21–2

But there must be very real doubts whether Errington can be reconciled with the earlier decisions of the House of Lords in Edwardes v. Barrington[51] and King v. David Allen and Sons

[50] This point is also made by Wade (1952) 68 LQR 337, 338–9, and Swadling, 'Property' in English Private Law (2nd edn, ed Burrows, 2007) [4.33].
[51] (1901) 85 LT 650.

(Billposting) Ltd. It would seem that we must follow those cases or choose between the two lines of authority. It is not, however, necessary to consider those alternative courses in detail, since in our judgment the House of Lords cases, whether or not as a matter of strict precedent they conclude this question, state the correct principle which we should follow.

Our reasons for reaching this conclusion are based upon essentially the same reasons as those given by Russell L.J. in the Hastings Car Mart case[52] and by Professor Wade in the article, 'Licences and Third Parties'[53] to which Russell L.J. refers. Before Errington the law appears to have been clear and well understood. It rested on an important and intelligible distinction between contractual obligations which gave rise to no estate or interest in the land and proprietary rights which, by definition, did. The far-reaching statement of principle in Errington was not supported by authority, not necessary for the decision of the case and per incuriam in the sense that it was made without reference to authorities which, if they would not have compelled, would surely have persuaded the court to adopt a different ratio. Of course, the law must be free to develop. But as a response to problems which had arisen, the Errington rule (without more) was neither practically necessary nor theoretically convincing.

Denning LJ's bold reasoning in Errington is thus not an accurate reflection of the current law.

Lord Denning later adopted a different technique for reaching his desired conclusion that a contractual licence can count as a property right. That technique built on the idea in Binions v Evans[54] that a constructive trust can be used to protect a party with a contractual licence.

DHN Food Distributors Ltd v London Borough of Tower Hamlets
[1976] 3 All ER 462, CA

Facts: Bronze Ltd, a wholly owned subsidiary company of DHN Food Distributors Ltd, owned a warehouse and cash-and-carry in Malmesbury Road, Bow, London. DHN (B) ran its fruit distribution business from the premises; it occupied the land under a contractual agreement with Bronze (A). The Tower Hamlets London Borough Council made a compulsory purchase order relating to the land; it planned to demolish the warehouse and build housing. The council paid A for the land. The council argued that it had no statutory duty to pay A compensation for disturbance of its business, because A was not carrying out any business on the land. B was carrying out a business, but the relevant statute stated that B qualified for compensation for disturbance only if it had an 'interest' in the land. The council argued that B had no such right, because it simply had a contractual licence, and so had no legal or equitable interest in the land. The Lands Tribunal accepted the council's argument. B (along with a third associated company in the same position as B) successfully appealed to the Court of Appeal.

Lord Denning MR

At 466–7

The directors of [A] could not turn out themselves as directors of [B] [...] In the circumstances, I think the licence was virtually an irrevocable licence. [B was] the parent company holding all the shares in [A]. In those circumstances, [B was] in a position to carry on their business on these premises unless and until, in their own interests, B no longer wished to continue to stay there. It was equivalent to a contract between the two companies whereby A granted an irrevocable licence to B to carry on [its] business on the premises. In this situation counsel for the claimants cited to us Binions v Evans, to which I would add Bannister v Bannister and Siew Soon Wah alias Siew Pooi Tong v Yong Tong Hong [1973] AC 836. Those cases show that a contractual licence (under which a person has the right to occupy premises indefinitely) gives rise to a constructive trust, under which the legal owner is not allowed to turn out the licensee. So here. This irrevocable licence gave to [B] a sufficient interest in the land to qualify them for compensation for disturbance.

52 The name given to NPB v Ainsworth in the Court of Appeal: [1964] Ch 665, 697.
53 (1952) 68 LQR 337. 54 [1972] Ch 359.

The decision in DHN, like that in Errington, can be justified on other grounds. For example, both Goff and Shaw LJJ found that, as a result of various transactions between A and B, A held its right to the land on trust for B. B therefore had a recognized equitable interest and could claim compensation on that basis. Further, it can be argued that the term 'interest', when used in a statute setting rules for compensation for disturbance caused by a compulsory purchase order, is not necessarily confined to legal or equitable property rights in land.[55] Moreover, it could even be argued that, when interpreting such a statute, a court can 'pierce the corporate veil' and treat constituent companies within a group, such as Bronze Ltd and DHN Ltd, as one entity.

Lord Denning's specific reasoning in DHN, like that in Errington, is, however, impossible to defend. His Lordship's argument is that, as soon as A comes under a duty to B not to revoke B's licence, a constructive trust arises in B's favour. This means that, if A were later to transfer his freehold to C, C would prima facie be bound by B's licence.[56] Bannister v Bannister and Binions v Evans are cited in favour of that proposition—but the constructive trusts in those cases did not arise as soon as A made a contractual promise to B; rather, the constructive trusts arose as a result of C's later promise to A, made when acquiring his right from A.

Certainly, in the following case, the Court or Appeal rejected the DHN analysis.

Ashburn Anstalt v Arnold
[1989] Ch 1, CA

Fox LJ

At 24

For the reasons which we have already indicated, we prefer the line of authorities which determine that a contractual licence does not create a property interest. We do not think that the argument is assisted by the bare assertion that the interest arises under a constructive trust.

55 See Pennine Raceways Ltd v Kirklees MBC [1983] QB 382.

56 Of course, DHN v Tower Hamlets itself did not involve a third party. In Re Sharpe [1980] 1 WLR 219, however, Browne-Wilkinson J (somewhat reluctantly) applied the reasoning in DHN to allow a licence between A and B to bind C, A's trustee in bankruptcy.

It is clear, then, that Lord Denning MR in DHN used the constructive trust not as a means for B to acquire a new, direct right against C, but rather as a vehicle to turn all contractual licences into immediate equitable property rights. That approach, of course, is illegitimate as a matter of precedent: the House of Lords in King v David Allan and National Provincial Bank v Ainsworth had already made clear that a contractual licence does not count as an equitable interest in land. Parliament may be able to change the law and turn a contractual licence into an equitable interest, but Lord Denning MR had no power to do so.

It is, therefore, clear that a contractual licence given by A to B is not prima facie binding on C, a party who later acquires A's land.[57] The interesting question is, of course, whether Parliament should make such a change. Before looking at that question, we need briefly to consider an argument that Parliament may already (and inadvertently) have allowed a contractual licence to bind a third party.

Land Registration Act 2002, s 116

It is hereby declared for the avoidance of doubt that, in relation to registered land, each of the following:

(a) an equity by estoppel, and

(b) a mere equity

has effect from the time the equity arises as an interest capable of binding successors in title (subject to the rules about the effect of dispositions on priority).

If B has a contractual licence, B may try to argue that he or she has a 'mere equity' and thus that, under s 116(b), that right is capable of binding C. Certainly, B has an 'equity' in the sense that, as we saw in section 3.1.2, a court may well protect B's contract with A through the equitable remedies of specific performance or an injunction. It is clear, however, that, when proposing the clause that became s 116(b), the Law Commission did not intend to change the status of a contractual licence.[58] Instead, the term 'mere equity' is intended to refer to situations in which B has a power to obtain an equitable property right by, for example, having a document rectified or setting aside a transfer of a right to A.[59] Certainly, it would be very odd if a section of the Land Registration Act 2002 (LRA 2002)—an Act, as we saw in Chapter 15, section 1.4, primarily intended to protect a third party acquiring a right in registered land—were to increase the burdens on such a third party by allowing a contractual licence to function as an equitable interest.

Future reform?

It is thus clear that, as the law stands, a contractual licence does not count as a property right. A number of arguments have, however, been made in favour of changing the law.

[57] This point was conceded by B in London Development Agency v Nidai [2009] EWHC 1730 (Ch) at [11].

[58] See Law Com No 271, [5.32]–[5.37].

[59] For further discussion of mere equities, see McFarlane, The Structure of Property Law (2008), pp 226–7; Snell's Equity (32nd edn, eds McGhee et al., 2005), [2–006].

European Convention on Human Rights, Art 8

> (1) Everyone has the right to respect for his private and family life, his home and his correspondence.
>
> (2) There shall be no interference by a public authority with the exercise of this right except such as is in accordance with the law and is necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security, public safety or the economic well-being of the country, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others.

In some cases, B's only right to his 'home' may come from a contractual licence with A. B may then argue that if C, a party to whom A has sold his land, is able to remove B from the land, B's right to respect for his home is interfered with.[60]

In Chapter 3, we looked in detail at how such human rights arguments can have an impact in land law. Two points are particularly worth noting here. Firstly, there is more than one way in which B's right to his home can be respected. As we have seen, if C removes B from the land before the end of the period of B's contractual licence with A, B will be able to claim damages for breach of contract from A. This right to receive money provides B with some protection for his Art 8 right.[61] Further, the law also protects B by allowing B, in certain situations, to acquire a new, direct right against C (see section 3.3.1 above). And, even if C is allowed to remove B, the Protection from Eviction Act 1977 may ensure that C has to give B four weeks' notice before insisting that B move out.[62] Indeed, that Act provides strong protection for B: s 1(2) means that C commits a criminal offence if he attempts to remove B without giving the requisite notice.[63]

Secondly, it is not clear whether, if C removes B from the land, there is any breach of Art 8. Article 8(2) allows for B's right to be compromised in order to protect the 'rights' of others. In our example, C has a right, as an owner of the land; that right must be balanced against B's right to respect for his home. It is true that, if C is a local authority or other public body, the special duty imposed by s 6 of the Human Rights Act 1998 (HRA 1998) can (in theory) mean that it is unlawful for C to exercise its prima facie right to remove B from the land.[64] In Kay v Lambeth LBC,[65] however, the House of Lords, when considering the position of a licensee, [60] As we saw in Chapter 3, section 4.1.1, particular land can count as B's home even if B has no recognized legal or equitable property right in relation to that land.

[61] A contractual right, such as a contractual licence, can also count as a 'possession' for the purposes of Art 1 of the First Protocol to the ECHR: see Chapter 3, section 3. Clearly, B's right to peaceful enjoyment of that possession does not mean that B must be able to assert his contractual right against a third party such as C; instead, B must rely on his remedies against A, including a claim for damages for A's breach of contract.

[62] Section 5(1A) applies where B has a 'periodic licence to occupy premises as a dwelling'—e.g. where B pays A £50 a week to occupy A's land. Some contractual licences are excluded from the 1977 Act: see s 3A. The Act does not apply, for example, if the licence involves B sharing accommodation with A or a member of A's family, or if, immediately before giving B the licence, A occupied the land as his only or principal home.

[63] C does not commit the offence if he deprives B of occupation whilst reasonably believing that B had, in any case, moved out: see s 1(2). Under the Criminal Law Act 1977, s 6, it is also a criminal offence to use or threaten violence in an attempt to gain possession of residential premises occupied by B.

[64] So, for example, B may be able to resist a public body's decision to exercise its power to remove B: see Chapter 3, section 4.2.2.

[65] [2006] 2 AC 465.

held that, in all but the most exceptional cases,[66] there will be no breach of B's Art 8 right if C removes B in a situation in which the current land law rules allow C to do so. On that view, the introduction of the HRA 1998 does not necessitate allowing B's contractual licence of his home to count as an equitable interest in land.

In the following article, Maudsley draws a distinction between contractual licences that give B a right to exclusive possession of A's land, and other contractual licences. He argues that the former, but not the latter, should count as equitable property rights in land.

Maudsley, 'Licences to Remain on Land (Other than a Wife's Licence)' (1956) 20 Conv 281

At 285

For, while it is consistent with principle, authority and policy to protect licensees in certain cases where they have exclusive possession of land, the protection of contractual licensees having something less than exclusive possession would cause far more problems than it would solve. For it would mean that every lodger would be entitled to remain in his room after a sale to anyone except a purchaser of the legal estate for value without notice;[67] and this would have a serious effect on land sales.

At 288–9

In most cases, of course, in which one party goes into possession of land in consideration of payment to the owner, he will be a tenant; but that is not invariably the case [. . .]

The present practice of holding certain persons who are in exclusive possession to be licensees and not tenants is of importance only in the opposite type of case, where the object is to help the landlord; the result of it is that in certain cases where the landlord, who would be unable to evict a tenant because of the tenant's statutory protection (by the Rent Acts[68] or the Limitation Acts)[69] is able to do so if the court can be persuaded that the party in occupation is not a tenant but only a licensee [. . .] It is submitted therefore that cases in which one party goes into exclusive possession in consideration of making periodic payments to the owners will be held to create tenancies unless the court, in order to deprive an undeserving tenant of the statutory protection, can do justice between the parties by construing the tenancy, according to the intentions of the parties, as a licence.

Maudsley's argument is important, because it reveals the context in which Lord Denning made his attempts (in cases such as Errington v Errington[70] and DHN v Tower Hamlets)[71] to establish a contractual licence as an equitable property right. As we will see in Chapter 22, section 2, the standard position today is that if the contract between A and B gives B a right, for a limited period, to exclusive possession of A's land, B has a lease. A lease counts as property right and B therefore has a right that is capable of binding C.

[66] A case may be exceptional if, for example, B is a member of a particularly vulnerable group: see, for example, the decision of the European Court of Human Rights in Connors v UK (2004) 40 EHRR 189, discussed in Chapter 3, section 2.5.3.

[67] [Note that the reference here to the 'bona fide purchaser' defence is now outdated. In registered land, a registered purchaser for value is protected against a pre-existing equitable interest unless: (i) that interest is protected by a notice on the register; or (ii) the holder of the interest is in actual occupation of the land at the relevant time—see Chapter 12, section 3.2, and Chapter 14, section 2.2.]

[68] Marcroft Wagons v Smith [1951] 2 KB 496; Murray Bull & Co v Murray [1953] 1 QB 211.

[69] Cobb v Lane [1952] 1 All ER 1199.

[70] [1952] 1 KB 290.

[71] [1976] 3 All ER 462.

But from the 1950s until the mid-1980s, the Court of Appeal, again led by Lord Denning, adopted a much narrower definition of a lease. Under that definition, A could give B a right to exclusive possession of A's land for a fixed period and still deny B a lease: A simply needed to make clear that he did not intend to give B a 'stake in the land'. As Lord Denning MR put it in Errington v Errington & Woods:[72] 'The result of all these cases is that, although a person who is let into exclusive possession is, prima facie, to be considered to be a tenant, nevertheless he will not be held to be so if the circumstances negative any intention to create a tenancy.'

The chief reason for this narrow definition of a lease, it seems, was to allow A to avoid the statutes that gave extra rights to a party with a lease:[73] for example, if he had a lease, B might gain a statutory right to remain in occupation of A's land even after the end of the agreed contractual period (we will consider the question of statutory protection for residential tenants in Chapter 23). But the courts' narrow definition of a lease meant that, in some cases in which B would nowadays be regarded as having a lease—that is, where B had a contractual right to exclusive possession of A's land for a limited period—B was instead regarded as having only a contractual licence. Maudsley's argument recognizes that, in such cases, B should have a property right. The law has now adopted that argument—but by recognizing that, in such cases, B has a lease. This means that much of the pressure for allowing contractual licences to count as property rights has now disappeared.

In the following article, Cheshire discusses and defends the reasoning of Denning LJ in Errington v Errington.

Cheshire, 'A New Equitable Interest in Land' (1953) 16 MLR 1, 9

[I]s the equity to specific performance enforceable against the successor in title to the licensor? Does the licensee acquire a proprietary, not a merely contractual right? [. . .] At least one learned writer in the Law Quarterly Review, Mr HWR Wade, holds it to be unjustifiable on several counts. 'It is,' he says, 'revolutionary to hold that a contract for a licence, (not being a contract for sale or lease, or a restrictive covenant) can be enforced against a person not a party to it.'[74] Perhaps, however, it may be suggested with respect that the recent decisions illustrate a peaceful penetration, not a revolution. The doctrine of privity was penetrated by the common law courts themselves in Spencer's Case[75] and by the Court of Chancery in Tulk v Moxhay,[76] and there seems no reason that what was possible and beneficial in an earlier age should become outmoded by the mere passage of time.

Another criticism made by Mr Wade is that the list of equitable proprietary interests in land should be regarded as closed and that this invention of a new type will unsettle the law of real property for many years. Similar warnings have been uttered in the past, but they have failed to impede the living growth of English law. For example, in 1834, Lord Brougham, in holding that a covenant does not run with land at law and cannot be made to run with it in equity, adorned his judgment with the following homily:

> 'Great detriment would arise and much confusion of rights if parties were allowed to invent new modes of holding and enjoying real property, and to impress upon their lands and tenements a peculiar character which should follow them into all hands, no matter how remote.'[77]

Yet, only fourteen years later, Tulk v Moxhay invented the restrictive covenant, a new interest of remarkable virility that nobody then or since has regretted.

[72] [1952] KB 290, 298. [73] See Marchant v Charters [1977] 1 WLR 1181, 1185.
[74] (1952) 68 LQR 337, 338–9. [75] (1583) 5 Co Rep 16a. [76] (1848) 2 Ph 774.
[77] Keppell v Bailey (1834) 2 My & K 517, 536.

Although Cheshire takes issue with it, Wade's article was referred to with approval by the Court of Appeal in Ashburn Anstalt v Arnold.[78] And, as we saw when considering the decision in Errington v Errington, Wade is right to emphasize the difference between cases in which A makes a contractual promise to give B a recognized property right and those in which A simply promises to allow B to make a particular use of A's land. Cheshire's reply therefore focuses on the restrictive covenant: as we will see in Chapter 26, it is a recognized equitable property right that can arise as a result of a contractual promise by A to B, even though A's promise is not a promise give B, in the future, a property right.

The restrictive covenant is a very important point of comparison: it is the most recent example of the courts developing a new form of equitable property right in land. As Cheshire notes, it shows that the list of property rights can be added to. Two points are, however, worth noting. Firstly, the restrictive covenant was recognized as a property right before 1925 (see Chapter 4, section 6). In contrast, as we have seen, s 4 of the LPA 1925 now prevents the courts from developing the contractual licence as a new form of property right; any such change would have to come from Parliament.

Secondly, when the restrictive covenant was recognized as an equitable property right, the courts imposed important restrictions on precisely what type of promise by A to B could give rise to such a property right. Such restrictions would also have to be imposed by Parliament if it were to allow any contractual licences to count as property rights. Certainly, the debate is not as to whether all contractual licences should become property rights; rather, it is as to whether particular sorts of contractual licence should do so.

Thirdly, it is important to note how restrictive covenants came to be regarded as property rights. Cheshire cites Tulk v Moxhay as a key decision, but, as we noted in Chapter 6, section 2.6, that case, in fact, involved B acquiring a new, direct right against C.[79] This raises the question of whether a gradual extension of the circumstances in which B can acquire such a right could, over time, prompt Parliament to elevate some forms of contractual licence to the status of an equitable interest in land.

McFarlane, 'Identifying Property Rights: A Reply to Mr Watt' [2003] Conv 473

At 482

[The passage to proprietary status of restrictive covenants] depended on an initial recognition that a covenantee could be protected against a third party by means of a new, direct right. This can be seen from a consideration of Tulk v Moxhay. That decision did not in itself establish the proprietary status of a restrictive covenant, as is clear from Lord Cottenham L.C.'s judgment:

> 'the question is, not whether the covenant runs with the land, but whether a party shall be permitted to use the land in a manner inconsistent with the contract entered into by his vendor, and with notice of which he purchased.'

B's protection in Tulk v Moxhay therefore seems to depend on a new right which arises as a result of C's conduct in purchasing the property with notice of the covenant. However, from this starting point, the restrictive covenant began a journey which culminated in the acquisition of proprietary status.

78 [1989] Ch 1, 22.

79 This point was noted by Browne-Wilkinson V-C in Swiss Bank v Lloyds Bank [1979] 1 Ch 548, 571.

At 485–6

[The] history [of restrictive covenants] demonstrates that a right is generally only allowed to become proprietary on certain terms. In Tulk v Moxhay itself, no distinction is made between positive and negative covenants; nor does it seem necessary for the covenantee to have land for the benefit of which the covenant was taken. As the judgment in that case focuses on the culpability of C's conduct, these requirements, relating to the nature of B's original right, may well seem out of place. However, as the analysis shifts and that original right comes to be regarded as proprietary, it is inevitable that the courts will consider such restrictions. For a recognition that a particular right is proprietary must be based on a decision that the right is, by its nature, sufficiently important to warrant protection even if the property to which it relates changes hands. Therefore it is scarcely surprising that the courts will think carefully about the precise nature of the right in question before allowing it to have proprietary status. For example, given the burdens which will be placed on C's property as a result, it may well make sense to restrict proprietary status to those rights that confer a compensating benefit on another piece of property. Further, the particular disadvantage of allowing a right to be proprietary, that it can bind third parties without their consent, may be thought too great when dealing with certain types of right, such as those that impose positive obligations. Hence it may be thought unlikely that English law will ever accept that all [...] licences of land have proprietary status. As a result, it can be concluded not only that a general category consisting of all [...] licences of land is currently absent from the list of property rights recognised by English law, but also that it may well always remain so.

A final argument in favour of the proprietary status of contractual licences is made by Moriarty in the following extract. It rests on an unusual definition of a contractual licence.

Moriarty, 'Licences and Land Law: Legal Principles and Public Policies' (1984) 100 LQR 376

At 376

The device of the licence, it will be argued, is no more than a mechanism by which the law sanctions the informal creation of proprietary rights in land.

At 397

The point, then is that we have to make a distinction between two different kinds of rule in land law. There are, first, the substantive rules of the subject which govern and define what kinds of right the law will accept as having the potential to bind third parties, as property rights, in the first place. And then there are the procedural rules of the subject which, important as they are, merely regulate the method by which they are created. King [v David Allen Ltd] and Clore [v Theatrical Properties Ltd], it is suggested, authoritatively rule out the possibility of the contractual licence being used to subvert the former, and more fundamental, rules of the subject. But they leave untouched the use of the contractual licence as a means of supplementing the procedural rules for creation. It is in this latter context that the contractual licence is most commonly found; and it is in this latter context that the device shares so much in common with the estoppel licence. In such a context, therefore, there can be no objection to contractual licences binding third parties, unless it is an objection to all licences binding third parties.

The distinction made by Moriarty between the 'substantive' and 'procedural' rules of land law seems to match the distinction between the content question and the acquisition question. Moriarty's argument is thus slightly surprising. The issue that we are currently considering relates to the content question: should a particular type of right (a contractual licence) be regarded as an equitable interest in land? Yet Moriarty sees the issue as instead related to the acquisition question: given our list of equitable interests in land, by what means should B be able to acquire such a right? It is therefore important to note that Moriarty's argument does not involve reversing the results in cases such as King v David Allen[80] and Clore v Theatrical Properties Ltd;[81] rather, his argument is that, in a case such as Errington v Errington,[82] B2 had, in fact, acquired, through an informal means, a recognized equitable property right. That analysis seems to be correct: it was noted above that Errington could be analysed as a case in which, as a result of A's informal promise to transfer his land to them, B1 and B2 had acquired an estate contract. Crucially, then, Moriarty's analysis does not involve promoting the contractual licence to a property right; instead, it can be used to defend the status quo, by re-analysing some (but not all) contractual licence cases as cases in which, in fact, B acquired not only a licence, but also a recognized equitable property right.

In his article, Moriarty also draws a link between the contractual licence and the estoppel licence. He notes, firstly, that the courts have regularly held that an estoppel licence can bind a third party, and, secondly, that estoppel licences and contractual licences are very similar. We will consider estoppel licences, and their effect on third parties, in the next section.

4 ESTOPPEL LICENCES

An estoppel licence exists where B has a liberty to make some use of A's land and A is under a duty to B, arising as a result of the doctrine of proprietary estoppel. This means that—in some circumstances, at least—A is under a duty to B not to revoke B's licence. An estoppel licence is thus similar to a contractual licence. The key difference is the source of A's duty to B: in this case, the duty arises not because of a contract, but, instead, under the doctrine of proprietary estoppel. We examined that doctrine in Chapter 10. It seems to allow B to acquire a right against A where B has reasonably relied on a commitment made by A to allow B a right relating to land. As the following extract demonstrates, the doctrine can thus impose a duty on A even if A has made no contractual bargain with B.

Inwards v Baker
[1965] 2 QB 29, CA

Facts: Mr Baker owned land at Dunsmore, near Wendover, in Buckinghamshire. In 1931, Mr Baker (A) invited his son, John (B), to build a bungalow on the land. B accepted the invitation. He moved into the bungalow and lived there in the belief that he could remain, if he wished, for the rest of his life. A died in 1951 and, under his will, made in 1922, his land passed to trustees who were to hold the land for the benefit of parties other than B. The trustees attempted to remove B from the land. The judge at the Aylesbury county court found in favour of the trustees, but B successfully appealed to the Court of Appeal.

[80] [1916] 2 AC 54. [81] [1936] 3 All ER 483. [82] [1952] 1 KB 290.

Lord Denning MR

At 36–7

The trustees say that at the most [B] had a licence to be in the bungalow but that it had been revoked and he had no right to stay. The judge has held in their favour. He was referred to Errington v. Errington and Woods, but the judge held that that decision only protected a contractual licensee. He thought that, in order to be protected, the licensee must have a contract or promise by which he is entitled to be there. The judge said:

> 'I can find no promise made by the father to the son that he should remain in the property at all—no contractual arrangement between them. True the father said that the son could live in the property, expressly or impliedly, but there is no evidence that this was arrived at as the result of a contract or promise—merely an arrangement made casually because of the relationship which existed and knowledge that the son wished to erect a bungalow for residence.'

Thereupon, the judge, with much reluctance, thought the case was not within Errington's case, and said the son must go.

The son appeals to this court. We have had the advantage of cases which were not cited to the county court judge[83] [. . .] It is quite plain from those authorities that if the owner of land requests another, or indeed allows another, to expend money on the land under an expectation created or encouraged by the landlord that he will be able to remain there, that raises an equity in the licensee such as to entitle him to stay. He has a licence coupled with an equity.

So in this case, even though there is no binding contract to grant any particular interest to the licensee, nevertheless the court can look at the circumstances and see whether there is an equity arising out of the expenditure of money. All that is necessary is that the licensee should, at the request or with the encouragement of the landlord, have spent the money in the expectation of being allowed to stay there. If so, the court will not allow that expectation to be defeated where it would be inequitable so to do. In this case it is quite plain that the father allowed an expectation to be created in the son's mind that this bungalow was to be his home. It was to be his home for his life or, at all events, his home as long as he wished it to remain his home. It seems to me, in the light of that equity, that the father could not in 1932 have turned to his son and said: 'You are to go. It is my land and my house.' Nor could he at any time thereafter so long as the son wanted it as his home.

4.1 B'S RIGHTS AGAINST A

The nature of B's rights against A depends on the nature of A's duty to B. The key point is that the doctrine of proprietary estoppel, as we saw in Chapter 10, sections 3 and 4, may have a number of different effects. For example, in Jennings v Rice,[84] B had been staying for a number of nights each week on A's land, in order to care for A. A had promised B that she would leave her land to B in her will; A did not do so. The Court of Appeal confirmed the finding of the trial judge: the doctrine of proprietary estoppel imposed a duty on A (and now on A's estate) to pay B £200,000. In that case, it seems, A was not under a duty not to revoke B's licence: A would have been able to remove B from the land. As a result of failing to honour her promise to leave her land to B, however, A was instead under a duty to pay B a sum of money.

[83] [The cases mentioned are classic proprietary estoppel cases: Dillwyn v Llewellyn (1862) 4 De G F & J 517; Plimmer v Wellington Corpn (1884) 9 App Cas 699 (PC); Ramsden v Dyson (1866) LR 1 HL 129.]

[84] [2003] 1 P & CR 100.

In some cases, the doctrine of proprietary estoppel may impose a duty on A not to revoke B's licence. For example, in the passage from Inwards v Baker quoted above, Lord Denning MR confirms that, at least once B had built and moved into his bungalow, A was under a duty not to remove B from the land. In such a case, it seems, the discussion set out in section 2.1 above will apply: firstly, in general, a court will specifically enforce A's duty not to revoke B's licence; secondly, for as long as A's duty lasts and B remains on A's land, B will not become a trespasser, even if A attempts to revoke B's licence.

It might be thought that where A's duty not to revoke a licence arises under the equitable doctrine of proprietary estoppel, B's right to remain on the land is dependent on factors such as B's behaviour and is thus more fragile than in a case in which B has a contractual licence. As the following extract shows, however, that does not seem to be the case.

Williams v Staite
[1979] Ch 291, CA

Facts: Mrs Moore (A) owned two neighbouring cottages in Llangibby, Gwent. Her daughter married Mr Staite. A then invited the Staites to move into one of the cottages. A promised them that they could remain in that cottage for as long as they wished. Mr Staite lived in a cottage provided with his job, but, following A's promise, he gave up that accommodation to move into A's cottage. After moving in, the Staites spent money improving the cottage; they also cared for A and her husband, who lived next door. A died and her land was eventually sold to C. C then attempted to remove the Staites (B1 and B2) from the cottage. The judge found in favour of B1 and B2, holding that their licence was binding on C. C did not appeal against that finding—but C later claimed that, due to the bad behaviour of B1 and B2, he was entitled to remove them from the cottage. The judge in the Pontypool and Abergavenny county court found in C's favour. B1 and B2 then successfully appealed to the Court of Appeal.

Lord Denning MR

At 297–8

[B1 and B2] had an equitable licence under which they were entitled to live in [the cottage] for their lives or for as long as they wished it to be their home. It may in some circumstances be revoked, but I do not think it can be revoked in such circumstances as are found in the present case. I know that the judge took a poor view of the conduct of [B1 and B2]—and I am not sure he was altogether fair to them—[. . .] but to my mind their conduct, however reprehensible, was not such as to justify revocation of their licence to occupy the cottage as their home.

Goff LJ

At 300

Excessive user or bad behaviour towards the legal owner cannot bring the equity to an end or forfeit it. It may give rise to an action for damages for trespass or nuisance or to injunctions to restrain such behaviour, but I see no ground on which the equity, once established, can be forfeited. Of course, the court might have held, and might hold in any proper case, that the equity is in its nature for a limited period only or determinable upon a condition certain. In such a case the court must then see whether, in the events which have happened, it has determined or it has expired or been determined by the happening of that condition.

It is important to note that C did not appeal against the initial holding that the estoppel licence of B1 and B2 was capable of binding C. We will consider that question in detail in section 4.3 below.

4.2 B'S RIGHTS AGAINST X

If the doctrine of proprietary estoppel simply imposes a duty on A not to revoke B's licence, B's position against X should be exactly the same as if he had a contractual licence. In such a case, the discussion in section 3.2 above should apply.

4.3 B'S RIGHTS AGAINST C

4.3.1 Direct rights

The discussion of direct rights in section 3.3.1 above applies equally where B has an estoppel licence. Certainly, if the doctrine of proprietary estoppel imposes a duty on A not to revoke B's licence, A will have the same incentive, when transferring his land to C, to ask C to promise to respect B's licence.

4.3.2 A pre-existing property right?

Inwards v Baker
[1965] 2 QB 29, CA

Facts: See above.

Lord Denning MR

At 37

[C's counsel] put the case of a purchaser. He suggested that the father could sell the land to a purchaser who could get the son out. But I think that any purchaser who took with notice would clearly be bound by the equity. So here, too, the present plaintiffs, the successors in title of the father, are clearly themselves bound by this equity. It is an equity well recognised in law. It arises from the expenditure of money by a person in actual occupation of land when he is led to believe that, as the result of that expenditure, he will be allowed to remain there. It is for the court to say in what way the equity can be satisfied. I am quite clear in this case it can be satisfied by holding that the defendant can remain there as long as he desires to as his home.

Lord Denning MR's view is thus that, on the facts of Inwards v Baker, B had a right that was capable of binding C. That conclusion seems correct. In a case such as Inwards, as Lord Denning noted, it would be inequitable for B's expectation of a home for life to be defeated. It can therefore be argued that the doctrine of proprietary estoppel imposes a duty on A to allow B to exclusive possession of the bungalow for B's life (at least). If that is correct, B has a recognized equitable property right: an equitable life interest arising under a trust (see Chapter 20, section 4). It can be argued that it is B's equitable interest, rather than any licence, that is capable of binding C.

A number of cases in which an estoppel licence is said to be capable of binding C can be explained in this way. For example, in ER Ives Investment Ltd v High,[85] A agreed that, in return for A being able to place foundations on part of B's land, B would have a right of way across A's land. The Court of Appeal held that B had a right that was capable of binding C, a later owner of A's land. There are a number of possible explanations for this decision.[86] One explanation is that B had a licence to use A's land and the doctrine of proprietary estoppel imposed a duty on A to give B the promised right of way: an easement. On that view, A was under a duty to give B a recognized property right and so B acquired an equitable easement. It is that easement, rather than B's licence, that is capable of binding C.

There are, however, some cases in which the doctrine of proprietary estoppel has simply imposed a duty on A not to revoke B's licence. Williams v Staite,[87] discussed above, is one example. In that case, as we have seen, it had earlier been held, by the county court judge, that a pre-existing estoppel licence was binding on C. That assumption does seem to create an inconsistency with the law relating to contractual licences. A contractual licence, like the estoppel licence in Williams v Staite, consists of B having a liberty to use A's land and A's being under a duty to B not to revoke that liberty. As a number of commentators have suggested,[88] B's right should not be treated differently only because A's duty arises under proprietary estoppel rather than due to a contract.

On this view, either both estoppel licences and contractual licences can count as equitable property rights, or neither can. We saw in section 3.3.2 above that no contractual licences are currently viewed as equitable property rights. This means that no estoppel licences should be viewed as equitable property rights. But this does not mean that the assumption made in Williams v Staite was a surprising one: after all, at the time, the Court of Appeal, led by Lord Denning MR, regarded the contractual licence as an equitable property right. It is therefore no surprise that B's estoppel licence was also viewed as such a right. Now that it is clear that a contractual licence is not an equitable property right, however, the same must also be true of an estoppel licence.

Land Registration Act 2002, s 116

It is hereby declared for the avoidance of doubt that, in relation to registered land, each of the following:

(a) an equity by estoppel, and

(b) a mere equity

has effect from the time the equity arises as an interest capable of binding successors in title (subject to the rules about the effect of dispositions on priority).

85 [1967] 2 QB 379.

86 See Battersby [1995] MLR 637; Swadling, 'Property' in English Private Law (2nd edn, ed Burrows, 2007), [4.128].

87 [1979] Ch 291.

88 See Thompson [1983] Conv 57; Moriarty, 'Informal Transactions in Land: Estoppel and Registration' (1984) 100 LQR 376.

We looked at the possible effect of s 116(b) of the LRA 2002 on contractual licences in section 3.3.2 above. It seems that s 116(a) may have an important effect on estoppel licences. As we saw in Chapter 10, section 4.3, an 'equity by estoppel' is said to arise whenever A is under a duty to B arising as a result of the doctrine of proprietary estoppel. The 'equity' is the right that B has in the period after the estoppel has arisen and before a court makes an order in B's favour. So, even in a case in which A's only duty is a duty not to revoke B's licence, B initially has an 'equity by estoppel'—and the effect of s 116(a), on its natural reading, is to allow that 'equity by estoppel' to be capable of binding C, and thus to function as an equitable property right. That result does seem to have been intended by the Law Commission, as can be seen in the report that led to the LRA 2002.[89] As the following extract points out, however, it also seems to lead to an inconsistency in the law.

McFarlane, 'Proprietary Estoppel and Third Parties After the Land Registration Act 2002' [2003] CLJ 661, 690

> Although they view s.116(a) as solving one of the most persistent debates relating to estoppel, the Law Commission's interpretation of that section re-awakens another such debate which might have been thought settled. As a result of s.116(a), a licence arising through proprietary estoppel would operate differently to a contractual licence: the former could bind C, provided the land was transferred to him before a court order granting B the licence. It could be argued in such a case that it is not the licence itself which binds C, but rather the independent 'equity' that arose as a result of the estoppel before the licence was awarded by the court. Yet why does no such 'equity' arise in the case of a contractual licence: surely a contractual licensee also has the right to [go to court: see further Chapter 10, section 4.3]? Once again, unconvincing distinctions arise as a result of separating estoppel from other means of acquiring rights. Indeed, it seems that the position under s.116(a) could be even less satisfactory than that favoured by Lord Denning [. . .] at least his Lordship intended that contractual and estoppel licences should be treated consistently.

As we saw in Chapter 10, section 4.3, it can therefore be argued that s 116(a) should not be interpreted so as to mean that B acquires a right that is capable of binding C whenever the doctrine of proprietary estoppel imposes a duty on A to B. Under the interpretation intended by the Law Commission, however, the holder of an estoppel licence, at least in the period before a court order is made in his or her favour, has a right that is capable of binding C.[90]

5 STATUTORY LICENCES

We can use the term 'statutory licence' to refer to situations in which B has a liberty to make some use of A's land and A is under a statutory duty to B not to revoke B's licence. A statutory licence is thus similar to a contractual licence or an estoppel licence. The key difference again is the source of A's duty to B. When considering the effect of a statutory licence on A, [89] Law Commission Report No 271, Land Registration for the Twenty-First Century (2001), [5.29]–[5.32].

[90] It is very unlikely that B will have protected his or her right by entering a notice on the register and so, if B is not in actual occupation of the registered land, C may well have be able to use the lack of registration defence to B's 'equity by estoppel': see Chapter 12, section 3.2, and Chapter 14, section 2.2.

X, and C, it is difficult to set out general principles: the statute in question will generally specify the effect of B's right. In this section, we will consider, in outline only, one particularly important form of statutory licence: the licence of one spouse[91] to occupy land owned by another.

Family Law Act 1996, s 30

(1) This section applies if—

(a) one spouse is entitled to occupy a dwelling-house by virtue of

(i) a beneficial estate or interest or contract; or

(ii) any enactment giving that spouse the right to remain in occupation; and

(b) the other spouse is not so entitled.

(2) Subject to the provisions of this Part, the spouse not so entitled has the following rights ("matrimonial home rights")—

(a) if in occupation, a right not to be evicted or excluded from the dwelling-house or any part of it by the other spouse except with the leave of the court given by an order under s.33;

(b) if not in occupation, a right with the leave of the court so given to enter into and occupy the dwelling-house.

5.1 B'S RIGHTS AGAINST A

The statutory predecessors of s 30 of the Family Law Act 1996 (FLA 1996) were, in part, a reaction to the House of Lords' decision in National Provincial Bank v Ainsworth[92] (see Chapter 1, section 5, and Chapter 5, section 5.4). In that case, Mrs Ainsworth's right to occupy the matrimonial home was said to depend on a 'deserted wife's equity'. This right, essentially improvised by the courts, arose only after Mr Ainsworth left the home. And it was of a very uncertain nature: in particular, it would not always be clear if the home-owning spouse (A) was under a duty to allow the non-owning spouse (B) to remain in occupation of the current home. Parliament intervened, first through the Matrimonial Homes Act 1967, in the hope of making B's position clearer and more secure (see Chapter 1, section 5.7).

Whilst B's basic right to occupy A's land is set out in s 30, s 33 gives a court wide powers to exclude or restrict B's right. Section 33(6) directs a court exercising those powers to take into account a number of factors, including: (i) the housing needs and resources of A and B, and of any 'relevant child'; (ii) the financial resources of A and B; (iii) the likely effect of any order on the health, safety, or well-being of A and B, and of any relevant child; and (iv) the conduct of A and B in relation to each other and otherwise. Under s 33(7), special rules apply where there is a likelihood of one of the parties or a relevant child suffering 'significant harm attributable to conduct' of the other party.

It is thus clear that, in order to balance the various needs of the spouses and any relevant children, the court has a wide discretion to exclude or restrict B's right against A.

[91] The statutory licence arising under the Family Law Act 1996, s 30, now also applies to parties in a registered civil partnership: see Civil Partnership Act 2004, s 82 and Sch 9, para 1, amending the 1996 Act.
[92] [1965] AC 1175.

5.2 B'S RIGHTS AGAINST X

The provisions of the FLA 1996 are not too important in regulating B's position against X. In National Provincial Bank v Ainsworth itself, Lord Upjohn noted that, if B is in sole occupation of A's land, strangers such as X are under a duty not to interfere with B's possession of that land.[93] As noted in section 2.2 above, B's right, in such a case, does not arise from any licence, but rather from the fact of B's physical control of the land.

5.3 B'S RIGHTS AGAINST C

5.3.1 Direct rights

Where B has a statutory licence under the FLA 1996, it is, of course, possible for B to acquire a direct right against C. Such a right can only arise, however, if C's conduct falls into one of the means, examined in Chapter 6, section 2, by which B can acquire a direct right against C.

5.3.2 A pre-existing property right?

Family Law Act 1996, s 31

(1) Subsections (2) and (3) apply if, at any time during a marriage, one spouse is entitled to occupy a dwelling-house by virtue of a beneficial estate or interest.

(2) The other spouse's matrimonial home rights are a charge on the estate or interest.

(3) The charge created by subsection (2) has the same priority as if it were an equitable interest created at whichever is the latest of the following dates—

(a) the date on which the spouse so entitled acquires the estate or interest;

(b) the date of the marriage; and

(c) 1st January 1968 (the commencement date of the Matrimonial Homes Act 1967) [...]

(8) Even though a spouse's matrimonial home rights are a charge on an estate or interest in the dwelling-house, those rights are brought to an end by—

(a) the death of the other spouse, or

(b) the termination (otherwise than by death) of the marriage, unless the court directs under s.33(5) [...]

(10) If the title to the legal estate by virtue of which a spouse is entitled to occupy a dwelling-house [...] is registered under the Land Registration Act 2002 or any enactment replaced by that Act—

(a) registration of a land charge affecting the dwelling-house by virtue of this Part is to be effected by registering a notice under the Act; and

(b) a spouse's matrimonial home rights are not to be capable of falling within paragraph 2 of Schedule 1 or 3 of that Act.

In National Provincial Bank v Ainsworth, the House of Lords held that B's right to occupy A's land, arising under a 'deserted wife's equity', did not count as a property right in land and so was not capable of binding C. Section 31(2) of the FLA 1996 clearly adopts a different position: B's statutory right to occupy is capable of binding C.

[93] [1965] AC 1175, 1232.

It is important to note, however, that B's statutory right does not operate in quite the same way as a standard interest in land. For example, consider the case in which B has a standard equitable interest in relation to registered land. If B fails to protect that right by entering a notice on the register, then, as we have seen, it may be possible for C to use the lack of registration defence against it (see Chapter 12, section 3.2). But if B is in actual occupation of the registered land at the relevant time, C cannot use that lack of registration defence against B (see further Chapter 14, section 5).

In contrast, if B does not have a standard equitable interest, and instead has only a statutory right under s 30 of the FLA 1996, B's failure to protect that right by entering a notice on the register prevents B from asserting that right against C. B's actual occupation makes no difference: s 31(10) ensures that B's right remains subject to the lack of registration defence. This means that, in most cases,[94] B can only assert his or her right against C if, before C registers C's right, B protects his or her statutory right by entering a notice on the register.

6 LICENCES COUPLED WITH AN INTEREST

A licence coupled with an interest arises where B has a liberty to make some use of A's land and that liberty protects, or arises as part of, a property right held by B. It is very doubtful, however, that 'licences coupled with an interest' are a useful concept. After all, as we saw in section 1 above, the general definition of a licence excludes situations where B's liberty to use A's land arises as part of a property right held by B: for example, if B has a lease of A's land, it is true that B has permission to be on A's land, but B's rights as against A, X, and C do not depend on this licence. Where B has a 'licence coupled with an interest' then, as against A, we would expect B's position to depend on: (i) the terms of the contract between A and B, if any; and (ii) the nature of B's property right. As against X and C, we would expect B's position simply to depend on the nature of B's property right. This does, indeed, seem to be the case; it is therefore of little use to speak of B as also having a licence coupled to his property right. In fact, as we will see in section 6.1, the concept of a 'licence coupled with an interest' has chiefly been used by the courts as a way in which to develop the remedies available to B when he has a contractual licence, whilst at the same time technically respecting past (but outdated) decisions that limited those remedies.

6.1 B'S RIGHTS AGAINST A

James Jones & Sons Ltd v Earl of Tankerville
[1909] 2 Ch 440

Facts: The Earl of Tankerville (A) owned the Chillingham estate in Northumberland.[95] He made a contractual promise to James Jones & Sons Ltd (B) allowing them to come 94 If C does not acquire his right for value, C cannot rely on B's failure to register as a defence to B's statutory right to occupy: the protection given to C by ss 29 and 30 of the Land Registration Act 2002 applies only if C acquires his right 'for valuable consideration'.

95 Lord Grey succeeded to the estate in 1675 and was made Earl of Tankerville in 1695, and later Lord Privy Seal. He is said to have played a pivotal role in the passage of the Habeas Corpus Act 1679, by deliberately onto A's land, cut down timber on that land, set up a sawmill on A's land, and then remove the timber from A's land. A breached the agreement and forcibly removed B's employees from the land. B applied for an injunction to restrain A from acting in that way. Parker J granted the injunction.

Parker J

At 442

A contract for the sale of specific timber growing on the vendor's property, on the terms that such timber is cut and carried away by the purchaser, certainly confers on the purchaser a licence to enter and cut the timber sold, and, at any rate as soon as the purchaser has severed the timber, the legal property in the severed trees vests in him. A licence to enter a man's property is prima facie revocable, but is irrevocable even at law if coupled with or granted in aid of a legal interest conferred on the purchaser, and the interest so conferred may be a purely chattel interest or an interest in realty. If A sells to B felled timber lying on A's land on the terms that B may enter and carry it away, the licence conferred is an irrevocable licence coupled with and granted in aid of the legal property in the timber which the contract for sale confers on B: Wood v. Manley.[96] [...] Even, therefore, if no interest at law passes by a contract for the sale of specific growing timber to be cut by the purchaser, it is difficult to see why on principle equity should not restrain the vendor from revoking the licence conferred by such a contract, though it might be unable to compel the purchaser to cut the timber if he refused to do so. When once the purchaser has cut any part of the timber, the legal property in the timber so cut is certainly in the purchaser, and the licence so far as that timber is concerned is irrevocable even at law, and a Court of Equity in granting an injunction would only be restraining the violation of a legal right. An injunction restraining the revocation of the licence, when it is revocable at law, may in a sense be called relief by way of specific performance, but it is not specific performance in the sense of compelling the vendor to do anything. It merely prevents him from breaking his contract [...]

It is important to note the date of this judgment. When it was given, there was some doubt as to whether a court could order specific performance of a standard contractual licence: Hurst v Picture Theatres Ltd[97] (see section 3.1.2 above) had not yet been decided. It was therefore helpful for the judge to distinguish past cases[98] in which it had been assumed that a standard contractual licence could not be protected by specific performance, by saying that B had a 'licence coupled with an interest'.[99] Nowadays, as we saw in section 3.1.2 above, there is no such difficulty in ordering A to perform a contractual duty not to revoke B's licence. It seems, then, that, in a case such as James Jones, B's rights against A—as far as his liberty to use A's miscounting the number of Lords voting for the bill when acting as a teller in the House of Lords, the other teller supposedly being too drunk to notice (see WD Christie, Life of the First Earl of Shaftesbury, vol ii (1871) pp 335–6. I am grateful to Jamie Glister for bringing this fact to my attention. The estate, including Chillingham Castle, remained with the family until the death of the ninth Earl in 1980. The twelfth-century castle (claimed to be one of the most haunted places in Britain) is now open to the public. The estate remains home to a rare breed of white cattle, said to be the only wild cattle in the world.

[96] (1839) 11 Ad & E 34. [97] [1915] 1 KB 1.

[98] Such as Wood v Leadbitter (1845) 13 M & W 838.

[99] Indeed, in Hurst itself, the chief argument of Mr Hurst's counsel was that Mr Hurst, on buying the cinema ticket, had a licence coupled with an interest. And both judges in the majority, do refer to that argument at points in their judgments (see Buckley LJ, [5]–[6] and Kennedy LJ, [13]–[14]).

land is concerned—should be governed simply by A's contractual agreement with B and the principles discussed in section 3.1.2 above.

The concept of a 'licence coupled with an interest' may be more important in a case in which A is not under a contractual duty to B. For example, let us say that property belonging to B finds its way onto A's land. It may be that B's car is stolen and then parked on A's land. In such a case, A may refuse B permission to come onto A's land and retrieve the car.

There are two ways in which the law could respond. Firstly, it could be said that B has a 'licence coupled with an interest': B's ownership of the car imposes a duty on A either to deliver the car to B or to allow B to come onto the land to collect it. The question then would be whether a court would grant an order forcing A to comply with that duty, or would instead order A to pay damages to B.

Secondly, it could be said that, by refusing to allow B to collect the car, A is interfering with B's ownership of the car and so is committing a wrong: the tort of conversion.[100] If A commits such a tort, B can ask the court to order A to 'deliver up' the car to B,[101] but the court does not have to make such an order. In fact, the usual response of the court is to order A to pay B damages.

6.2 B'S RIGHTS AGAINST X

Where B has a licence coupled with an interest, B also has a property right. If X interferes with that property right, he commits a wrong against B. For example, in James Jones, if X were to trespass onto A's land and take away some of B's timber, X would commit the tort of conversion against B. It is also possible for B's licence to be coupled with a property right in A's land. For example, as we will see in Chapter 25, section 1.1, there is a particular form of property right in land, akin to an easement, known as a 'profit' or 'profit à prendre'. It is a property right that allows B to come onto A's land and remove something that would otherwise be owned by A—for example, turf or trees growing on A's land. If B has such a right, X is under a duty not to interfere with B's right to come onto A's land and remove the thing in question. But X's duty does not arise because B has a licence; rather, it arises because B has a profit—that is, a property right in A's land. In James Jones, it is unclear whether B had such a property right: it seems that, because A had not used a deed to give B his right, B could not claim a legal profit à prendre—but B may have had an equitable profit à prendre.

6.3 B'S RIGHTS AGAINST C

6.3.1 Direct rights

If, as in James Jones, A is under a contractual duty to allow B to make a particular use of A's land, the discussion of direct rights in section 3.3.1 above is applicable. Certainly, A will have the same incentive, when transferring his land to C, to ask C to promise to respect B's licence.

100 For a discussion of the requirements of the tort, see Kuwait Airways v Iraqi Airways (Nos 4 & 5) [2002] 2 AC 883. Howard E Perry v British Railway Board [1980] 1 WLR 1375 provides an example in which the defendant committed the tort of conversion simply by refusing to return goods, currently controlled by the defendant, to the claimant.

101 See Torts (Interference with Goods) Act 1977, s 3.

6.3.2 A pre-existing property right?

We have seen that, in general, the fact that A is under a duty not to revoke B's licence does not, by itself, give B a property right in A's land. But where B has a licence coupled with an interest, the interest is, in itself, a property right. So, if the interest is a property right in A's land, such as a profit à prendre, it is capable of binding C. If the interest is instead a property right in a thing on A's land, that property right is also capable of binding C, just as it is capable of binding X. So, if, in James Jones, A were to sell his land to C, the timber already cut down by B and stored on A's land would continue to belong to B. C would therefore commit the tort of conversion if he were to refuse to allow B to collect that timber.

QUESTIONS

1. What is the key feature of a licence? Does Hohfeld's distinction between a 'privilege', or 'liberty' on the one hand and a 'claim right' on the other help in understanding the position of a licensee?
2. What are the different forms of licence? Given their variety, is it useful to think of licences as a single category?
3. In what circumstances might a court refuse to order specific performance of A's duty not to revoke B's contractual licence?
4. When can B rely on a 'constructive trust' to assert a right against C? Does such a constructive trust arise as soon as A gives B a contractual licence, or does it only arise at a later point?
5. Do you think that particular forms of contractual licence may one day be recognized as property rights?
6. Are cases in which 'estoppel licences' bind third parties cases in which B has more than a licence, and instead has a recognized equitable interest, arising as a result of proprietary estoppel?

FURTHER READING

Battersby, 'Informally Created Interests' in Land Law: Themes and Perspectives (eds Bright and Dewar, Oxford: OUP, 1998)

Bright, 'The Third Party's Conscience in Land Law' [2000] Conv 398

Hohfeld, 'Faulty Analysis in Easement and License Cases' (1917) Yale LJ 66

McFarlane, 'Identifying Property Rights: A Reply to Mr Watt' [2003] Conv 473

Moriarty, 'Licences and Land Law: Legal Principles and Public Policies' (1984) 100 LQR 376

Smith, 'The Economic Torts: Their Impact on Real Property' (1977) 41 Conv 318

Swadling, 'Property' in English Private Law (2nd edn, ed Burrows, Oxford: OUP, 2007, [4.114]–[4.128])

Wade, 'Licences and Third Parties' (1952) 68 LQR 337

22

LEASES

CENTRAL ISSUES

1. Over the next three chapters, we will examine the lease in detail. In this chapter, we will concentrate on a key feature of a lease: its ability to count as a property right. This crucial aspect of a lease differentiates it from the licence, which we examined in Chapter 21. In this chapter, therefore, we will look at the three principal questions that apply to any property right: the content question (when will B's right count as a lease?); the acquisition question (how can B acquire a lease?); and the defences question (if B has a lease of A's land, when can C, a party later acquiring a right from A, have a defence to B's lease?). In considering the content question, we will see precisely how a lease differs from a licence; in considering the acquisition question, we will also consider the ways in which a lease may come to an end.
2. Before examining those questions, we will consider why B may wish to show that he or she has a lease. One important consequence of having a legal or equitable lease, of course, is that such a right is capable of binding C, a third party who later acquires a right from A. In addition, if B can show that he or she has a lease, this may mean that additional duties are imposed on A: in particular, such duties may be imposed by statutes that provide protection to B if B has a lease.
3. In Chapter 23, we will consider in more detail the statutory protection potentially available to B if he or she has a lease. We will see there that, in some cases, B can be seen as having a lease (at least, in the sense used by a particular statute) even if B has no property right. This suggests that there are two sorts of leases: a proprietary lease, and a non-proprietary lease. In this chapter, we will concentrate on the former type of lease.
4. A lease, in the sense of a property right, will often arise as part of an agreement imposing a number of duties on both A and B. In some cases, those duties, even if positive, can bind not only A and B, but also parties later acquiring the rights of A and B. We will examine this phenomenon in Chapter 24, by looking at the concept of a leasehold covenant. In Chapter 23, we will consider in more detail the statutory protection potentially available to B if he or she has a lease. In this chapter, we will see how the judges' approach to defining the content of a lease as a property right may have been influenced by the presence of such statutory protection.
5. The content of a lease can be simply defined: B has a lease if he or she has a right to exclusive possession of land for a limited period. In practice, however, there may be difficulties in applying this simple test: for example, how should we deal with cases in which B1 and B2 occupy land together? And what is the effect of a term inserted by A into an occupation agreement with B with the sole purpose of denying B exclusive possession of land?

6. In considering the acquisition and defences questions, we will see the impact of the Land Registration Act 2002 on leases. We considered the general effect of that Act in Chapters 14 and 15. When considering the acquisition and defences questions, we will also need to bear in mind the possibility of B's having an equitable, rather than a legal, lease.
7. Finally, in section 5 below, we will consider a recurrent debate about the conceptual nature of a lease: should it be seen as primarily a contractual right, or, instead, as primarily a property right? It will be suggested that the debate rests on a misconception: there is no reason why a right cannot be both contractual—that is, acquired as a result of a contractual agreement between A and B—and also proprietary—that is, having a content that means it can count as a legal property right.

1 INTRODUCTION: THE IMPORTANCE OF THE LEASE

1.1 THE EFFECT OF A LEASE

Imagine a case in which A, who holds a registered legal estate in land, makes a contractual agreement with B. A promises to allow B to occupy A's land for a year; in return, B promises to pay A £200 a week. In such a case, B clearly has a permission to use A's land: he or she has, at the very least, a contractual licence (see Chapter 21, section 3). Why might B want to claim that his or her agreement with A instead gives him or her a lease of A's land?

We can answer this question by considering three different types of situation, matching the different situations that we examined in Chapter 21 when considering the effect of a licence. In the first set of situations, B wants to make a claim against A. In the second set of situations, B wants to make a claim against X, a stranger who has not acquired a right in A's land, but who has, in some way, interfered with B's use of that land. In the third set, B wants to make a claim against C, a third party who has acquired a right in A's land.

1.1.1 The effect of a lease on A

In Chapter 21, section 3.1, we saw that, even if B has a contractual licence rather than a lease, his or her position as against A is fairly secure. In our example in which A has promised to allow B to occupy A's land for a year, it is quite possible that, if A were to threaten to remove B early, B could obtain a court order preventing A from thus breaching his or her contractual duty to B.[1] Nonetheless, if B can show he or she has acquired a lease, A may come under extra duties to B, going beyond the express terms of the parties' agreement.

[1] See Verrall v Great Yarmouth Borough Council [1981] QB 202, although note Thompson v Park [1944] KB 408. Both cases are discussed in Chapter 21, section 3.1.2.

First, if B has a lease, A and B can be said to be in a 'landlord–tenant relationship'. The common law may then impose particular duties on the parties, even if they did not expressly undertake those duties when making their contractual agreement. These implied duties are, however, very limited:[2] for example, B has a duty not permanently to alter the physical character of the land;[3] and A's implied duties include a duty to allow B 'quiet enjoyment' of the land, meaning that A has a duty not to interfere physically with B's expected use of the land, or to interfere substantially with B's enjoyment of the land.

Second, and much more importantly in practice, particular statutes may operate to impose duties on A if and only if A has given B a lease. We will look at the scope of this statutory protection in more detail in Chapter 23, but its existence is crucial to understanding the context of a number of cases that we will examine in this chapter.

It is certainly apparent in the case from which the following extract is taken. The extract given below is a long one, but the length of the extract is commensurate with the importance of the decision. Lord Templeman's analysis provides the key starting point for any attempt to define the content of a lease or to distinguish a lease from a contractual licence.

Street v Mountford
[1985] AC 809, HL

Facts: Roger Street, a solicitor from Bournemouth, owned No 5, St Clement's Gardens, Boscombe. On 7 March 1983, he entered a signed written agreement with Wendy Mountford, allowing her a right to exclusive occupation of two rooms in that house (Rooms 5 and 6). Under the terms of the agreement, Mrs Mountford was under a duty to pay £37 a week to Mr Street and either party was free to terminate the agreement by giving fourteen days' notice. The agreement described itself throughout as a licence: for example, the £37 payment was described as a 'licence fee'. Under the terms of the Rent Act 1977, if the agreement gave Mrs Mountford a lease, then Mr Street was obliged to accept whatever rent was set as a fair rent by an independent officer or tribunal. Mrs Mountford claimed that the agreement did, indeed, give her a lease and applied for a fair rent to be assessed. Mr Street then applied to the county court for a declaration that Mrs Mountford had only a licence. If it were found that Mrs Mountford had a lease, the Rent Act 1977 would also limit the grounds on which Mr Street could end her occupation and would thus prevent him bringing her occupation to an end by simply giving fourteen days' notice. The county court judge found that Mrs Mountford did, indeed, have a lease. The Court of Appeal upheld Mr Street's appeal, finding that, as the written agreement made clear that Mr Street did not intend to grant Mrs Mountford a lease, Mrs Mountford had only a contractual licence. But the House of Lords held that, this contrary intention notwithstanding, the agreement between Mr Street and Mrs Mountford did give her a lease. Lord Templeman, with whom all of their Lordships agreed, gave the only reasoned speech. In it, the term 'tenancy' is used interchangeably with 'lease'.

[2] Judges in other jurisdictions have been more willing to impose duties on A: see Javins v First National Realty (1970) 428 F 2d 1071 (District of Columbia Court of Appeals). For a comparison between the English and US approaches, see Bright, Landlord and Tenant Law in Context (2007), pp 30–5.

[3] See Marsden v Edward Heyes [1927] 2 KB 1, applying Horsefall v Mather (1815) Holt NP 7.

Lord Templeman

At 814

A tenancy is a term of years absolute. This expression, by section 205(1)(xxvii) of the Law of Property Act 1925, reproducing the common law, includes a term from week to week in possession at a rent and liable to determination by notice or re-entry. Originally a term of years was not an estate in land, the lessee having merely a personal action against his lessor. But a legal estate in leaseholds was created by the Statute of Gloucester 1278 and the Act of 1529 21 Hen. VIII, c. 15. Now by section 1 of the Law of Property Act 1925 a term of years absolute is an estate in land capable of subsisting as a legal estate. In the present case if the agreement dated 7 March 1983 created a tenancy, Mrs. Mountford having entered into possession and made weekly payments acquired a legal estate in land. If the agreement is a tenancy, the occupation of Mrs. Mountford is protected by the Rent Acts.

A licence in connection with land while entitling the licensee to use the land for the purposes authorised by the licence does not create an estate in the land. If the agreement dated 7 March 1983 created a licence for Mrs. Mountford to occupy the premises, she did not acquire any estate in the land. If the agreement is a licence then Mrs. Mountford's right of occupation is not protected by the Rent Acts. Hence the practical importance of distinguishing between a tenancy and a licence.

At 816–9

On behalf of Mrs. Mountford her counsel, Mr. Hicks Q.C., seeks to reaffirm and re-establish the traditional view that an occupier of land for a term at a rent is a tenant providing the occupier is granted exclusive possession. It is conceded on behalf of Mr. Street that the agreement dated 7 March 1983 granted exclusive possession to Mrs. Mountford. The traditional view that the grant of exclusive possession for a term at a rent creates a tenancy is consistent with the elevation of a tenancy into an estate in land. The tenant possessing exclusive possession is able to exercise the rights of an owner of land, which is in the real sense his land albeit temporarily and subject to certain restrictions. A tenant armed with exclusive possession can keep out strangers and keep out the landlord unless the landlord is exercising limited rights reserved to him by the tenancy agreement to enter and view and repair. A licensee lacking exclusive possession can in no sense call the land his own and cannot be said to own any estate in the land. The licence does not create an estate in the land to which it relates but only makes an act lawful which would otherwise be unlawful.

On behalf of Mr. Street his counsel, Mr. Goodhart Q.C., relies on recent authorities which, he submits, demonstrate that an occupier granted exclusive possession for a term at a rent may nevertheless be a licensee if, in the words of Slade L.J. in the present case:

> 'there is manifested the clear intention of both parties that the rights granted are to be merely those of a personal right of occupation and not those of a tenant.'[4]

My Lords, there is no doubt that the traditional distinction between a tenancy and a licence of land lay in the grant of land for a term at a rent with exclusive possession. In some cases it was not clear at first sight whether exclusive possession was in fact granted. For example, an owner of land could grant a licence to cut and remove standing timber. Alternatively the owner could grant a tenancy of the land with the right to cut and remove standing timber during the term of the tenancy. The grant of rights relating to standing timber therefore required careful consideration in order to decide whether the grant conferred exclusive possession of the land for a term at a rent and was therefore a tenancy or whether it merely conferred a bare licence to remove the timber [. . .]

4 [1985] 49 P & CR 324, 332.

In the case of residential accommodation there is no difficulty in deciding whether the grant confers exclusive possession. An occupier of residential accommodation at a rent for a term is either a lodger or a tenant. The occupier is a lodger if the landlord provides attendance or services which require the landlord or his servants to exercise unrestricted access to and use of the premises. A lodger is entitled to live in the premises but cannot call the place his own. In Allan v. Liverpool Overseers Blackburn J. said:[5]

> 'A lodger in a house, although he has the exclusive use of rooms in the house, in the sense that nobody else is to be there, and though his goods are stowed there, yet he is not in exclusive occupation in that sense, because the landlord is there for the purpose of being able, as landlords commonly do in the case of lodgings, to have his own servants to look after the house and the furniture, and has retained to himself the occupation, though he has agreed to give the exclusive enjoyment of the occupation to the lodger.'

If on the other hand residential accommodation is granted for a term at a rent with exclusive possession, the landlord providing neither attendance nor services, the grant is a tenancy; any express reservation to the landlord of limited rights to enter and view the state of the premises and to repair and maintain the premises only serves to emphasise the fact that the grantee is entitled to exclusive possession and is a tenant. In the present case it is conceded that Mrs. Mountford is entitled to exclusive possession and is not a lodger. Mr. Street provided neither attendance nor services and only reserved the limited rights of inspection and maintenance and the like set forth in clause 3 of the agreement. On the traditional view of the matter, Mrs. Mountford not being a lodger must be a tenant.

There can be no tenancy unless the occupier enjoys exclusive possession; but an occupier who enjoys exclusive possession is not necessarily a tenant. He may be owner in fee simple, a trespasser, a mortgagee in possession, an object of charity or a service occupier. To constitute a tenancy the occupier must be granted exclusive possession for a fixed or periodic term certain in consideration of a premium or periodical payments. The grant may be express, or may be inferred where the owner accepts weekly or other periodical payments from the occupier.

In the present case, the agreement dated 7 March 1983 professed an intention by both parties to create a licence and their belief that they had in fact created a licence. It was submitted on behalf of Mr. Street that the court cannot in these circumstances decide that the agreement created a tenancy without interfering with the freedom of contract enjoyed by both parties. My Lords, Mr. Street enjoyed freedom to offer Mrs. Mountford the right to occupy the rooms comprised in the agreement on such lawful terms as Mr. Street pleased. Mrs. Mountford enjoyed freedom to negotiate with Mr. Street to obtain different terms. Both parties enjoyed freedom to contract or not to contract and both parties exercised that freedom by contracting on the terms set forth in the written agreement and on no other terms. But the consequences in law of the agreement, once concluded, can only be determined by consideration of the effect of the agreement. If the agreement satisfied all the requirements of a tenancy, then the agreement produced a tenancy and the parties cannot alter the effect of the agreement by insisting that they only created a licence. The manufacture of a five-pronged implement for manual digging results in a fork even if the manufacturer, unfamiliar with the English language, insists that he intended to make and has made a spade.

5 (1874) LR 9 QB 180, 191–2.

It was also submitted that in deciding whether the agreement created a tenancy or a licence, the court should ignore the Rent Acts. If Mr. Street has succeeded, where owners have failed these past 70 years, in driving a coach and horses through the Rent Acts, he must be left to enjoy the benefit of his ingenuity unless and until Parliament intervenes. I accept that the Rent Acts are irrelevant to the problem of determining the legal effect of the rights granted by the agreement. Like the professed intention of the parties, the Rent Acts cannot alter the effect of the agreement.

At 826–7

My Lords, the only intention which is relevant is the intention demonstrated by the agreement to grant exclusive possession for a term at a rent. Sometimes it may be difficult to discover whether, on the true construction of an agreement, exclusive possession is conferred. Sometimes it may appear from the surrounding circumstances that there was no intention to create legal relationships. Sometimes it may appear from the surrounding circumstances that the right to exclusive possession is referable to a legal relationship other than a tenancy. Legal relationships to which the grant of exclusive possession might be referable and which would or might negative the grant of an estate or interest in the land include occupancy under a contract for the sale of the land, occupancy pursuant to a contract of employment or occupancy referable to the holding of an office. But where as in the present case the only circumstances are that residential accommodation is offered and accepted with exclusive possession for a term at a rent, the result is a tenancy.

[. . .] Henceforth the courts which deal with these problems will, save in exceptional circumstances, only be concerned to inquire whether as a result of an agreement relating to residential accommodation the occupier is a lodger or a tenant. In the present case I am satisfied that Mrs. Mountford is a tenant, that the appeal should be allowed, that the order of the Court of Appeal should be set aside and that [Mr Street] should be ordered to pay the costs of [Mrs Mountford] here and below.

In Street v Mountford, Lord Templeman thus set out a seemingly simple test for the existence of a lease: B can only have a lease if he or she has exclusive possession of land for a term (i.e. for a limited period). In the extract above, Lord Templeman does refer to the payment of rent: nothing turned on that in Street itself and, as we will see in section 1.1.2 below, it is now accepted that B can have a lease even if no rent is paid. We will examine the content of a lease and Lord Templeman's test in more detail in section 2 below.

Street also raises the important question of whether and, if so, how the courts' approach to defining a lease has been affected by the fact that various forms of statutory protection are, or have been, available only in cases in which B has a lease. This question may raise the tension between doctrine and utility that we considered in Chapter 1, section 5.2: if B, according to the doctrinal rules does (or does not) have a lease, should a court bend those rules in order to deny (or give) B the statutory protection that depends on B's having a lease? In the extract above, Lord Templeman takes the view that such statutory protection is "irrelevant to the problem of determining the legal effect of the rights granted by the agreement"; but, as we will see, there do seem to be decisions, even involving Lord Templeman himself, in which the judges' reasoning has been influenced by a desire to make statutory protection available to particular occupiers.[6] Indeed, as we will see in section 2.1 below, it has even been argued that the decision in Street itself can only be justified by the practical need to give statutory protection to Mrs Mountford.[7]

[6] One example, which we will discuss in section 2.4 below, is the House of Lords' decision in AG Securities v Vaughan, Antioniades v Villiers [1990] 1 AC 417.

For present purposes, however, the key lesson from Street is a simple one: like Mrs Mountford, B may claim that he or she has a lease in order to show that A is under extra, statutory duties to B. As we will see in Chapter 23, the particular statutory duties imposed by the Rent Act 1977 are now of marginal relevance. Nowadays, a private landlord, such as Mr Street, has very little to fear from a lease: he can grant a party, such as Mrs Mountford, an 'assured shorthold tenancy'—that is, a form of lease that gives rise to no fair rent duties and places no substantial limits on Mr Street's ability to remove the tenant at the end of the agreed period.

Nonetheless, even where private landlords are concerned, there are still some statutory duties that apply if and only if B has a lease. For example, as we will see in Chapter 23, s 11 of the Landlord and Tenant Act 1985 can impose a duty on a private landlord (A) to keep in repair the structure and exterior of a dwelling house occupied by B. This particular statutory duty (which cannot be varied by the express terms of a lease) provides the context for another important House of Lords decision, Bruton v London and Quadrant Housing Trust,[8] which we will consider in detail in Chapter 23, section 3, as well as in section 2.6 of the present chapter. It is important to note here that, in Bruton, the House of Lords held that Mr Bruton had a lease, at least for the purposes of the Landlord and Tenant Act 1985, even though his agreement with A did not give him a property right. The idea that B can have a lease even if he has no property right is a controversial and important one: we will examine it further in Chapter 23, section 3—but we will not consider it in this chapter, because our focus here is on the role of a lease as a property right in land.

Statutory protection continues to be important in residential cases not involving private landlords. As we will see in Chapter 23, if B can show that he or she has a lease from a local authority, the Housing Act 1985 will apply to impose extra duties on that local authority. For example, the statute limits the grounds on which B can be removed and thus confers on a tenant (but not a licensee) a form of security of tenure. And if B has a lease of business premises, Pt II of the Landlord and Tenant Act 1954 may impose a statutory duty on A to renew B's lease when it reaches the end of the initially agreed period. In contrast, if B has only a licence, A is under no such statutory duty.

1.1.2 The effect of a lease on X

We have seen that the distinction between a lease and a licence can be crucial in deciding whether additional statutory duties will be imposed on A. There is a further, more fundamental distinction between a lease and a licence: a lease, unlike a licence, can count as a property right in land.

As we saw in Chapters 4 and 5, the key feature of a property right is that it is capable of binding parties other than A. In particular, if B has a legal estate or interest (such as a legal lease), then the rest of the world is under a prima facie duty not to interfere with B's use of the land. The consequences of such a duty can be seen in the following extract.

[7] See the extract from Hill, 'Intention and the Creation of Proprietary Rights: Are Leases Different?' [1996] LS 200, set out in section 2.1 below.

[8] [2000] 1 AC 406.

Hunter and ors v Canary Wharf Ltd
[1997] AC 665, HL

Facts: Patricia Hunter lived on the Isle of Dogs, in East London. Along with hundreds of other claimants living in that area, she claimed that her television reception had been affected by the construction, on land belonging to Canary Wharf Ltd, of the Canary Wharf Tower.[9] It was claimed that the interference began in 1989, during the construction of the tower, and continued until a relay transmitter was put up in 1991. It seems that the interference was particularly bad in Poplar, to the north of Canary Wharf, as the tower lay between that area and the BBC's Crystal Palace transmitter. It was claimed that, by causing this interference, Canary Wharf Ltd had committed the tort of nuisance. In a separate action, brought against the London Docklands Development Corporation (LDDC), Ms Hunter and the other claimants sought compensation for damage caused by the dust produced by the LDDC in building the Limehouse Link Road. That separate action alleged that LDDC had committed the torts of negligence and nuisance.

The claims raised a number of difficult legal issues, which were tried as preliminary issues of law. By the time that the case reached the House of Lords, two issues remained. In the words of Lord Goff of Chieveley, they were: '(1) whether interference with television reception is capable of constituting an actionable nuisance, and (2) whether it is necessary to have an interest in property to claim in private nuisance and, if so, what interest in property will satisfy this requirement.'[10] The House of Lords held that: (1) interference with television reception, at least when caused by the construction of a building on the defendant's land, cannot amount to a nuisance;[11] and (2) to sue in nuisance, a claimant must have a property right in land, and that property right must give the claimant exclusive possession of land. The claims made by Ms Hunter and other residents of the Isle of Dogs against Canary Wharf Ltd therefore failed. The claims made against LDDC succeeded, but only in relation to those claimants with a right to exclusive possession of land. As we will see in the extracts below, this meant that if Ms Hunter simply had a licence of the land that she occupied as her home, she could not bring a nuisance claim in respect of damage caused by the dust; whereas, if she had a lease of that land, she could do so.

Lord Goff

At 687

The basic position is, in my opinion, most clearly expressed in Professor Newark's classic article on The Boundaries of Nuisance (1949) 65 L.Q.R. 480 when he stated, at p. 482, that the essence of nuisance was that 'it was a tort to land. Or to be more accurate it was a tort directed against the plaintiff's enjoyment of rights over land [. . .]'

[9] Also known by its address, 'One Canada Square', the tower rises 235 m from ground level and remains the tallest completed building in the UK. Taller buildings are, however, under construction: for example, the Shard London Bridge is due to reach a height of 310 m in 2012.

[10] [1997] AC 665, 684.

[11] One issue considered by the House of Lords was whether it is possible for a party to have an easement to receive television signals, and, if so, whether such an easement could be acquired over the passage of time through the doctrine of prescription. This point is examined in Chapter 25, section 3.3.

[Lord Goff then examined the relevant authorities, finding that they supported Newark's view.][12]

At 692–4

It follows that, on the authorities as they stand, an action in private nuisance will only lie at the suit of a person who has a right to the land affected. Ordinarily, such a person can only sue if he has the right to exclusive possession of the land, such as a freeholder or tenant in possession, or even a licensee with exclusive possession. Exceptionally however, as Foster v. Warblington Urban District Council[13] shows, this category may include a person in actual possession who has no right to be there; and in any event a reversioner [e.g. a landlord] can sue in so far his reversionary interest is affected. But a mere licensee on the land has no right to sue.

[...] [A]ny such departure from the established law on this subject, such as that adopted by the Court of Appeal in the present case, faces the problem of defining the category of persons who would have the right to sue. The Court of Appeal adopted the not easily identifiable category of those who have a 'substantial link' with the land, regarding a person who occupied the premises 'as a home' as having a sufficient link for this purpose. But who is to be included in this category? It was plainly intended to include husbands and wives, or partners, and their children, and even other relatives living with them. But is the category also to include the lodger upstairs, or the au pair girl or resident nurse caring for an invalid who makes her home in the house while she works there? If the latter, it seems strange that the category should not extend to include places where people work as well as places where they live, where nuisances such as noise can be just as unpleasant or distracting. In any event, the extension of the tort in this way would transform it from a tort to land into a tort to the person, in which damages could be recovered in respect of something less serious than personal injury and the criteria for liability were founded not upon negligence but upon striking a balance between the interests of neighbours in the use of their land. This is, in my opinion, not an acceptable way in which to develop the law.

Lord Hoffmann

At 702–3

In the dust action it is not disputed that, in principle, activities which cause dust to be deposited on the plaintiff's property can constitute an actionable nuisance. The question raised by the preliminary issue is: who can sue? In order to answer this question, it is necessary to decide what exactly he is suing for. Since these questions are fundamental to the scope of the tort of nuisance, I shall deal with them first.

Up to about 20 years ago, no one would have had the slightest doubt about who could sue. Nuisance is a tort against land, including interests in land such as easements and profits. A plaintiff must therefore have an interest in the land affected by the nuisance... An example of an action for nuisance by a de facto possessor is Foster v. Warblington Urban District Council[14] in which the plaintiff sued the council for discharging sewage so as to pollute his oyster [12] An exception was Khorasandijan v Bush [1993] QB 727, in which the Court of Appeal found that the defendant had committed the tort of nuisance by pestering the claimant with unwelcome telephone calls. In Hunter v Canary Wharf, the House of Lords rejected the nuisance analysis, noting that the need to prevent such behaviour can be met through use of the Protection from Harassment Act 1997, or by holding that the defendant commits a tort when intentionally causing distress: see per Lord Hoffmann at 707.

[13] [1906] 1 KB 648. [14] [1906] 1 KB 648.

ponds on the foreshore. He had some difficulty in proving any title to the soil but Vaughan Williams L.J. said, at pp. 659–660:

> 'But, even if title could not be proved, in my judgment there has been such an occupation of these beds for such a length of time—not that the length of time is really material for this purpose—as would entitle the plaintiff as against the defendants, who have no interest in the foreshore, to sustain this action for the injury which is alleged has been done by the sewage to his oysters so kept in those beds.'

Thus even a possession which is wrongful against the true owner can found an action for trespass or nuisance against someone else: Asher v. Whitlock.[15] In each case, however, the plaintiff (or joint plaintiffs) must be enjoying or asserting exclusive possession of the land: see per Blackburn J. in Allan v. Liverpool Overseers.[16] Exclusive possession distinguishes an occupier who may in due course acquire title under the Limitation Act 1980 from a mere trespasser. It distinguishes a tenant holding a leasehold estate from a mere licensee. Exclusive possession de jure or de facto, now or in the future, is the bedrock of English land law.

The decision of the House of Lords in Hunter v Canary Wharf reveals a point that we examined in Chapter 4, section 1: the key feature of a legal property right is that it imposes a duty on the rest of the world. So, if B has a legal lease of A's land,[17] the rest of the world is under a prima facie duty to B not to interfere with B's use of that land. As a result, B, if he or she has a legal lease, can, for example, bring a nuisance claim against a third party whose activities interfere with B's reasonable enjoyment of the land. In contrast, if B has only a licence to use A's land (even a contractual licence), then, as we saw in Chapter 21, B does not have a right that he or she can assert against a third party later acquiring a right in the land. And, as shown by Hunter v Canary Wharf, if B has only a licence, then the rest of the world is not under a duty to B.

One point in Lord Goff's judgment may seem puzzling: his Lordship stated that a 'licensee with exclusive possession' may be able to sue in nuisance. As we saw in section 1.1.1 above, Street v Mountford establishes the presence of exclusive possession as the key test for the presence of a lease. So it may seem odd that a party can both be a licensee (rather than a tenant) and have exclusive possession. But this problem disappears when we distinguish between two types of exclusive possession. The first type is the form of exclusive possession that matters when considering the test for a lease: it is a right to exclusive possession for a limited period arising as a result of B's agreement with A. If B is a licensee, then he or she will not have such a right. There is, however, also a second form of exclusive possession. Consider a case such as National Provincial Bank v Ainsworth.[18] A has a freehold of a home and lives there with his partner, B. A then moves out, but B remains in occupation. At each stage, B has a licence: certainly, there is no agreement between A and B giving B a right to exclusive possession of the land. But when A moves out, B occupies alone and so assumes sole factual

15 (1865) LR 1 QB 1. 16 (1874) LR 9 QB 180.

17 An interesting question arises where B has an equitable lease rather than a legal lease. As noted in Chapter 5, section 7, it seems that equitable interests, whilst they can bind a third party who later acquires a right in the affected land, do not generally impose a duty on the rest of the world (although note the discussion there of the Court of Appeal's decision in Shell UK (Ltd) v Total UK (Ltd) [2010] 3 All ER 793). If so, this suggests that a party with an equitable lease cannot bring a nuisance claim. In Hunter v Canary Wharf, however, Lord Hoffmann does make the contrary (but obiter) suggestion (at 708) that a party with an equitable interest under a trust of a family home can bring a nuisance claim.

18 [1965] AC 1175. See Chapter 1, section 5, and Chapter 4, section 5.4.

control of the land. At that point, B acquires the second type of exclusive possession: a right to exclusive possession arising as a result of B's conduct in having sole physical control of land. As we saw in Chapter 21, sections 2.2 and 3.2, B's factual control of the land then means that third parties come under a duty to B. That duty arises because, as we saw in Chapter 8, section 3, the fact of B's exclusive physical control gives B a legal estate in land: a freehold.[19]

In such a case, B's freehold is the same type of right as held by the claimant in Foster v Warblington Urban District Council[20] (referred to by Lords Goff and Hoffmann in the extract above). It is not given to B by A, but is instead acquired independently (see Chapter 4, section 4, for discussion of the concept of independent acquisition).[21] This means that, once A leaves and B takes sole physical control of the land, B not only has a licence (arising as a result of A's permission for B to remain on the land), but also a legal freehold (arising as a result of B's physical control of the land). It is in such a case that B, in Lord Goff's words, is a 'licensee with exclusive possession'. B's ability to sue in nuisance thus comes from his or her legal freehold, not from his or her licence.

1.1.3 The effect of a lease on C

When considering B's position as against C (a party who later acquires a right in relation to A's land), it is again vital to bear in mind the key difference between a lease and a licence—that is, that the licence, unlike the lease, can count as a property right in land. So, as we saw in Chapter 5, section 7, an equitable lease, as well as a legal lease, is capable of binding a third party, such as C, who later acquires a right from A.

1.2 THE PRACTICAL IMPORTANCE AND DIVERSITY OF LEASES

Leases are tremendously important in a number of different practical contexts. There is, of course, the residential sector: for many residents, a lease is the property right they hold in the land they call their home. When considering the residential sector, a number of subdivisions can be made. For example, long residential leases are often isolated as a specific category: certainly, there is a clear practical distinction between, on the one hand, a party with a 999-year lease of a flat who acquired that lease by paying a large up-front price and then pays a very small rent, and, on the other, a party with a weekly, monthly, or yearly tenancy of a flat, who pays a regular market rent. Around 30 per cent of homes in the United Kingdom are leased in this second way.[22] Those shorter leases can be divided into three groups, roughly equal in terms of numbers, according to the nature of the landlord: private, local authority, or social (e.g. housing association). As we will see in Chapter 23, the statutory rules applying to private landlords (such as Mr Street) are very different from those applying to public landlords, such as local authorities or housing associations.

[19] We noted in Chapter 8, section 3, that there is some academic doubt as to whether B's property right is legal or equitable, but, as we saw there, the cases strongly favour the view that B has a legal freehold.

[20] [1906] 1 KB 648.

[21] Because B's freehold is independently acquired, it arises after A's legal estate and so A (or C, a party later acquiring a right from A) can, of course, remove B from the land (see Chapter 12, section 2, for the importance of timing when considering conflicting property rights). Of course, if B has a defence to A or C's prior property right, then B will be protected (such a defence could be based, for example, on B's long possession of the land: see Chapter 8).

[22] Wilcox and Pawson (eds) UK Housing Review 2010/11, Table 17d.

But it would be a mistake to focus solely on the residential sector. Leases are also very important in other areas: for example, many businesses hold leases of their premises; and many farmers hold leases of their agricultural land. Again, as we will see in Chapter 23, statute has intervened in those areas to give some extra protection to business and agricultural tenants.

The following extract emphasizes the importance and diversity of leases. As demonstrated by the extract, a number of different terms can be used to describe a party with a lease: 'tenant', 'lessee', etc.; the party granting a lease can be referred to as a 'landlord', or 'lessor'; and the property right retained by the landlord or lessor is referred to as a 'reversion', on the basis that, at the end of the lease, a right to exclusive possession of the land goes back to the landlord.

Bright, Landlord and Tenant Law in Context (2007, pp 5–6)

The variety of letting arrangements

There is a wide variety within the landlord and tenant relationship. A lease of a house is likely to be very different from a lease of a department store. A tenant who rents a house in order to let out individual rooms to others has quite a different perspective from a tenant renting the house to provide a home for his family. Some tenancies may be intended to last for only a short period, such as a let of holiday accommodation, and some may be for extremely long periods, such as a 999 year lease. Some may be granted in return for a substantial capital payment (known as a premium) and only a nominal rent, others for no premium but for a market rent. Some landlords are motivated primarily by financial considerations, others by social concerns.

It is important to have an overview of how leases are used in practice as different types of lease raise very different legal issues. The student renting a room for the year would, for example, rightly expect the landlord to be responsible for solving the problem of a leaking roof. In contrast, the commercial tenant with a 125 year lease of an entire building would usually be responsible for the maintenance and repair of the property itself. For the landlord, also, the length of the lease will affect its expectations; with a short lease the freehold (or reversion) has a high capital value and so the landlord may take an active role in managing the property in order to preserve this capital value, but with very long term leases the capital value of the reversion will be minimal, and so the landlord may show less interest in managing the property.

At the risk of over-generalisation, there are three broad categories of lease that can be identified based on the length of the lease. The expectations of landlords and tenants in terms of what the relationship provides will differ according to which category the lease comes within. First, there are tenancies for short term occupation which usually involve the payment of a market rent and will be either periodic (weekly, monthly or annual) or for a fixed term up to five years (commercial) or seven years (residential). The tenant pays for occupation and exclusive possession for the term, while the landlord's reversion retains all, or nearly all, of the capital value of the property. Second, medium term leases are generally used to provide occupation for the tenant for up to, say, 25 years for commercial leases and 21 years for residential leases. Again, these leases will usually be at a market rent, with provision for the rent to be reviewed at regular intervals. A premium (a capital sum) may be paid for the grant of the lease, but this would be unusual. The reversion again continues to have a substantial value. In the last category, long leases, there is a greater divergence between the commercial and residential models. The longer commercial lease, typically, for a term of 125 years, may involve the payment of a 'ground rent', that is, a market rent that reflects the value of the land only (the site value). In this arrangement, the lessee will often construct the buildings on the site, and the cost of doing so will be written off over the life of the lease, with the expectation that the building's useful life will draw to an end as the lease does. Notwithstanding the length of the lease, the reversion will carry a significant capital value because of the substantial and reviewable ground rent. In contrast, the long residential lease is typically granted for terms of 99, 125 or 999 years and a substantial premium will be paid to purchase this interest, similar to the amount that would be paid to buy a freehold interest. Here, it is the lease that will have a significant capital value, rather than the reversion. Indeed, the leaseholder will usually perceive of himself as the 'owner' of the property, as a purchaser rather than a renter or tenant. The lease is primarily being used in this context because it enables covenants, such as obligations to repair and financial commitments to contribute towards the cost of shared facilities, to be enforced against successive owners (English common law does not permit positive covenants to be attached to freehold land).

The rights and responsibilities of the landlord and tenant will be most affected by the type of letting, whether it is short term rented housing, a home purchased on a long lease, commercial property or agricultural land. Within these main divisions, there will be further differentiation according to the status of the landlord.

This passage also sets out some of the reasons why a party may acquire a lease, rather than a freehold. In Chapter 27, section 1, we will examine why a party buying a flat will almost always acquire a long lease of that flat rather than a freehold: as explained by Bright, the key point is that, if a lease is used, the 'owner' of each flat can take the benefit and burden of positive duties (such as duties to keep the flat in good repair).[23] In Chapter 27, we will also examine the concept of a commonhold—that is, a mechanism introduced with the aim of allowing such duties to bind flat 'owners' without the necessity for each such owner to have a lease of his or her flat.

In other cases, the key attraction of a lease is often that it involves a shorter commitment: for example, if moving to a town to study there for three years, B has no need to incur the extra expense necessary in acquiring a freehold. Similarly, if B is starting up a business and is unsure of its long-term prospects, a freehold is an unattractive option. In some cases, however, B may wish to establish a long-term home, but be unable to find the finance needed to acquire a freehold. In such cases, financial necessity may lead B to acquire a shorter residential lease. There is a risk in such cases that B's need for a home, and relatively weak bargaining position, may give A an opportunity to exploit B. As we saw in section 1.1.1 above, this has led to statutory intervention in B's favour: we will consider that intervention further in Chapter 23.

1.3 THE LANDLORD–TENANT RELATIONSHIP

As is made clear by the decision of the House of Lords in Street v Mountford, an agreement can only count as a lease if it gives B a right to exclusive possession of land for a limited period. As we saw in sections 1.1.2 and 1.1.3 above, once A has given B that core right, third parties can then also come under a duty, during that period, not to interfere with B's right to exclusive possession. In practice, of course, a standard lease agreement will generally include many other terms, imposing additional duties on A (e.g. duties to undertake major repairs), as well as duties on B (e.g. a duty to pay rent). And, in certain circumstances, those additional duties can also affect third parties: for example, it may be that, if A owns other, neighbouring land, he or she will make a binding promise to B not to use that other land in a particular way (e.g. not to build on that land, not to run a business on that land that will compete with the business B plans to operate from the leased premises, etc.). In such a case, A's promise can give B an equitable interest in A's other land: a restrictive covenant (see Chapter 26). Like any equitable interest, that restrictive covenant will be capable of binding C, a third party who later acquires a right in A's other land.

[23] Note that, as we will see in Chapter 26, the Law Commission has recently proposed that the law should be changed to allow for the possibility of attaching some positive covenants to freehold land.

There is a further, important way in which third parties can be affected by the additional duties assumed by A or B in a lease agreement: if the contractual promise giving rise to the duty counts as a 'leasehold covenant', it can bind other parties who later step into the shoes of A or B, and thereby also enter a landlord–tenant relationship. For example, it may be possible for B to assign (i.e. to transfer) his or her lease to another party (B2). In such a case, B's contractual promise to pay A rent will bind B2. If A then transfers his or her reversion (i.e. A's legal estate) to A2, then B2 will be under a duty to pay rent to A2; and, due to the promise to repair made by A in the initial lease, A2 will be under a duty to B2 to do such repairs. In this way, later parties who step into the landlord–tenant relationship will also take the benefit and burden of at least some of the additional duties originally agreed to by A and B. A key question, of course, is which of those additional duties should be seen as part of the landlord–tenant relationship, and thus capable of benefiting and binding later parties. We will consider that question, and others, in Chapter 24, when looking in detail at leasehold covenants.[24]

2 THE CONTENT QUESTION

In this chapter, our focus is on the lease as a property right. In Chapter 1, section 3, we saw that there are three key questions when considering property rights. The first of these, the content question, focuses on the nature of B's right to use land. Section 1 of the Law of Property Act 1925 (LPA 1925) makes clear that a lease, referred to there as a 'term of years absolute', can count as a legal estate in land. But how do we tell if an agreement made between A and B, under which B has a right to occupy A's land, counts as a lease? The basic test, as we saw in section 1.1.1 above, was set out by Lord Templeman in Street v Mountford:[25]a lease consists of a right to exclusive possession of land for a limited period. There are, however, a number of specific points to consider when applying that general test.

2.1 WHERE A DOES NOT INTEND TO GRANT B LEASE

The first question to ask is whether B's right can count as a lease even if A, when making the agreement with B, makes it clear that he or she does not intend to grant B a lease. As we saw in section 1.1.1 above, that question was answered by the House of Lords in Street v

[24] In that chapter, the party here referred to as 'B2' (i.e. the party acquiring B's lease) is referred to as 'TA' (i.e. tenant's assignee). Similarly, 'A2' (i.e. the party acquiring A's estate) is referred to as 'LA' (i.e. landlord's assignee).

[25] [1985] AC 809.

Mountford: A's lack of intention to grant B a lease does not necessarily prevent B's right from counting as a lease.

As evidenced by the following extract, this result came as a surprise to Mr Street.

Street, 'Coach and Horses Trip Cancelled? Rent Act Avoidance after Street v Mountford' [1985] Conv 328, 328–9

The Rent Acts are grossly unfair to landlords. A stranger obtains a weekly tenancy of a house: half a century may pass before the owner can have his property again. In the meantime he can only charge a so-called 'fair' rent which in many cases does little more than cover the cost of keeping the property in repair. As a result of all this the capital value of the property drops to between one-third and one-half of its vacant possession value. Little wonder that over the years landlords and their legal advisers have sought various ways of avoiding the potentially horrendous consequences of being caught by the legislation [. . .]

In Street v. Mountford the plaintiff was—in the eyes of some—a double rogue, a landlord and a lawyer. He had studied the Court of Appeal decisions of the late 1970s which appeared to confirm a shift of emphasis from status to contract. The traditional view had been that exclusive possession meant a tenancy had been created (subject to one or two well-recognised exceptions), but the approach in the more recent cases suggested the ultimate test was one of intention. Lord Denning's judgments in particular seemed to show this development very clearly. By 1977 he felt able to say:

> 'What is the test to see whether the occupier of one room in a house is a tenant or a licensee? It does not depend on whether he or she has exclusive possession or not [. . .] [The test is] Was it intended that the occupier should have a stake in the room or did he have only permission for himself personally to occupy the room, whether under a contract or not, in which case he is a licensee?'

In 1979 the writer decided to take the Court of Appeal at its word and drafted a document, using the simplest possible terms, expressed to be a personal non-assignable licence. A declaration was appended to underline the fact that it was not the intention of the parties to create a tenancy, which would be protected by the Rent Acts. No attempt was made to avoid granting the licensee exclusive possession, as this was not seen as the dominant factor. The document was to mean what it said, the licensee was to have an exclusive right to occupy a room, but this would be revocable on notice and would be outside the scope of the statutory protection afforded to tenants. The writer employed the document from 1979 to 1983 with no problems arising [. . .]

[When the case came to the Court of Appeal] Slade LJ stated:

> 'Having regard to the form of the document and the declaration at the foot of it, I do not see how [Mr Street] could have made much clearer his intention that what was being offered to [Mrs Mountford] was a mere licence to occupy and not an interest in the premises as tenant. And I do not see how [Mrs Mountford] could have made clearer her acceptance of that offer than by her two signatures.'

The House of Lords unanimously reversed this decision [. . .] Lord Templeman's judgment, with which Lords Scarman, Keith, Bridge and Brightman concurred, turned the clock back more than a quarter of a century, and in doing so expressly disapproved of a number of decisions in recent years. The ancient wisdom is reinstated: save in exceptional 'special category' cases (e.g. master and service occupier, vendor and purchaser) the grant of exclusive possession for a fixed or periodic term in consideration of periodic payments will create a tenancy.

It is, of course, rare to see an article about a reported decision written by one of the very parties to that decision. There is, of course, a question about the writer's objectivity—but Roger Street is certainly correct in pointing out that, prior to the decision of the House of Lords in Street, the Court of Appeal had developed a rule that, if A did not intend to grant B a lease, no lease would arise. The question is whether the House of Lords had good reason to depart from that rule.

As noted in Chapter 1, section 5.2, we can approach this question from the perspective of doctrine, or from the perspective of utility. The following extract argues that the House of Lords' approach in Street v Mountford can be justified only from the latter perspective.

Hill, 'Intention and the Creation of Proprietary Rights: Are Leases Different?' [1996] LS 200

To what extent can the parties effectively deny proprietary effect to an interest which, in terms of its characteristics and in terms of the rights and obligations of the parties inter se, has the appearances of an interest to which the law grants proprietary consequences? To what extent can [A] grant to [B] an interest which has the substance of a proprietary interest but determine that the agreement is purely personal to the parties?

There is a group of authorities which suggest that an interest which has the substantive characteristics of a proprietary interest will, nevertheless, not be binding on a purchaser of the property to which the interest relates if there is a sufficient indication that the parties to the transaction which establishes the interest intended to create only personal rights. Perhaps the clearest authority is IDC Group v Clark, which concerns the boundary between easements and contractual licences. In this case [A] and [B] were the owners of adjoining buildings. By means of a formal document [A] granted [B] the right to make an opening in a party wall so as to create a fire escape from B's property. Subsequently C acquired a lease of A's property and B2 acquired the other building from B. When the fire escape was blocked off, B2 sought to enforce against C the right granted to B by A. B2 attempted to rely on the fact that the right being claimed was in the nature of an easement which was binding on A's successors in title. C, however, argued that because in the original transaction between A and B the parties had used the words 'grant licence' the right conferred on B was in the nature of a personal licence, the burden of which did not pass.

Although the right granted by A was capable of being the subject-matter of an easement, the Court of Appeal thought that, in view of the fact that 'the simple expression "grant licence" is not one which would have been used by a conveyancer of any experience as the means of creating an easement', the grantor 'intended to grant a licence properly so called and no more.'[26] the court held that the deed created only a personal licence, the burden of which was not binding on C [. . .]

[Hill then goes on to examine a number of other cases in which A's intention, expressed in an agreement with B, is effective to ensure that B's right, whilst matching the content of a particular legal or equitable property right, takes effect only as a personal right against A.]

The pattern of authorities supports the view that as a general rule the parties to an agreement may render personal rights which, in the normal course of events, would have proprietary consequences. An exception exists, however, with regard to leases. Can the exception be explained or justified?

[Hill then notes that, prior to Street v Mountford, the Court of Appeal had developed the rule that A's intention not to grant a lease could prevent B from acquiring a property right, even if the agreement between A and B gave B a right to exclusive possession for a term.]

[26] Per Nourse LJ at 183–4.

> [. . .] This is not to deny the validity of the courts' intervention in Street v Mountford or the desirability of the result achieved. The point is rather that the true rationale underlying the decision is to some extent obscured by Lord Templeman's assertion that 'the Rent Acts must not be allowed to alter or influence the construction of an agreement.'[27]
>
> The context in which the distinction between leases and licences has been most relevant is the private sector of the housing market. In Street v Mountford the statement in the agreement between the parties that the occupier was a licensee rather than a tenant was not motivated by any desire to ensure that the occupier's interest would not be binding on any subsequent purchaser of the land; it was an attempt to avoid the statutory controls contained in the Rent Acts. In a market in which there is a severe shortage of residential accommodation for rent, the prospective occupier is in a very weak bargaining position vis-à-vis the owner. It is often the case that the prospective occupiers of residential property are desperate to find somewhere to live and have no knowledge of the scope of the protective legislation [. . .]
>
> [T]he most honest approach to the lease/licence distinction would be for the courts to recognise more explicitly the basis of their intervention. Unless external factors suggest that the parties' expressed wished should be overridden, there is no reason why an agreement which confers exclusive possession for a term at a rent should not take effect as a licence if that is what the parties intend to create. Where a transaction is freely entered into on the basis of commercial considerations there is no justification for the law's disregard of the parties' intentions.
>
> However, where there is inequality between the parties—as is the case in the private sector of the housing market—the law is entitled to look behind the form of the agreement [. . .] It is widely recognised that '[f]reedom of contract [. . .] is a particularly inappropriate model when dealing with the consumer as a contracting party.' Accordingly, it seems reasonable to look at the lease/licence distinction from the consumer law perspective rather than purely as an aspect of the law relating to real property.

Hill makes the very important point that, as shown by the decision of the Court of Appeal in IDC Group v Clark,[28] there are other areas of land law in which A is permitted to give B a personal right that matches the content of a recognized property right (such as an easement). His argument is that the same general, doctrinal approach had been applied to leases by the Court of Appeal, but that such an approach was inappropriate for dealing with the special problems caused by residential occupation. So, in Street v Mountford, the House of Lords created a special exception to that general approach, departing from doctrine to uphold a policy of protecting vulnerable residential occupiers.

The next extract takes a different approach. It argues that there are sound doctrinal reasons for treating leases as different from other forms of property right, such as easements. On this view, the decision in Street v Mountford can be justified from a doctrinal perspective, as well as from a utility perspective.

McFarlane, The Structure of Property Law (2008, pp 661–2)

> If the rights given by A to B entitle B to exclusive control of the land for a limited period then, providing he satisfies the acquisition question, B will have a Lease. This is the case even if A did not intend to give B a Lease. A's intention is of course crucial when we ask the first question: what rights does the agreement give to B? However, A's intention is irrelevant when we ask the second question: do the rights given to B amount to a Lease? There are two points here. First, it is for the land law system, not A, to define a Lease. That point is not specific to property law. For example, let's say A makes an oral promise to give B £100 in two weeks' time. A and B both call the promise "a contract" and intend it to be binding. However, it does not give B a contractual right against A: no consideration has been provided by B. As the law's test for a contract has not been satisfied, A and B's intention to have a contract is irrelevant.

[27] [1985] AC 809, 825. [28] (1992) 65 P & CR 179.

The second point that it is simply not possible for A both to (i) give B a right to exclusive control of a thing; and (ii) to deny that B has a property right. This point is specific to property law. It shows that (i) if A gives B a right to exclusive control of a thing; then (ii) A's intention to give B only a personal right is irrelevant. Of course, this does not mean A is trapped into giving B a Lease. If A is keen to ensure that B does not acquire a Lease, A simply needs to ensure that the rights he gives B under agreement do not amount to a right to exclusive control.

We can draw an analogy with cooking. A can choose his own ingredients when cooking: his intention is therefore crucial to what he produces. But if A chooses to (i) mix together flour, eggs, sugar, butter and baking powder; and (ii) put the mixture in a tin and heat it in the oven; then (iii) whether he likes it or not, A makes a cake. It does not matter that A intended to make a casserole: he is judged by what he produces and he has produced a cake. If A wants to make a casserole, the solution is simple: he needs to choose the right ingredients.

[...] [The decision of the House of Lords in Street v Mountford] might seem to be an example of a court bending the rules to thwart A's unscrupulous attempt to avoid giving B the statutory protection available under the Rent Acts. However, the decision is perfectly correct as a matter of doctrine: it is conceptually impossible for A to give B a right to exclusive control for a limited period and then to claim that B has only a licence.

On the view taken in this extract, the decision of the House of Lords in Street returns to the traditional, doctrinal position that, if A's agreement with B gives B a right to exclusive possession, B can acquire a lease even if A does not intend to give B a property right. Indeed, on this view, it was the Court of Appeal, in cases prior to Street, which departed from doctrine in order to uphold a policy: a policy of allowing owners of land to escape the onerous statutory duties imposed by giving an occupier a lease.[29]

2.2 INTENTION TO CREATE LEGAL RELATIONS

To have a lease, B must show he or she has been given a right to exclusive possession. If A and B make an agreement allowing B to occupy A's land, but that agreement is not intended to be legally binding, then A has not given B such a right. This flows from the general rule of contract law: as Treitel has put it,[30] 'An agreement, though supported by consideration, is not binding as a contract if it was made without any intention of creating relations'. For example, in Booker v Palmer,[31] Mr Palmer agreed with a friend that an evacuee could occupy a cottage owned by Mr Palmer. The Court of Appeal found that the evacuee did not have a lease: the [29] Certainly, Lord Denning MR openly admitted that the Court of Appeal's approach was affected by the statutory regime: see Cobb v Lane [1952] 1 TLR 1037, 1041; Marcroft Wagons v Smith [1051] 2 KB 496. See also Marchant v Charters [1977] 1 WLR 1181, 1184. See also Chapter 21, section 3.3.2.

[30] Treitel's Law of Contract (12th edn, ed Peel, 2007), [4–001].

[31] [1942] 2 All ER 674, CA.

informal agreement, under which Mr Palmer received no rent, was not intended to create legal rights. Lord Greene MR stated:[32] 'There is one golden rule which is of very general application, namely, that the law does not impute intention to enter into legal relationships where the circumstances and the conduct of the parties negative any intention of the kind.'

This requirement for a lease is entirely consistent with doctrine: it is simply a requirement for the creation of contractual rights. As has been noted in other contexts, however, there is scope for the courts to manipulate that requirement:[33] so, if a court wishes to hold, for a particular policy reason, that B does not have a lease, it may then be inclined to find, as a matter of fact, that the agreement between A and B was not intended to create legal relations. Certainly, in Street v Mountford, Lord Templeman makes a very flexible use of the concept when attempting to explain the results of past cases in which B was found to have no lease.[34]

It is worth noting here that, provided the parties do intend to create legal relations, a lease can exist even if B has no duty to pay rent to A. As was noted in section 1.2 above, a long lease may be granted for a premium (a substantial one-off payment); and there seems to be no reason why a lease, like any other form of property right, cannot be granted by A to B for free. It is true that there are points in Street v Mountford where Lord Templeman refers to a lease as involving 'the grant of exclusive possession for a term at a rent.'[35] In that case, however, there was no issue as to whether rent was a requirement of a lease. Further, s 205(1)(xxvii) of the LPA 1925, defines a 'term of years absolute' (the phrase used to refer to a lease in s 1 of that Act) as a 'term of years (taking effect in possession or in reversion whether or not at a rent) . . .'. As a result, in Ashburn Anstalt v Arnold,[36] the Court of Appeal confirmed that B's right may count as a lease even if B is under no duty to pay rent.

2.3 A RIGHT TO EXCLUSIVE POSSESSION: GENERAL POSITION

Where A and B's agreement does create contractual rights, it is necessary to see if its terms give B a right to exclusive possession of the land: in the absence of such a right, B cannot have a lease. As we have seen, in Street v Mountford, Lord Templeman was confident that the exclusive possession test would be simple to apply in residential cases.

Street v Mountford
[1985] AC 809, HL

Lord Templeman

At 817–18

In the case of residential accommodation there is no difficulty in deciding whether the grant confers exclusive possession. An occupier of residential accommodation at a rent for a term is either a lodger or a tenant. The occupier is a lodger if the landlord provides attendance or services which require the landlord or his servants to exercise unrestricted access to and use of the premises. A lodger is entitled to live in the premises but cannot call the place his own.

[32] Ibid, p 676. [33] See Hepple, 'Intention to Create Legal Relations' (1970) 28 CLJ 122.

[34] For example, Bright, Landlord and Tenant in Context (2007, p 69) notes that: 'In Street v Mountford Lord Templeman explained the finding of no tenancy in Marcroft Wagons [v Smith [1951] 2 KB 496, CA] as being due to the fact that the parties did not intend to contract at all.'

[35] See [1985] 1 AC 809, 816. [36] [1989] Ch 1.

As explained by Lord Templeman, a right to exclusive possession is synonymous with ownership for a limited period: at one point in Street, his Lordship states: 'The tenant possessing exclusive possession is able to exercise the rights of an owner of land, which is in the real sense his land albeit temporarily and subject to certain restrictions.'[37]

As we noted in Chapter 4, section 3.2, this analysis supports the view of Harris[38] that the concept of ownership is vital to understanding the content of the two legal estates in land permitted by s 1 of the LPA 1925: the freehold and the lease. According to Harris, a key aspect of any ownership interest is that it gives its holder an open-ended set of use privileges and control powers in relation to a resource.

As the following extract shows, that analysis seems to be reflected in the test for a lease: if the agreement between A and B gives B only a limited set of rights, then B cannot have a lease.[39]

Westminster City Council v Clarke
[1992] 2 AC 288, HL

Facts: Westminster City Council owned the Cambridge Street Hostel, Cambridge Street, London. Mr Clarke occupied Room 133E. He was provided with that room under an agreement with the council. The agreement was headed 'Licence to occupy'. It stated that Mr Clarke was permitted 'to occupy in common with the council and any other persons to whom the same right is granted accommodation at the single persons hostel at 131–137, Cambridge Street, S.W.1 in the City of Westminster'. The first clause of the agreement stated:

> This licence does not give you and is not intended to give you any of the rights or to impose upon you any of the obligations of a tenant nor does it give you the right of exclusive occupation of any particular accommodation or room which may be allotted to you or which you may be allowed to use nor does it create the relationship of landlord and tenant. The accommodation allotted to you may be changed from time to time without notice as the council directs and you may be required to share such accommodation with any other person as required by the council.

Following complaints by other residents of the hostel, the council sought to remove Mr Clarke. Mr Clarke argued that his agreement gave him a lease, that he therefore had a secure tenancy under Part IV of the Housing Act 1985, and that the council could therefore only remove him if one of the grounds permitted by the Housing Act applied. Mr Clarke's argument failed at first instance, but was accepted by the Court of Appeal. The council then appealed successfully to the House of Lords, who found that Mr Clarke did not have a lease.

Lord Templeman

At 296

The council own a terrace of houses 131–137, Cambridge Street. The premises are used by the council as a hostel. There are 31 single rooms each with a bed and limited cooking [37] [1985] AC 809, 816. [38] Harris, Property and Justice (1996), pp 72–3. See Chapter 4, section 2.

[39] See too Hunts Refuse Disposals Ltd v Norfolk Environmental Waste Services Ltd [1997] 1 EGLR 16, CA.

facilities. There was originally a common room which has since been vandalised. The occupiers of the hostel are homeless single men, including men with personality disorders or physical disabilities, sometimes eccentric, sometimes frail, sometimes evicted from domestic accommodation or discharged from hospital or from prison. Experience has shown the possibility that the hostel may have to cope with an occupier who is suicidal or alcoholic or addicted to drugs. There is a warden supported by a resettlement team of social workers. The hope is that after a period of rehabilitation and supervision in the hostel, each occupier will be able to move on to permanent accommodation where he will be independent and look after himself. In the case of Mr. Clarke, the hostel was designed to be a halfway house for rehabilitation and treatment en route to an independent home [. . .]

At 300–2

The question is whether upon the true construction of the licence to occupy and in the circumstances in which Mr. Clarke was allowed to occupy room E, there was a grant by the council to Mr. Clarke of exclusive possession of room E.

From the point of view of the council the grant of exclusive possession would be inconsistent with the purposes for which the council provided the accommodation at Cambridge Street. It was in the interests of Mr. Clarke and each of the occupiers of the hostel that the council should retain possession of each room. If one room became uninhabitable another room could be shared between two occupiers. If one room became unsuitable for an occupier he could be moved elsewhere. If the occupier of one room became a nuisance he could be compelled to move to another room where his actions might be less troublesome to his neighbours. If the occupier of a room had exclusive possession he could prevent the council from entering the room save for the purpose of protecting the council's interests and not for the purpose of supervising and controlling the conduct of the occupier in his interests. If the occupier of a room had exclusive possession he could not be obliged to comply with the terms and the conditions of occupation. Mr. Clarke could not, for example, be obliged to comply with the directions of the warden or to exclude visitors or to comply with any of the other conditions of occupation which are designed to help Mr. Clarke and the other occupiers of the hostel and to enable the hostel to be conducted in an efficient and harmonious manner. The only remedy of the council for breaches of the conditions of occupation would be the lengthy and uncertain procedure required by the [Housing Act 1985] to be operated for the purpose of obtaining possession from a secure tenant. In the circumstances of the present case I consider that the council legitimately and effectively retained for themselves possession of room E and that Mr. Clarke was only a licensee with rights corresponding to the rights of a lodger. In reaching this conclusion I take into account the object of the council, namely the provision of accommodation for vulnerable homeless persons, the necessity for the council to retain possession of all the rooms in order to make and administer arrangements for the suitable accommodation of all the occupiers and the need for the council to retain possession of every room not only in the interests of the council as the owners of the terrace but also for the purpose of providing for the occupiers supervision and assistance. For many obvious reasons it was highly undesirable for the council to grant to any occupier of a room exclusive possession which obstructed the use by the council of all the rooms of the hostel in the interests of every occupier. By the terms of the licence to occupy Mr. Clarke was not entitled to any particular room, he could be required to share with any other person as required by the council and he was only entitled to "occupy accommodation in common with the council whose representative may enter the accommodation at any time." It is accepted that these provisions of the licence to occupy were inserted to enable the council to discharge its responsibilities to the vulnerable persons accommodated at the Cambridge Street terrace > and were not inserted for the purpose of enabling the council to avoid the creation of a secure tenancy. The conditions of occupancy support the view that Mr. Clarke was not in exclusive occupation of room E. He was expressly limited in his enjoyment of any accommodation provided for him. He was forbidden to entertain visitors without the approval of the council staff and was bound to comply with the council's warden or other staff in charge of the hostel. These limitations confirmed that the council retained possession of all the rooms of the hostel in order to supervise and control the activities of the occupiers, including Mr. Clarke. Although Mr. Clarke physically occupied room E he did not enjoy possession exclusively of the council.

>
> This is a very special case which depends on the peculiar nature of the hostel maintained by the council, the use of the hostel by the council, the totality, immediacy, and objectives of the powers exercisable by the council and the restrictions imposed on Mr. Clarke. The decision in this case will not allow a landlord, private or public, to free himself from the Rent Acts or from the restrictions of a secure tenancy merely by adopting or adapting the language of the licence to occupy. The provisions of the licence to occupy and the circumstances in which that licence was granted and continued lead to the conclusion that Mr. Clarke has never enjoyed that exclusive possession which he claims. I would therefore allow the appeal and restore the order for possession made by the trial judge.

The decision in Westminster City Council provides an interesting contrast with that in Street v Mountford, not least because, in each case, Lord Templeman provides the only reasoned speech. Again, there is a question of whether the decision is best viewed from the perspective of doctrine or utility. From the latter point of view, there is no doubt that the different context of Westminster City Council may have influenced their Lordships: there certainly seems to be more sympathy for the objectives of the council than for those of Mr Street. But there is also an important doctrinal difference between the two cases: in Street v Mountford, Mr Street (as he admits in the extract in section 2.1 above) quite readily gave Mrs Mountford a right to exclusive possession; in contrast, in Westminster City Council, the council was careful not to give Mr Clarke such a right. The contextual factors identified by Lord Templeman explain why the council chose not to give Mr Clarke a right to exclusive possession—but from a doctrinal perspective, the only relevant point is the fact that no such right was granted.

2.4 A RIGHT TO EXCLUSIVE POSSESSION: SHAMS AND PRETENCES

The comparison between Street v Mountford, on the one hand, and Westminster City Council v Clarke, on the other, gives rise to a further question: if a party such as Mr Street wishes to avoid granting an occupier a lease, can he simply insert a term in the agreement that denies the occupier a right to exclusive possession? The first point to remember, noted in section 1.1.1 above, is that a private landlord no longer has any real need to avoid granting a lease: he can simply grant an 'assured shorthold tenancy'—that is, a form of lease that gives the tenant only trifling statutory protection.

Under the previous statutory regimes, however, private landlords did, indeed, react to Street by inserting terms for the purpose of denying an occupier exclusive possession. As the next extract shows, that tactic was not always successful: in some cases, courts showed themselves to be willing, when asking if the agreement gave B a right to exclusive possession, to disregard particular terms inserted with the purpose of denying B such a right.

AG Securities v Vaughan and ors; Antoniades v Villiers and anor
[1990] 1 AC 417, HL

Facts: Two separate appeals were heard together by the House of Lords. In the first case, AG Securities (an unlimited company) had a long lease of a flat: No 25 Linden Mansions, Hornsey Lane, London. That flat had four bedrooms, as well as communal areas, and it was rented out to four occupiers: Nigel Vaughan and three others. The four had not moved in as a group: each moved in as and when a former occupier left and a room became available. Mr Vaughan had arrived in 1982; two of the other occupiers, in 1984; the fourth occupier, in 1985. In May 1985, AG Securities attempted to terminate the occupation of the four. The four claimed that, acting together, they jointly held a lease, arising from the terms of their agreements with AG Securities, and therefore qualified for statutory protection. AG Securities sought a declaration that the occupiers each had an individual licence. The first instance judge granted that declaration, but the Court of Appeal (Sir George Waller dissenting) held that the occupiers, acting jointly, had a lease. The House of Lords upheld AG Securities' appeal, holding that the occupiers were, indeed, licensees.

In the second case, Mr Antoniades had a long lease of the top flat at No 6, Whiteley Road, Upper Norwood, London. That flat had a bedroom, a room described as a bed–sitting room, a kitchen, and a bathroom. It was rented out to two occupiers: Mr Villiers and Miss Bridger. They were a couple and moved in together, signing separate, but identical, agreements with Mr Antoniades on the same day: 9 February 1985. Each agreement contained a term (Clause 16) stating that: 'The licensor shall be entitled at any time to use the rooms together with the licensee and permit other persons to use all of the rooms together with the licensee.' In 1986, Mr Antoniades claimed possession of the flat. The occupiers claimed that, acting jointly, they had a lease, arising as a result of their agreements with Mr Antoniades. If they were found to have a lease, they would qualify for statutory protection and Mr Antoniades' power to remove them would be limited by statute. The first instance judge found that the occupiers did have a lease, but the Court of Appeal held that they were licensees and so allowed Mr Antoniades' appeal. The House of Lords took a different view, restoring the order of the first instance judge, and holding that Mr Villiers and Miss Bridger, acting together, had a lease.

Lord Templeman

At 458–65

Parties to an agreement cannot contract out of the Rent Acts; if they were able to do so the Acts would be a dead letter because in a state of housing shortage a person seeking residential accommodation may agree to anything to obtain shelter. The Rent Acts protect a tenant but they do not protect a licensee. Since parties to an agreement cannot contract out of the Rent Acts, a document which expresses the intention, genuine or bogus, of both parties or of one party to create a licence will nevertheless create a tenancy if the rights and obligations enjoyed and imposed satisfy the legal requirements of a tenancy. A person seeking residential accommodation may concur in any expression of intention in order to obtain shelter . . . Since parties to an agreement cannot contract out of the Rent Acts, the grant of a tenancy to two persons jointly cannot be concealed, accidentally or by design, by the creation of two documents in the form of licences. Two persons seeking residential accommodation may sign any number of documents in order to obtain joint shelter. In considering one or more documents for the purpose of deciding whether a tenancy has been created, the court must consider the surrounding circumstances including any relationship between the prospective occupiers, the course of negotiations and the nature and extent of the accommodation and the intended and actual mode of occupation of the accommodation. If the owner of a one-bedroomed flat granted a licence to a husband to occupy the flat provided he shared the flat with his wife and nobody else and granted a similar licence to the wife provided she shared the flat with the husband and nobody else, the court would be bound to consider the effect of both documents together. If the licence to the husband required him to pay a licence fee of £50 per month and the licence to the wife required her to pay a further licence fee of £50 per month, the two documents read together in the light of the property to be occupied and the obvious intended mode of occupation would confer exclusive occupation on the husband and wife jointly and a tenancy at the rent of £100.

Landlords dislike the Rent Acts and wish to enjoy the benefits of letting property without the burden of the restrictions imposed by the Acts. Landlords believe that the Rent Acts unfairly interfere with freedom of contract and exacerbate the housing shortage. Tenants on the other hand believe that the Acts are a necessary protection against the exploitation of people who do not own the freehold or long leases of their homes. The court lacks the knowledge and the power to form any judgment on these arguments which fall to be considered and determined by Parliament. The duty of the court is to enforce the Acts and in so doing to observe one principle which is inherent in the Acts and has been long recognised, the principle that parties cannot contract out of the Acts [...]

Where residential accommodation is occupied by two or more persons the occupiers may be licensees or tenants of the whole or each occupier may be a separate tenant of part. In the present appeals the only question raised is whether the occupiers are licensees or tenants of the whole [...]

[In AG Securities v Vaughan, the Court of Appeal] concluded that the four [occupiers] were jointly entitled to exclusive occupation of the flat. I am unable to agree. If a landlord who owns a three-bedroom flat enters into three separate independent tenancies with three independent tenants each of whom is entitled to one bedroom and to share the common parts, then the three tenants, if they agree, can exclude anyone else from the flat. But they do not enjoy exclusive occupation of the flat jointly under the terms of their tenancies. In the present case, if the four [occupiers] had been jointly entitled to exclusive occupation of the flat then, on the death of one of [the occupiers], the remaining three would be entitled to joint and exclusive occupation. But, in fact, on the death of one [occupier] the remaining three would not be entitled to joint and exclusive occupation of the flat. They could not exclude a fourth person nominated by the company. I would allow the appeal.

In the first appeal the four agreements were independent of one another. In the second appeal [Antoniades v Villiers] the two agreements were interdependent. Both would have been signed or neither. The two agreements must therefore be read together. Mr. Villiers and Miss Bridger applied to rent the flat jointly and sought and enjoyed joint and exclusive occupation of the whole of the flat. They shared the rights and the obligations imposed by the terms of their occupation. They acquired joint and exclusive occupation of the flat in consideration of periodical payments and they therefore acquired a tenancy jointly. Mr. Antoniades required each of them, Mr. Villiers and Miss Bridger, to agree to pay one half of each aggregate periodical payment, but this circumstance cannot convert a tenancy into a licence. A tenancy remains a tenancy even though the landlord may choose to require each of two joint tenants to agree expressly to pay one half of the rent. The tenancy conferred on Mr. Villiers and Miss Bridger the right to occupy the whole flat as their dwelling. Clause 16 reserved to Mr. Antoniades the power at any time to go into occupation of the flat jointly with Mr. Villiers and Miss Bridger.

The exercise of that power would at common law put an end to the exclusive occupation of the flat by Mr. Villiers and Miss Bridger, terminate the tenancy of Mr. Villiers and Miss Bridger, and convert Mr. Villiers and Miss Bridges into licensees. But the powers reserved to Mr. Antoniades by clause 16 cannot be lawfully exercised because they are inconsistent with the provisions of the Rent Acts [. . .]

Clause 16 is a reservation to Mr. Antoniades of the right to go into occupation or to nominate others to enjoy occupation of the whole of the flat jointly with Mr. Villiers and Miss Bridger. Until that power is exercised Mr. Villiers and Miss Bridger are jointly in exclusive occupation of the whole of the flat making periodical payments and they are therefore tenants. The Rent Acts prevent the exercise of a power which would destroy the tenancy of Mr. Villiers and Miss Bridger and would deprive them of the exclusive occupation of the flat which they are now enjoying. Clause 16 is inconsistent with the provisions of the Rent Acts.

There is a separate and alternative reason why clause 16 must be ignored. Clause 16 was not a genuine reservation to Mr. Antoniades of a power to share the flat and a power to authorise other persons to share the flat. Mr. Antoniades did not genuinely intend to exercise the powers save possibly to bring pressure to bear to obtain possession. Clause 16 was only intended to deprive Mr. Villiers and Miss Bridger of the protection of the Rent Acts. Mr. Villiers and Miss Bridger had no choice in the matter.

In the notes of [the first instance judge], Mr. Villiers is reported as saying that: 'He [Mr. Antoniades] kept going on about it being a licence and not in the Rent Act. I didn't know either but was pleased to have a place after three or four months of chasing.' The notes of Miss Bridger's evidence include this passage: 'I didn't understand what was meant by exclusive possession or licence. Signed because so glad to move in. Had been looking for three months.'

In Street v. Mountford, I said:

> 'Although the Rent Acts must not be allowed to alter or influence the construction of an agreement, the court should, in my opinion, be astute to detect and frustrate sham devices and artificial transactions whose only object is to disguise the grant of a tenancy and to evade the Rent Acts.'[40]

It would have been more accurate and less liable to give rise to misunderstandings if I had substituted the word 'pretence' for the references to 'sham devices' and 'artificial transactions.' Street v. Mountford was not a case which involved a pretence concerning exclusive possession. The agreement did not mention exclusive possession and the owner conceded that the occupier enjoyed exclusive possession. In Somma v. Hazelhurst [41] and other cases considered in Street v. Mountford, the owner wished to let residential accommodation but to avoid the Rent Acts. The occupiers wished to take a letting of residential accommodation. The owner stipulated for the execution of agreements which pretended that exclusive possession was not to be enjoyed by the occupiers. The occupiers were obliged to acquiesce with this pretence in order to obtain the accommodation. In my opinion the occupiers either did not understand the language of the agreements or assumed, justifiably, that in practice the owner would not violate their privacy. The owner's real intention was to rely on the language of the agreement to escape the Rent Acts. The owner allowed the occupiers to enjoy jointly exclusive occupation and accepted rent. A tenancy was created. Street v. Mountford reasserted three principles. First, parties to an agreement cannot contract out of the Rent Acts. Secondly, in the absence of special circumstances, not here relevant, the enjoyment of exclusive occupation for a term in consideration of periodic payments creates a tenancy. Thirdly, where the language of licence contradicts the reality of lease, the facts must prevail.

[40] [1985] AC 809, 825.

[41] [1978] 1 WLR 1014.

The facts must prevail over the language in order that the parties may not contract out of the Rent Acts. In the present case clause 16 was a pretence.

The fact that clause 16 was a pretence appears from its terms and from the negotiations. Clause 16 in terms conferred on Mr. Antoniades and other persons the right to share the bedroom occupied by Mr. Villiers and Miss Bridger. Clause 16 conferred power on Mr. Antoniades to convert the sitting-room occupied by Mr. Villiers and Miss Bridger into a bedroom which could be jointly occupied by Mr. Villiers, Miss Bridger, Mr. Antoniades and any person or persons nominated by Mr. Antoniades. The facilities in the flat were not suitable for sharing between strangers. The flat, situated in an attic with a sloping roof, was too small for sharing between strangers. If clause 16 had been genuine there would have been some discussion between Mr. Antoniades, Mr. Villiers and Miss Bridger as to how clause 16 might be operated in practice and in whose favour it was likely to be operated. The addendum imposed on Mr. Villiers and Miss Bridger sought to add plausibility to the pretence of sharing by forfeiting the right of Mr. Villiers and Miss Bridger to continue to occupy the flat if their double-bedded romance blossomed into wedding bells. Finally and significantly, Mr. Antoniades never made any attempt to obtain increased income from the flat by exercising the powers which clause 16 purported to reserve to him. Clause 16 was only designed to disguise the grant of a tenancy and to contract out of the Rent Acts. In this case in the Court of Appeal Bingham L.J. said:

> 'The written agreements cannot possibly be construed as giving the occupants, jointly or severally, exclusive possession of the flat or any part of it. They stipulate with reiterated emphasis that the occupants shall not have exclusive possession.'[42]

My Lords, in Street v. Mountford, this House stipulated with reiterated emphasis that an express statement of intention is not decisive and that the court must pay attention to the facts and surrounding circumstances and to what people do as well as to what people say.

My Lords, in each of the cases which were disapproved by this House in Street v. Mountford and in the second appeal now under consideration, there was, in my opinion, the grant of a joint tenancy for the following reasons. (1) The applicants for the flat applied to rent the flat jointly and to enjoy exclusive occupation. (2) The landlord allowed the applicants jointly to enjoy exclusive occupation and accepted rent. A tenancy was created. (3) The power reserved to the landlord to deprive the applicants of exclusive occupation was inconsistent with the provisions of the Rent Acts. (4) Moreover in all the circumstances the power which the landlord insisted upon to deprive the applicants of exclusive occupation was a pretence only intended to deprive the applicants of the protection of the Rent Acts.

Each of AG Securities v Vaughan and Antoniades v Villiers raises questions about how multiple occupiers of land can claim a lease. We will examine that issue in detail in section 2.5 below. For present purposes, we can focus on the appeal in Antoniades and the decision that the agreement created a lease even though the clear effect of Clause 16 was to deny the occupiers a right to exclusive possession.

The decision of the House of Lords can only be justified if it is permissible, when deciding if B (or B1 and B2) has a right to exclusive possession, to disregard particular contractual terms. In examining this question, we again have to consider both the doctrinal perspective and the utility approach.

From a doctrinal perspective, it is clear that an apparent contractual term can be disregarded if it is not, in fact, contractually binding. One well-established example occurs if an apparent contractual term is a 'sham' (a term used by Lord Templeman in Street v Mountford when referring to 'sham devices').[43] Diplock LJ provided the commonly used definition of a sham, in the contractual context at least, in the following case.[44]

[42] [1988] 3 WLR 139, 148.

Snook v London and West Ridings Investments Ltd
[1967] 2 QB 786, CA

Diplock LJ

At 802

If it has any legal meaning, the term 'sham' means acts done or documents executed by the parties to the 'sham' which are intended by them to give to third parties or to the court the appearance of creating between the parties legal rights and obligations different from the actual legal rights and obligations (if any) which the parties intended to create [. . .] for acts or documents to be a 'sham', with whatever legal consequences follow from this, all the parties thereto must have a common intention that the acts or documents are not to create the legal rights and obligations which they give the appearance of creating. No unexpressed intentions of a 'shammer' affect the rights of a party whom he deceived.

As is made clear by that definition, a term can only be dismissed as a sham if neither party intends that the term should create genuine legal rights. One example occurs if A sells a painting to B for £10,000, but, to minimize her tax bill, persuades B to sign a contract of sale recording the price as £100. In such a case, each party intends that B should be under a legal duty to pay £10,000; neither party intends that B's duty is to pay only £100. The written 'contract' is therefore of no legal effect: it is a sham as it is not genuinely intended to create legal rights.

It is clear that this model is of very little use in a case such as Antoniades v Villiers. In that case, it was abundantly clear that Mr Antoniades did intend for Clause 16 to create genuine legal rights: the whole point of the clause was to ensure that the occupiers did not have a right to exclusive possession. It is therefore no surprise that, in Antoniades, Lord Templeman did not base his decision on the sham concept; instead, his Lordship based his decision to disregard the sharing clause (Clause 16) on two separate grounds. As suggested in the extract below, those grounds are not free from difficulty.

McFarlane and Simpson, 'Tackling Avoidance' in Rationalizing Property, Equity and Trusts: Essays in Honour of Edward Burn (ed Getzler, 2003)

At 151–2

Lord Templeman provides two grounds for denying effect to the sharing clause. First, it was said that Mr Antoniades could never insert others into occupation as [the Rent Acts prevent him from exercising his power to do so]. This reasoning cannot be supported, as it assumes the very thing it purports to prove. The Rent Acts can only apply if the occupiers are lessees, which will only be the case if they have a right to exclusive possession. As the Rent Acts can therefore only apply if the sharing clause, which seems to deny such a right to exclusive possession, is found to be invalid, those Acts cannot also be the means by which such invalidity is proved [...]

[43] [1985] AC 809, 825.

[44] The reference to documents cannot mean that either all of a document is sham, or none of it: see Hitch v Stone [2001] STC 214. Rather, each apparent term within a document must be seen as a relevant 'act', and will only be valid if accompanied by the necessary intention that the term should genuinely create contractual rights.

Secondly, Lord Templeman held that the clause was [...] "a pretence [...] only designed to disguise the grant of a tenancy and to contract out of the Rent Acts". This reasoning is crucial as it aims to provide a means, independent of the Rent Acts, to render the sharing clause ineffective. It also seems clear that Lord Templeman contemplates going beyond the sham doctrine, as conventionally understood. First, his Lordship prefers to condemn the clause as a "pretence", rather than as a "sham device or artificial transaction." Whilst the concepts of pretence and sham had been used interchangeably in the past, Lord Templeman's explicit preference for the former term does suggest that it involves the adoption of a new means by which a clause may be rendered ineffective. Certainly, Lord Templeman's application of the concept of pretence in Villiers goes beyond [...] the orthodox 'sham test'.

At 157–8

[...] [A suggested justification for the 'pretence' test is that] terms can be disregarded where they are inserted for the purpose of avoiding the Rent Acts by denying a right to exclusive possession. It is true that, at a number of points in his judgment in Villiers, Lord Templeman emphasises that this was the owner's aim in including clause 16 in the written agreement [...] Nonetheless, the courts have repeatedly rejected any suggestion that they have a general, non-statutory power to disregard agreed terms simply because those terms have been agreed in order to avoid a particular characterisation of the parties' dealings. Any number of examples can be given.

First, the courts have frequently had to consider situations in which parties have, for various reasons, chosen to set up a hire-purchase transaction rather than a simple loan on the security of goods. As long as the parties have genuinely intended to create the legal rights characteristic of hire-purchase, then, even if the only reason for preferring that mechanism has been the desire to avoid creating a secured loan, the agreement will be taken at face-value by the court.[45] The validity of this approach has been upheld in cases dealing with attempts to avoid the very legislation considered in Antoniades v Villiers. In Kaye v Massbetter,[46] an owner insisted that a tenancy agreement be made with a company created for that purpose, rather than with the individual who was to occupy the property. The only reason for doing so was to avoid the Rent Acts, which do not protect company tenants, yet this device was upheld by the Court of Appeal.

From a doctrinal perspective, then, it seems that the 'pretence' test, if it amounts to disregarding terms inserted for the purpose of denying an occupier exclusive possession, cannot be justified. After all, if A simply decides not to grant B exclusive possession, he is perfectly free to do so. In Antoniades v Villiers itself, it may nonetheless be possible to reconcile the decision of the House of Lords with doctrine. It can perhaps be explained on a standard contractual principle: a term is only binding on B if A reasonably believes that B is agreeing to be bound by that term.[47] Usually, of course, B's signature of a written document ensures that it is reasonable for A to believe that B is agreeing to be bound by all of the terms set out in the document. But if the surrounding factual circumstances serve to make a term as set out in the document wholly implausible, it may just be possible for B to argue that such a term is not binding.

45 See Helby v Matthews [1895] AC 471, 475; Re George Inglefield Ltd [1933] Ch 1, per Romer LJ; Yorkshire Railway Co v Maclure (1882) 21 Ch D 309, per Lindley LJ.

46 [1991] 2 EGLR 97.

47 This seems to be the approach adopted by Lord Oliver in Antoniades v Villiers: see [1990] 1 AC 417, 469.

The difficulty with this attempt to exclude the pretence test, however, is that the Court of Appeal adopted that test in cases following Antoniades. One example is provided by the combined judgment of the Court of Appeal in the cases of Aslan v Murphy (Nos 1 & 2) and Duke v Wynne.[48] In each case, occupation of residential premises occurred under an agreement that permitted A to share occupation, or to insert other occupiers. In Aslan, the agreement also included a term that 'the licensor licenses the licensee to use (but not exclusively) all the furnished room [. . .] on each day between the hours of midnight and 10.30am and between noon and midnight, but at no other times'. In Aslan, B occupied a small basement room in Redcliffe Gardens, London.

In Duke, B1 and B2, a married couple, occupied a three-bedroom house in Dunkeld Road, South Norwood, along with their two young sons. The Court of Appeal found that, in each case, a lease had been granted. Lord Donaldson MR, referring to the concept of a pretence, regarded it as important that, in each case, A had not, in practice, attempted to exercise his rights to share occupation, or, in Aslan, to remove B from the land between 10.30 a.m. and noon.

Such decisions can only be seen as doctrinally justified if it is possible to find a rationale for the wider pretence test. One such rationale is proposed in the following extract.

Bright, 'Avoiding Tenancy Legislation: Sham and Contracting Out Revisited' [2002] CLJ 146

At 152–3

In practice, the need for a common intention and for a whole transaction to be a sham limits the usefulness of the doctrine. There could not, for example, have been a sham in this strict sense in Antoniades v. Villiers where a couple were asked to sign separate licence agreements containing a provision, clause 16, which stated that the "licensor shall be entitled at any time to use the rooms together with the licensee and permit other persons to use all of the rooms together with the licensee [. . .]" Given the size and layout of the accommodation, and the relationship between the couple, it was obvious that the "licensor" would not exercise this right. In holding the couple to have a tenancy and not separate licences, the House of Lords used a variety of language to explain why clause 16 should not be given its face value. Only Lord Oliver spoke of sham [. . .] In moving away from the language of sham to pretence there is the chance to introduce greater flexibility. Essentially, pretence will be found where there is no genuine intention to implement the agreement as it stands. This can also be said of sham, but there are not the same constraints about the need for a common intention and for the whole document to be a lie. Lord Donaldson M.R. clearly saw the two concepts operating differently in Aslan:

> '[. . .] parties may succumb to the temptation to agree to pretend to have particular rights and duties which are not in fact any part of the true bargain [. . .] [The] courts would be acting unrealistically if they did not keep a weather eye open for pretences, taking due account of how the parties have acted in performance of their apparent bargain. This identification and exposure of such pretences does not necessarily lead to the conclusion that their agreement is a sham, but only to the conclusion that the terms of the true bargain are not wholly the same as that of the bargain appearing on the face of the agreement.'

[48] [1990] 1 WLR 766.

Throughout the speeches in Antoniades it is clear that the reason why the licences were found to be non-genuine was because there was never any intention to rely on clause 16. Had they been applying the Snook concept of sham the House of Lords would have had to find a mutuality of intention to mislead, but there is no discussion in the speeches of whether both parties intended for clause 16 not to operate, nor was there a third party that they intended to mislead. Nor did it matter that the focus was on two aspects of the transaction rather than the transaction as a whole. The essence of pretence is that the agreement is a smokescreen. It is not sufficient to strike down a device on the grounds that it was intended or designed for the sole purpose of avoiding protective legislation, even if there is no other purpose served by it. As with sham, motive is irrelevant. It does not matter that the only reason why a particular route, however tortuous, is selected is to avoid statutory provisions: the test is simply one of whether or not the device is seriously intended. The transaction must be taken at face value unless it is shown that it was not genuine in the sense that the parties never intended to rely on that device.

At 157–9

Much of value was lost when the dicta of Diplock L.J. in Snook became hardened law and it is clear that in AG Securities the House of Lords, and Lord Templeman in particular, was seeking to break away from these confines. Both sham and pretence are to do with the same thing, that is, to enable the true nature of a transaction to be revealed. The case law, although rather thin on this, does support a more sophisticated account of sham than is usually given and which accords better with "legal principle and morality". Whatever it is called, this refined doctrine of sham would be able to subsume within it the doctrine of pretence.

Where it is found that documents entered into give the appearance of creating legal rights and obligations between the parties that are not genuine, in the sense that there is no intention of honouring these obligations or enjoying the rights, then:

1. where there is a common intention to deceive, that document will be void as between those parties. It is this automatic consequence of voidness, and possible impact upon third parties, that accounts for the reluctance of courts to find a sham and the need for very clear evidence that the provisions are not genuine. If an innocent third party has relied upon the form of the document, the parties may be estopped from setting up the invalidity of the documents
2. where only one of the parties intended to deceive or inserted provisions which he had no intention of honouring and the other party was ignorant of this (or did not 'know or care') or simply went along with it through absence of choice, the party with the deceitful (non-genuine) intent:
   (i) will not be allowed to take advantage of the formal appearance of rights to the disadvantage of an 'innocent' party. This means that a person innocent of the sham will be allowed to rely upon external evidence to prove that the formal agreement is a sham/non-genuine. Similarly, when applied to the residential tenancy cases, the occupier is allowed to prove that the 'licensor' never had any intention of relying upon clauses which prevent a tenancy arising, as, for example, with the 'sharing clause' in AG Securities or the clause requiring a daily 90 minute departure in Aslan. As Lord Donaldson M.R. said in Aslan, it 'is the true rather than the apparent bargain which determines the question: tenant or lodger?'

> (ii) will not be allowed to set aside the formal document by proving it is a sham and thereby rely on the real/true agreement if an innocent person has relied upon the formal agreement. Snook [is an example] [. . .] the court held that there was no sham because there was no common intention to deceive but the effect was the same as saying that the 'shammer' could not set aside the sham document to the detriment of the innocent party.

Bright's argument is that the pretence test is not a special feature of the law of leases, developed to ensure that statutory protection is available to deserving or vulnerable occupiers. Bright instead argues that the pretence test is a logical corollary of the sham test and, indeed, can be subsumed within it. On this view, cases such as Antoniades and Aslan are simply applying standard contractual principles. The validity of that view therefore depends on a more general question about contract law: is it the case that, for a term to be contractually binding, the parties must intend not only that the term should create legal rights, but also that the term will be enforced in practice?[49]

Whatever the answer to that question, it may still be possible to justify the pretence test from the perspective of utility rather than doctrine.[50] For example, in section 2.1 above, we saw Hill's suggestion that policy, rather than doctrine, can justify the decision in Street v Mountford that a lease can be created even when A does not intend to give B a property right. In that article, Hill suggests:[51] 'The drafting of a residential agreement as a licence rather than a lease is analogous to the inclusion of an unfair contractual term in a consumer sale.' On this view, the pretence doctrine is simply a means to an end: it gives judges the power (usually only given by statutes such as the Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977) to disregard terms that, whilst notionally agreed, have been forced on a reluctant occupier. Certainly, as noted by Hill, Lord Templeman did refer in Antoniades to the fact that 'a person seeking residential accommodation may concur in any expression of intention [. . .] [and] may sign a document couched in any language in order to obtain shelter'.[52]

This analysis raises an important point about the utility approach: one that we encountered in Chapter 1, section 5.7. There, we saw Harris's observation that a choice as to whether the doctrinal or utility approach is to be preferred may depend on one's view as to the proper role of judges. For example, it may be plausible to take the view that whilst it is important, in a case such as Antoniades, to protect an occupier and to ensure that the relevant statutory protection applies, it is not for judges to take on the power to disregard terms that, according to the usual doctrinal tests, are contractually binding. On that view, it is for Parliament to make a change to the law: for example, by extending the statutory protection beyond those with leases to parties who occupy their home under a contractual licence. Indeed, as we will see in Chapter 23, section 5, the Law Commission has recently suggested just that 49 For a view that a contractual term is, in general, binding even if the parties did not intend to enforce it in practice, see McFarlane and Simpson, 'Tackling Avoidance' in Rationalizing Property, Equity and Trusts: Essays in Honour of Edward Burn (ed Getzler, 2003), pp 160–3 and McFarlane, The Structure of Property Law (2008), p 665.

50 For example, as we will see in Chapter 23, section 3, McFarlane and Simpson suggest that the approach in Antoniades may be justified as a matter of statutory interpretation, if it can be said that Parliament intended the statutory protection to apply not only to parties with a legal right to exclusive possession, but also to parties who, in practice, enjoyed exclusive possession of land for a term: McFarlane and Simpson, 'Tackling Avoidance' in Rationalizing Property, Equity and Trusts: Essays in Honour of Edward Burn (ed Getzler, 2003), pp 175–8.

51 (1996) 16 LS 200, 217.

52 [1990] 1 AC 417, 458.

change: the remaining statutory protection (of course, now much diminished in the private rental sector) should not be limited to tenants, but should also be extended to licensees.

2.5 A RIGHT TO EXCLUSIVE POSSESSION: MULTIPLE OCCUPANCY

In each of AG Securities and Antioniades, more than one person occupied land. In such a case, it could, in theory, be possible for each occupier to claim a right to exclusive possession of a particular part of the land (e.g. of a particular room in a flat). But the occupiers did not pursue that argument in either case; instead, it was argued (unsuccessfully in AG Securities, but successfully in Antoniades) that the occupiers, seen as a unit, had a single right to exclusive possession to the whole of the land. This is a claim to co-ownership of the land: a claim that the individual occupiers, acting a team, held a single legal estate. We examined co-ownership in Chapter 17, in section 2 of which we saw that there are two possible forms of co-ownership: the joint tenancy and the tenancy in common. In each case, there is 'unity of possession' amongst the co-owners: each is prima facie entitled to occupy all of the land. In a tenancy in common, unlike a joint tenancy, each co-owner also has an 'undivided share': a right to a particular, individual share of the benefits of the co-owned land. We also saw there that, due to s 1(6) of the LPA 1925, it is impossible for a legal estate (such as a legal lease) to be held by tenants in common: in such a case, the only permitted form of co-ownership is a joint tenancy. So, what happens if A transfers a freehold to B1 and B2, stating that B1 is to have a 40 per cent share and B2 is to have a 60 per cent share? Despite the parties' intentions, B1 and B2 hold the legal freehold as joint tenants (without an individual share). But, under s 34(2) of the 1925 Act, a trust is imposed: B1 and B2 hold that legal freehold as joint tenants, but each also has an individual share to the benefit of that legal right, arising under a trust.

In AG Securities, however, the House of Lords adopted a different approach to the specific question of co-ownership of a lease. It was held that the four occupiers had a lease only if they could show that, acting together, they genuinely had a joint tenancy of that lease. The assumption is that, if B1, B2, B3, and B4 had intended to receive a right to exclusive possession as tenants in common, no lease would arise: s 34(2) cannot operate to save the lease by allowing B1, B2, B3, and B4 to hold a legal lease as joint tenants on trust for themselves. This approach causes real problems for joint occupiers. As we saw in Chapter 17, section 2, to establish a tenancy in common, it is necessary for the occupiers to show only that they have 'unity of possession'—that is, that each is entitled to occupy all of the land. To establish a genuine joint tenancy (rather than one imposed by s 34(2)), however, the occupiers also need to show that they have not only unity of possession, but also 'unity of interest, time and title'. This means that they must show that they acquired the lease together: without individual shares, at the same time, and in the same way.

In AG Securities, it was impossible for the occupiers to show a genuine joint tenancy: it was clearly not the case that they had acquired a lease together, because they had not moved into the land at the same time; rather, they were part of a 'fluctuating population' of occupiers, each of whom moved in whenever an individual room happened to be vacant. In Antoniades, Mr Villiers and Miss Bridger had signed separate agreements with Mr Antoniades. Nonetheless, they were able to show that they had acquired a lease together: the agreements were identical and signed on the same day, and Mr Villiers and Miss Bridger moved in together, as a couple. The cases thus reflect an important difference between: (i) cases in which rooms in a house or flat are occupied by individuals who move in and move out at different times; and

(ii) cases in which the house or flat itself is occupied together by a couple (or group) who move in together and who would expect to move out together. In particular, the decision in AG Securities seems correct, because, on the facts, it was not plausible to see the four occupiers as a group, co-operating to claim exclusive possession of the entire property.

The reasoning in AG Securities, however, with its insistence on a joint tenancy requirement, can cause problems even in a case in which a couple or group do move in together and exercise joint exclusive control of the property (and thus have unity of possession). As the following extract shows, the difficulties arise if the occupiers undertake individual and separate duties to pay rent (and thus have no unity of interest).

Mikeover v Brady

[1989] 3 All ER 618, CA

Facts: Mikeover Ltd had a long lease of the top floor flat at 179 Southgate Road, London N1. It advertised the flat as available for occupation by two people. The flat consisted of a front room, which had a cooker and refrigerator in it, and a back room, which had a sink in it. In addition, there was a bathroom and lavatory in the attic. Mr Brady and Miss Guile, a couple, responded to the advert and moved into the flat together. Each signed a separate, but identical, agreement, headed as a licence agreement, allowing each of them to share occupation of the flat for six months, in return for paying a monthly rent of £86.66. Once that initial six months had expired, the occupiers were allowed to remain in the flat, on the same terms as set out in the initial agreements. Early in 1986, Miss Guile moved out of the flat. She informed Mr Ferster (a director of Mikeover Ltd, and the party with whom she and Mr Brady had dealt) of this in April 1986. Mr Brady wished to remain and offered to pay £173.32 as monthly rent. Mr Ferster declined that offer, stating: 'I can't accept it. I'll hold you responsible for your share only.' Nonetheless, even on the basis that he had to pay only £86.66 a month, Mr Brady fell into arrears on the rent payment and, in early 1987, Mikeover Ltd sought to remove him from the flat. Mr Brady claimed that, as a result of the initial agreements signed by the parties, he and Miss Guile had, acting together, acquired a lease of the flat. If that were correct, Mr Brady would then qualify for statutory protection under the Rent Acts. The first instance judge, however, rejected that argument and held that the initial agreements gave each party only a licence. Mr Brady appealed unsuccessfully to the Court of Appeal.

Slade LJ

At 623–7

[Slade LJ found that the agreements should be interpreted together and against the factual background that 'the layout of the flat was such that it was clearly only suitable for occupation by persons who were personally acceptable to one another'. On that basis:] It follows that, in our judgment, [Mr Brady's] agreement on its true construction conferred on him the right (by cl 1) to exclusive occupation of the flat in common only with Miss Guile during its currency [. . .]

It is, however, well settled that four unities must be present for the creation of a joint tenancy, namely the unities of possession, interest, title and time [. . .] In the present case there is no dispute that the two agreements of 6 June 1984 operated to confer on the defendant and Miss Guile unity of possession and title. Likewise, there was unity of time in that each of their interests arose simultaneously and was expressed to endure for six months. The dispute concerns unity of interest. The general principle, as stated in Megarry and Wade is:[53]

> 'The interest of each joint tenant is the same in extent, nature and duration, for in theory of law they hold but one estate.'

'Interest' in this context must, in our judgment, include the bundle of rights and obligations representing that interest. The difficulty, from the defendant's point of view, is that the two agreements, instead of imposing a joint liability on him and Miss Guile to pay a deposit of £80 and monthly payments of £173.32, on their face imposed on each of them individual and separate obligations to pay only a deposit of £40 and monthly payments of only £86.66. On the face of it, the absence of joint obligations of payment is inconsistent with the existence of a joint tenancy.

Counsel for [Mr Brady] sought to meet this difficulty in three ways. First, he contended that the two agreements were, as he put it, 'interdependent' and must be read together. When so read, he submitted, they should be construed as placing on the two parties joint obligations. However, it seems to us quite impossible to rewrite the two agreements in this manner as a matter of construction [...] [o]ne cannot add up two several [i.e. separate] obligations to pay £X so as to construct a joint obligation to pay £2X.

Next counsel for [Mr Brady], as we understood him, contended that, in so far as the two agreements purported to render each of the defendant and Miss Guile merely individually liable for the payment of a deposit of £40 and monthly payments of £86·66, they were 'shams'. The true intention of the parties, he submitted, to be inferred from all the circumstances, was that they should be jointly liable to make monthly payments of £173.32 and to pay a deposit of £80 (to the return of which they should be jointly entitled in due course).

In this context, the subsequent conduct of the parties is admissible in evidence, not for the purpose of construing the agreements but on the question whether the documents were or were not genuine documents giving effect to the parties' true intentions [...]

However, the onus of proving a sham falls on the defendant and, in our judgment, the parties' subsequent conduct affords no support, or at least no sufficient support, to his case in this respect [...] we see no sufficient grounds for disturbing the judge's finding that the receipts of sums by [Mikeover Ltd] from [Mr Brady] after Miss Guile left the flat represented no more than was due from him on the footing that he was liable only for monthly payments of £86.66 [...] [Mikeover Ltd's] failure to accept [Mr Brady's] offer to pay the higher monthly sum does not in any way assist [Mr Brady's] contention that the provisions for payment contained in the two agreements were shams.

On these authorities, it appears to us that unity of interest imports the existence of joint rights and joint obligations. We therefore conclude that the provisions for payment contained in these two agreements (which were genuinely intended to impose and did impose on each party an obligation to pay no more than the sums reserved to [Mikeover Ltd] by his or her separate agreement) were incapable in law of creating a joint tenancy, because the monetary obligations of the two parties were not joint obligations and there was accordingly no complete unity of interest. It follows that there was no joint tenancy.

Mikeover v Brady nicely illustrates the problem caused to occupiers by the approach adopted in AG Securities. In Mikeover, the individual rent obligation would not have prevented Mr Brady from showing that he and Miss Guile held a lease as tenants in common, each with a 50 per cent share of the lease—but it did prevent him from showing that they held a lease as joint tenants (i.e. only as a team and without any individual share), and, under the AG Securities approach, it therefore followed that the occupiers did not have a lease.

[53] [The reference in the case is to the 5th edn (1984): see now Megarry and Wade's Law of Real Property (7th edn, eds Harpum et al, 2008), [13–006].]

As explained in the following extract, it is not obvious why the courts should insist on there being a genuine joint tenancy of a lease when, as we have seen, there is no such requirement when parties acquire a freehold together.

Sparkes, 'Co-Tenants, Joint Tenants and Tenants in Common' (1989) 18 AALR 151

At 155

In the light of Lord Templeman's speech [in AG Securities v Vaughan], it must be asked whether a tenancy in common can exist in an informal tenancy. The House of Lords simply assumed that this could not be the case. The question is by no means easy to answer in view of the well-known inadequacy of the provisions of the Law of Property Act 1925 concerned with the imposition of a statutory [trust of land] on co-ownership.[54] Before 1926, legal tenants could be either joint tenants or tenants in common. Equally landlords could hold in common, so that for example one landlord could serve a notice to quit that was effectual in respect of his undivided share, while leaving intact the term in respect of the undivided shares of other landlords. An informal tenancy could then have created a legal leasehold estate held by tenants in common. Such a tenancy, if it could exist today, would fall squarely within the definition of a protected tenancy.

After 1925, a legal estate must be held by joint tenants. A statutory [trust of land] arises and the beneficial owners might be either joint tenants or tenants in common beneficially. These rules should apply to any legal estate, whether the estate is freehold or leasehold [. . .]

Business tenancies must often exist as equitable tenancies in common, since such tenancies are frequently held by partnerships. A business lease is likely to contain an express declaration of a beneficial tenancy in common, which is best suited for business partnership. In the absence of an express declaration, equity would presume the intention to create a beneficial tenancy in common. Similar considerations apply to agricultural holdings. The question is therefore whether there is something special about residential tenancies which marks them out as uniquely confined to joint tenancies in the technical sense. The Rent Act 1977 contains no express prohibition; nor does the Housing Act 1988 for the assured tenancy present and future [. . .]

At 163–4

Nothing is clear in the field of co-ownership of short term leases. The courts have confidently equated a co-ownership joint tenancy and a co-tenancy under the Rent Act 1977. It is tentatively submitted that it is wrong to equate these two separate concepts.

In AG Securities v. Vaughan the House of Lords decided that four occupiers who were free to leave independently of each other were licensees and not co-tenants. The main ground relied upon was that the occupiers did not together share exclusive possession. Some dicta rest this decision on a different ground—that is the absence of unity of interest. In the absence of this unity at most a tenancy in common was created. This now forms the ratio decidendi of the Court of Appeal decision, Mikeover v Brady.

In both cases, it was important to establish whether or not there was a concurrent interest in the four occupiers. If it was concurrent, whether it was a joint tenancy or a tenancy in > common or some other kind of relationship was (until the death of one of the parties)[55] quite irrelevant. For a tenancy in common to exist, only one of the four unities—that is unity of possession—would be necessary. An informal tenancy in common might create a statutory trust [. . .] or it might stand altogether outside conventional property law. There is no need to search for the remaining unities—that is time, title and interest.

[54] [The author here refers to a statutory trust for sale, because the article was written before the Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996. As to the effect of that Act, see Chapter 17, section 5.]

>
> The court should look to see whether there has been a joint grant of the right to exclusive occupation of the property, or in shorthand, joint exclusive possession. The opinions delivered in AG Securities v Vaughan are quite consistent with the general view that it is the substantive existence of a joint right to exclusive possession that is determinative of the existence of a tenancy.

Sparkes' view is thus that the approach in Mikeover v Brady cannot be justified as a matter of doctrine.

There are some challenges to that view: for example, Roger Smith[56] has argued that the structure of the LPA 1925 may support the approach of the courts; McFarlane[57] has argued that if, as in Mikeover, the occupiers claim that a contractual agreement has given rise to a lease, then they must claim as joint tenants, because, as a matter of general contract law, it is impossible for a contractual right to be held by tenants in common. Whatever your final view on the doctrinal question, however, it is also important to consider the AG Securities approach from the utility perspective. From that point of view, the approach, as exemplified by the decision in Mikeover v Brady, certainly contrasts with the more generous stance taken towards occupiers in cases such as Street v Mountford and Antoniades v Villiers.

2.6 A PROPRIETARY RIGHT TO EXCLUSIVE POSSESSION

If I were to make a contractual promise allowing you exclusive possession of Buckingham Palace for five years, recorded in a deed, could that promise give you a property right in Buckingham Palace? Clearly not. The problem is that, whilst you have a right against me to have exclusive possession of the Palace, I am simply not in a position to give you a property right in relation to that land. Nonetheless, the reasoning of the House of Lords in Bruton v London & Quadrant Housing Trust Ltd[58] appears to mean that, in such a case, our contractual agreement does give you a lease.

Not surprisingly, as we will see when examining Bruton in Chapter 23, section 3, that decision has attracted a lot of disapproval. It is, however, very important to note that the House of Lords in Bruton made clear that, in our example, the contractual agreement does not give you a property right. The controversy excited by the decision is about the very idea that B can have a 'lease' even though he or she does not have a property right. In effect, Bruton means that there are now two sorts of leases: standard leases, which give their holder (B) a property right in land; and contractual leases, which give their holder (B) only a personal right against A. We will therefore postpone our consideration of Bruton to Chapter 23; in this chapter, our focus is on the standard, proprietary lease.

[55] [As we saw in Chapter 17, section 2.2, the doctrine of survivorship means that the death of a joint tenant has consequences differing from those arising on the death of a tenant in common.]

[56] See Smith, Plural Ownership (2005), pp 24–6.

[57] McFarlane, The Structure of Property Law (2008), pp 714–15. The general rule applying to contractual rights is shown by, for example, Coke, Commentaries on Littleton (1628, p 198a) and Re McKerrell [1912] 2 Ch 648.

[58] [2000] 1 AC 406.

2.7 A RIGHT TO EXCLUSIVE POSSESSION FOR A LIMITED PERIOD

To have a lease, B needs to have a right to exclusive possession for a limited period. This requirement is reflected in the very phrase used, in s 1 of the LPA 1925, to define a lease—that is, a 'term of years absolute'. In that context, the word 'term'—like 'terminus', or 'terminal'—indicates an end or a limit. This relatively simple requirement has, however, caused a number of practical problems.

Prudential Assurance Ltd v London Residuary Body
[1992] 2 AC 386, HL

Facts: Prior to 1930, Mr. Nathan owned shop premises: Nos 263–5, Walworth Road, Southwark, London. The London City Council (LCC) owned the road itself. LCC planned to widen the road: this would lead to its encroaching on part of the strip of land, owned by Mr Nathan, then separating his shop from the road. So the LCC bought Mr Nathan's freehold of that strip of land, agreeing, however, that Mr Nathan could continue to use it until the road-widening project went ahead. The agreement stated the strip was leased back to Mr Nathan for continued use, with the rest of 263–5 Walworth Road, until required for road widening; in return, Mr Nathan agreed to pay £30 a year in rent. It was clear that both parties intended this to be a temporary arrangement, because both believed that the road-widening project would soon go ahead. So, for example, there was no provision to allow the rent to be increased.

By 1988, however, the road widening had not occurred. The London Residuary Body (LRB), a successor of LCC, now held the freehold of the strip of land, and Nos 263–5 were owned by Prudential Assurance Ltd, which also had the benefit of the 1930 agreement. LRB attempted, by giving notice, to end Prudential's right to use the strip of land. It was agreed by valuers acting for each side that the current commercial rent for the strip of land (valuable because it allowed Nos 263–5 to have a shop frontage) was £10,000 per annum rather than the £30 that Prudential was paying under the 1930 agreement. Prudential, however, argued that LRB could not regain possession of the strip, because the land was not yet needed for road widening. Millett J found in favour of Prudential; LRB[59] appealed directly to the House of Lords.[60]

Lord Templeman

At 390–6

A demise for years is a contract for the exclusive possession and profit of land for some determinate period [. . .] The Law of Property Act 1925 [. . .] provided, by section 1(1), that:

> 'The only estates in land which are capable of subsisting or of being conveyed or created at law are—(a) An estate in fee simple absolute in possession; (b) A term of years absolute.'

[59] After giving the notice to quit, LRB sold its freehold, so, technically, the new freehold owners brought the appeal.

[60] Such a 'leapfrog' appeal is permitted where, for example, an appellant wishes to challenge the validity of previous Court of Appeal authority: in this case, Ashburn Anstalt v Arnold [1989] Ch 1, where the Court of Appeal had held that it was possible for B to have a lease of land until the land was needed for re-development. There is no point appealing first to the Court of Appeal because, unlike the House of Lords, it will simply be bound by that Court of Appeal authority.

Section 205(1)(xxvii) was in these terms:

> ' "Term of years absolute" means a term of years [...] either certain or liable to determination by notice, re-entry, operation of law, or by a provision for cesser on redemption, or in any other event (other than the dropping of a life, or the determination of a determinable life interest); [...] and in this definition the expression 'term of years' includes a term for less than a year, or for a year or years and a fraction of a year or from year to year; [...]'

The term expressed to be granted by the agreement in the present case does not fall within this definition [...]

When the agreement in the present case was made, it failed to grant an estate in the land. The tenant however entered into possession and paid the yearly rent of £30 reserved by the agreement. The tenant entering under a void lease became by virtue of possession and the payment of a yearly rent, a yearly tenant holding on the terms of the agreement so far as those terms were consistent with the yearly tenancy. A yearly tenancy is determinable by the landlord or the tenant at the end of the first or any subsequent year of the tenancy by six months' notice unless the agreement between the parties provides otherwise [...]

Now it is said that when in the present case the tenant entered pursuant to the agreement and paid a yearly rent he became a tenant from year to year on the terms of the agreement including clause 6 which prevents the landlord from giving notice to quit until the land is required for road widening. This submission would make a nonsense of the rule that a grant for an uncertain term does not create a lease and would make nonsense of the concept of a tenancy from year to year because it is of the essence of a tenancy from year to year that both the landlord and the tenant shall be entitled to give notice determining the tenancy.

[...] [T]he agreement in the present case did not create a lease and that the tenancy from year to year enjoyed by the tenant as a result of entering into possession and paying a yearly rent can be determined by six months' notice by either landlord or tenant. The landlord has admittedly served such a notice [...]

A tenancy from year to year is saved from being uncertain because each party has power by notice to determine at the end of any year. The term continues until determined as if both parties made a new agreement at the end of each year for a new term for the ensuing year. A power for nobody to determine or for one party only to be able to determine is inconsistent with the concept of a term from year to year [...] principle and precedent dictate that it is beyond the power of the landlord and the tenant to create a term which is uncertain [...]

In the present case the Court of Appeal were bound by the decisions in In re Midland Railway Co.'s Agreement[61] and Ashburn's case.[62] In my opinion both these cases were wrongly decided. A grant for an uncertain term does not create a lease. A grant for an uncertain term which takes the form of a yearly tenancy which cannot be determined by the landlord does not create a lease. I would allow the appeal.

Lord Browne-Wilkinson

At 396–7

As a result of our decision Mr. Nathan's successor in title will be left with the freehold of the remainder of No. 263–265 which, though retail premises, will have no frontage to a shopping street: the L.C.C.'s successors in title will have the freehold to a strip of land with a road frontage but probably incapable of being used save in conjunction with the land from which it was severed in 1930, i.e. the remainder of No. 263–265.

[61] [1971] Ch 725. [62] [1989] Ch 1.

> It is difficult to think of a more unsatisfactory outcome or one further away from what the parties to the 1930 agreement can ever have contemplated. Certainly it was not a result their contract, if given effect to, could ever have produced. If the 1930 agreement had taken effect fully, there could never have come a time when the freehold to the remainder of No. 263–265 would be left without a road frontage.
>
> This bizarre outcome results from the application of an ancient and technical rule of law which requires the maximum duration of a term of years to be ascertainable from the outset. No one has produced any satisfactory rationale for the genesis of this rule. No one has been able to point to any useful purpose that it serves at the present day. If, by overruling the existing authorities, this House were able to change the law for the future only I would have urged your Lordships to do so.
>
> But for this House to depart from a rule relating to land law which has been established for many centuries might upset long established titles. I must therefore confine myself to expressing the hope that the Law Commission might look at the subject to see whether there is in fact any good reason now for maintaining a rule which operates to defeat contractually agreed arrangements between the parties (of which all successors in title are aware) and which is capable of producing such an extraordinary result as that in the present case.

There are a number of points to note about the decision of the House of Lords in Prudential Assurance. Firstly, whilst the contractual agreement entered into in 1930 did not create a lease, because it did not give Mr Nathan a right to exclusive possession for a limited period, he (and, later, Prudential) nonetheless did acquire a lease. That lease did not arise under the agreement, but instead resulted from Mr Nathan's payment of rent and the LCC's acceptance of that rent. This form of lease is known as an 'implied periodic tenancy': it provides a particular means by which B can acquire a lease and so we will examine it in section 3.1.2 below. As Lord Templeman noted, the important point about the lease held by Prudential was that it could be terminated by the giving of notice by the landlord: because it was not based on the initial contractual agreement between the LCC and Mr Nathan, it did not give Prudential a right to use the land until it was needed for road widening.

Secondly, the dispute in Prudential did not involve the initial parties to the 1930 agreement: the LRB had made no express promise to allow Prudential to use the land until it was needed for road-widening. This raises the question of what would have happened if the LCC had tried to remove Mr Nathan from the land before it was needed for road-widening: could Mr Nathan have then asked for an injunction preventing the LCC from breaching its promise? As we will see in the next extract, this question was later addressed (albeit in obiter dicta) by the Supreme Court in Berrisford v Mexfield.[63]

Third, whilst the House of Lords in Prudential Assurance upheld the traditional rule that a lease must have a maximum duration, Lord Browne-Wilkinson expressed some displeasure with the result: it was a 'bizarre outcome' caused by an 'ancient and technical rule of law'. It should be said that it is a straightforward matter for well-advised parties to avoid the effect of the rule: for example, as noted by Lord Templeman in Prudential Assurance,[64] there is nothing to prevent A from giving B a lease 'for 999 years, to determine if and when the land is need for road-widening'—such a lease is for a limited period, because 999 years provides a clear maximum duration for the lease. Indeed, this tactic has been adopted by statute to save certain types of intended lease.

[63] [2011] UKSC 52. [64] [1992] 2 AC 386, 395.

Law of Property Act 1925, s 149(6)

> Any lease or underlease, at a rent, or in consideration of a fine, for life or lives or for any term of years determinable with life or lives, or on the marriage of the lessee, or any contract therefor, made before or after the commencement of this Act, or created by virtue of Part V of the Law of Property Act, 1922, shall take effect as a lease, underlease or contract therefor, for a term of ninety years determinable after the death or marriage (as the case may be) of the original lessee, or of the survivor of the original lessees, by at least one month's notice in writing given to determine the same on one of the quarter days applicable to the tenancy, either by the lessor or the persons deriving title under him, to the person entitled to the leasehold interest, or if no such person is in existence by affixing the same to the premises, or by the lessee or other persons in whom the leasehold interest is vested to the lessor or the persons deriving title under him:
>
> Provided that [. . .]

There are further provisos to s 149(6) of the LPA 1925, but the key point for our purposes is that certain forms of lease (e.g. a lease for B's life) are validated by interpreting the lease as a lease for a fixed term (ninety years), with the landlord having the power to determine the lease following the occurrence of a particular event (e.g. B's death).

It is, therefore, tempting to ask, along with Lord Browne-Wilkinson, whether the traditional rule, requiring a lease to have a maximum duration ascertainable at its outset, should be reformed. Lord Browne-Wilkinson's preference was for statutory reform, but, in the following case, the Supreme Court, sitting in a panel of seven, were given the opportunity to consider judicial reform of the rule. The case involved both of the initial parties to the agreement, so it also gave the court a chance to look at one of the loose ends from Prudential Assurance noted above: if a particular term of the parties' agreement prevents a lease arising, by introducing uncertainty, can it nonetheless be enforced between the initial parties as a matter of contract law?

Berrisford v Mexfield Housing Co-operative Limited
[2011] UKSC 52, SC

Facts: Ms Berrisford owned a property in Barnet, North London. She was having difficulty paying the mortgage. In 1993, as part of a 'mortgage rescue scheme', she sold the property to Mexfield, a fully mutual housing co-operative. Mexfield then agreed to allow Ms Berrisford to continue in occupation of the property, and she became a member of the Mexfield co-operative. The statutory protection available to social tenants does not apply to members of housing co-operatives: Parliament took the view that such protection was unnecessary, as, in a co-operative, the 'interests of landlord and tenants as a whole are in effect indivisible'.[65]

Clause 1 of the occupation agreement stated that:

> '[Mexfield] shall let and [Ms Berrisord] shall take the [premises] from 13 December 1993 and thereafter from month to month until determined as provided in this Agreement.'

[65] See the judgment of Lord Hope at [81], set out below. For further discussion of this analysis, see Loveland, 'Security of Tenure for Tenants of Fully Mutual Housing Co-operatives' [2010] Conv 461, 464.

Clauses 5 and 6 were as follows:

> 5. 'This Agreement shall be determinable by [Ms Berrisford] giving [Mexfield] one month's notice in writing.'
> 6. 'This Agreement may be brought to an end by [Mexfield] by the exercise of the right of re-entry specified in this clause but ONLY in the following circumstances:
>   a) If the rent reserved hereby or any part thereof shall at any time be in arrear and unpaid for 21 days [. . .]
>   b) If [Ms Berrisford] shall at any time fail or neglect to perform or observe any of the [terms of] this Agreement which are to be performed and observed by [her]
>   c) If [Ms Berrisford] shall cease to be a member of [Mexfield] >   d) If a resolution is passed under [. . .] [Mexfield's] Rules regarding a proposal to dissolve [Mexfield]
>
> THEN in each case it shall be lawful for [Mexfield] to re-enter upon the premises and peaceably to hold and enjoy the premises thenceforth and so that the rights to occupy the premises shall absolutely end and determine as if this Agreement had not be made [. . .]'

Ms Berrisford remained in occupation until 2008, at which point Mexfield attempted to remove her from the property. Mexfield admitted that none of the circumstances set out in Clause 6 applied. Nonetheless, it argued that Clause 6 and, indeed, the entire occupancy agreement, was void—it fell foul of the need for a lease to have a certain term. As a result, Mexfield argued that Ms Berrisford did not occupy under the parties' written agreement, but rather under an implied (weekly or monthly) periodic tenancy, arising from her payment, and Mexfield's acceptance, of rent. On this view, Mexfield was not bound by the limits imposed in Clause 6 and was free to remove Ms Berrisford after refusing to renew the implied periodic tenancy.

In the end, Mexfield entered into a new agreement with Ms Berrisford, allowing her to remain in occupation of the property. The litigation was allowed to continue, however, to determine the status of Ms Berrisford's occupation prior to that new agreement. This is an important issue as the occupation agreement entered into by Mexfield and Ms Berrisford is of a standard form used not only by Mexfield, but also by many other housing co-operatives.

At first instance, His Honour Judge Mitchell refused Mexfield's application for summary judgment. Peter Smith J, on appeal, accepted Mexfield's analysis and made a possession order in its favour; Ms Berrisford then appealed to the Court of Appeal. The appeal was dismissed, but Wilson LJ dissented from the majority position of Aikens and Mummery LJJ. The case then proceeded to the Supreme Court.

The Supreme Court heard the case in a special panel of seven Justices. Ms Berrisford, however, did not directly challenge the traditional rule, affirmed in Prudential Assurance, that a lease must have a maximum duration, ascertainable from its outset. As a result, the Supreme Court were not invited to overrule Prudential Assurance and to discard that rule. Ms Berrisford thus accepted that the occupation agreement, on its own terms, did not create a lease. Nonetheless, she put forward two key reasons in support of the conclusion that Mexfield could remove her from the property only if one of the events set out in Clause 6 had occurred.

The first (a new argument, introduced only at the Supreme Court stage of the appeal) was that, prior to 1926, the occupation agreement would have been treated as a tenancy for the life of Ms Berrisford, which could be terminated by Mexfield during her life only under Clause 6. If that argument was correct, then s 149(6) of the Law of Property Act 1925 would apply, with the effect that Ms Berrisford had a 90 year lease, which could be terminated by Mexfield only on her death, or if one of the events set out in Clause 6 had occurred.

Ms Berrisford's second argument, accepted by Wilson LJ in his dissent in the Court of Appeal, was that, even if Clause 6 could not form part of a valid lease, it was nonetheless contractually binding on Mexfield and so Mexfield could be prevented from removing her in breach of the terms of Clause 6.[66]

The Supreme Court allowed Ms Berrisford's appeal: it rejected both of Mexfield's arguments, and accepted Ms Berrisford's first argument. It was not, therefore, strictly necessary for the court to consider her second argument, but a number of the Justices did so in any case—Lord Clarke took the view (at [108]) that Ms Berrisford's second argument was correct, and Lord Neuberger (at [59]), Lord Hope (at [80]), and Lord Dyson (at [120]) all indicated that they found that second argument convincing. As Ms Berrisford did not ask the court to overrule Prudential Assurance, it did not consider doing so; but, as can be seen in the extracts below, some of the Justices expressed their views as to the (lack of) merits of the rule that a lease must have a certain term.

Lord Neuberger

At [23]

Is Such An Arrangement Capable Of Being A Tenancy As A Matter of Law?

I turn to the second issue, namely whether an agreement, which can only come to an end by service of one month's notice by the tenant, or by the landlord invoking a right of determination on one or more of the grounds set out in clause 6, is capable, as a matter of law, of being a tenancy in accordance with its terms. [Counsel for Ms Berrisford] accepts that it is not so capable. His concession is supported both by very old authority and by high modern authority.

[Lord Neuberger then considered cases and commentary, up to and including Prudential Assurance, confirming what Lord Templeman in that case referred to as '500 years of judicial acceptance [that] the requirement that a term must be certain applies to all leases and tenancy agreements'].[67]

At [34]–[70]

If we accept that that is indeed the law, then, subject to the point to which I next turn, the Agreement cannot take effect as a tenancy according to its terms. As the judgment of Lady Hale demonstrates (and as indeed the disquiet expressed by Lord Browne-Wilkinson and others in Prudential itself shows), the law is not in a satisfactory state. There is no apparent practical justification for holding that an agreement for a term of uncertain duration cannot give rise to a tenancy, or that a fetter of uncertain duration on the right to serve a notice to quit is invalid. There is therefore much to be said for changing the law, and overruling what may be called the certainty requirement, which was affirmed in Prudential, on the ground that, in so far as it had any practical justification, that justification has long since gone, and, in so far as it is based on principle, the principle is not fundamental enough for the Supreme Court to [66] Mexfield also introduced a new argument before the Supreme Court. As well as its principal argument that the terms of the agreement itself could not create a lease, it also argued that the agreement itself gave Mexfield an implied contractual right to determine the lease with one month's notice. This argument was swiftly rejected by the Supreme Court as it involved an implausible interpretation of the parties' contract: see per Lord Neuberger at [18]–[23].

[67] [1992] 2 AC 386, 394

be bound by it. It may be added that Lady Hale's Carrollian characterisation of the law on this topic is reinforced by the fact that the common law accepted perpetually renewable leases as valid: they have been converted into 2000-year terms by s 145 of the Law of Property Act 1922.

However, I would not support jettisoning the certainty requirement, at any rate in this case. First, as the discussion earlier in this judgment shows, it does appear that for many centuries it has been regarded as fundamental to the concept of a term of years that it had a certain duration when it was created. It seems logical that the subsequent development of a term from year to year (ie a periodic tenancy) should carry with it a similar requirement, and the case law also seems to support this.

Secondly, the 1925 Act appears to support this conclusion. Having stated in s 1(1) that only two estates can exist in land, a fee simple and a term of years, it then defines a term of years in s 205(1)(xxvii) as meaning "a term of years [. . .] either certain or liable to determination by notice [or] re-entry"; as Lord Templeman said in Prudential,[68] this seems to underwrite the established common law position. The notion that the 1925 Act assumed that the certainty requirement existed appears to be supported by the terms of s 149(6). As explained more fully below, this provision effectively converts a life tenancy into a determinable term of 90 years. A tenancy for life is a term of uncertain duration, and it was a species of freehold estate prior to 1926, but, in the light of s 1 of the 1925 Act, if it was to retain its status as a legal estate, it could only be a term of years after that date. Presumably it was converted into a 90-year term because those responsible for drafting the 1925 Act thought it could not be a term of years otherwise.

Thirdly, the certainty requirement was confirmed only some 20 years ago by the House of Lords. Fourthly, while not a very attractive point, there is the concern expressed by Lord Browne-Wilkinson, namely that to change the law in this field "might upset long established titles".[69] Fifthly, at least where the purported grant is to an individual, as opposed to a company or corporation, the arrangement does in fact give rise to a valid tenancy, as explained below. Finally, it has been no part of either party's case that the Agreement gave rise to a valid tenancy according to its terms (if, as I have concluded, it has the meaning for which [Ms Berrisford's counsel] contends).

Would such a tenancy have been treated as a tenancy for life before 1926?

While [counsel for Ms Berrisford] accepts that the arrangement contained in the Agreement would not be capable of constituting a tenancy in accordance with its terms, he contends that, at any rate before 1926, the arrangement would have been treated by the court as a tenancy for the life of Ms Berrisford, determinable before her death by her under cl 5, or by Mexfield under cl 6.

There is much authority to support the proposition that, before the 1925 Act came into force, an agreement for an uncertain term was treated as a tenancy for the life of the tenant, determinable before the tenant's death according to its terms. In Bracton,[70] it will be recalled that the grant of an uncertain term was held to give rise to a "free tenement", provided that the formalities had been complied with. The nature of this free tenement would appear to be a tenancy for the life of the grantee. That is clear from what was said in Littleton on Tenures namely:

> "[I]f an abbot make a lease to a man, to have and to hold to him during the time that he is abbot [. . .] the lessee hath an estate for the term of his owne life: but this is on condition [. . .] that if the abbot resign, or be deposed, that then it shall be lawful for his successor to enter."[71]

[68] [1992] 2 AC 386, 391B. [69] [1992] 2 AC 386, 397A.
[70] Bracton on the Laws and Customs of England (trans Professor E Thorne) (1977, vol 3), p 50 (f176b).
[71] Littleton on Tenures (1481/2) vol 2, s 382.

In Co Litt vol 1, p 42a,[72] it is similarly stated that if an estate is granted to a person until, inter alia, she marries, or so long as she pays £40 "or for any like incertaine term", "the lessee hath in judgment of law an estate for life determinable if [the formalities of creation are satisfied]". This passage was quoted and applied by North J in In re Carne's Settled Estates.[73] The same point was made in Sheppard's Touchstones on Common Assurances,[74] where it is said that "uncertain leases made with [. . .] limitations [. . .] may be good leases for life determinable on these contingents, albeit they be no good leases for years".

In Doe v Browne,[75] Lord Ellenborough CJ and Lawrence J, both of whom rejected the contention that an agreement which was to continue so long as the tenant paid the rent and did not harm the landlord's business could be a valid term of years, said that it could be "an estate for life", but that it failed to achieve this status because the necessary formalities had not been complied with. Such formalities have now largely been done away with, and they normally only require a written, signed document. As Lord Dyson's reference to Joshua Williams's 1920 textbook shows, the perceived legal position right up to the time of the 1925 property legislation was that terms of uncertain duration were converted into determinable terms for life.

On this basis, then it seems clear that, at least if the Agreement had been entered into before 1 January 1926 (when the 1925 Act came into force), it would have been treated by the court as being the grant of a tenancy to Ms Berrisford for her life, subject to her right to determine pursuant to cl 5 and Mexfield's right to determine pursuant to cl 6.

[Counsel for Mexfield] relies on more recent authorities to support a contention that an agreement for an uncertain term was only regarded as creating a tenancy for life if, on a fair reading of the agreement, that was what the parties to the agreement intended [. . .]

In my judgment, however, there are three answers to that contention. The first is that the reasoning in Zimbler v Abrahams[76] is not strictly inconsistent with [counsel for Ms Berrisford's] analysis: if, as a matter of interpretation, the agreement in that case did involve the grant of a tenancy for life, then there was no need to invoke [counsel for Ms Berrisford's] analysis, but that does not mean that the analysis is wrong. Secondly, if Zimbler did proceed on the assumption that an agreement which purported to create a tenancy for an uncertain term could not give rise to a tenancy for life unless it was the parties' intention to do so, it was wrong, as it would have been inconsistent with the authoritative dicta relied on by [counsel for Ms Berrisford], in particular the clear statement in Littleton, vol 2, s 382 [. . .] Thirdly, even if an agreement which creates an uncertain term could only have resulted in a tenancy for the life of the tenant if that was the intention of the parties, I consider that, on a true construction of the Agreement, it was intended that Ms Berrisford enjoy the premises for life - subject, of course, to determination pursuant to clauses 5 and 6. I have in mind in particular cl 6(c), which will apply on Ms Berrisford's death, the fact that her interest is unassignable, and the fact that it was intended to ensure that she could stay in her home.

Is the agreement converted into a 90-year term by s 149(6)?

The next step in [counsel for Ms Berrisford's] argument is that, given that the Agreement would have given rise to a tenancy for life prior to 1926, the effect of s 149(6) of the 1925 Act ("s 149(6)") is that the Agreement is now to be treated as a term of 90 years determinable on the death of Ms Berrisford, subject to the rights of determination in clauses 5 and 6.

[The wording of s.149(6), extracted above, is then set out]

[72] [This is a reference to Coke's commentary on Littleton's Tenures].
[73] [1899] 1 Ch 324, 329, 68 LJ Ch 120, 47 WR 352.
[74] 7th edn (1821, vol 2), p 275.
[75] (1807) 8 East 165, 166–7.
[76] [1903] 1 KB 577.

As already mentioned, the 1925 Act began by limiting the number of permissible legal estates in land to two, a fee simple and a term of years. Accordingly, it was necessary for the statute to deal with interests, such as estates for lives, which had previously been, but no longer were, valid legal estates. Hence one of the reasons for s 149(6). However, it is clear from its terms that the section was not merely concerned with preserving life interests which existed prior to 1 January 1926: it also expressly applies to life interests granted thereafter. Therefore, says [counsel for Ms Berrisford], the section converts an arrangement such as the Agreement, which, according to the common law, is a life tenancy into a 90-year term.

The first argument which might be raised against this contention is that the Agreement was not a "lease [. . .] for life", merely a contract which would have been treated by established case law as such a lease. I do not consider that can be right. Apart from not being consistent with the wording of s 149(6), it would mean that an agreement such as that described in Littleton s 382, which existed as a continuing valid determinable life estate on the 1 January 1926, would have lost its status as a legal estate, as it would not have been saved by s 149(6): that cannot have been the legislature's intention.

[Counsel for Mexfield] contends that s 149(6) is concerned with tenancies which automatically end with the tenant's death, not with tenancies which can be determined on the tenant's death, and, in this case, the effect of cl 6(c) is that the tenancy can be determined, not that it automatically determines, on the tenant's death. I accept that s 149(6) only applies to tenancies which automatically determine on death, and I am prepared to assume that cl 6(c) can only be invoked by service of a notice. However, the argument misses the point, because the Agreement is (or would be in the absence of ss 1 and 149 of the 1925 Act) a tenancy for life, not because of the specific terms of, or circumstances described in, cl 6(c), but because it is treated as such by a well-established common law rule.

It is also suggested that s 149(6) does not apply to arrangements such as the Agreement which are determinable in circumstances other than the tenant's death—eg on the grounds set out in cl 6. I can see no reasons of principle for accepting that contention, and it appears to me that there are strong practical reasons for rejecting it. The common law rule that uncertain terms were treated as life tenancies applied, almost by definition, to arrangements which determined in other events, and it is hard, indeed impossible, to see why the rule should be limited to cases where an event automatically determines the term, as opposed to cases where an event entitles the landlord to serve notice to determine the term. In each case, the term is uncertain. At least one of the reasons the common law treated uncertain terms as tenancies for lives was, as I see it, to save arrangements which would otherwise be invalidated for technical reasons, and I find it hard to accept that the modern law requires the court to adopt a less benevolent approach to saving contractual arrangements. [. . .]

It is strongly pressed by [counsel for Mexfield] that the conclusion that the Agreement gives rise to a valid tenancy for 90 years determinable on the tenant's death would be inconsistent with high modern authority. In particular, he said that such a conclusion would be contrary to the outcome in Lace v Chantler,[77] and inconsistent with clear dicta of Lord Greene MR in that case and of Lord Templeman in Prudential. I accept the factual basis for that argument, but do not agree with its suggested conclusion.

The fact is that it was not argued in either of those two cases that the arrangement involved would have created a life tenancy as a matter of common law, and that, following s 149(6), such an arrangement would now give rise to a 90-year term, determinable on the tenant's death (and [counsel for Ms Berrisford] was kind enough to point out that such an argument would not have assisted, and may even have harmed, the unsuccessful respondent's case in Prudential).[78] Some of the statements about the law by Lord Greene and Lord Templeman can now be seen to be extravagant or inaccurately wide, but it is only fair to them to repeat that this was, at least in part, because the tenancy for life argument was not raised before them.

[77] [1944] KB 368.

Is Ms Berrisford accordingly entitled to retain possession?

For the reasons given, I accept [counsel for Ms Berrisford's] case that (i) the arrangement contained in the Agreement could only be determined in accordance with clauses 5 and 6, and not otherwise, (ii) such an arrangement cannot take effect as a tenancy in accordance with its terms, but (iii) by virtue of well-established common law rules and s 149(6), the arrangement is a tenancy for a term of 90 years determinable on the tenant's death by one month's notice from the landlord, and determinable in accordance with its terms, ie pursuant to clauses 5 and 6.

I indicated earlier in this judgment that this conclusion would apply irrespective of whether the purported tenancy created by the Agreement was simply for an indeterminate term or was a periodic tenancy with a fetter on the landlord's right to determine. There is no difficulty if the former is the right analysis. If the latter is correct, then there is a monthly tenancy which the landlord is unable to determine unless he can rely on one or more of the grounds in cl 6. In Breams Property Investment co Ltd v Strougler,[79] the court concluded that a periodic tenancy with a fetter on the landlord's right to determine for three years was valid. It seems to me that the term thereby created was equivalent to a fixed term of three years (subject to a restricted right of determination in the landlord and an unrestricted right of determination by the tenant) followed by a periodic tenancy.

Accordingly a periodic tenancy with an invalid fetter on the landlord's right to determine should be treated in the same way as a tenancy for a fixed, if indeterminate, term. That seems to me to be justified in principle, logical in theory, and it ensures the law in this area is the same for all types of tenancy, whether or not periodic in nature (which was, I think, part of the reasoning in Prudential). On that basis, even if the tenancy created by the Agreement was a monthly tenancy with an objectionable fetter, it seems to me that it would have been treated as a life estate under the old law (subject to the right to determine in accordance with the terms of the fetter), and so would now be a tenancy for 90 years.

Ms Berrisford is still alive, and it is common ground that she has not served notice under cl 5 and that Mexfield is not relying on cl 6. In those circumstances, it follows that Ms Berrisford retains her tenancy of the premises and that Mexfield is not entitled to possession.

Ms Berrisford's alternative case in contract

This conclusion renders it unnecessary to consider two alternative arguments, which were raised by [counsel for Ms Berrisford], namely that (i) if the Agreement did not create a tenancy, it nonetheless gave rise to a binding personal contract between Mexfield and Ms Berrisford, which Ms Berrisford is entitled to enforce against Mexfield so long as it owns the premises, or (ii) if the Agreement created a periodic tenancy with an impermissible fetter on the right of the landlord to serve notice to quit, the fetter is nonetheless enforceable as against Mexfield so long as it is the owner of the premises.

However, having heard full submissions on those two arguments, I incline fairly strongly to the view that, if Ms Berisford had failed in establishing that she had a subsisting tenancy of the premises, she would nonetheless have defeated Mexfield's claim for possession on the ground that she is entitled to enforce her contractual rights.

78 [After all, in Prudential Assurance, it is likely to have been the case that Mr Nathan, the original tenant, had died by the time of the litigation (see per Lady Hale at [92]): a lease for Mr Nathan's life would therefore have been of little use to his successors in title, the respondents in that case.]

79 [1948] 2 KB 1.

If the Agreement does not create a tenancy for technical reasons, namely because it purports to create an uncertain term, it is hard to see why, as a matter of principle, it should not be capable of taking effect as a contract, enforceable as between the parties personally, albeit not capable of binding their respective successors, as no interest in land or other proprietary interest would subsist.

The argument to the contrary rests in part on authority and in part on principle. So far as authority is concerned, the point at issue was specifically addressed and rejected by Lord Greene in Lace v Chantler in these terms:

> '[Counsel] argued that the agreement could be construed as an agreement to grant a licence. In my opinion, it is impossible to construe it in that sense. The intention was to create a tenancy and nothing else. The law says that it is bad as a tenancy. The court is not then justified in treating the contract as something different from what the parties intended [...] That would be setting up a new bargain which neither of the parties ever intended to enter into.'[80]

So, too, in Prudential, it appears that Lord Templeman treated as void a fetter for an indefinite period on the right of the landlord under a periodic tenancy to serve a notice to quit.

It does not seem to me that the observations of Lord Greene, although they are strongly expressed views of a highly reputable judge, can withstand principled analysis. As Lord Templeman made clear in Street v Mountford,[81] while the parties' rights and obligations are primarily determined by what they have agreed, the legal characterisation of those rights is ultimately a matter of law. If the Agreement is incapable of giving rise to a tenancy for some old and technical rule of property law, I do not see why, as a matter of principle, that should render the Agreement invalid as a matter of contract.

The fact that the parties may have thought they were creating a tenancy is no reason for not holding that they have agreed a contractual licence any more than in Street, the fact that the parties clearly intended to create a licence precluded the court from holding that they had, as a matter of law, created a tenancy [...]

[Counsel for Mexfield] relies on Street to support another argument, namely that the Agreement could not amount to a licence because it granted the occupier exclusive possession, which is the hallmark of a tenancy. In my view, there is nothing in that argument. The hallmarks of a tenancy include the grant of exclusive possession, but they also include a fixed or periodic term. That was emphasised by Lord Templeman in Street at several points in his judgment, where he referred to a tenancy having to be for "a term of years absolute", "a fixed or periodic term certain", or (in a formulation which he approved and adopted) "for a term or from year to year or for a life or lives".[82] Further, as Lord Templeman made clear more than once, the rule that an occupier who enjoys possession is a tenant admits of exceptions, even where the occupier has been granted a fixed or periodic term.[83] [...]

If the Agreement cannot give rise to a tenancy, then, if it is not a contractual licence, the only right that Ms Berrisford could claim would be that of a periodic tenant on the terms of the written Agreement in so far as they are consistent with a periodic tenancy, because she has been in possession purportedly under the Agreement, paying a weekly rent to Mexfield. It is worth briefly considering why she would be a periodic tenant on this basis, not least because it is Mexfield's contention that this is the right analysis.

It would be because the law will infer a contract on these terms from the actions of the parties, namely the terms they purported to agree in the Agreement, and Ms Berrisford's

[80] [1944] KB 368, 371–2.
[81] [1985] AC 809.
[82] 1985] AC 809, 814E–F, 818E, and 827C and E.
[83] [1985] AC 809, 818E–F and 823D–E.

enjoyment of possession and payment of rent. But the ultimate basis for inferring a tenancy (and its terms) is the same as the basis for inferring any contract (and its terms) between two parties, namely what a reasonable observer, knowing what they have communicated to each other, considers that they are likely to have intended. Given that no question of statutory protection could arise, it seems to me far less likely that the parties would have intended a weekly tenancy determinable at any time on one month's notice than a licence which could only be determined pursuant to clauses 5 and 6. [...]

That leaves [counsel for Ms Berrisford's] further alternative argument, namely that, if Mexfield is right and there is a periodic tenancy, then, even if the fetter on the landlord's right to serve a notice to quit is objectionable in landlord and tenant law, it can be enforced as between the original parties as a matter of contract. That was the basis on which Wilson LJ felt able to find for Ms Berrisford in the Court of Appeal. I prefer to say nothing about that point: I have already dealt with one alternative reason for allowing this appeal, so considering this argument would involve making two successive counter-factual assumptions, rarely a satisfactory basis for deciding a point of law.

Conclusion

In these circumstances, I would allow Ms Berrisford's appeal, and discharge the order made against her. It is only right to repeat that the Court of Appeal and Peter Smith J were bound by authority which made it impossible for them to reach the same conclusion as I have done on the points on which I would allow the appeal.

Lord Hope

[Lord Hope considered how Scottish law would deal with the facts of the case, noting that a lease is seen principally as a contract conferring only personal rights, and can have proprietary effect against third parties only if the requirements of the Leases Act 1449 are met. He also noted that, under the relevant Scottish housing legislation, it was very likely that a body such as Mexfield would be a registered social landlord and that an occupier such as Ms Berrisford would thus have the statutory protection of a secure tenancy]

At [80]–[81]

I have to confess that I have found it difficult to understand why English law finds it so difficult to hold that, if an agreement of this kind cannot for technical reasons take effect as a tenancy, it can be regarded as binding on the parties simply by force of contract. I appreciate the problems that would need to be faced if it was necessary for the agreement to have proprietary effect, which it would if the dispute had not been between the original contracting parties. As it is, however, the essence of the dispute between the parties in this case seems to me to be about the effect of the contract which they entered into. One might have expected it to be capable of being solved by applying the ordinary principles of the law of contract without having to resolve questions about the effect of the agreement on the parties' proprietary interests or what the agreement is to be called. But I entirely understand that the contrary view is supported by a very substantial body of authority. It can by no means be lightly brushed aside, and I am persuaded that, for all the reasons that Lord Neuberger gives, it would not be appropriate for us to consider changing the law as to what constitutes what English law will hold to be a tenancy, at least in this case.

I also wonder whether the time has not now come for the legislative fetter which prevents mutual housing associations from granting protected or statutory tenancies in England and Wales to be removed, so that they are placed on the same footing as other providers of social housing as in Scotland. The reason that was given by the Minister of State in the Department of the Environment, the Earl of Caithness, for introducing an amendment to the Bill which became the Housing Act 1988 that provided that a fully mutual housing association cannot create an assured tenancy was that a statutory regime designed to regulate the relationship between landlord and tenant had little relevance in a situation "where, as is the nature of a co-operative, the interests of landlord and tenants as a whole are in effect indivisible.[84] That statement was repeated in the House of Commons by the Parliamentary Under Secretary of State, David Trippier, when the Lords amendment was approved.[85] The facts of this case suggest that, as least so far as Mexfield is concerned, that happy state of affairs no longer exists. The assumption on which that measure was put through Parliament seems now to rest on doubtful foundations, as financial pressures may cause the parties' interests to diverge to the detriment of the residential occupier. That is not something that this court can deal with. But I suggest that it is something that might be considered in any future programme for the reform of housing law.

Lady Hale

At [87]–[88]

Periodic tenancies obviously pose something of a puzzle if the law insists that the maximum term of any leasehold estate be certain. The rule was invented long before periodic tenancies were invented and it has always been a problem how the rule is to apply to them. In one sense the term is certain, as it comes to an end when the week, the month, the quarter or the year for which it has been granted comes to an end. But that is not the practical reality, as the law assumes a re-letting (or the extension of the term) at the end of each period, unless one or other of the parties gives notice to quit. So the actual maximum term is completely uncertain. But the theory is that, as long as each party is free to give that notice whenever they want, the legal maximum remains certain. Uncertainty is introduced if either party is forbidden to give that notice except in circumstances which may never arise. Then no-one knows how long the term may last and indeed it may last for ever.

These rules have an Alice in Wonderland quality which makes it unsurprising that distinguished judges have sometimes had difficulty with them [...]

At [93]–[96]

So we have now reached a position which is curiouser and curiouser. There is a rule against uncertainty which applies both to single terms of uncertain duration and to periodic tenancies with a curb on the power of either party to serve a notice to quit unless and until uncertain events occur. But this rule does not matter if the tenant is an individual, because the common law would have automatically turned the uncertain term into a tenancy for life, provided that the necessary formalities were complied with, before the Law of Property Act 1925. A tenancy for life was permissible at common law, although of course it was quite uncertain when the event would happen, but it was certain that it would. I suppose at the time of the hundred years' war there was uncertainty both as to the "when" and the "whether" it would ever end. Be that as it may, a tenancy for life is converted into a 90 year lease by the 1925 Act.

As it happens, in the particular agreement with which we are concerned, it is not difficult to conclude that the parties did in fact intend a lease for life determinable earlier by the tenant on one month's notice and by the landlords on the happening of certain specified events. So our conclusions are in fact reflecting the intentions of the parties. But it is not difficult to imagine circumstances in which the same analysis would apply but be very far from the intentions of the parties. And that analysis is not available where the tenant is a company or corporation. So there the court is unable to give effect to the undoubted intentions of the parties. Yet, as the court pointed out in Midland Railway,[86] it is always open to the parties to give effect to those intentions by granting a very long term of years, determinable earlier on the happening of the uncertain event. The law, it would seem, has no policy objection to such an arrangement, so it is difficult to see what policy objection it can have to upholding the arrangement to which the parties in fact came.

84 Hansard (HL Debates), 3 November 1988, vol 501, col 395.
85 Hansard (HC Debates), 9 November 1988, vol 140, col 337.

It is even more bizarre that, had the "tenancy for life" analysis not been available, the conclusion might have been, not that this was a contractual tenancy enforceable as such as between the original parties, but that it was a contractual licence, also enforceable as such between the original parties. This, as I understand it, is the difference between English and Scots law. I do not understand that it makes any difference to the result.

As will be apparent, I entirely agree with the reasoning and conclusions reached by Lord Neuberger on the first question: does Ms Berrisford have a subsisting tenancy? For that reason, I do not think it necessary to express an opinion on the alternative case in contract. But it seems to me obvious that the consequence of our having reached the conclusions which we have on the first issue is to make the reconsideration of the decision in Prudential, whether by this court or by Parliament, a matter of some urgency. As former Law Commissioner Stuart Bridge has argued:[87]

> "If the parties to a periodic tenancy know where they stand, in the sense that the contract between them is sufficiently certain, then that should be enough. If a landlord, in this case a fully mutual housing association, decides that its tenants should be entitled to remain in possession unless and until they fall into arrears with their rent or break other provisions contained in the tenancy agreement, it is difficult to see what policy objectives are being furthered in denying the tenant the rights that the agreement seeks to create."

Quite so.

Lord Dyson

At [116]–[120]

At all events, as a result of [counsel for Ms Berrisford's] impressive and scholarly research (which was not placed before the Court of Appeal), it is clear that it is unnecessary to get rid of the uncertainty rule in this case. This is because before the enactment of the Law of Property Act 1925 ("the 1925 Act"), the tenancy purportedly created by the Agreement would have been treated as a tenancy for life, defeasible by determination on any of the grounds specified in clauses 5 and 6. Lord Neuberger has referred to some of the pre-1926 authorities at paras 37 to 39. The position is well summarised in the last edition of the standard work on land law before the 1925 legislation, Joshua Williams' Law of Real Property,[88] in these terms:

> 'Where land is given to a widow during her widowhood, or to a man until he shall become bankrupt, or for any other definite period of time of uncertain duration, a freehold estate is conferred, as in the case of a gift for life. Such estates are regarded in law as determinable life estates [...]' (Emphasis added).

Accordingly, a periodic tenancy determinable on an uncertain event was treated as a defeasible tenancy for life. In disputing this proposition, [counsel for Mexfield's] principal submission was that, before the enactment of the 1925 Act, the question whether a periodic tenancy determinable on an uncertain event was a defeasible tenancy for life was one of construction of the particular agreement. But, as Lord Neuberger explains, it is clear from the authorities that this is incorrect. It was a rule of the common law that such a tenancy was automatically treated as a tenancy for life. It had nothing to do with the intention of the parties.

86 In re Midland Railway Co's Agreement [1971] Ch 725.

87 [2010] Conv 492, 497.

88 23rd edn (1920, p 135).

The effect of s 149(6) of the 1925 Act was to convert such a tenancy into a term for 90 years, subject to earlier termination in accordance with its terms. It follows that the Agreement is such a tenancy and all the terms of cl 6 apply with full force and effect. Mexfield cannot terminate the Agreement by serving a notice to quit as if this were a simple monthly tenancy without more.

This is a just result which plainly accords with the intention of the parties. But it may legitimately be said that it is not satisfactory in the 21st century to have to adopt this chain of reasoning in order to arrive at such a result. It is highly technical. There should be no need to have to resort to such reasoning in order to arrive at the result which the parties intended. That is why the radical solution of doing away with the uncertainty rule altogether is so attractive. There is the further point that the s 149(6) route to the right result can only be followed where the purported tenant is an individual and not a corporate entity. To treat an individual and a corporate entity differently in this respect can only be explained on historical grounds. The explanation may lie in the realms of history, but that hardly provides a compelling justification for maintaining the distinction today.

To conclude, in my view the answer to this appeal lies in the law of landlord and tenant and the appeal must be allowed. I do not find it necessary to address the alternative arguments advanced by [counsel for Ms Berrisford]. I would, however, go so far as to say that, like Lord Neuberger (paras 57 to 62), I am strongly attracted by the submission that, if by reason of the uncertainty argument the Agreement did not create a tenancy, then it was enforceable as a contract according to its terms like any other contract.

In Prudential Assurance, Lord Browne-Wilkinson noted that the need for certainty of term may produce 'bizarre' or 'extraordinary' results. The facts of Berrisford form an almost perfect example of the apparent injustice to which the rule may lead. The basis on which Ms Berrisford sold her home and then entered into an agreement with Mexfield was that she would be secure in her occupation: that she could be removed only if one of the events set out in Clause 6 occurred. Mexfield's principal argument, successful in the front of Peter Smith J and the Court of Appeal, was that, notwithstanding the clear terms of Clause 6, Ms Berrisford could in fact be removed at the whim of Mexfield, provided that she was given one month's notice of Mexfield's intention not to renew her implied periodic tenancy.

It is no surprise, then, that the Supreme Court found a way to avoid that seemingly unjust result. It is important to note, first of all, that the Supreme Court's solution does not reform or remove the rule, applied in Prudential Assurance, that a lease involves exclusive possession of land for a limited period. The Supreme Court rather found that Ms Berrisford had a right to exclusive possession of her home for a maximum period of 90 years, with Mexfield having a power to end that right only on her death or if one of the events set out in Clause 6 occurred. To find that Ms Berrisford had such a right, the Supreme Court had to take two steps. First, her agreement with Mexfield, which seemingly gave her a right to exclusive possession for an uncertain term, was re-interpreted as giving her a right to exclusive possession for her life, determinable on the grounds set out in the agreement. This re-interpretation was the result of a common law principle that applied before the Law of Property Act 1925.

Second, it was held that, as Ms Berrisford had a right to exclusive possession for her life, determinable on the grounds set out in the agreement, s 149(6) of the LPA 1925 could be applied to turn her right into a 90 year lease, again determinable on the grounds set out in the agreement. The Supreme Court's analysis can therefore be set out as follows:

The parties' agreement gives Ms Berrisford a right to exclusive possession for an uncertain term, determinable on limited grounds.

Step 1: A common law principle transforms Ms Berrisford's right into a right to exclusive possession for her life, determinable on the limited grounds set out in the agreement.

Step 2: Section 149(6) of the LPA 1925 transforms Ms Berrisford's right into a lease for 90 years, determinable on her death as well as on the limited grounds set out in the agreement.

As Lord Templeman remarked in Prudential Assurance, it has always been a simple matter for well-advised parties to avoid the effects of the certainty of term rule: instead of a right to exclusive possession 'until the land is needed for road-widening', a party can be given such a right 'for 999 years, or until the land is needed for road-widening'. The solution adopted in Berrisford effectively allows for the same tactic to be applied, even if the parties did not think of it themselves. It is important to note, however, that the solution cannot work in cases where the purported lease is given to a company—in such cases, a right to exclusive possession 'for life' makes no sense, and therefore the common law rule, operating at Step 1 above, cannot apply. Following Berrisford, the case for some form of legislative intervention is very strong, as it is difficult to justify a position where the same agreement has a quite different effect depending on whether the tenant is a natural person or a company.

It is tempting to ask why, if the solution in Berrisford (including its interpretation of the LPA 1925) is correct, it had not previously been adopted by any court. This is not, however, a strong argument against the Berrisford analysis. Firstly, prior to Prudential Assurance, there had been Court of Appeal decisions which took a more relaxed approach to the need for certainty of term;[89] as a result, in a number of cases at least, there was no need to appeal to the Berrisford argument. Secondly, in some cases, such as Prudential Assurance itself, the Berrisford solution would have been of no use to the occupier of the land, as the death of the original tenant meant that, even if s 149(6) applied, the landlord would in any case have a right to end the lease.

There are, nonetheless, some difficulties with the Berrisford analysis. Firstly, the effect of the common law rule applied at Step 1 has to be carefully defined. For example, the 1920 textbook[90] quoted by Lord Dyson[91] states that where land is given for a 'definite period of time of uncertain duration, a freehold estate is conferred, as in the case of a gift for life. Such estates are regarded in law as determinable life estates [...]'. It is important to distinguish a determinable freehold for life from a lease for life. Prior to the LPA 1925, it was possible, for example, for a testator to leave his land to B1 for B1's life, then to B2 and thus to give each of B1 and B2 a legal estate: B1's estate was known as a life estate, and B2's estate as a fee simple in remainder. B1's estate, however, was not a lease: it was one of the three forms of freehold estate that could exist at common law before 1926.[92] So, for example, B1 held his life estate without being in a landlord-tenant relationship; B1's life estate counted as part of his 'real

89 See In re Midland Railway Co's Agreement [1971] Ch 725; Ashburn Anstalt v Arnold [1989] Ch 1.

90 Joshua Williams' Law of Real Property (23rd edn, 1920), p 135.

91 At [116].

92 The other two being the fee simple and the fee tail.

property', whereas a lease held by B1 would count as part of his 'personal property'; and B1 was subject to liability for waste to B2 (see Chapter 20, section 4).

On this analysis, the common law rule operating at Step 1 thus did not convert a lease for an uncertain term into a lease for life; it rather converted it into a (freehold) life estate. This may cause two problems for the reasoning in Berrisford. Firstly, can that common law rule still operate even after 1926, given that the life estate no longer exists as a legal estate in land? Secondly, if the common law rule does operate, then can Step 2 apply? After all, s 149(6) of the LPA applies to leases, not to (freehold) life estates.

Whatever one's view as to the validity of the Supreme Court's reasoning in Berrisford, one can also ask if, rather than adopting a technical work-around to the certainty of term rule, it would be simpler and better to remove the rule itself. It must be emphasised that, as the Supreme Court were not asked by either party to overrule Prudential Assurance, it would have been inappropriate for it to do so. Nonetheless, it may seem odd that the law is left with a rule for which judges in the highest court in the land have twice been unable to find a persuasive justification. The following extracts consider if a rationale for the rule can be found. The first focuses on a doctrinal explanation; the second, finding that explanation unconvincing, suggests that the rule, in some cases at least, may serve a useful policy purpose.

McFarlane, The Structure of Property Law (2008, pp 677–8)

A Lease consists of a right to exclusive control of land for a limited period. So, if A gives B a right to exclusive control of land "until England win the football World Cup" that right does not count as a Lease. The problem is not that the parties will be unable to tell if the specified event has happened: if and when England win the football World Cup, they (and everyone else) will know about it. The problem is rather that it is impossible for A to know if and when he can regain his right to exclusive control of the land. And that uncertainty is simply incompatible with a Lease. A Lease arises where A retains his property right in the land and grants B a new property right. So, if A grants B a Lease, A does not lose his property right in the land. But if it were possible to have a Lease in which A does not know if and when he will again have a right to exclusive control of the land, A's property right will, in effect, be meaningless [. . .]

[In Prudential Assurance] Lord Browne-Wilkinson expressed frustration that the rationale for the rule was unclear, stating that "No one has produced any satisfactory rationale for the genesis of the rule" that "the maximum duration of a [Lease must be] ascertainable from the outset". However, the problem may lie with his Lordship's formulation of the rule. It is not the case that the maximum length of the Lease must be known at the outset: the important point is that A must be able to tell if and when he will be able to assert his right to exclusive control of the land. The rule therefore has a valid doctrinal purpose.

Bright, Landlord and Tenant Law in Context (2007, pp 73–4)

The explanation for the certainty requirement is sometimes said to rest in the fact that it serves to distinguish leases, as determinate interests, from freeholds, which are of uncertain duration (such as for life, indefinitely, or until the happening of some future event). There are, however, difficulties with accepting this as a continuing justification for the rule. As seen, statute clearly accepts the notion of a lease for life as it provides that it is to be converted into a fixed period lease determinable on death, and this makes it therefore difficult to argue that determinancy can tell us on which side of the line an interest falls. Further, there are usually > other ways of knowing if an interest is freehold or leasehold, especially as it is common (though not universal) for a rent to be paid if there is a lease. It has also been argued that the rule is simply part of the numerus clausus principle in land law (the idea that there is a closed list of rights that can exist as property rights) and the certainty requirement draws a line which marks the boundary between property and contract rights. At one level, this is clearly true but it does not tell why the line is drawn where it is. The rule has also been supported for promoting careful drafting, but this would need only a rule requiring linguistic certainty.

>
> None of these explanations provides a convincing justification for retaining a rule which strikes down otherwise good commercial arrangements. Why should a landlord not be able to agree with a tenant that he can occupy a workshop 'until planning permission is obtained to redevelop the site'? [...] Although not designed for this purpose, the rule can have the benefit of releasing the landlord from what turns out to have been an improvident bargain. The commercial intention behind the workshop example is that the tenant occupies the workshop as an interim measure [...] The risk [...] is that it may become clear that planning permission will never be given, thereby creating a perpetual lease [...] This risk materialised in Prudential Assurance itself. The lease was to end when the land was needed for road widening. Circumstances changed, and the road was never widened. The 'lease' that had been intended to only be of short duration when granted in 1930 for a fixed rent of £30 per annum was still running in 1992, by which time the current rental value was in excess of £10,000 per annum. The fact that the letting was intended by the parties to be fairly short term and was drafted on that basis means that the arrangement, initially evenly balanced, became heavily slanted against the landlord over time. By declaring the lease void the court opens up the relationship so that it can be renegotiated to reflect current property values [...] But it is unlikely that the certainty rule was ever intended to facilitate contractual variation; and the problem remains that it strikes down not only the leases that have become unfair over time, but all leases with an unknown end-date.

As Bright notes, in particular cases (such as Prudential Assurance), the limited period requirement may be justifiable on the grounds that it allows a party to escape an improvident long-term contract. In Berrisford, in contrast, this effect of the rule was wholly unattractive: there would have been a clear injustice if Mexfield had been allowed to remove Ms Berrisford contrary to the terms of its agreement with her. One way to avoid that injustice would be to reform the rule that a lease must be for a limited period; but it must be noted that, as demonstrated by the decision of the Supreme Court in Berrisford, other solutions are possible. Indeed, as Lord Hope noted,[93] there is a strong case that the legislature erred in denying statutory protection to tenants of fully mutual housing co-operatives. Had Parliament taken a different view, the approach of the House of Lords in Prudential Assurance would have caused no difficulty to Ms Berrisford, as the implied periodic tenancy arising from her payment of rent, and Mexfield's acceptance of that rent, would have been enough to give her statutory protection and therefore to limit the grounds on which Mexfield, or any successor in title to Mexfield, could have removed her from the property.

2.8 EXCEPTIONS?

The discussion so far suggests that there is a relatively simple test for the content of a lease: does B have a right to exclusive possession of land for a limited period? In Street v Mountford, [93] [2011] UKSC 52, [81].

however, Lord Templeman set out a number of exceptions: situations in which B can have a right to exclusive possession without having a lease. We need to ask if those situations really do constitute exceptions to the basic rule.

Bruton v London and Quadrant Housing Trust
[1988] QB 834, CA[94]

Millett LJ

At 843

In Street v Mountford Lord Templeman gave only three examples of exceptional circumstances where the grant of exclusive possession does not create a tenancy. First, where the circumstances negative any intention to create legal relations at all. Secondly, where the possession of the grantee is referable to some other legal relationship such as vendor and purchaser or master and servant. Thirdly, where the grantor has no power to create a tenancy, as in the case of a requisitioning authority. As I pointed out in Camden London Borough v Shortlife Community Housing,[95] the first and third of these are not exceptions to a general rule. The relationship of landlord and tenant is a legal relationship. It cannot be brought into existence by an arrangement which is not intended to create legal relations at all or by a body which has no power to create it. The existence of these two categories is due to the fact that the creation of a tenancy requires the grant of a legal right to exclusive possession.

On the view of Millett LJ, which seems to be correct, we need to focus our attention on cases in which 'possession of [B] is referable to some other legal relationship such as vendor and purchaser or master and servant'. In Street v Mountford,[96] Lord Templeman stated that: 'an occupier who enjoys exclusive possession is not necessarily a tenant. He may be owner in fee simple, a trespasser, a mortgagee in possession, an object of charity or a service occupier.'

In the first three of those cases we can explain the absence of a lease by simply pointing to the absence of a term: B may have exclusive possession, but he does not have it for a limited period.[97] The 'object of charity' exception may admit of two explanations. Firstly, it may be that, as in Booker v Palmer[98] (see section 2.2 above), A's charitable motive means that he does not intend to enter legal relations with B. This may well be the case, where, for example, B pays no rent. In that case, the absence of a lease is easy to explain.

Secondly, in Gray v Taylor,[99] Mrs Taylor occupied an almshouse under an agreement with the trustees of a charity. Sir John Vinelott stated:[100] 'A person who is selected as an almsperson becomes a beneficiary under the trusts of the charity and enjoys the privilege of occupation of rooms in the almshouses as beneficiary.' As noted by Barr,[101] the analysis here seems to be that the occupier's rights come from her status as a 'beneficiary' of the charitable trust. The argument seems to be that the agreement between the parties, by itself, did not define Mrs Taylor's right to occupy; rather, that right flowed from, and depended on the continuation of, the charity's decision to regard her as a suitable recipient of its generosity. Equally, 94 See Chapter 23, section 3, for discussion of the facts of the case and the decision of the House of Lords.

95 (1992) 25 HLR 330.

96 [1985] AC 809, 825.

97 See McFarlane, The Structure of Property Law (2008), p 670.

98 [1942] 2 All ER 674.

99 [1998] 4 All ER 17.

100 Ibid, p 21.

101 Barr, 'Charitable Lettings and their Legal Pitfalls' in Modern Studies in Property Law (ed Cooke, 2001), pp 247–9.

of course, this approach promotes a policy of ensuring that landlords acting with altruistic motives are not hampered by the statutory protection that may be available to B if he or she is found to have a lease. Certainly, in Gray v Taylor, Sir John Vinelott noted that it would be absurd if, due to that statutory protection, the charity was prevented from ending the occupation of a party who, for example, won the lottery.

The final case, of a service occupier, can also be explained without needing to create an exception to the basic test for a lease. There is a general principle, not confined to land law, that an employee in possession of property in the course of his or her employment does not hold that possession in his or her own right, but instead holds it on behalf of on his or her employer.[102] That principle may now seem outdated and can certainly be attacked,[103] but, as long as it continues to exist, it ensures that a contractual agreement between an employer and an employee simply cannot give the employee a right to exclusive possession of property if that property is to be used by the employee in the course of his or her employment.

2.9 SUMMARY

It seems that, despite the supposed 'exceptional categories' noted by Lord Templeman in Street v Mountford, B has a lease (in the sense of a property right in land) if and only if he or she has a right to exclusive possession of land for a limited period, given to him or her by A, a party who has the power to give B such a property right.

The main complications arise from two sources. Firstly, it is necessary to analyse the agreement between A and B to see what legal rights it creates. It may be that, when asking if B has a right to exclusive possession, an apparent contractual term can be disregarded if it is a 'pretence'—that is, if it is clear that A had no intention to enforce that term in practice. As we saw in section 2.4 above, the court's power to disregard such apparent terms is, on one view, doctrinally justified: it is simply an application of a general concept which, when properly understood, makes such terms invalid as a matter of contract law. On another view, the disregarding of such terms is not doctrinally justified, and can be justified, if at all, only from a utility perspective: it denies A an easy means of withholding the statutory protection available, in some circumstances, to parties with a lease.

The second complication occurs where B1 and B2, acting together, claim to have a lease. It is currently the law that B1 and B2 can only have a lease if they are genuinely joint tenants—that is, if the four unities of possession, interest, time, and title are all present. On one view, this restriction is doctrinally justified;[104] on another, more widespread, view it is not: it overlooks the possibility that B1 and B2, acting together, can acquire a lease as tenants in common and thus without the need to show unity of interest, time, or title.[105] Certainly, from the utility perspective, it is hard to find a convincing policy argument for the restriction.

As we have seen throughout this section, it is important to remember that the courts' approach to the content of a lease may be shaped by the fact that, if B has such a right, he or she may qualify (or have qualified) for significant statutory protection. On the summary given above, this utility concern may (perhaps) have been an influential factor in the

102 See Parker v British Airways Board [1984] QB 1004, 1017, per Donaldson LJ; Bridge, Personal Property (3rd edn, 2002), p 20.

103 See ibid, pp 20–1; McFarlane, The Structure of Property Law (2008), p 156.

104 See Smith, Plural Ownership (2004), pp 24–6; McFarlane, The Structure of Property Law (2008), pp 714–15.

105 See Sparkes (1989) 18 AALR 151; Bright (1993) 13 LS 38.

development of the 'pretence' test. As we will see in Chapter 23, section 3 it may also have affected an important House of Lords' decision that has also had an impact on the definition of a lease: Bruton v London & Quadrant Housing Trust[106].

3 THE ACQUISITION QUESTION

To show that he or she has a lease, B must show that he or she has acquired a right to exclusive possession of land for a limited period. In considering the acquisition question, it is vital to distinguish between legal leases and equitable leases.

3.1 LEGAL LEASES

As we saw in Chapter 4, section 4, there are, in general, two different ways in which B may acquire a legal property right. Firstly, and most commonly, B can acquire such a right through a dependent acquisition: by showing that A gave him or her the right; secondly, and more rarely, B can acquire a legal property right by an independent acquisition—that is, simply by relying on his or her own conduct. For example, as noted in section 1.1.2 above, as well as in Chapter 8, section 3, if B takes possession of land, so that he or she has exclusive physical control of that land, B independently acquires a legal freehold. It is, however, very difficult to see how B could ever independently acquire a lease: firstly, a lease consists of a right to exclusive possession for a limited period—if B simply takes control of land, he or she is not asserting such a limited right; secondly, a lease depends on a relationship between A and B, as landlord and tenant—and it is hard to see how such a relationship can arise solely because of B's conduct.

Nonetheless, under the provisions of the Land Registration Act 2002 (LRA 2002), it is now possible for B to acquire a lease independently.[107] As we saw in Chapter 8, section 6, if B can successfully show adverse possession of land subject to a registered lease, B can apply to be registered as the new holder of that lease. From a doctrinal point of view, this is a very strange result: B's possession of the land gives him or her a freehold, but he or she then acquires a lease by applying to the Registrar.[108] From the utility perspective, however, there may be something to be said for this result: it essentially represents a compromise solution to the difficult practical and theoretical questions raised by the adverse possession of land subject to a lease.[109]

In any case, in looking at the acquisition of leases, we can concentrate on the case of dependent acquisition—that in which B claims that A has given B a lease.

3.1.1 Basic formality requirements

As we saw in Chapter 7, B's claim that A has given him or her a legal property right, such as a lease, may be affected by formality rules.

1. A contract to grant a lease, like a contract to grant a freehold, must, in general, satisfy the need for writing signed by both A and B, as required by s 2 of the Law of Property (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1989 (LP(MP)A 1989) (see Chapter 7, section 3).

106 [2000] 1 AC 406.
107 For the background to this change, see Law Com No 271 at [14.66]–[14.73].
108 This point is made by McFarlane, The Structure of Property Law (2008), pp 684–5.
109 See Chapter 8, section 6, for discussion of those problems.

2. A's grant of the lease to B must, in general, be made in a deed, as required by s 52 of the LPA 1925 (see Chapter 7, section 4).
3. Again, in general, the transaction will not be complete, and B will not acquire a legal lease, unless and until B is registered as the holder of that lease. That registration requirement is imposed by s 4 of the LRA 2002 in a case in which A does not hold a registered estate and s 27 of that Act in a case in which A does hold a registered estate (see Chapter 7, section 5).

It is important to note that exceptions are provided to each of these three rules. In some cases, of course, none of those exceptions applies.

In considering the exceptions, it is useful to distinguish between: (i) cases in which A gives B a new legal lease; and (ii) cases in which B1 transfers his or her existing legal lease to B2.

3.1.2 Where A attempts to give B a new legal lease

If A attempts to give B a new legal lease of more than seven years, the full set of formality requirements applies: in particular, B does not acquire that legal lease unless and until he or she registers as its holder. As we will see in section 3.2 below, B's failure to register will not prevent him or her from acquiring an equitable lease—but there may be disadvantages to B in having only an equitable lease: in particular, an equitable lease can only count as an overriding interest if B is in actual occupation of the land; in contrast, a legal lease always counts as an overriding interest (see Chapter 14, section 5.2, and section 4.1 below). Further, as we saw in Chapter 15, section 2.1.2, once B has registered as the holder of a legal estate, s 58 of the LRA 2002 operates to vest that right conclusively in B. So, unless and until the register is changed, B is secure in knowing that he or she has a legal lease. And, indeed, even if the register is rectified, B, if he or she has not acted fraudulently or carelessly, is very likely to qualify for an indemnity payment from the Land Registry.

There is an exceptional category of leases that, even if given for seven years or less, must be registered. The leases falling within this category are defined by ss 4(1)(d)–(f) and 27(2)(b)(ii)–(v) of the 2002 Act. One example consists of a lease taking effect only after a gap of more than three months from the date of its grant by A to B.[110] In that particular case, it seems that the registration requirement is imposed as such a legal lease could otherwise cause a trap for C, a party acquiring a right after the lease has been granted to B, but before B has taken possession of the land.

If A attempts to grant B a non-exceptional lease of seven years or less, B can acquire a legal lease without needing to register his or her right. As we have seen, the general rule under s 52 of the LPA 1925 is that A must use a deed to grant B a legal lease. There is, however, an exception to the need for a deed, provided by s 54(2) of the 1925 Act.

Law of Property Act 1925, s 54(2)

Nothing in the foregoing provisions of this Part of this Act shall affect the creation by parol of leases taking effect in possession for a term not exceeding three years (whether or not the lessee is given power to extend the term) at the best rent which can reasonably be obtained without taking a fine.

[110] Other examples are a discontinuous lease (such as a time-share lease, in which B has a right to exclusive possession only for a limited part of each year) and leases that, under the provisions of the Housing Act 1985, would, in any case, require registration.

If the requirements of s 54(2) are met, B can acquire a legal lease as a result of a purely oral grant from A: registration is not needed; nor a deed; nor even any writing. The basic policy of the exception is clear: as a matter of convenience, parties should be free to enter relatively short-lived arrangements without having to express their intentions in a particular form.

It is, however, important to note that the length of the lease is only one of the requirements of the exception. To acquire a legal lease without a deed, B needs to show that the lease:

- is for three years or less; and
- takes effect in possession; and
- is at the best rent reasonably obtainable without taking a fine. [111]

The third requirement will be satisfied if B is paying a reasonable market rent[112] rather than, for example, acquiring the lease by paying a one-off premium. This requirement may be seen as a means of protecting C, a party to whom A might later transfer A's estate in the land. The problem for C is that B's oral, but legal, lease may be hard to discover. Of course, in practice, B may well be in occupation of the land—but, as we saw in Chapter 15, section 5.2, B's legal lease counts as an overriding interest in its own right and so is immune from the lack of registration defence even if B is not in actual occupation of the land. The rent requirement in s 54(2) provides some protection for C: even if he or she is bound by B's oral lease, he or she will at least, receive a reasonable rent from B.

In the following case, the second of the three requirements was decisive.

Long v Tower Hamlets London Borough Council
[1998] Ch 197

Facts: Tower Hamlets LBC had a freehold of No 21 Turners Road, consisting of a ground-floor shop and a maisonette. It gave Mr Long permission to occupy the shop; Mr Long later decided to occupy the maisonette as well. As far as the shop was concerned, Mr Long, before moving in, had received a letter setting out the terms of occupation. The letter was sent in early September 1975 and stated that Mr Long's right of occupation would begin on 29 September. Mr Long indorsed and returned the letter on 8 September. At some point (claimed by Mr Long to be in 1977), Mr Long stopped paying rent. In 1995, Mr Long claimed that, because he had been occupying both the shop and maisonette, without Tower Hamlets' consent, for over twelve years, the doctrine of adverse possession extinguished Tower Hamlet LBC's freehold of that land (see Chapter 8 for a discussion of that doctrine). According to Sch 1, para 5, of the Limitation Act 1980, if Tower Hamlets LBC could show that Mr Long had occupied under a 'lease in writing', Mr Long's adverse possession claim would fail, because the twelve-year [111] For an argument that the 'best rent' requirement should be abolished, and that the 'takes effect in possession' requirement should be modified so as to require only that a lease take effect in possession within three months of its grant, see Brown and Pawlowski, 'Re-thinking Section 54(2) of the Law of Property Act 1925' [2010] Conv 146.

[112] See Fitzkriston LLP v Panayi [2008] EWCA Civ 283, [23], per Rix LJ. There may thus be cases where the rent agreed by the parties is below market rent, and so s 54(2) does not apply: ibid, [27], per Rix LJ.

limitation period would have begun in 1984 and so would not yet have expired. But if Tower Hamlets could not show that Mr Long had a 'lease in writing', the twelve-year clock would have begun to count down from an earlier point (when Mr Long stopped paying rent) and so Mr Long's adverse possession claim could succeed. The case was therefore slightly unusual: the claim of a lease was made not by the occupier, but rather by the party granting the rights of occupation.

Tower Hamlets LBC applied for an order striking out Mr Long's adverse possession claim, on the basis that, because he had been given 'a lease in writing', the limitation period only began to run against Tower Hamlets LBC in 1984. James Munby QC, sitting as a deputy High Court judge, rejected that argument, holding that Mr Long had not been given a 'lease in writing'.

James Munby QC (sitting as a Deputy High Court judge)

At 205

At common law a lease could be granted in any way, even orally [. . .] Moreover, there was at common law no restraint upon the grant of a reversionary lease, that is, a lease to take effect in reversion on some future day, however distant, and conferring no right to take possession in the meantime. Such a lease [. . .] gave the lessee an immediate vested legal interest in the land, that interest being known as an interesse termini, though until the date when the lease was due to take effect this interest was vested in interest and not in possession. On the other hand, the lessee under a reversionary lease acquired no estate in the land until he had actually entered, that is, taken possession in accordance with the lease; until then all he had was an interesse termini [. . .]

At 216–17

In the first place, the words 'in possession,' when used as part of the phrase 'taking effect in possession for a term not exceeding three years,' in my judgment have their normal legal meaning. They connote an estate or interest in the land which is vested 'in possession' rather than merely vested 'in interest.' This reading is powerfully reinforced by the distinction drawn in section 205(1)(xxvii) of the Law of Property Act 1925 between a 'term of years taking effect in possession' and a 'term of years taking effect in reversion.' The words 'taking effect in possession' in section 54(2) are, in my judgment, used in the same sense in which those words are used in section 205(1)(xxvii) and thus, and this is the critical point, in distinction to the words 'taking effect in reversion.' This, as it seems to me, demonstrates that [. . .] reversionary leases were not intended to come within the ambit of section 54(2).

Moreover, there has been omitted from section 54(2) any express reference to the date of 'the making' of the lease. Thus, if [counsel for Tower Hamlets'] argument is correct, there is no limit expressed in section 54(2) to the period which may elapse before the lease 'tak[es] effect in possession,' the only requirement being that the lease, when eventually it does 'tak[e] effect in possession,' must be 'for a term not exceeding three years.'

As interpreted in Long v Tower Hamlets LBC, the requirement that the lease must 'take effect in possession' can also be seen as providing some protection for C: a lease under which B has no right to immediate possession may be particularly hard for C to discover.[113]

[113] It should be noted, however, that a lease can 'take effect in possession' even if B does not immediately go into occupation; the question is whether B has an immediate right to exclusive possession.

But whilst the decision must be correct as a matter of statutory interpretation, it reveals that the s 54(2) exception has only a limited practical impact.

Bright, 'Beware the Informal Lease: The (Very) Narrow Scope of s 54(2) Law of Property Act 1925' [1998] Conv 229, 232–3

> Whilst the reasoning behind [Long v Tower Hamlets] is hard to fault, the practical implications of the decision are absurd. It is easy to state that, to be safe, all leases should be entered into by deed, but this is unrealistic. Another option is to say that where there is an informal lease, the term date should be stated to pre-date the date of the agreement (presumably it is the term commencement that indicates whether a lease is in possession). This again is an unrealistic option for in most situations the parties want a binding commitment prior to the commencement date. The absurdity of the subsection is revealed when we consider what the policy is underlying it. There are many reasons why formalities may be required in land transactions but underlying section 52 is the benefit it secures for the parties to the transaction (creating evidence, warning of legal effects, protecting against outside influences) and for the court (evidential). Given the advantages of formality in this context, why are short leases exempted? The answer in part is probably that many short leases are, in fact, entered into without legal advice and if a formality requirement were imposed many parties would remain in ignorance of it. In addition to non-compliance through ignorance there is likely to be a high level of non-compliance through fear of costs. Deeds are likely to involve instructing lawyers, which means expense and delay. The disadvantages of requiring a deed outweigh the advantages to be gained from requiring one. If these ideas explain why the law permits the creation of short leases by parol, the exemption should not be restricted to those taking effect immediately in possession. Instead, the exemption should apply to those leases that are most likely to be entered into without the benefit of legal advice, informally, and where the costs of a deed would discourage compliance. Looked at in this light, the exemption should apply to short leases which are to take effect in possession within a reasonable period, and perhaps twelve months would provide a sensible cut-off.

There is another form of short legal lease that can be acquired by B without a deed, or any writing. As we saw when considering Prudential Assurance Ltd v London Residuary Body in section 2.7 above, B's payment and A's acceptance of rent can give rise to an implied periodic tenancy. In such a case, the conduct of the parties leads a court to imply, or assume, that A granted a lease to B; there is no need for any formal proof of that grant. In practice, B may occupy land for a long time under a succession of periodic tenancies (in Prudential Assurance, for example, the House of Lords held that the strip of land in question had been occupied in that way for over sixty years). The maximum duration of any individual periodic tenancy is, however, a year. The length of the term depends on how B pays rent: if B pays weekly, a weekly tenancy will be implied; if B pays monthly, a monthly tenancy will result; and if the frequency is calculated by reference to a year (e.g. if B pays quarterly), B will have a yearly periodic tenancy. To terminate the lease, either party needs to give notice of an intention not to renew it at the end of the current period. A week's notice is needed in the case of a weekly tenancy; a month's notice for a monthly tenancy; six months' notice is required for a yearly tenancy.

Given that the maximum length of a periodic tenancy is a year and that B will necessarily have a right to immediate possession, it may seem that any implied periodic tenancy will fall within the s 54(2) exception. Because an implied periodic tenancy can arise even if B does not pay a reasonable market rent, however, it seems that it provides an independent exception to the general rule that a legal interest in land can only be acquired where a deed is used.

The position can be summarized as in Table 5.

Table 5 Formality requirements for legal leases

Type of legal lease	Deed required?	Registration required?
For more than seven years or in an exceptional category*	Yes	Yes
For three years or less, and taking effect in possession, and at a reasonable market rent	No	No
All other leases	Yes	No

* See Land Registration Act 2002, ss 4 and 27, for the exceptional categories (e.g. a lease taking effect in possession more than three months from the time of the grant).

3.1.3 Where B1 attempts to transfer an existing legal lease to B2

Imagine that A has a legal estate in land and then grants B1 a legal lease. It is then possible for B1 to retain his or her lease and to grant B2 a new lease (a sublease): in such a case, the formality requirements will apply in the way set out above. It is also possible for B1 to transfer his or her lease to B2. In that case, the formality requirements apply in a slightly different way:[114] firstly, if B1's lease is registered, B2 cannot acquire that right until he or she registers as its new holder; secondly, if B1's lease is not registered (e.g. because it is a lease of less than seven years), B1 must use a deed to transfer the lease to B2. That rule applies even if B1 acquired his or her lease orally, by relying on the s 54(2) exception. The Court of Appeal confirmed this in Crago v Julian.[115]

It is clear, as a matter of statutory interpretation, that the s 54(2) exception does not apply to the transfer of an existing lease; it applies only to the creation of a new lease. Yet this can cause problems in practice, because, if B1 has acquired his or her lease orally, he or she may be unaware that the lease can only be transferred by using a deed.

3.2 EQUITABLE LEASES

It was suggested in Chapter 5, section 1 that all equitable interests depend on A's being under a duty to B. Certainly, it seems that, to acquire an equitable lease, B needs to show that A is under a duty to grant B a lease. In Chapter 9, when considering Walsh v Lonsdale,[116] we saw that B can acquire an equitable lease when A comes under a contractual duty to grant B a lease. As we saw in Chapter 7, section 3, A can only come under such a duty if the formality rule set out by s 2 of the Law of Property (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1989 has been satisfied. Further, it is generally assumed that B will only acquire an equitable lease if A's duty to 114 The terms of B1's lease may attempt to prevent B1 from granting a sublease to B2 or from transferring his or her lease to B2. In such a case, the sublease or transfer does still occur (see Old Grovebury Manor Farm Ltd v W Seymour Plant Sales and Hire Ltd (No 2) [1979] 1 WLR 1397), but B1's breach may give A a power to forfeit the lease (see Chapter 24, section 6.4).

115 [1992] 1 WLR 372.

116 (1882) 21 Ch D 9.

grant a lease can be enforced by an order of specific performance—but, as we saw in Chapter 9, section 3, it is not entirely clear that the specific performance requirement is justified, either as a matter of history or of principle.

There may be situations in which A has not made a contractual promise to give B a lease but, instead, has simply tried and failed to make an immediate grant of a lease: for example, A may attempt to grant B a five-year lease, but fail to use a deed. In such a case, if B provided something in return for the failed grant (e.g. money), A will be regarded as under a duty to give B a lease and B can thus acquire an equitable lease: Parker v Taswell[117] provides an example of this principle. Further, B may well be able to acquire an equitable lease if he or she can show that the doctrine of proprietary estoppel imposes a duty on A to grant B a lease.[118]

If B1 has an equitable lease, arising as a result of A being under a duty to grant B1 a lease, it should also be possible for B1 to transfer that equitable lease to B2. In such a case, the basic formality rule set out by s 53(1)(a) of the LPA 1925 will apply: the transfer must be made in writing signed by B1.

It is sometimes suggested that an equitable lease is 'as good as' a legal lease. Certainly, if B has an equitable lease, this will generally be enough to entitle him or her to any statutory protection available to a holder of a lease (see section 1.1.1 above). Further, an equitable lease is capable of binding a third party who later acquires a right in relation to the land from A (see section 1.1.3 above). But certain advantages do come with a legal lease. Firstly, as we have noted, a legal lease, unlike an equitable lease, necessarily counts as an overriding interest and so C, a party later acquiring a right from A, will not be able to use the lack of registration defence against B's right.

Secondly, if B acquires a legal lease for value, then, under s 29 of the LRA 2002, B may him or herself be able to use the lack of registration defence against a pre-existing property right (such as a prior equitable lease created by A in favour of Z).[119] But if B has only an equitable lease, he or she cannot use that defence.

Thirdly, if B acquires a legal lease from A, B will also be able to rely on s 62 of the LPA 1925, which can imply the grant of additional rights by A (such as easements—see Chapter 25, section 3.2) into the creation of B's legal lease. But if B has only an equitable lease, s 62 cannot apply.

Finally, if B has a legal lease, it is then clear that the rest of the world is under a prima facie duty to B: as a result, for example, a stranger who interferes with B's enjoyment of the land will commit the tort of nuisance against B (see the discussion of Hunter v Canary Wharf[120] in section 1.1.2 above). If, however, B has only an equitable lease, it is far from clear that B has the same protection: B can assert a right against C, a party who later acquires a right from [117] (1858) 2 De G & J 559.

[118] For example, it seems that B acquired such an equitable lease in Lloyd v Dugdale [2002] 2 P & CR 13. See further Bright and McFarlane, 'Proprietary Estoppel and Property Rights' [2005] CLJ 449. The problem for B (Mr Dugdale) was that, because he was in not in actual occupation of the land when A transferred his freehold to C, C had a defence to B's pre-existing equitable lease. B therefore tried to assert a new, direct right against C, arising as a result of a promise made by C when acquiring the freehold: we discussed that aspect of the case in Chapter 6, section 2.3.

[119] Usually, B needs to register his or her own right if he or she wishes to rely on the lack of registration defence. But s 29(4) of the Land Registration Act 2002 means that B can rely on that defence if he or she has been granted a lease that cannot be registered (e.g. a non-exceptional lease of seven years or less). The term 'grant' is crucial, because it excludes a party with only an equitable lease: if B has only an equitable lease, he or she has not been granted a right; rather, A is under a duty to make such a grant.

[120] [1997] AC 665.

A; but, as discussed in Chapter 5, section 7, it is not clear that the rest of the world owes a duty to B not to interfere with the land.

3.3 METHODS BY WHICH A LEASE MAY END

In sections 3.1 and 3.2, we considered the methods by which a lease can come into being. We also need to consider the various ways in which a lease may end.

3.3.1 The effluxion of time

The simplest method by which a lease may end is the passage of time: if the term for which a lease has been granted comes to an end, the lease itself ends. So, if A granted B a 21 year lease in 1990, that lease will end in 2011. We saw in section 3.1.2 above that, if B has a periodic tenancy, his right to exclusive possession will automatically be renewed at the end of each period, unless one of the parties gives sufficient notice of his or her intention not to renew. If no such notice is given, B can end up occupying A's land for a long time: in Prudential Assurance, for example, B's occupation, under a succession of yearly tenancies, had lasted over 60 years. It is important to note that, in such a case, B does not occupy under one, continuing lease—rather, B occupies under a succession of periodic tenancies. This technical point is important in ensuring that periodic tenancies are consistent with the need for a lease to be for a limited period: the maximum duration of each in a series of periodic tenancies is known in advance. The technical point was also important in the following case.

Hammersmith & Fulham LBC v Monk
[1992] 1 AC 478, HL

Facts: Mr Monk and Mrs Powell cohabited in a flat at 35 Nitron Street, South West London, under a joint weekly tenancy, given to them by Hammersmith and Fulham London Borough Council. As the landlord was thus a local authority, the grounds on which it could recover possession of the flat were limited by statute. In 1988, the couple fell out and Mrs Powell left the flat. She consulted with the council who agreed to provide her with alternative accommodation, if she terminated the periodic tenancy of 35 Nitron Street. The terms of the tenancy allowed for termination with four week's notice. Without Mr Monk's knowledge or consent, Mrs Powell gave this notice to quit to the council, who then sought possession of 35 Nitron St against Mr Monk.

The council's argument was that Mr Monk had occupied under a succession of weekly periodic tenancies and each new tenancy arose only because each of Mr Monk and Mrs Powell had failed to give a notice to quit. When Mrs Powell gave such a notice, their joint periodic tenancy could not continue into a new period and so the tenancy, and the statutory protection it gave to Mr Monk, was now at an end. As a result, the council now had the choice of removing Mr Monk from the land. The first instance judge held that Mrs Powell's notice to quit could not end the joint tenancy, and so dismissed the council's claim for possession. The Court of Appeal allowed the council's appeal; the House of Lords agreed that Mrs Powell's notice to quit meant that the succession of joint weekly periodic tenancies, and with it Mr Monk's right to occupy the flat, was brought to an end. The council were therefore free to claim possession of the flat.

Lord Bridge

At 482–4

For a large part of this century there have been many categories of tenancy of property occupied for agricultural, residential and commercial purposes where the legislature has intervened to confer upon tenants extra-contractual rights entitling them to continue in occupation without the consent of the landlord, either after the expiry of a contractual lease for a fixed term or after notice to quit given by the landlord to determine a contractual periodic tenancy. It is primarily in relation to joint tenancies in these categories that the question whether or not notice to quit given by one of the joint tenants can determine the tenancy is of practical importance, particularly where, as in the instant case, the effect of the determination will be to deprive the other joint tenant of statutory protection. This may appear an untoward result and may consequently provoke a certain reluctance to hold that the law can permit one of two joint tenants unilaterally to deprive his co-tenant of 'rights' which both are equally entitled to enjoy. But the statutory consequences are in truth of no relevance to the question which your Lordships have to decide. That question is whether, at common law, a contractual periodic tenancy granted to two or more joint tenants is incapable of termination by a tenant's notice to quit unless it is served with the concurrence of all the joint tenants. That is the proposition which [Mr Monk] must establish in order to succeed.

As a matter of principle I see no reason why this question should receive any different answer in the context of the contractual relationship of landlord and tenant than that which it would receive in any other contractual context. If A and B contract with C on terms which are to continue in operation for one year in the first place and thereafter from year to year unless determined by notice at the end of the first or any subsequent year, neither A nor B has bound himself contractually for longer than one year. To hold that A could not determine the contract at the end of any year without the concurrence of B and vice versa would presuppose that each had assumed a potentially irrevocable contractual obligation for the duration of their joint lives, which, whatever the nature of the contractual obligations undertaken, would be such an improbable intention to impute to the parties that nothing less than the clearest express contractual language would suffice to manifest it. Hence, in any ordinary agreement for an initial term which is to continue for successive terms unless determined by notice, the obvious inference is that the agreement is intended to continue beyond the initial term only if and so long as all parties to the agreement are willing that it should do so. In a common law situation, where parties are free to contract as they wish and are bound only so far as they have agreed to be bound, this leads to the only sensible result [...]

[...] from the earliest times a yearly tenancy has been an estate which continued only so long as it was the will of both parties that it should continue, albeit that either party could only signify his unwillingness that the tenancy should continue beyond the end of any year by giving the appropriate advance notice to that effect. Applying this principle to the case of a yearly tenancy where either the lessor's or the lessee's interest is held jointly by two or more parties, logic seems to me to dictate the conclusion that the will of all the joint parties is necessary to the continuance of the interest [...]

[Lord Bridge then considered a number of previous decisions, including Doe d. Aslin v Summersett[121] finding at 487 that there was a 'formidable body of English authority' in support of the Court of Appeal's decision that Mrs Powell's notice to quit brought the succession of weekly tenancies to an end]

[121] (1830) 1 B. & Ad. 135.

At 490–1

Finally, it is said [by Mr Monk] that all positive dealings with a joint tenancy require the concurrence of all joint tenants if they are to be effective. Thus, a single joint tenant cannot exercise a break clause in a lease, surrender the term, make a disclaimer, exercise an option to renew the term or apply for relief from forfeiture. All these positive acts which joint tenants must concur in performing are said to afford analogies with the service of notice to determine a periodic tenancy which is likewise a positive act. But this is to confuse the form with the substance. The action of giving notice to determine a periodic tenancy is in form positive; but both on authority and on the principle so aptly summed up in the pithy Scottish phrase 'tacit relocation' the substance of the matter is that it is by his omission to give notice of termination that each party signifies the necessary positive assent to the extension of the term for a further period.

Lord Browne-Wilkinson

At 491–3

My Lords, there are two instinctive reactions to this case which lead to diametrically opposite conclusions. The first is that the flat in question was the joint home of the appellant and Mrs. Powell: it therefore cannot be right that one of them unilaterally can join the landlords to put an end to the other's rights in the home. The second is that the appellant and Mrs. Powell undertook joint liabilities as tenants for the purpose of providing themselves with a joint home and that, once the desire to live together has ended, it is impossible to require that the one who quits the home should continue indefinitely to be liable for the discharge of the obligations to the landlord under the tenancy agreement.

These two instinctive reactions are mirrored in the legal analysis of the position. In certain cases a contract between two persons can, by itself, give rise to a property interest in one of them. The contract between a landlord and a tenant is a classic example. The contract of tenancy confers on the tenant a legal estate in the land: such legal estate gives rise to rights and duties incapable of being founded in contract alone. The revulsion against Mrs. Powell being able unilaterally to terminate the appellant's rights in his home is property based: the appellant's property rights in the home cannot be destroyed without his consent. The other reaction is contract based: Mrs. Powell cannot be held to a tenancy contract which is dependant for its continuance on the will of the tenant.

[. . .]

In property law, a transfer of land to two or more persons jointly operates so as to make them, vis à vis the outside world, one single owner. "Although as between themselves joint tenants have separate rights, as against everyone else they are in the position of a single owner."[122] The law would have developed consistently with this principle if it had been held that where a periodic tenancy has been granted by or to a number of persons jointly, the relevant "will" to discontinue the tenancy has to be the will of all the joint lessors or joint lessees who together constitute the owner of the reversion or the term as the case may be.

[. . .] the law was in my judgment determined in the opposite sense by Doe d. Aslin v. Summersett.[123] The contractual, as opposed to the property, approach was adopted. Where there were joint lessors of a periodic tenancy, the continuing "will" had to be the will of all the lessors individually, not the conjoint will of all the lessors collectively [. . .]

It was submitted that this House should overrule Summersett's case. But, as my noble and learned friend, Lord Bridge of Harwich, has demonstrated, the decision was treated 122 Megarry and Wade, The Law of Real Property, 5th edn (1984), p 417.

123 (1830) 1 B. & Ad. 135.

> throughout the 19th century as laying down the law in relation to the rights of joint lessors. It is not suggested that the position of joint lessees can be different. Since 1925 the law as determined in Summersett's case has been applied to notices to quit given by one of several joint lessees. In my judgment no sufficient reason has been shown for changing the basic law which has been established for 160 years [. . .]

The decision of the House of Lords in Monk, like many of the cases we have examined in this chapter, can be considered both from the doctrinal and utility perspectives. As a matter of doctrine, the result seems to be correct: a periodic tenancy, like any lease, has to be renewed if it is to continue from one term to the next. And the renewal of a periodic tenancy, like the renewal of any contract, requires the consent of all the parties to that tenancy. When Mrs Powell removed her consent, then, the periodic tenancy ended, taking with it the statutory security of tenure it gave to Mr Monk. From a utility perspective, in contrast, the result may seem concerning: Mr Monk's security of tenure was lost without his consent. The Law Commission, for example, has proposed that it should be possible for one joint tenant, such as Mrs Powell, to give a notice to quit, and thus end her involvement with the tenancy, without ending the joint tenancy itself.[124] Indeed, as we noted in Chapter 3, section 4.2.2, the approach in Monk has been subjected to human rights challenges, questioning its compatibility with Article 8 of the European Convention on Human Rights.[125] Whilst this is an evolving area of law, the current position is that the basic rule in Monk is regarded, by the English courts at least,[126] as compatible with Art 8. In Chapter 3, section 2.5.4, we saw that in McCann v UK,[127] the European Court of Human Rights did find a breach of Art 8 in a case where the local authority took advantage of the basic rule in Monk to remove Mr McCann from his home. The point here may be that, whilst the basic rule in Monk gives a local authority the option of regaining possession after one joint tenant fails to renew a periodic tenancy, the local authority will have to bear Art 8 in mind when exercising its discretion as to whether to use that option.[128]

3.3.2 The exercise of a power to end a lease before its term expires

There are a number of situations in which a lease may end before the planned term has expired. Firstly, the terms of the lease may give one or both of the parties a power to terminate the lease early. Such a 'break clause' is common, for example, in a commercial lease. It may be wise for a tenant taking a 21 year lease of business premises to insist on a clause allowing him or her to terminate the lease after five years: the tenant can then take advantage of that clause if the business does not prove successful.

Secondly, a change of circumstances may give a party the power to end the lease early, even if the terms of the contract do not expressly confer such a power. For example, in National Carriers Ltd v Panalpina (Northern) Ltd,[129] the House of Lords acknowledged, for 124 Law Com No 297, 'Renting Homes: The Final Report' (Volume 1, 2006) paras 2.44–2.46, 4.9–4.12.

125 See Harrow LBC v Qazi [2004] 1 AC 983, discussed in Chapter 3, section 4.1; see too Bright, 'Ending Tenancies by Notice to Quit: The Human Rights Challenge' (2004) 120 LQR 398.

126 See Wandsworth v Dixon [2009] EWHC 27 (Admin). Note too Ure v UK (28027/95, Commission decision of 1996), in which the European Commission found that the basic rule in Monk is not incompatible with Art 8.

127 (2008) 47 EHRR 40.

128 This seems to be the suggestion of Lord Walker in Doherty v Birmingham City Council [2009] AC 367 at [121]–[123].

129 [1981] AC 675.

the first time, that the doctrine of frustration can apply to a lease. So, if A gives B a lease of a warehouse, and both A and B know that B plans to use that warehouse for commercial storage, the purpose of the contract means that the closure of the only road giving access to the warehouse could, if continuing for a long enough period, lead to the parties' contract being frustrated.[130]

Similarly, in Hussein v Mehlman,[131] Stephen Sedley QC, sitting as an assistant recorder, held that, where A gave B a lease of a house, A's serious breaches of his duty to repair, rendering the house unfit to live in, interfered with the 'central purpose'[132] of the contract and so allowed B to terminate the contract by moving out and ceasing to pay rent.[133] Of course, the general contractual rule applies, and so the tenant's power to terminate the lease early will arise only where the landlord's breach is so serious as to deprive the tenant of substantially the whole of the benefit which the contract was intended to secure for the tenant.[134] We will consider both Panalpina and Hussein again in section 5 below, when looking at the contractual aspects of a lease.

If the tenant, rather than the landlord, is in serious breach of his or her obligations under the lease, the landlord may have a power to bring the lease to an end. If the landlord exercises such as a power, this is said to be a 'forfeiture': the tenant loses the right to exclusive possession due to his or her serious breach of the terms of the lease. Given the often severe consequences of forfeiture, the courts have the power to protect a tenant by granting relief from forfeiture: this power was first developed by courts of equity, and is now regulated, in part, by statute.[135] We will consider forfeiture in detail in Chapter 24, section 6.4. It is also worth noting that, even if a landlord does have the freedom to forfeit a lease, such a landlord may instead elect to keep the lease alive so as to continue to claim rent from the tenant. As the Court of Appeal confirmed in Reichman v Beveridge,[136] this course is open to the landlord even if the tenant has left the premises, and even if the landlord could reduce his losses by renting the premises to a different tenant. This is in part because of a long-standing rule that if the new tenant pays a lower rent, the landlord is not permitted to pursue the former tenant for this difference in rent: the landlord's decision to end the first lease also ends the first tenant's liability for any future rent. To this extent, it seems, the normal contractual liability rules do not apply between a landlord and a tenant.[137]

3.3.3 Where the lease is subsumed into a different legal estate

Firstly, if A has granted B a lease, it is possible for A and B to agree to B's surrender of the lease before its term expires. A surrender is a 'consensual transaction between landlord and tenant'[138] and its effect is that 'the tenancy is absorbed by the landlord's reversion and is 130 In the case itself, the contract was not frustrated: the road was closed only for twenty months of a ten-year lease.

131 [1992] 2 EGLR 87 (County Court). 132 Ibid, 91.

133 That reasoning has since been confirmed by the Court of Appeal: see Chartered Trust plc v Davies [1997] 2 EGLR 83.

134 The general contractual test is set out by Diplock LJ in Hong Kong Fir v Kawasaki [1962] 1 All ER 474, 489. For a case in which the landlord's breach was not sufficiently serious, see Nynehead Developments Ltd v RH Fibreboard Containers Ltd [1991] 1 EGLR 7. In such a case, the landlord is liable in damages to the tenant for the breach.

135 See Law of Property Act 1925, s 146(1).

136 [2006] EWCA Civ 1659. See too Chapter 24, section 6.

137 The position is different in many other common law jurisdictions: see Bright, Landlord and Tenant Law in Context (2007), pp 508–11.

138 Per Lord Scott in Kay v Lambeth LBC; Leeds CC v Price [2006] 2 AC 465, [141].

extinguished by operation of law':[139] the lease thus ceases to exist as it is subsumed into A's estate in the land. An express surrender must be made by deed, even if the lease itself was initially created orally. Most surrenders occur by operation of law, however, and are therefore excepted from the need for a deed. [140] A surrender by operation of law requires both the tenant's re-delivery of possession of the land to the landlord, and the landlord's acceptance of such re-delivery.[141] It is also worth noting that, if A grants a lease to B, and B then grants a sublease to C, the surrender by B to A of B's lease does not end C's sub-lease; rather, A then becomes C's landlord, as would be the case had B transferred his lease to A. This result is based on the basic principle that C's property right cannot be terminated without C's consent.[142]

Secondly, if A grants B a lease, and A's estate and B's lease are later acquired by the same party, it is possible for the lease to end by a merger: by being subsumed into A's estate. For example, in Chapter 21, section 3.3.1, we saw that in Ashburn Anstalt v Arnold,[143] Mr Arnold initially held a lease of the land; Arnold & Co then acquired a sub-lease. Cavendish Land Co Ltd later acquired the freehold subject to Arnold's head-lease. Cavendish then also acquired both the head-lease and the sub-lease. The effect of this, as noted by Fox LJ in the Court of Appeal, was that 'the head-lease and the sub-lease merged into the freehold'.[144] In that case, merger allowed Cavendish to achieve its aim of holding its freehold free from any leases. Similarly, if B has a very long lease and then, as in James v UK,[145] exercises his or her statutory right of enfranchisement, B will generally want to hold his or her freehold free from any leases. It is important to note, however, that merger is not automatic. If B has a lease from A, and then acquires A's estate, it may well be that B does not want merger to operate. For example, Bright notes that 'A tenant of a flat who, for example, acquires the freehold reversion to the block may want the lease to continue as an independent and saleable asset.'[146] In such a case, courts of equity focussed on B's intention and therefore held that merger did not occur: that equitable approach is now preserved by the Law of Property Act 1985, s 185.

4 THE DEFENCES QUESTION

If B acquires a legal or equitable lease of A's land, his or her right will be prima facie binding on C, a third party later acquiring a right relating to that land from A. As we noted in Chapter 12, however, it may be possible for C to have a defence to a pre-existing property right of B. In practice, the key defence is the lack of registration defence, provided (in relation to unregistered land) by the Land Charges Act 1972 (LCA 1972) and (in relation to registered land) by the LRA 2002.

In considering the defence, we again need to distinguish between cases in which B has a legal lease and those in which B's lease is equitable.

139 Per Lord Millett in Barrett v Morgan [2000] 2 AC 264, [270].

140 Law of Property Act 1925, s 52(2)(c) excepts surrenders by operation of law from the general deed requirement imposed by s 52.

141 See further per Peter Gibson LJ in Bellcourt Estates Ltd v Adesina [2005] EWCA Civ 208, [29]–[31].

142 See Mellor v Watkins (1874) LR 9 QB 400, 405; and Kay v Lambeth LBC; Leeds CC v Price [2006] 2 AC 465, [141].

143 [1989] Ch 1. 144 [1989] Ch 1, 6. 145 (1986) 8 EHRR 123: see Chapter 3, section 2.4.2.

146 Bright, Landlord and Tenant Law in Context (2007), p 73).

4.1 LEGAL LEASES

To acquire a legal lease of seven years or more of registered land, B must register as the holder of that right (see section 3.1 above). In such a case, C clearly will not be able to rely on the lack of registration defence. B can, however, acquire a shorter legal lease without needing to register as the holder of that right. Even in such a case, it is still impossible for C to rely on the lack of registration defence, because Sch 3, para 1, of the LRA 2002 ensures that B's right counts as an overriding interest: that is the case even if B is not in actual occupation of the land. If A has an unregistered legal estate and grants B a legal lease, it may be the case that, when A transfers his or her estate to C, C will register that estate for the first time. In such a case, B's legal lease is again overriding, this time under Sch 1, para 1, of the 2002 Act.

If B has a legal lease of unregistered land, then, as we saw in Chapter 13, section 3, it is impossible for C to rely on the lack of registration defence provided by the LCA 1972: the general position is that a legal estate or interest does not count as a registrable land charge for the purposes of the 1972 Act. This means that, as far as legal leases are concerned, the picture is clear: C will never be able to use the lack of registration defence against a pre-existing legal lease.

4.2 EQUITABLE LEASES

Where B has an equitable lease of registered land, it is possible for B to protect that right by entering a notice on the register. As noted above, the entry of a notice does not guarantee B's equitable right—but it does prevent C, when later acquiring a right, from using the lack of registration defence against B's right. If B fails to protect his or her equitable lease by entering a notice, that right will be vulnerable to the lack of registration defence unless B is in actual occupation of the land under Sch 3, para 2 of the LRA 2002 (where C registers a legal estate for the first time, Sch 1, para 2, of that Act has the same effect). But if B is not in actual occupation at the relevant time, his or her equitable lease does not count as an overriding interest. Unlike a legal lease, an equitable lease, by itself, does not count as an overriding interest. This flows from the fact that Sch 3, para 1 (like Sch 1, para 1) protects only 'A leasehold estate in land granted for a term [. . .]'. As confirmed by the Court of Appeal in City Permanent Building Society v Miller,[147] a grant necessarily implies the acquisition of a legal property right: if B has an equitable lease, he or she has not been granted a lease by A; rather, A is instead under a duty to make such a grant.[148]

If B has an equitable lease of unregistered land, the applicability of the lack of registration defence provided by the LCA 1972 will depend on the means by which B acquired that equitable lease. If it arises as a result of A's contractual promise to give B a lease (or under the principle in Parker v Taswell),[149] B's right counts as an 'estate contract': as we saw when examining Midland Bank Trust Co Ltd v Green[150] in Chapter 12, section 3.1, B's failure to register such a right as a land charge[151] gives C the chance to use the lack of registration defence provided by the 1972 Act. If, however, B's equitable lease arises because A is under [147] [1952] Ch 840. See Chapter 12, section 3.6.

[148] Compare fn 119 above, discussing the effect of the term 'grant' in s 29(4) of the Land Registration Act 2002.

[149] (1858) 2 De G & J 559. See section 3.2 above.

[150] [1981] AC 813.

[151] Land Charges Act 1972, s 2(4)(iv), makes clear that an estate contract counts as a registrable land charge.

a non-contractual duty to grant B a lease, that lack of registration defence cannot apply and C will instead have to attempt to rely on the general 'bona fide purchaser' defence, as discussed in Chapter 14, section 4.

5 THE CONTRACTUAL ASPECT OF A LEASE

In this chapter, we have been examining the lease as a property right and have therefore asked the three key questions relating to such rights: the content, acquisition, and defences questions. There are, however, other aspects to a lease. In Chapter 23, we will examine how a lease can confer status, by allowing B to qualify for important statutory protection. In addition, it is sometimes stated that, due to developments in the law occurring in the last thirty years or so, the lease has become more 'contractualized'. It is certainly true that, as well as functioning as a property right in land, a lease almost always has an important contractual aspect. As the following extract suggests, however, we have to be very careful when framing a debate about the nature of leases as a conflict between property, on one hand, and contract, on the other.

McFarlane, The Structure of Property Law (2008, pp 697–8)

It is often said that there is a tension between two different views of the Lease. On the first view, the Lease is seen as primarily a property right; on the second, it is seen as chiefly a contractual right [. . .]

However, this tension is an illusion. There is no conflict between property rights on the one hand and contractual rights on the other. The classification of a right as a property right depends on the content question: does B's right impose a prima facie duty on the rest of the world not to interfere with B's use of a thing? The classification of a right as a contractual right depends on the acquisition question: does B's right arise as a result of a promise which, because it was made in an agreement for which consideration was provided, binds A? It is therefore perfectly possible for B to have a right that is both (i) a property right; and (ii) a contractual right. An example occurs where A, by means of a sale, transfers his Ownership of a bike to B. B acquires a property right; and that right arises as a result of the contractual bargain between A and B.

Indeed, in almost all cases where he has a Lease, B's right to exclusive control of land for a limited period is both (i) a property right; and (ii) a contractual right. It is a property right because it is a right, relating to a thing, that imposes a prima facie duty on the rest of the world. It is a contractual right as B acquires that right as a result of a promise made to B in return for which B provided consideration. In fact, B usually acquires a number of different contractual rights: (i) a right to exclusive control of the land for a limited period; (ii) the benefit of contractually agreed leasehold covenants (rights that can be enforced against parties later acquiring A's estate); and (iii) personal rights against A. All those rights are acquired in the same way; but their content differs.

This analysis does not mean that a Lease must arise as a result of a contract. It is possible for a Lease to arise purely by consent: A can exercise his power to grant B a Lease without coming under any contractual duties to B.[152] However, it does mean that it is misleading to say that there is a tension between the proprietary view of the Lease and the contractual view of the Lease. A Lease is simply a property right that can, and almost always does, arise through a contract. Indeed, when analysing the practical problems that are often said to depend on a choice between the 'proprietary' and 'contractual' views, that false opposition only obscures the solution to the problems.

[152] See per Millett LJ (dissenting) in Ingram v IRC [1997] 4 All ER 395, 421–2: 'There is no doubt that a lease is property. It is a legal estate in land. It may be created by grant or attornment as well as by contract and need not contain any covenants at all.' There was a successful appeal against the decision of the majority of

So, what does it mean to say that the lease has been 'contractualized'? In a very controversial decision, the House of Lords has stated that the term 'lease' can be extended to cases in which A, even if he or she has no property right in land, makes a binding promise to give B exclusive possession of that land for a limited period. In such a case, B has a lease even though the core feature examined in this chapter, B's acquisition of a property right, is missing. We will examine this decision (Bruton v London & Quadrant Housing Trust) in Chapter 23, section 3. In Hammersmith & Fulham LBC v Monk, which we examined in section 3.3.1 above, we saw that Lord Browne-Wilkinson contrasted the 'proprietary' and 'contractual' approaches to the question of whether a joint periodic tenancy can be ended by the choice of just one of the joint tenants not to renew the tenancy. His Lordship's view was that the proprietary approach would give a negative answer to that question, whilst the contractual approach favoured a positive response. As we saw, the answer given in the case was the positive one, and so the decision may thus seem to contribute to the 'contractualization' of the lease. We should be wary, however, of attaching too much weight to the result. For, as we noted in section 3.3.1 above, the crucial factor was that occupation of land under a periodic tenancy, even if it continues for a long time, occurs not under one continuous lease but rather under a succession of periodic tenancies. Each new periodic tenancy, as it is a new lease, must then require the consent of all the parties to it. The necessity of consent is not a feature exclusive to contracts: after all, the transfer of property from A to B also requires the consent of both parties.

In other cases, the so-called 'contractualization' amounts not to a denial of the proprietary status of a lease, but rather to the recognition that, where A grants B a lease, the purpose of the parties' contract extends beyond the simple acquisition of a property right by B.

This point has been made by Bright,[153] who has argued that the key issue relates to the characterization of a contract granting B a lease. The question is whether B's acquisition of a property right should be seen as: (i) the sole aim of the parties' contract; or (ii) only one of the aims of the contract, or even as a means to a more important end (e.g. the provision of a home or business premises). In Bright's words, is the contract: (i) for possession only; or (ii) for possession 'plus'?[154]

The traditional view of a lease, it seems, favoured the former analysis. This affected the application to the lease of normal contractual principles and, as a result, had a number of important practical consequences. Firstly, it meant that judges were very reluctant to use the particular purpose for which a lease was acquired (e.g. to give B a home) as a reason to imply contractual terms into that lease. As noted in section 1.1.1 above, certain minimal duties are implied as a result of B's acquisition of a property right (e.g. A is under a duty not to interfere with B's 'quiet enjoyment' of the land), but the courts would not go beyond those duties by looking to the particular factual circumstances in which the lease was granted.

the Court of Appeal ([2000]1 AC 293): Lord Hutton, at 310, expressly agreed with Millett LJ's analysis of the nature of a lease.

[153] See Bright, Landlord and Tenant Law in Context (2007), pp 30–3.

[154] Ibid, p 31.

Secondly, it meant that the doctrine of frustration was not applied to leases: even if there was a radical change in circumstances, frustrating the particular purpose for which B acquired his or her lease, B would still have a property right and so, on the traditional view, the principal purpose of the contract would have been achieved.

Thirdly, and similarly, it meant that a significant breach by A of one of his or her continuing duties under the contract (e.g. to provide repairs) could never allow B to terminate the contract: after all, B would still have the principal benefit he or she had sought under the contract—a property right in the land.

Over time, the courts have recognized that, in many circumstances, it is unrealistic to view A and B's lease agreement as solely a means for B to acquire a property right in land. This has led to a reversal of each of the three consequences, set out above, of that former view. Firstly, in Liverpool City Council v Irwin,[155] the House of Lords recognized that, where A gave B a lease of a flat in a tower block, the obvious purpose of providing B with accommodation meant that, under normal contractual principles, terms could be implied allowing B to use other parts of the block (such as the lift and stairs) and imposing a duty on A to make reasonable efforts to keep those parts working and usable by B.

Secondly, we noted in section 3.3.2 above that, in National Carriers Ltd v Panalpina (Northern) Ltd,[156] the House of Lords acknowledged that, where A gave B a lease of a warehouse for storage, the obvious commercial purpose of the contract meant that, under normal contractual principles, the closure of the only road giving access to the warehouse could, if continuing for a long enough period, lead to the parties' contract being frustrated.[157]

Similarly, we also saw in section 3.3.2 that, in Hussein v Mehlman,[158] Stephen Sedley QC, sitting as an assistant recorder, held that, where A gave B a lease of a house, A's serious breaches of his duty to repair, rendering the house unfit to live in, interfered with the 'central purpose'[159] of the contract and so allowed B to terminate the contract by moving out and ceasing to pay rent.[160]

These developments have proceeded on the eminently reasonable basis that, in many situations, the acquisition of a property right in land, whilst fundamental, is not the only purpose that B has in mind when entering a lease agreement with A. As we will see in the next chapter, its effect in giving B a property right is only one of the lease's key features.

QUESTIONS

1. If A makes a contractual agreement to allow B to occupy land, why might B want to claim that the agreement gives him or her a lease?
2. In Street v Mountford, the House of Lords held that A's contractual agreement with B can give B a lease even if A clearly did not intend the agreement to have that effect. Can that aspect of the decision be defended, either from a doctrinal or policy perspective?

155 [1977] AC 239. 156 [1981] AC 675.

157 In the case itself, the contract was not frustrated: the road was closed only for twenty months of a ten-year lease.

158 [1992] 2 EGLR 87 (County Court). 159 Ibid, 91.

160 That reasoning has since been confirmed by the Court of Appeal: see Chartered Trust plc v Davies [1997] 2 EGLR 83.

3. In Antoniades v Villiers, the House of Lords, in deciding that Mr Villiers and Miss Bridger had a joint right to exclusive possession, disregarded a term in an agreement signed by both Mr Villiers and Miss Bridger. Can that aspect of the decision be defended, either from a doctrinal or policy perspective?
4. In AG Securities v Vaughan, the House of Lords assumed that it is impossible for B1 and B2 to acquire a lease as tenants in common. Is that assumption correct?
5. Are there any genuine exceptions to the rule that if A gives B a right to exclusive possession of land for a limited period, B has a lease?
6. What is the effect of the Supreme Court's decision in Berrisford v Mexfield on the rule that a lease must be for a limited period?

FURTHER READING

Bright, 'Avoiding Tenancy Legislation: Sham and Contracting Out Revisited' [2002] CLJ 146

Bright, Landlord and Tenant Law in Context (Oxford: Hart, 2007, esp chs 1–3)

Bright, 'Street v Mountford Revisited' in Landlord and Tenant Law: Past, Present and Future (ed Bright, Oxford: Hart, 2006)

Hill, 'Intention and the Creation of Proprietary Rights: Are Leases Different?' [1996] LS 200

McFarlane, The Structure of Property Law (Oxford: Hart, 2008, Pt G1B)

Sparkes, 'Co-Tenants, Joint Tenants and Tenants in Common' (1989) 18 AALR 151

23

REGULATING LEASES AND PROTECTING OCCUPIERS

CENTRAL ISSUES

1. In Chapter 22, we concentrated on a key feature of a lease: its ability to count as a property right. This can be referred to as the property right-conferring aspect of a lease. We also saw, in Chapter 22, section 5, that the conferral of a property right is not the only key feature of a lease: as now recognized by the courts, a contract giving B a lease can also be a means for B to achieve a further practical end, such as to have a home in which to live, or premises from which to run a business.
2. In Chapter 22, we also saw that the applicability of various forms of important statutory protection may be dependent on B showing that he or she has a lease. In this chapter, we will examine that statutory protection in more detail. Such protection can be important in a number of different contexts, such as, for example, if B has an agricultural or commercial lease. In this chapter, we will focus on the protection available to B where he or she occupies land as his or her home. The degree of statutory protection available to B depends on the identity of B's landlord: A. If A is a private individual, the statutory protection available to B is now very slight; where A is a local authority, however, significant statutory protection is still available to B, in the form of a 'secure tenancy'.
3. In examining this statutory protection, we will see that a lease can give B status: the status of a party qualifying for statutory protection. This demonstrates a further key feature of a lease: its status-conferring aspect. It also raises a fundamental question: is it possible for an agreement between A and B to give B the status of a party with a lease without giving B a property right? A key recommendation of the Law Commission's most recent review of the area is that the statutory protection available to B, a party occupying land as a home and paying rent, should no longer depend on whether or not B has a property right in that land.
4. Having focused on the property right-conferring aspect of a lease in Chapter 22, and its status-conferring aspect in this chapter, we will then move on, in Chapter 24, to examine its relationship-creating aspect. There, we will see that the landlord–tenant relationship arising when A gives B a lease may impose duties and confer rights not only on A and B, but also on later parties stepping into the shoes of A or B, and thus entering into a landlord–tenant relationship. In Chapter 24, section 6, we will also see how the courts and statute have given B some protection against the risk of losing his or her lease due to a breach of one of his or her duties to A.

1 INTRODUCTION

In Chapter 22, we focused on a particular aspect of the lease: its ability to confer a property right on B. In this chapter, we will also consider the status-conferring aspect of a lease—that is, its ability, in certain circumstances, to allow B to qualify for important statutory protection.

Bridge, 'Leases: Contract, Property and Status' in Land Law: Issues, Debates, Policy (ed Tee, 2002, pp 98–9)

> The lease straddles the worlds of contract and property. It is an estate the duration of which is determined by the agreement of the landlord and the tenant. It is also highly significant as a status, tenants enjoying rights and incurring obligations that are denied to others. The law of leases is extraordinarily complex, and the search for order out of the inherent chaos can at times seem an almost futile exercise. The student of land law [. . .] tends to concentrate on the 'general principles' affecting the leasehold relationship [. . .] It is inevitable that this emphasis on 'general principles' provides a view of the law of landlord and tenant which is some way removed from the practical realities of the leasehold relationship. One obvious divergence relates to security of tenure. It may be that according to the 'general principles', a lease can be terminated by notice, but there may be statutory restrictions on such termination, nor does it necessarily follow that recovery of possession ensues upon termination of the lease. The landlord and tenant practitioner must be aware that specific types of lease are dealt with by statute in very different ways, and that engrafted on to the 'general part' are principles which may or may not apply according to the specific kind of lease.

The 'general principles' referred to in the extract can be seen as the principles, set out in Chapter 22, that govern the property right-conferring aspect of a lease. If we analyse a lease as no more than a grant by A to B of a property right, giving B a right to exclusive possession of land (and thus ownership powers over land) for a limited period, then the positions of A and B seem clear. Each is free to pursue his or her own self-interest: B, by making use of the land during the period of the lease; A, by recovering possession of the land when the agreed period ends. If either party wants to control the actions of the other, the basic position is that he or she can only do so by convincing the other party to agree to that limit and thus making it a term of the parties' contractual agreement. As we will see in this chapter, there are many situations in which that simple model of a lease has been found wanting.

2 THE STATUS-CONFERRING ASPECT OF A LEASE: BACKGROUND

The first important challenge to the simple model of a lease set out above comes from Parliament: as noted by Bridge, statutory intervention means that, in many cases, we have to look beyond the property right-conferring aspect of a lease. Again, it is useful to refer back to the contrasting approaches that we noted in Chapter 1, section 5.2. From the perspective of doctrine, the simple model of a lease, with its emphasis on the parties' property rights and their freedom of contract, may seem perfectly adequate—but from the perspective of utility, Parliament has accepted that the simple model may fail to secure important policy goals.

In very broad terms, there are two general reasons why Parliament may have decided that A and B cannot simply be left to determine their respective rights: firstly, it may be that the use of land is sufficiently important that a particular party's individual wishes can be overridden; secondly, it may be that differences in the parties' relative bargaining positions mean that, absent statutory protection, one may be left at the mercy of the other. In particular, given the limited availability of land (see Chapter 1, section 4), it may be that A holds too powerful an advantage when negotiating the terms of a lease with B: even if B finds the proposed terms unattractive, it may not be possible, in practice, for B to walk away and negotiate better terms elsewhere.

Of course, the particular policy goals that Parliament wishes to advance will vary according to the particular context in question. This means that, as Bridge notes in the extract above, B's position may vary according to the particular context in which he or she has acquired his or her lease.

For the purpose of considering the statutory regulation of leases, we can distinguish between four broad types of lease:

- agricultural leases;
- commercial leases;
- long-term residential leases;
- short-term residential leases.

In line with the approach taken in Part E of this book (see Chapters 16–20), our focus will be on the protection that may be available to B where he or she occupies land as his or her home.

In Chapter 27, section 2.1, we will see how the statutory protection applicable to long-term residential leases may be useful to B where, generally by having paid a large purchase price, he or she has acquired a long lease (e.g. 99 or 125 years) of a flat. The central problem for B, in such a case, is that B may reasonably regard himself or herself as 'the owner' of the flat: B may have made significant financial investments in the land, as well as establishing his or her home there. Yet as time passes, and the period remaining on the lease grows shorter, the prospect of B losing his or her right to exclusive possession of the land undermines B's position.[1] Of course, if we apply the simple doctrinal model set out above, in which A and B's positions are to be determined entirely by their property rights and the agreed terms of their contract, B's loss of the land at the end of the agreed period will be unavoidable. Nonetheless, as we will see in Chapter 27, section 2.2, Parliament has intervened on policy grounds to ensure that B is protected even at the end of his or her lease.

[1] 'B' here refers both to the party originally acquiring the lease and any of his or her successors in title.

A very similar form of intervention forms the background to James v UK,[2] a case that we considered in Chapter 3 (see especially section 2.5.3). That case concerned the effect of the Leasehold Reform Act 1967. That Act does not apply to flats, but it protects B where he or she holds a long lease, at a low rent, of a house. B is given a statutory power to 'enfranchise'—that is, to purchase A's freehold at a price set by a statutory formula.[3] The Duke of Westminster (who was obliged by the 1967 Act to sell a number of freeholds) claimed that the 1967 Act infringed his right, protected by Art 1 of the First Protocol of the European Convention on Human Rights, to the 'peaceful enjoyment of his possessions'. Certainly, the Act departed from the simple model in which A and B's positions are to be determined entirely by their property rights and the agreed terms of their contract. Nonetheless, as we saw in Chapter 3, the Court found that the UK had not infringed the Duke's Art 1 right. Taking into the account the 'margin of appreciation' afforded to the UK (see Chapter 3, section 2.5.3), the Court recognized that the Act employed a proportionate means of pursuing a legitimate aim: to give effect to B's 'moral entitlement' to the ownership of the house and thus to remedy the 'social injustice' inherent in the precariousness of B's position.[4] Whilst dealing with a specific form of statutory intervention, applying only to long-term residential leases, the James case also reveals the tension inherent whenever Parliament intervenes to protect B at A's expense. In some cases, at least, it seems that wider policy goals can justify a departure from the simple model based on the parties' property rights and their freedom to contract.

In this chapter, our focus is on short-term residential leases. Around 30 per cent of all homes in England and Wales are occupied by tenants with such leases.[5] The protection available to such tenants may come from many different sources: for example, the criminal law prohibits certain forms of harassment by a landlord;[6] local authorities also have regulatory powers to ensure that certain minimum housing and public health standards are maintained.[7] In addition, in just under one third of all short-term residential leases, A (the landlord) is a local authority.[8] This means that public law may also limit A's exercise of its property rights as landlord: in particular, as a public body, a local authority has a basic duty not to act inconsistently with B's rights under the ECHR. Many of the cases that we examined in Chapter 3, exploring the impact of Art 8 of the ECHR, concerned the position of residential occupiers of land owned by a local authority.

In addition, as we saw in Chapter 22, section 5, general contractual rules, when applied to leases, may provide B with some protection: for example, A's incentive to comply with his or her statutory repairing duty may be increased by the prospect of B, in the event of a serious breach by A, being able to terminate the lease (and thus being free to move out and cease paying rent).[9]

Further, statutory regulation applying to all contracts will also apply to leases and thus provide some protection to B: for example, B may able to rely on the Unfair Terms in

2 (1986) 8 EHRR 123.

3 A power of enfranchisement (or instead to extend the length of the lease) was extended to a holder of a long residential lease of a flat only with the introduction of the Leasehold Reform Housing and Urban Development Act 1993: see Chapter 27, section 2.2.

4 (1986) 8 EHRR 123, 47.

5 See Wilcox & Pawson (eds) UK Housing Review 2010/11, Table 17d.

6 See the Protection from Eviction Act 1977.

7 See the Environmental Protection Act 1990, esp ss 79–82.

8 See Wilcox & Pawson (eds) UK Housing Review 2010/11, Table 17d.

9 See Hussein v Mehlman [1997] 2 EGLR 87 (County Court), considered in Chapter 22, section 5.

Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999[10] to show that 'non-core' terms of the lease contract are unfair and hence not binding on B.[11] Indeed, the Office of Fair Trading produces useful guidance as to terms that, if included in a lease without being individually negotiated, may be regarded as 'unfair'.[12]

Clearly, in this chapter, we cannot consider the full scope of the protection available to a short-term residential tenant. As noted in Chapter 1, section 2, our focus is not on all of the legal rules that affect the use of land; rather, our primary concern is with property rights relating to land. In this context, it is with the statutory protection that is made available to B because B has a property right in the land: a lease.

In considering that protection, we can start by noting that there is a clear difference between short-term residential leases and their long-term equivalents. Generally, to acquire a long-term residential lease, B will pay a large purchase price and then a very low, often nominal, rent. In contrast, a short-term residential lease generally involves no such premium but, instead, a duty on B to pay regular, more significant sums as rent. Of course, some tenants opt for a short-term residential lease simply as a matter of convenience: they do not wish to make a long-term commitment to a particular property or area. But the absence of a purchase price may mean that many tenants acquire a short-term residential lease out of financial necessity rather than choice: such a tenant may well wish to establish a permanent home, but lack the money needed to acquire a freehold or long-term lease. As a result—in those cases, at least—there may be a particularly strong case for statutory intervention in favour of a tenant with a short-term residential lease. Certainly, as we saw in Chapter 22, the Rent Act 1977 gave significant protection to such a tenant: that was precisely why private landlords such as Mr Street (see Chapter 22, section 1.1.1) and Mr Antoniades (see Chapter 22, section 2.4) went to such lengths to try to deny B a lease. This was not because they wanted to deny B a property right—their concern was not with whether B would have a right capable of binding third parties; rather, it was because they wished to deny B the status that would come with a lease—that status would enable B to qualify for statutory protection.

In the following extract, Bridge develops the idea of the status-conferring aspect of a lease. He also explains how the statutory protection available to a short-term residential tenant has changed, very significantly, since the time of the Rent Act 1977.

Bridge, 'Leases: Contract, Property and Status' in Land Law: Issues, Debates, Policy (ed Tee, 2002, pp 105–8)

The lease as status

The status-conferring dimension of the landlord-tenant relationship is given little attention in modern land law courses. Yet [. . .] the leading cases have frequently been motivated by a [10] It is clear that the Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999 (SI 1999/2083) may apply to leases: this was confirmed by the Court of Appeal in Khatun v Newham LBC [2005] QB 37. In contrast, the Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977 does not apply to leases (due to an express exemption: see Sch 1, para 1(b), of the Act). The 1977 Act can, however, apply to licences: this is a rare situation in which the availability of particular statutory protection depends on B not having a lease.

[11] Core terms are not subject to the fairness test: as a result, the Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999 cannot be used to challenge, e.g. the level of the agreed rent.

[12] The website of the Office of Fair Trading (http://www.oft.gov.uk) is a useful starting point for a tenant wishing to claim that a non-individually negotiated term in the lease agreement is unfair and so not binding on him or her.

desire on the part of the landlord to avoid legislative status and [...] there are many other cases where the courts have been faced with the interaction of the general principles of landlord and tenant law with specific statutory provisions that apply to certain kinds of lease. The landlord-tenant relationship does not exist within a vacuum, it exists within a factual context, and the type of property let (a house, a flat, a farm, an office), for instance, will make considerable differences to the legal regime applicable. There is insufficient space here to do justice to the multifarious forms of statutory intervention in the landlord-tenant relationship. However, it may be useful to mention three particular areas in an attempt to show how the legal background has moved on, even since the days of Street v Mountford, to illustrate why it is that private sector residential landlords have changed their practices, and to compare the operation of principle in the residential sector of property with that in the commercial field.

Part 1 of the Housing Act 1988 came into force on 15 January 1989, less than four years after the decision in Street v Mountford. The Conservative government had taken the view that the decline in the private rented sector of residential property was attributable to the impact of rent control, and that any revival would require landlords to obtain a commercial return for their investment. The 1988 Act sought to phase out the Rent Acts by providing that tenancies granted after the legislation came into force would be taken out of the operation of the Acts altogether. Instead, a new regime of letting, known as the 'assured tenancy', would apply to them, pursuant to which landlords could charge whatever rent the tenant agreed to pay. The assured tenant was given statutory security and a limited form of succession on death was also enacted. Eight years later, by the Housing Act 1996, the statutory security of private sector tenants was dealt a further blow. As from 28 February 1997, any new tenancy was to take effect as an 'assured shorthold tenancy', unless the parties expressly agreed otherwise, under which the landlord can recover possession once any fixed term has expired by giving notice of a sufficient length. The legislative matrix is extremely convoluted, but the sum effect is clear. Since the enactment of the Housing Act 1988 there has been a highly significant diminution in the statutory rights of the tenant of residential property in the private sector. The spectre of the Rent Acts, which cast a long shadow over residential lettings, has been vanquished, and market forces are now allowed to prevail. Over the course of the last decade, private sector landlords have ceased to care whether they grant tenancies or licences.

[...] The public sector of housing has never been subjected to the regime of the Rent Acts, as it was for many years assumed that local authorities would act in the interests of their rate-paying tenants and not be influenced by unseemly market forces. Council tenants were therefore left to resort to public law remedies in cases where they fell into dispute with their local authority landlords over matters such as the negotiation of council rents. The systematic conferment of security of tenure on public sector tenants was initiated by Margaret Thatcher's first Conservative administration, contemporaneously with its highly publicised promotion of the tenant's right to buy the reversion of their landlord. Thus there arose, in the public sector, the status of 'secure tenant', conferring security of tenure, rights to exchange tenancies, and succession rights on death.

3 THE STATUS-CONFERRING ASPECT OF A LEASE: PRACTICE

The final part of the previous extract refers to the 'secure tenancy'. The secure tenancy is an excellent example of the status-conferring aspect of the lease. This statutory creation[13] can arise where the landlord is a local authority[14] and its chief effect is to ensure that a court order is necessary to remove the tenant without his or her consent, and that such an order can only be made if the local authority can establish one or more of a limited set of 'grounds of possession'. A form of security of tenure is conferred, as those limited grounds do not include the expiry of the term of the lease. Moreover, even if one of the grounds for removal arises (e.g. because the tenant is in arrears of rent), a possession order can be granted only if it would be 'reasonable' to make such an order.[15] Indeed, even if one of the grounds for possession exists, and it would be reasonable to make the order, a court still has a wide discretion: as noted by Lord Neuberger in Manchester City Council v Pinnock[16] (discussed in Chapter 3), a court may instead 'refuse to make any order, it may adjourn the proceedings, it may make an outright possession order which takes effect on a specific day, or it may make a suspended possession order which will not take effect so long as, for instance, the tenant pays the rent or creates no nuisance.'

[13] Introduced by the Housing Act 1980. See now Housing Act 1985, s 79.

A secure tenancy can arise only where B is an individual who 'occupies a dwelling-house as his only or principal home'.[17] It is important to note that s 79(3) of that Act states that the secure tenancy rules also 'apply in relation to a licence to occupy a dwelling-house (whether or not granted for consideration) as they apply in relation to a tenancy'. In Westminster City Council v Clarke,[18] which we examined in Chapter 22, section 2.3, however, the House of Lords explained that s 79(3) was intended to deal only with those cases in which, under the approach to the definition of a lease applying before Street v Mountford,[19] B could have a licence involving exclusive possession (see Chapter 22, section 1.1.1). In practice, then, the protection given to a secure tenant can apply only where B has a lease. That was precisely why, in Westminster City Council v Clarke, it was vital to decide if B had a right to exclusive possession of the land for a limited period. It could well be argued that the policy behind the secure tenancy (in particular, the need to allow B to be secure in his or her home) applies equally where B occupies as a licensee, lacking a right to exclusive possession. Crucially, however, it is only B's acquisition of a lease that gives B the statutory status of a secure tenant.

As Bridge noted, in the extract above, the status-conferring aspect of a lease can change over time, as Parliament adopts different views as to the level of protection that a particular type of tenant should enjoy. For example, prior to the introduction of the Housing Act 1988, private sector tenants had enjoyed security of tenure under the Rent Acts, which limited the grounds on which a landlord could regain possession of the land, and thus allowed a tenant to remain even after the expiry of the term of the lease. Due to the statutory changes introduced from 1988, things are now very different. If A is a private party and B (the tenant) is an individual, rather than a company, B's short-term lease may be an 'assured shorthold tenancy', or an 'assured tenancy'.[20] A has a choice as to which tenancy to give B: the default [14] Housing Act 1985, s 80(1). Under that section, a secure tenancy can arise in other cases (e.g. where the landlord is a development corporation, or a housing action trust), but by far the most common case is where the landlord is a local authority.

[15] Housing Act 1985, s 84(2). Under that section, a possession order may also be made, in particular circumstances, if the court is satisfied that suitable alternative accommodation will be available to the tenant.

[16] [2011] 2 AC 104, [6].

[17] Where there is a joint tenancy, it will be a secure tenancy if each of B1 and B2 is an individual and 'at least one of them occupies the dwelling-house as his only or principal home': Housing Act 1985, s 81.

[18] [1992] AC 288. [19] [1985] AC 809.

[20] Of all dwellings in England, around 14 per cent are occupied by tenants of private landlords: Wilcox & Pawson (eds) UK Housing Review 2010/11, Table 17b.

position is that it will be an assured shorthold tenancy.[21] As noted by Bridge in the extract above, that form of lease is only very lightly regulated: certainly, B acquires no security of tenure. So, parties such as Mr Street or Mr Antoniades, who once went to such lengths to avoid granting a lease, are now perfectly content to grant B an assured shorthold tenancy. In fact, assured shorthold tenancies now make up around 67 per cent of all private sector lettings.[22]

Similarly, whilst the secure tenancy remains the predominant form of local authority tenancy, statutory reform has led to the introduction of other forms, which confer less protection on the tenant. As we saw in Chapter 3, section 4.2.2, the 'demoted tenancy' (considered by the Supreme Court in Manchester City Council v Pinnock) was introduced by the Anti-social Behaviour Act 2003.[23] That Act gave a court the power to make a 'demotion order', turning a secure tenancy into a demoted tenancy. As Lord Neuberger stated in Pinnock,[24] a demotion order can be made only if: '(a) the tenant (or someone living with him) has engaged, or has threatened to engage, in (i) "housing-related anti-social conduct"[25] or (ii) conduct which consists of or involves using the "premises for unlawful purposes"[26], and (b) it is reasonable to make the order.' If a demotion order is made, 'the demotion results in much reduced rights of security of tenure for the tenant.' The reduction in the security of tenure available to particular local authority tenants was the result of a Parliamentary desire to address the perceived problem of anti-social behaviour. Similarly, in Chapter 3, section 4.2.2, we also noted the existence of introductory tenancies (considered by the Supreme Court in Leeds City Council v Hall and Birmingham City Council v Frisby).[27] As Lord Hope noted in those appeals,[28] Parliament allowed local authorities to create such tenancies when wishing, in effect, to put a tenant on probation, the idea being that the introductory tenancy would mature into a secure tenancy (and thus confer security of tenure) only if the tenant behaved appropriately during the term of the introductory tenancy.

As we noted in Chapter 3, section 4.2.2, an important feature of demoted and introductory tenancies is that each allows for mandatory grounds of possession: the statutory framework sets out circumstances in which a judge is not given any discretion to refuse a possession order. This feature is also present when a local authority, acting to meet its duty to a homeless person, grants such person a non-secure tenancy under Part VII of the Housing Act 1996 (such a tenancy was considered by the Supreme Court in Hounslow London Borough Council v Powell).[29] This explains why, in each of Powell and Manchester City Council v Pinnock, the Supreme Court considered whether the statutory framework could be interpreted in such a way as to afford sufficient protection for a tenant's right, under Art 8 of the European Convention of Human Rights, to respect for his or her home. In the case of a secure tenancy, such a question is more easily answered: a judge has the discretion to decide whether or not it would be 'reasonable' to grant a possession order, and to decide whether or not to postpone or suspend such an order, and that discretion can be exercised in such a way as to ensure Art 21 Before 1 October 2010, a tenancy with a rent of over £25,000 per year was excluded from the Housing Act regime, and so could not be an assured or an assured shorthold tenancy. As from 1 October 2010, that limit has been raised to £100,000: The Assured Tenancies (Amendment) (England) Order 2010 – SI 2010 No 908 (25 March 2010).

22 Department for Communities and Local Government, Live Table 731 (figures for 2007–8).

23 That Act inserted provisions into the Housing Act 1996.

24 [2011] 2 AC 104, [8].

25 As defined in s 153A of the Housing Act 1996.

26 As explained in s 153B of the Housing Act 1996.

27 [2011] 2 AC 186. These appeals were heard along with Hounslow LBC v Powell.

28 Ibid, [15]–[19].

29 [2011] 2 AC 186. Lord Hope discusses the nature of such tenancies at [11]–[14].

8 is not infringed.[30] Where Parliament has decided, however, that it is permissible for a local authority to grant a non-secure tenancy, it may be more difficult, as we saw in Chapter 3, section 4.2.2, to reconcile the framework set out by statute with the demands of Art 8.

The introduction of demoted and introductory tenancies thus provides a good example of how Parliament's policy to the status-conferring aspect of a lease may change over time. Indeed, in passing the Localism Act 2011, Parliament has recently set out a new approach to the provision of public sector and social housing. The aim of Part 7 of the Act is to give local authorities and registered providers of social housing greater 'flexibility' and thus to reduce the statutory protection available to tenants.[31] For example, a local authority may be able to grant a new type of tenancy, known as a 'flexible tenancy'. Such a tenancy, whilst technically still a form of secure tenancy, will confer less statutory protection than the current, general form of secure tenancy: in particular, there will no longer be security of tenure, as a flexible tenancy will have a stated maximum duration, and the landlord will therefore be able to serve a notice and to claim possession of the land at the end of that period.[32]

There may be a number of reasons why Parliament's views as to the proper level of statutory protection for residential tenants may change over time. Firstly, it may be felt that giving significant protection to tenants can be counterproductive. If the level of that protection means that potential landlords are deterred from renting out their land, the supply of available housing will be reduced. In this way, the cost of protecting those in need of accommodation and fortunate enough to have found it already may be that others, also in need of accommodation, have more difficulty in finding a home. It may also be felt that security of tenure can, in certain cases, encourage anti-social conduct, if a tenant, or those occupying with a tenant, feel that they cannot be evicted no matter how they behave.

Secondly, there is a political question. Parliament's willingness to enforce a departure from the simple model of a lease (for example, by preventing A from regaining exclusive possession at the end of the agreed lease period) will depend on its view of the importance of the parties' property rights and their freedom to contract. Certainly, the political consensus from the mid-1990s or so has been broadly in favour of reduced state intervention and greater deregulation: as we will see in Chapter 29, that consensus has also shaped the degree of protection available to a mortgage borrower.

4 THE STATUS-CONFERRING ASPECT OF A LEASE: ITS IMPACT ON THE DEFINITION OF THE LEASE

The status-conferring aspect of a lease gives rise to an important question: if particular statutes give B important protection if and only if B has a lease, will judges be tempted to widen (or narrow) the definition of a lease in order to ensure that B does (or does not) receive such [30] It is true that Harrow LBC v Qazi [2004] 1 AC 983 (see Chapter 3, section 4.1.1) concerned an Art 8 challenge in the context of a secure tenancy. This was because the secure tenancy was held by two joint tenants and, technically, it ended due to the choice of one of those joint tenants not to renew it. The local authority therefore did not need to rely on any of the grounds for possession set out in the Housing Act 1985. See further Chapter 22, section 3.3.

[31] The policy behind the changes is set out in, for example, the consultation paper issued by the Department for Communities and Local Government in November 2010 entitled 'Local Decisions: A Fairer Future for Local Housing'.

[32] In addition, the class of people with a statutory right to succeed to a secure tenancy will be reduced by s 160 of the Localism Act 2011.

protection? For example, we noted in section 3 above that the Rent Acts formerly gave significant protection to a tenant of a private landlord. In Street v Mountford (see Chapter 22, sections 1.1.1 and 2.1), Lord Templeman stated that: 'I accept that the Rent Acts are irrelevant to the problem of determining the legal effect of the rights granted by the agreement. Like the professed intention of the parties, the Rent Acts cannot alter the effect of the agreement.'[33] This strict view can be seen as favouring the 'doctrinal' approach, as opposed to the 'utility' approach (see Chapter 1, section 5.2): if Parliament has decided that statutory protection should be available only to those with a lease, the term 'lease' should be given its usual meaning. A contrasting approach would be to interpret the term 'lease' in a way which ensures that the statute succeeds in protecting those who, in the view of the court, deserve protection. The tension between these two approaches was apparent in Chapter 22, section 2.4, when we considered the courts' response to 'shams' or 'pretences' used by a landlord in an attempt to prevent a lease arising. It is also clear in the House of Lords's decision in Bruton v London & Quadrant Housing Trust Ltd,[34] and in commentators' response to that decision.

To understand the background to Bruton, we first need to look at the reason why Mr Bruton wished to claim that he had a lease. It was provided by s 11 of the Landlord and Tenant Act 1985, which essentially[35] ensures that, where B has a lease, for less than seven years, of a dwelling, A is under the following duties:

Landlord and Tenant Act 1985, s 11

[. . .]

(a) to keep in repair the structure and exterior of the dwelling-house (including drains, gutters and external pipes);

(b) to keep in repair and proper working order the installations in the dwelling-house for the supply of water, gas and electricity and for sanitation (including basins, sinks, baths and sanitary conveniences, but not other fixtures, fittings and appliances for making use of the supply of water, gas or electricity), and

(c) to keep in repair and proper working order the installations in the dwelling-house for space heating and heating water.

The policy behind this statutory duty seems clear: if B has a short-term lease, it seems unreasonable for B to have to bear the cost of repairs that may ultimately benefit A when A regains exclusive possession of the land.[36] In addition, having rented a home in a particular condition, B may reasonably expect a certain basic level of maintenance and repair. In practice, it may be that B's need for accommodation and relatively weak bargaining position make it impossible to leave the matter to the parties' freedom to contract: hence the mandatory statutory duty. Those policy concerns would also seem to apply in a case in which B has a licence rather than a lease—it is difficult to see how B's acquisition of a property right makes him or her more deserving of the protection afforded by s 11. Nonetheless, the statute makes clear that the duty it imposes can only be implied into a lease. It is in this way that B's acquisition of a lease provides the status needed to qualify for the statutory protection.

[33] [1985] AC 809, 819. [34] [2000] 1 AC 406.

[35] There are some exceptional situations in which the duty does not arise: see Landlord and Tenant Act 1985, s 14.

[36] As a result of s 166 of the Localism Act 2011, s 11 of the 1985 Act will also apply to any future secure tenancies of seven years or longer; and any future assured tenancy for a fixed term of seven years or longer, granted by a registered provider of social housing, as long as it is not a shared ownership lease.

Bruton v London & Quadrant Housing Trust Ltd
[2000] 1 AC 406, HL

Facts: The London Borough of Lambeth ('the council') owned a block of flats, Oval House, in Brixton, London. It planned to demolish the block and build new flats, but there were delays to that project. In the meantime, the council gave the London & Quadrant Housing Trust, a charitable body that sought to provide accommodation to the homeless and those in need, a licence to use the flats for that purpose. It was clear that its agreement with the council gave the Trust only a licence: in particular, the council had no statutory power, in the circumstances, to give the Trust a lease. Mr Bruton was one of the parties housed by the Trust in Oval House. The agreement entered into by Mr Bruton and the Trust was described as a licence. It stated that:

> The trust has the property on licence from [the council] who acquired the property for development [. . .] and pending this development, it is being used to provide temporary housing accommodation. It is offered to you on the condition that you will vacate upon receiving reasonable notice from the trust, which will not normally be less than four weeks.

Mr Bruton claimed that his agreement with the Trust, in fact, gave him a lease; that the Trust was therefore under a statutory repairing duty, imposed by s 11 of the Landlord and Tenant Act 1985; and that the Trust had failed to perform that duty. The Trust argued that Mr Bruton could not have a lease: the Trust had no power to grant Mr Bruton a property right in the land because it had no such right itself (it had only a licence from the council). Judge James, sitting at Lambeth county court, found in favour of the Trust. The Court of Appeal dismissed Mr Bruton's appeal (Sir Brian Neill dissenting)—but the House of Lords found that Mr Bruton did have a lease and thus that the Trust was, therefore, under the statutory repairing duty.

Lord Hoffmann

At 413–6

Did this agreement create a 'lease' or 'tenancy' within the meaning of the Landlord and Tenant Act 1985 or any other legislation which refers to a lease or tenancy? The decision of this House in Street v. Mountford[37] is authority for the proposition that a 'lease' or 'tenancy' is a contractually binding agreement, not referable to any other relationship between the -parties, by which one person gives another the right to exclusive occupation of land for a fixed or renewable period or periods of time, usually in return for a periodic payment in money. An agreement having these characteristics creates a relationship of landlord and tenant to which the common law or statute may then attach various incidents. The fact that the parties use language more appropriate to a different kind of agreement, such as a licence, is irrelevant if upon its true construction it has the identifying characteristics of a lease. The meaning of the agreement, for example, as to the extent of the possession which it grants, depends upon the intention of the parties, objectively ascertained by reference to the language and relevant background. The decision of your Lordships' House in Westminster City Council v. Clarke[38] is a good example of the importance of background in deciding whether the agreement grants exclusive possession or not. But the classification of the agreement as a lease does not depend upon any intention additional to that expressed in the choice of terms. It is simply a question of characterising the terms which the parties have agreed. This is a question of law.

[37] [1985] AC 809.

In this case, it seems to me that the agreement, construed against the relevant background, plainly gave Mr. Bruton a right to exclusive possession. There is nothing to suggest that he was to share possession with the trust, the council or anyone else. The trust did not retain such control over the premises as was inconsistent with Mr. Bruton having exclusive possession as was the case in Westminster City Council v. Clarke. The only rights which it reserved were for itself and the council to enter at certain times and for limited purposes. As Lord Templeman said in Street v. Mountford such an express reservation 'only serves to emphasise the fact that the grantee is entitled to exclusive possession and is a tenant.'[39] Nor was there any other relationship between the parties to which Mr. Bruton's exclusive possession could be referable.

Mr. Henderson, who appeared for the trust, submitted that there were 'special circumstances' in this case which enabled one to construe the agreement as a licence despite the presence of all the characteristics identified in Street v. Mountford. These circumstances were that the trust was a responsible landlord performing socially valuable functions, it had agreed with the council not to grant tenancies, Mr. Bruton had agreed that he was not to have a tenancy and the trust had no estate out of which it could grant one.

In my opinion none of these circumstances can make an agreement to grant exclusive possession something other than a tenancy. The character of the landlord is irrelevant because although the Rent Acts and other Landlord and Tenant Acts do make distinctions between different kinds of landlords, it is not by saying that what would be a tenancy if granted by one landlord will be something else if granted by another. The alleged breach of the trust's licence is irrelevant because there is no suggestion that the grant of a tenancy would have been ultra vires either the trust or the council [...] If it was a breach of a term of the licence from the council, that would have been because it was a tenancy. The licence could not have turned it into something else. Mr. Bruton's agreement is irrelevant because one cannot contract out of the statute. The trust's lack of title is also irrelevant, but I shall consider this point at a later stage. In Family Housing Association v. Jones,[40] where the facts were very similar to those in the present case, the Court of Appeal construed the 'licence' as a tenancy. Slade L.J. gave careful consideration to whether any exceptional ground existed for making an exception to the principle in Street v. Mountford and came to the conclusion that there was not. I respectfully agree. For these reasons I consider that the agreement between the trust and Mr. Bruton was a lease within the meaning of section 11 of the Landlord and Tenant Act 1985.

My Lords, in my opinion, that is the end of the matter. But the Court of Appeal did not stop at that point. In the leading majority judgment, Millett L.J. said that an agreement could not be a lease unless it had a further characteristic, namely that it created a legal estate in the land which 'binds the whole world.'[41] If, as in this case, the grantor had no legal estate, the agreement could not create one and therefore did not qualify as a lease. The only exception was the case in which the grantor was estopped from denying that he could not create a legal estate. In that case, a 'tenancy by estoppel' came into existence. But an estoppel depended upon the grantor having purported to grant a lease and in this case the trust had not done so. It had made it clear that it was only purporting to grant a licence.

[38] [1992] AC 288. [39] [1985] AC 809, p 818. [40] [1990] 1 WLR 779. [41] [1998] QB 834, 845.

My Lords, I hope that this summary does justice to the closely reasoned judgment of Millett L.J. But I fear that I must respectfully differ at three critical steps in the argument.

First, the term 'lease' or 'tenancy' describes a relationship between two parties who are designated landlord and tenant. It is not concerned with the question of whether the agreement creates an estate or other proprietary interest which may be binding upon third parties. A lease may, and usually does, create a proprietary interest called a leasehold estate or, technically, a 'term of years absolute.' This will depend upon whether the landlord had an interest out of which he could grant it. Nemo dat quod non habet.[42] But it is the fact that the agreement is a lease which creates the proprietary interest. It is putting the cart before the horse to say that whether the agreement is a lease depends upon whether it creates a proprietary interest [...]

Secondly, I think that Millett L.J. may have been misled by the ancient phrase 'tenancy by estoppel' into thinking that it described an agreement which would not otherwise be a lease or tenancy but which was treated as being one by virtue of an estoppel. In fact, as the authorities show, it is not the estoppel which creates the tenancy, but the tenancy which creates the estoppel. The estoppel arises when one or other of the parties wants to deny one of the ordinary incidents or obligations of the tenancy on the ground that the landlord had no legal estate. The basis of the estoppel is that having entered into an agreement which constitutes a lease or tenancy, he cannot repudiate that incident or obligation [...] Thus it is the fact that the agreement between the parties constitutes a tenancy that gives rise to an estoppel and not the other way round. It therefore seems to me that the question of tenancy by estoppel does not arise in this case. The issue is simply whether the agreement is a tenancy. It is not whether either party is entitled to deny some obligation or incident of the tenancy on the ground that the trust had no title.

Thirdly, I cannot agree that there is no inconsistency between what the trust purported to do and its denial of the existence of a tenancy. This seems to me to fly in the face of Street v. Mountford. In my opinion, the trust plainly did purport to grant a tenancy. It entered into an agreement on terms which constituted a tenancy. It may have agreed with Mr. Bruton to say that it was not a tenancy. But the parties cannot contract out of the Rent Acts or other landlord and tenant statutes by such devices. Nor in my view can they be used by a landlord to avoid being estopped from denying that he entered into the agreement he actually made.

For these reasons I would allow the appeal and declare that Mr. Bruton was a tenant. I should add that I express no view on whether he was a secure tenant or on the rights of the council to recover possession of the flat.

Lord Hobhouse

At 417–8

The claim made in the action seeks to enforce a contractual cause of action. The breach of contract alleged against the defendant housing trust is the failure to maintain and keep in repair the flat in which the plaintiff, Mr. Bruton is living. He relies upon a written agreement between himself and the housing trust dated 31 January 1989. The written agreement does not contain any undertaking by the housing trust to repair the flat. But Mr. Bruton alleges that the agreement creates a relationship of landlord and tenant between the housing trust and himself and that therefore an undertaking to repair by the housing trust is compulsorily implied by statute—section 11 of the Landlord and Tenant Act 1985.

Counsel for the housing trust accepted before your Lordships that a contractual relationship of landlord and tenant suffices to make the provisions of the Act applicable. The question therefore is whether the agreement creates such a relationship. The answer to this question is, in my judgment, determined by the decision in Street v. Mountford. The agreement was an agreement to give Mr. Bruton the exclusive possession of the flat for a period or periods of time in return for the periodic payment of money; the grant of exclusive possession was not referable to any other relationship between the parties. It follows that the relationship created was that of landlord and tenant and the provisions of the Act apply to the agreement. Mr. Bruton is entitled to succeed [...]

42 [No one can give what he does not have.]

The Court of Appeal were influenced by the way in which the case for Mr. Bruton was argued before them. They understood that his case depended upon establishing a tenancy by estoppel. This was not a correct analysis. He needed to do no more than rely upon the written agreement he had with the housing trust and its legal effect. The only concept of estoppel which was possibly relevant was that which arises from the agreement [...] The present case does not depend upon the establishing of an estoppel nor does any problem arise from the fact that the housing trust did not have a legal estate. The case of Mr. Bruton depends upon his establishing that his agreement with the housing trust has the legal effect of creating a relationship of tenant and landlord between them. That is all. It does not depend upon his establishing a proprietary title good against all the world or against the council. It is not necessary for him to show that the council had conveyed a legal estate to the housing trust. I therefore cannot agree with the reasoning of the Court of Appeal and would allow this appeal.

The decision of the House of Lords in Bruton has proved to be controversial, to say the least. The essential point is that, prior to the decision, it had been assumed that, to take advantage of the status-conferring aspect of a lease, B necessarily had to have a property right—but the House of Lords departed from that assumption. It was held that Mr Bruton's agreement with the Trust, even if it did not give him a property right in the land, could nonetheless give Mr Bruton the status of a tenant and therefore allow him to take advantage of s 11 of the Landlord and Tenant Act 1985.

As Bright notes in the following extract, this suggests that there are two forms of lease: the standard proprietary lease, and a new, purely contractual, lease.

Bright, 'Leases, Exclusive Possession and Estates' (2000) 116 LQR 7, 8–9

Certain propositions emerge clearly from the speeches in the House of Lords:

1. Mr Bruton had a right to exclusive possession;
2. the relationship of landlord and tenant existed between Mr Bruton and the Housing Trust;
3. this relationship does not give a title good against all the world; and
4. the fact that the Housing Trust had no estate did not matter.

Cumulatively, these propositions illustrate an understanding about the essential nature of leases that was not shared by the Court of Appeal. Although both courts agree that exclusive possession is necessary in order for there to be a lease, there are contrasting views as to whether this is an absolute or relative concept. In the House of Lords, exclusive possession was found on the basis of the contractual agreement between Mr Bruton and the Housing Trust. The agreement gave Mr Bruton the right to exclusive possession: he did not have to share possession with anyone else, and the Housing Trust retained only limited rights over the premises. The Housing Trust's lack of title is not relevant. In contrast, Millett L.J. regarded exclusive possession as looking beyond the relationship between the two contracting parties. According to this view, exclusive possession, meaning possession to the exclusion of the whole world, is essential for a lease; if 'the grantor has no power to exclude the true owner from possession, he has no power to grant a legal right to exclusive possession and his grant cannot take effect as a tenancy'.[43] This means that Mr Bruton could not have exclusive possession and, thus, he could not have a lease. If it is possible to have exclusive possession in the relational sense referred to in the House of Lords, the further question arises as to the nature of the resulting relationship. We are told that it is a relationship of landlord and tenant but not whether it is an "estate". Given that relativity of title is a fundamental aspect of English land law, it could be classified as an estate in this relative sense. This is hard to accept, however. For derivative title, at least, the principle of nemo dat quod non habet—no one can convey what he does not own—is also fundamental to English land law. The Housing Trust did not have an estate, and so could not grant an estate to Mr Bruton. Indeed, this is implied when Lord Hoffmann states that a 'lease may, and usually does, create a proprietary interest called a leasehold estate [...] This will depend upon whether the landlord had an interest out of which he could grant it' (emphasis added). If usually, then it must be that sometimes there can be a lease which is not an estate.

On this point, too, the Court of Appeal had differed. The premise in the Court of Appeal was that a lease is (always) a proprietary concept: 'A tenancy is a legal estate'.[44] There is much to be said for this view. Although there can be tenancies of sorts which do not confer estates, the tenancy at will and the tenancy by estoppel, these are generally treated as special cases and would not be described as 'leases' without qualification. Moreover, much previous case law proceeds on the assumption that all leases are estates in land, an assumption which has, on occasion, been made explicit: 'I myself find it impossible to conceive of a relationship of landlord and tenant that has not got that essential element of tenure in it, and that implies that the tenant holds of his landlord, and he can only do that if the landlord has a reversion. You cannot have a purely contractual tenure.'[45] More recently, Neuberger J. stated that "a lease involves not only a contract, but also an estate in land".[46] [...] It is, therefore, a surprise that both Lord Hoffmann and Lord Hobhouse of Woodborough state clearly in Bruton, with little discussion of the point, that, though usual, an estate in land is not an essential element of a lease. A lease, in the words of Lord Hoffmann 'describes a relationship between two parties who are designated landlord and tenant. It is not concerned with the question of whether the agreement creates an estate or other proprietary interest which may be binding upon third parties'.

If this is a correct reading of what Lord Hoffmann says and it is possible to have leases which are not estates, contractual rights of occupation will need to be classified as either proprietary leases giving an estate in land and enforceable against all third parties, or as contractual leases conferring exclusive possession and giving rights against all who interfere with possession other than those who can show a better right to possession, or as licences. There will be consequential issues to be addressed. Will 'contractual leases' count as leases for all statutory purposes? Can 'contractual leases' be created informally? It would appear so, as the formality requirements set out in the Law of Property Act 1925, ss.52 and 54, and the Law of Property (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1989, s.2, apply only to interests in land. The rules on certainty of term presumably apply to 'contractual leases'—otherwise the outcome in Prudential Assurance Co. Ltd v. London Residuary Body [1992] 2 A.C. 386

[43] [1998] QB 834, 845, per Millett LJ. [44] Ibid.
[45] Milmo v Carreras [1946] KB 306, 310, per Lord Greene MR.
[46] Re Friends Provident Life Office [1999] 1 All ER (Comm.) 28, 36.

would have been different and the agreement upheld as a contractual tenancy [...] What status will a 'contractual lease' have vis-à-vis third parties?

The essence of the House of Lords' decision in Bruton is that B can have the status of a tenant even if his or her agreement with A does not give B a property right: B may instead have a 'non-estate tenancy'.[47]

In the following extract, it is suggested that the House of Lords could have reached that conclusion in a more conventional way: by utilizing the well-established notion of a 'tenancy by estoppel'.

Routley, 'Tenancies and Estoppel: After Bruton v London & Quadrant Housing Trust' (2000) 63 MLR 424, 424–8

As generally understood, a tenancy by estoppel results where a person purports to grant a tenancy of land, but does not in fact have a sufficient interest in the land to create a tenancy: he is then estopped from denying that the relationship of landlord and tenant exists between him and the grantee [...] As between the parties it is as though they are actually landlord and tenant even though in fact they are not.

The authorities describe a tenancy by estoppel as a different creature from the more familiar estoppel by representation, as a development from the doctrine of estoppel by deed, but extended in the field of landlord and tenant to all grants whether merely written or oral. A tenancy by estoppel could be said to be the result of the operation of estoppel by grant. Unlike its cousin, estoppel by grant does not rely upon any express representation as to title: 'It is the product of a fundamental principle of the common law which precludes a grantor from disputing the validity of his own grant.'[48]

[...] Confusion between the doctrines of estoppel by representation and estoppel by grant gave rise to some of the difficulties in Bruton [...] Millett LJ [in the Court of Appeal] found that there is no estoppel 'unless the grantor's denial of title is inconsistent with his grant.'[49] There was no estoppel here, because there was no inconsistency between the nature of the alleged grant (a licence), and therefore there could not be any tenancy. The principles of estoppel and of Street v Mountford were irreconciliable:

> 'Street v Mountford rejects the professed intentions of the parties in favour of the true effect of the transaction. Estoppel by convention gives effect to the professed intentions of the parties. Any attempt to combine them produces a hopeless circularity.'[50]

I fear that Millett LJ may have been too bemused by the elegance of that conundrum to notice its flaws: it is an oversimplification to say that estoppel 'gives effect to the professed intentions of the parties'. While Millett LJ acknowledges the difference described above between estoppel by representation and by grant, he then applies the 'representation' test to the facts of the case before him, basing his conclusion of no estoppel on a finding of no misrepresentation.

[47] To use the term applied by Lord Scott when considering the Bruton tenancy in Kay v Lambeth London Borough Council [2006] 2 AC 465, [145]–[147]. We examined the human rights aspects of that case in Chapter 3, section 2.1.1.

[48] Per Millett LJ in Bruton in the Court of Appeal: [1998] QB 834, 844.

[49] Ibid, 845.

[50] Ibid.

The flaw in that reasoning is that this estoppel does not arise from a representation, but from the grant, and if one correctly concludes via Street v Mountford that the grant was in fact the grant of a tenancy, then the Trust's denial of title is inconsistent with that grant, and, despite the fact that both the Trust and [Mr Bruton] thought that a licence was being granted, a tenancy by estoppel arises [...]

The whole corpus of law relating to landlord and tenant derives from the status of landlord and tenant, from privity of estate, from the fact of ownership of a proprietary interest in land, not from the fact of having entered into an agreement which might or might not have created such a proprietary interest.

An agreement in the form of a lease, but which does not create a proprietary interest, cannot be a lease. And the order of cart and horse is not as Lord Hoffmann would have it, but as it has always been.

Which is precisely why the common law imposes an estoppel upon the man who purports to grant a lease by means of an agreement in the form of a lease which purports to create one: to prevent him from saying 'I did not have the interest out of which to create a lease, therefore I could not have granted one, therefore the grantee is not my tenant, and I am not bound by any obligations as landlord.' But it must never be overlooked that a 'tenancy by estoppel' is not a tenancy: not a proprietary interest.

Routley's argument is that the House of Lords in Bruton reached the correct result, but by the wrong route. Certainly, given the policy behind s 11 of the Landlord and Tenant Act 1985, it would seem unreasonable for the Trust to use its own lack of a property right as a means to escape a statutory repairing duty. Routley suggests that the unfairness comes from the fact that the Trust entered an agreement seemingly giving Mr Bruton exclusive possession of the land for a limited period: as a result, the Trust should have been prevented from denying that Mr Bruton had a lease. This form of estoppel thus has the same effect as the estoppel by representation (see Chapter 10, section 1): it does not, in fact, give B a lease, but it prevents A from denying that B has a lease. That reasoning could thus have been used to prevent the Trust denying its statutory repairing duty.

Routley's argument is convincing—but, as he admits, it does not fit with the reasoning of the House of Lords. The key aspect of that reasoning seems to be the separation of the status-conferring and property right-conferring aspects of the lease. The agreement between Mr Bruton and the Trust, whilst it could not give Mr Bruton a property right in the land, did give him the status needed to qualify for statutory protection. The validity of that approach can be seen as a question of statutory interpretation: when Parliament used the word 'lease' to define the scope of the repairing duty, did it intend that term to be confined to cases in which B has a property right in land?

This suggestion is pursued in the following extract.

McFarlane and Simpson, 'Tackling Avoidance' in Rationalizing Property, Equity and Trusts: Essays for Edward Burn (ed Getzler, 2002, pp 175–6)

[It may] be significant that Lord Hoffmann posed the question: 'Did this agreement create a 'lease' or 'tenancy' within the meaning of the Landlord and Tenant Act 1985 or any other legislation which refers to a lease or tenancy?'[51] and also that counsel for the housing trust, > in the words of Lord Hobhouse, accepted that 'a contractual relationship of landlord and tenant suffices to make the provisions of the Act applicable.'[52] It can be argued that Bruton [. . .] does not involve a re-working of the general test for a lease but rather involves an attempt to further the presumed purpose of a legislative scheme by looking not for a lease in the technical sense of a legal right to exclusive possession but instead for a lease in the wider, non-juristic sense of an arrangement which confers practical control of property. The decision can thus be seen as based on an implicit assumption that the legislature's use of the concept of a tenancy to determine the bounds of particular protection for occupiers is simply a means to achieve an underlying purpose of giving such protection to those who, in practice, occupy property as one occupies a home. Provided such occupation exists, the precise legal rights enjoyed by the occupier are therefore not decisive in determining the application of the statute [. . .]

[51] [2000] 1 AC 406, 413.

>
> Hence, it may just be possible to justify the decision in Bruton by arguing that "lease" and "tenancy", when used in the Landlord and Tenant Act 1985, include an occupier under an agreement which only fails to confer a legal right to exclusive possession because of the grantor's lack of title. It could be said that the purpose of the legislation is to regulate the relationship between grantor and occupier, and the lack of title of the grantor, whilst it will prevent the occupier gaining rights against the true owner or those claiming through him, should not deny the occupier the protection of the Act: put simply, in such a situation the fact that the occupation agreement is technically unable to confer a lease in the full legal sense is not the fault of the occupier [. . .]

McFarlane and Simpson also explore whether this 'statutory interpretation' approach can be used to explain the 'pretence' concept applied by the House of Lords in Antoniades v Villiers.[53] As we saw in Chapter 22, section 2.4, there is a debate as to whether that concept provides a doctrinal justification for ignoring terms in the parties' contract that, if valid, would prevent B from acquiring a right to exclusive possession of the land. McFarlane and Simpson suggest that, in Antoniades, the House of Lords may have been motivated by an understandable desire to ensure that the statutory protection then provided by the Rent Acts should extend not only to parties with a legal right to exclusive possession, but also to parties, such as Mr Villiers and Miss Bridger, who, in practice, enjoyed exclusive control of a home in return for paying rent. As the authors go on to note in the following passage, however, this approach to statutory interpretation, whilst it may be able to explain the results in Bruton and Antoniades, seems to be inconsistent with the seminal decision of the House of Lords in Street v Mountford.[54]

McFarlane and Simpson, 'Tackling Avoidance' in Rationalizing Property, Equity and Trusts: Essays for Edward Burn (ed Getzler, 2002, p 177)

> Lord Templeman's [speech in Street v Mountford] is founded on a rejection of the previously prevailing idea that the term 'tenancy' could be given an unorthodox meaning when used in the Rent Acts. A heresy had sprung up in the Court of Appeal which allowed an owner wishing to avoid the burdens of such legislation to do so provided he demonstrated an intention not to grant a lease. It seems clear that this heresy was motivated by sympathy towards such an owner, and a consequent willingness to narrow the application of the Rent Acts. Lord

[52] Ibid, 417. [53] [1990] 1 AC 417. [54] [1985] AC 809.

> Templeman firmly emphasises that the orthodox, traditional definition of a lease as the grant of exclusive possession is the true test to apply. This can be defended on the simple grounds that when Parliament selects a concept such as 'lease' or 'tenancy', with an established juridical meaning, to communicate with judges there is no reason to believe it intends an unorthodox meaning of that term to be applied. Therefore whilst the result in Street may be favourable to occupiers rather than owners, its methodology is avowedly neutral.

The authors of the extract go on to make the point that, if the terms 'lease' or 'tenancy' can be interpreted in a novel way when used in a statute, this will not necessarily lead to an increase in the availability of statutory protection. For example, a court could find that, because of the special duties imposed on A if B has a lease, the term should be given a particularly narrow definition. Indeed, as we noted in Chapter 22, section 2.1, it seems that the Court of Appeal adopted just such an approach in the period leading up to Street v Mountford. Even if it is agreed that a judge, when interpreting a statute, should try to advance its purpose, we have to ask how a judge should discern that purpose. After all, as noted above, it may seem that the policy underlying s 11 of the Landlord and Tenant Act 1985 should apply even if B's agreement with A has not given B a property right. But it is doubtful that a court can make that decision given that: (i) the statute expressly limits its scope to cases in which B has a 'lease'; and (ii) as noted by the authors of all the extracts in this section, the term 'lease' is generally understood as applying only where A's agreement with B gives B a property right in land.

The solution, of course, is for Parliament to make its policy clearer. One resolution would be for the statutory protection currently available to those with leases to be extended to parties with licences. The lease would then be left to play its role as a concept conferring a property right; it would not have to perform the further task of conferring the status needed to qualify for statutory protection. In fact, as we will see in the next section, the Law Commission has proposed just such a change.

5 THE STATUS-CONFERRING ASPECT OF A LEASE: REFORM?

There have long been calls for the reform of the statutory regulation of short-term residential leases. One of the central complaints has been that the law is too complex, with occupiers and landlords often unsure of their positions. Certainly, any protection that the law aims to provide for occupiers will be undermined if, in practice, those occupiers are unaware of their legal rights.[55]

In 2006, the Law Commission, following what it described as 'one of the largest consultation exercises [it had] ever undertaken',[56] published its report on Renting Homes. The report considered the statutory protection available to short-term residential tenants and suggested significant changes, based on three objectives of 'simplification, increased comprehensibility, and flexibility'.[57] It produced a very detailed draft Bill (the Rented Homes Bill) and stated that its proposals were based on 'two radical changes to the legislative approach to the regulation of rented housing'. Those changes are set out in the extract below:

[55] For a good example of this problem, exploring occupiers' ignorance of the legal protection given to them by the Protection from Eviction Act 1977, see Cowan, 'Harassment and Unlawful Eviction in the Private Rented Sector – a Study of Law in (-)action' [2001] Conv 249.

[56] Law Commission Report No 297, Renting Homes (2006), [1.3].

[57] Ibid, [1.9].

Law Commission Report No 297, Renting Homes (2006, [1.4]–[1.6])

First, we recommend the creation of a single social tenure. At present, local authorities can only let on secure tenancies; registered social landlords only on assured tenancies. Our recommendations are 'landlord-neutral'. They enable social housing providers, referred to in the Bill as 'community landlords', and those private sector landlords who so wish to rent on identical terms. This has long been sought by local authorities and registered social landlords. This offers the prize of vastly increased flexibility both to policy makers and landlords in the provision and management of social housing.

Secondly, we recommend a new 'consumer protection' approach which focuses on the contract between the landlord and the occupier (the contract-holder), incorporating consumer protection principles of fairness and transparency. Thus our recommended scheme does not depend on technical legal issues of whether or not there is a tenancy as opposed to a licence (as has usually been the case in the past). This ensures that both landlords and occupiers have a much clearer understanding of their rights and obligations.

The terms of the contract, underpinned by our statutory scheme, will be set out in model contracts that we anticipate will be free and easily downloadable. They will benefit landlords by explaining their rights and obligations, thus reducing the ignorance many landlords have about their responsibilities. They will benefit occupiers who will also have a clear statement of their rights and obligations, which sets out the basis on which they occupy accommodation, and the circumstances in which their rights to occupy may come to an end.

The aim of simplification would be achieved in a number of ways. Firstly, the current focus on the identity of the landlord, and, with it, the different statutory categories of lease (e.g. 'assured shorthold tenancy', 'assured tenancy', 'secure tenancy', etc.), would be removed. Secondly, and most importantly for our current purposes, the status-conferring aspect of a lease would be lost: to qualify for statutory protection, it would no longer be necessary for B to show that he or she has a lease. The new scheme would instead regulate 'occupation contracts'. There would be two forms of such contract: the 'standard contract', lightly regulated and offering no security of tenure (similar to the current assured shorthold tenancy), and the 'secure contract', more heavily regulated and providing security of tenure, to be used (like the current secure tenancy and assured tenancy) by local authorities or social landlords.

Law Commission Report No 297, Renting Homes (2006)

At [3.9]

A number of points about the definition of 'occupation contract' should be noted at the outset.

1. It is specifically provided that an occupation contract can be either a tenancy or a licence. This avoids historic complications whereby statutory schemes only applied where premises were 'let'. This definition recognizes that the distinction between a lease/tenancy and a licence exists. This will often be important. For example, where a landlord sells their legal estate in a property to another, it is highly relevant whether that estate is subject to a lease or a licence. These issues continue to be determined by application of the current law. We also make explicit that, where an occupation contract is a tenancy, any land registration requirements must be satisfied.

2. The contract must be made between a landlord and an individual (the 'contract-holder'). The contract must confer the right to occupy premises as a home. Where the contract is made with two or more persons, at least one must be an individual. Contracts relating to the occupation of premises for purposes other than occupation as a home fall outside the scope of our scheme. In many situations, such agreements fall within the scope of other statutory schemes, for example business tenancies [. . .]
3. Despite the breadth of the definition, not all contracts which confer the right to occupy premises as a home fall within the scope of the Bill [. . .][58]
4. Most of the ancillary tests currently used to define the scope of statutory protection are removed. Thus, there is no requirement that the rent should be above or below a defined rent limit. Nor is there any requirement that the premises must be occupied as the 'only or principal home'.
5. Most importantly in the context of the social rented sector, there is no 'landlord condition'. Our emphasis on the principle of landlord neutrality means that the scheme will, for the first time, enable the creation of a single type of contract that can apply throughout the social rented sector, irrespective of the identity of the landlord.
6. Once created, an occupation contract continues in existence either until it is terminated in accordance with the provisions of the scheme, or unless the premises or the contract come within the scope of the exceptions listed in paragraph 3 of schedule 1[59] [. . .]

At [3.18]–[3.21]

In place of the current multiplicity of statutory statuses, the scheme provides for just two types of occupation contract: secure and standard.

Secure contracts

Secure contracts are modelled on secure tenancies which currently can only be created by local authorities. As with secure tenancies, secure contracts have a high degree of security of tenure protected by the Bill. They can be created only on a periodic basis. The reason for this is that in the context of the high security of tenure granted by the Bill for a secure contract, having a fixed term would not be useful [. . .] The idea of the secure contract is to provide a security gold standard for use in the social sector. To allow fixed term secure contracts would at best muddle the picture, and at worst, undercut that objective.

Standard contracts

Standard contracts are modelled on the current assured shorthold tenancy granted by private landlords. Although they have a low degree of security of tenure protected by statute, there is nothing preventing landlords entering contracts which have a greater degree of security than the Bill requires. Often this happens because it is in the landlord's interest to do so, for example to minimize void letting periods. Standard contracts can be either fixed term or periodic.

[58] [One example of a type of contract not covered by the Bill occurs where B pays to share occupation of A's land with A.]

[59] [That is, if a change in circumstances means that the contract now falls into one of those types not covered by the Bill.]

> In the case of standard contracts only, the Bill provides that a landlord is able to specify periods where, notwithstanding the existence of the contract, the premises cannot be used for occupation. The purpose of this provision is to enable, for example, universities to enter occupation contracts with their students for the whole academic year, but also enable them to regain possession during vacation periods when the accommodation is needed for conferences. It would be a disproportionate administrative burden for there to be separate contracts for each academic term or semester.

Under the proposals, A would be obliged to give B a written copy of any occupation contract.[60] Such a contract would include four classes of 'matters' or 'terms': (i) key matters; (ii) fundamental terms; (iii) supplementary terms; and (iv) additional terms.[61]

Contractual terms regulating the key matters (the identity of the land; the date when occupation is to start; the sums to be paid by B as rent or as other payments; the period of the rent) would be exempt from regulation under the Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999, because those Regulations do not permit a party to challenge core contractual terms.

Fundamental terms would be those imposed by statute: the parties could not vary them. One such term would replicate the statutory repairing duty currently imposed by s 11 of the Landlord and Tenant Act 1985. Of course, under the Law Commission's proposals, that duty would no longer depend on B showing that he or she has a lease from A.

Supplementary terms would be those required in the contract as a result of a decision by an appropriate authority, rather than under the statute itself.

Additional terms would be any added by the parties. Control over those terms would come from the 'consumer protection' approach and, in particular, by the application of the Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999. As we noted at the start of section 2 above, those Regulations can currently apply both to lease and to licence agreements. But their operation is restricted by: (i) the need for A to be 'acting for purposes relating to his trade, business or profession';[62] and (ii) the fact that the unfairness test does not apply to terms individually negotiated by A and B. Under the Law Commission's proposals, those two restrictions would no longer apply where A and B enter an occupation contract.

The Law Commission's proposals have not been enacted. Indeed, the housing provisions of the Localism Act 2011 introduce a yet further type of tenancy (the 'flexible tenancy') which increases the complexity of the statutory regulation of leases. Further, the 2011 Act follows its predecessors in organizing statutory protection around the question of whether or not B has a lease, and so does not adopt the Law Commission's contract-centred approach. Nonetheless, as noted in the following extract, the Law Commission's proposals had a positive reception.

Bright, Landlord and Tenant Law in Context (2007, p 224)

> These reform proposals have received widespread support. Many organizations have for some time been arguing that there should be a single form of tenancy available for all social 60 Law Commission Report No 297 (2006), [2.7]–[2.9].

61 Ibid, [2.10].

62 Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999, reg 3. In addition, B must be acting 'for purposes which are outside his trade, business or profession': that will always be the case in relation to short-term residential agreements.

lettings, irrespective of landlord type. Further, the emphasis placed on transparency and fairness through requiring a written contract which sets out the rights and obligations of both parties should help foster a 'mind-set' in which tenants are seen as consumers with rights and expectations, and landlords as service providers opting in to a regulated regime. Whether or not the proposals will progress to become law will depend, of course, on the political process. Legislation of this sort is complex and not politically eye-catching but it would be most unfortunate if these very welcome proposals never make it to the statute book.

For our present purposes, the key aspect of the Law Commission's proposals consists in the decision to decouple statutory protection from the presence of a property right. The thinking behind the decision to regulate occupation contracts, rather than only leases, is set out in one of the Consultation Papers that preceded the report.

Law Commission Consultation Paper No 162, Renting Homes 1: Status and Security (2002, [9.39]–[9.40])

We have thought very carefully about whether the lease-licence distinction should be retained as a means to determine which agreements should fall within our proposed scheme, and those which should fall outside. Considerable conceptual difficulties are caused by the distinction between exclusive occupation and exclusive possession. It is not readily understandable by the public at large.

As we have already argued, we regard the contract between the landlord and the occupier as central to the operation of our scheme. We see no reason why any distinction should be drawn between a contract which comprises a lease and a contract which comprises a licence. This distinction is essential where the proprietary consequences of the contract are concerned, and should remain so, but it should not affect the statutory regulation of the contract as between the contracting parties themselves.

Certainly, one advantage of the Law Commission's scheme would be the elimination of the current status-conferring aspect of the lease. In addition to its practical benefits, such a change could have an important conceptual effect: it would permit the courts to consider the doctrinal definition of the lease (as a property right in land), free from the concern that the same definition may also have to be used to advance the policy goals behind a particular statute.

QUESTIONS

1. Why might Parliament intervene to give a tenant extra rights beyond those expressly agreed between that tenant and his or her landlord?
2. 'The distinction between a lease and a licence should only matter if a third party is involved: it should make no difference when considering the positions of A (the landlord/licensor) and B (the tenant/licensee).' Do you agree?
3. What is a 'tenancy by estoppel'? Should the House of Lords in Bruton v London & Quadrant Housing Trust have found that Mr Bruton had a tenancy by estoppel?
4. Does the Law Commission's 'consumer protection' model provide the best way in which to regulate short-term residential leases?

FURTHER READING

Bridge, 'Leases: Contract, Property and Status' in Land Law: Issues, Debates, Policy (ed Tee, Devon: Willan, 2002)

Bright, Landlord and Tenant Law in Context (Oxford: Hart, 2007, chs 5 and 6)

Dixon, 'The Non-Proprietary Lease: The Rise of the Feudal Phoenix' [2000] CLJ 25

Law Commission Report No 297, Renting Homes (2006, especially Pts 1 and 2)

McFarlane and Simpson, 'Tackling Avoidance' in Rationalizing Property, Equity & Trusts: Essays for Edward Burn (ed Getzler, London: LexisNexis, 2002)

Pawlowski, 'The Bruton Tenancy: Clarity or More Confusion?' [2005] Conv 262

24

LEASEHOLD COVENANTS

CENTRAL ISSUES

1. Both the positive and negative obligations of landlord and leaseholder have long been enforceable by the principle of privity of estate. The appropriate legal framework now differs according to whether the lease was granted before or after the enactment of the Landlord and Tenant (Covenants) Act 1995 on 1 January 1996.
2. Pre-1996 leases (the burden) A leaseholder's covenants (provided that they touch and concern the lease) are enforceable against a purchaser of the lease by privity of estate (see Spencer's Case).[1] The burden of the landlord's covenants (provided that they relate to the subject matter of the lease) is enforceable against the purchaser of the freehold reversion by s 142 of the Law of Property Act 1925.
3. Pre-1996 leases (the benefit) The leaseholder's covenants and the landlord's covenants (both having reference to the subject matter of the lease) are enforceable by a purchaser of the freehold reversion and by a purchaser of the lease, respectively, under ss 141 and 142 of the 1925 Act.
4. Pre-1996 leases The contractual liability of the original parties to the lease continues throughout the term of the lease.
5. Post-1996 leases The benefit and burden of the leaseholder's and landlord's covenants (provided that they are not expressed to be personal) are enforceable against and by purchasers of the lease and the freehold reversion under s 3 of the 1995 Act.
6. Post-1996 leases The original leaseholder is automatically released from contractual liability upon his or her assignment of the lease under s 5 of the 1995 Act, and the original landlord may apply for a release from his or her liability upon his or her assignment of the freehold reversion under ss 6 and 8 of the Act.
7. A sub-lessee is not within the privity of estate relationship, but is obliged (inter alia) to observe the negative leaseholder covenants in the head lease under the doctrine in Tulk v Moxhay.[2]
8. The primary remedy for breach of a leasehold covenant that has not been waived is for the landlord to exercise a right of re-entry to forfeit the lease.

[1] (1583) 5 Co Rep 16a.

[2] (1848) 2 Ph 774.

9. The landlord may re-enter peacefully or by serving proceedings for possession. Before a landlord is able exercise a right of re-entry for breach of covenant (other than to pay rent), a notice must be served in accordance with s 146(1) of the 1925 Act.
10. A tenant (and subtenant or mortgagee) may apply for relief from forfeiture based upon a breach of either the covenant to pay rent or a breach of any other of the tenant's covenants.

1 INTRODUCTION

A lease will not only contain the grant of the leasehold term by the landlord to the tenant, but also covenants detailing the respective obligations of the landlord and the tenant. Certain covenants are implied, but, in a written lease, these covenants will be supplemented by often extensive and detailed covenants stipulating the tenant's obligations to the landlord and the landlord's, often more limited, obligations to the tenant. The landlord's covenants will include a covenant for quiet possession, and may also include obligations to repair and insure; a tenant's covenants will include a covenant to pay the rent and covenants governing his or her use of the premises, as well as covenants detailing the tenant's responsibilities for repair and maintenance, and to meet the cost of the landlord's obligations in this regard, by paying a management or service charge.

In this chapter, we will examine the mechanisms by which both negative and positive leasehold covenants bind, on the one hand, subsequent purchasers of the lease from the original tenant and, on the other, subsequent purchasers of the freehold reversion from the landlord. We will also consider the law governing the enforcement of leasehold covenants and, in particular, the process of forfeiture by which a landlord can bring the lease to an end for a failure by the tenant to perform the tenant's covenants.

The legal regulation of leasehold covenants is applicable to all leases that are capable of assignment. As we saw in Chapter 23, most short-term tenancy agreements of residential accommodation will contain a restriction on assignment of, or otherwise dealing with, the leasehold term. If an existing tenant wishes to leave the premises, he or she will normally surrender his or her tenancy to the landlord, who can then let the premises to another tenant.

The most common types of lease in which the enforcement of leasehold covenants is important are in the commercial context or in the ownership of flats, where the long lease structure is employed. Indeed, in Chapter 27, we will see that the long lease is employed in the ownership of flats, precisely because it provides a mechanism whereby positive obligations can be enforced against subsequent flat owners. In the commercial context, a lease of business premises will usually be capable of assignment (unless it is for a very short term), although it is common for the tenant's ability to assign or otherwise dispose of his or her term to be qualified by the need to obtain the landlord's consent, which cannot be unreasonably refused. Many of the cases that we will be considering are set in the commercial context, perhaps because commercial landlords and tenants are more inclined to litigate. Our focus will, however, be on the residential long lease.

1.1 LEASEHOLD COVENANT TERMINOLOGY

Where a lease or a freehold reversion is assigned, it is necessary to determine whether or not the covenants given by the original tenant (TO) to the original landlord (LO) in the lease (the tenant's covenants) may be enforced by a purchaser of the freehold reversion (the landlord's assignee, or LA) against TO and any purchaser of the lease (the tenant's assignee, or TA). Likewise, it is also necessary to establish whether TO and TA can enforce against LA the covenants granted by LO to TO in the original lease (the landlord's covenants).

This web of relationships can be depicted as shown in Figure 15.

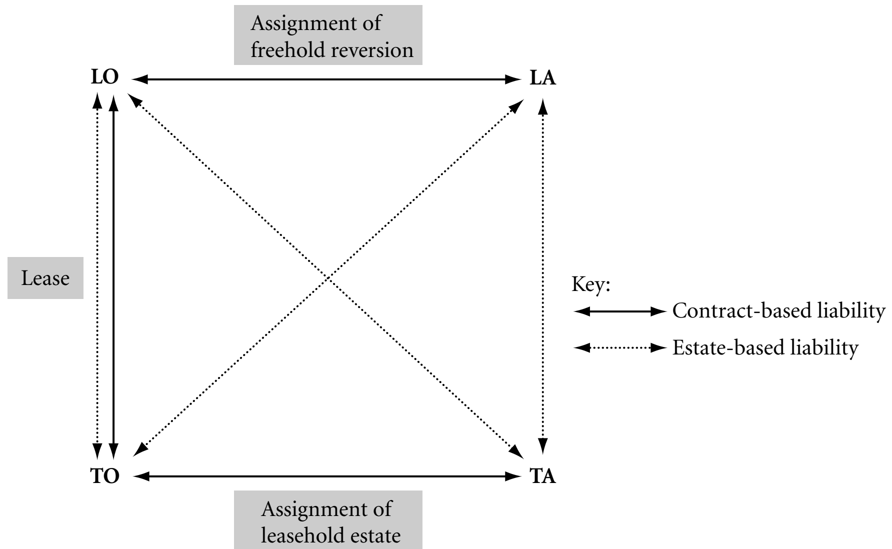

Figure 15 Leasehold covenant relationships

The answer to these central questions on the enforceability of both the landlord's and tenant's covenant depends on when the lease was granted. This is because the law was amended and codified by the Landlord and Tenant (Covenants) Act 1995, but the amendments enacted apply only to those leases granted on or after 1 January 1996. There are, of course, many leases granted before 1 January 1996 that still have many years to run and which will continue to be governed by the old law. It is thus necessary to look at the law governing leases entered into before 1 January 1996 ('pre-1996 leases') and the law regulating leases entered into on or after 1 January 1996 ('post-1995 leases').

1.2 CONTRACT AND ESTATE-BASED LIABILITY

We saw in Chapter 22 that a lease has a dual personality: firstly, as a contract between the original parties; and secondly, as a proprietary interest in the form of a leasehold estate in the land, which may be transferred or left by will. Liability on the landlord's covenants and the tenant's covenants in the lease is based either upon the contractual relationship between LO and TO, or upon the leasehold estate that will vested in TA, upon his or her purchase of the lease, or the freehold reversion (subject to the lease), which likewise may be transferred by LO to LA. Where the parties fall within this leasehold relationship, we say that there is privity of estate.

Students of contract law will recognize that, between LO and TO, there is privity of contract, which is unaffected if and when LO and/or TO assign their interests to LA and TA, respectively. The lease contract continues between the original parties throughout the term of the lease.

Privity of estate exists between the current parties to the leasehold estate. It can thus vary during the leasehold term, depending on in whom the lease and the freehold reversion are vested. Initially, LO and TO are the parties to the leasehold estate. If LO assigns the freehold reversion, then privity of estate will exist between LA and TO: LO falls out of privity of estate because he or she no longer holds the freehold reversion. Likewise, if TO assigns his or her lease to TA, TA comes within privity of estate with the current holder of the freehold reversion, whether that is LO or LA, and TO is no longer within the privity of estate relationship.

The concept of privity of estate was developed many centuries ago, and continues to be central to the enforceability of leasehold covenants by and against the current parties to the lease. Where there is privity of estate, both the positive and negative leasehold covenants, which are so closely related to the leasehold estate that they form part of it, will be enforceable by and against the current parties to the leasehold estate.

Lord Templeman explains the interplay between the operation of privity of contract and estate in the following case.

City of London Corp v Fell
[1994] 1 AC 458, HL

Lord Templeman

At 464

The principle that the benefit and burden of covenants in a lease which touch and concern the land run with the term and with the reversion is necessary for the effective operation of the law of landlord and tenant. Common law, and statute following the common law, recognise two forms of legal estate in land, a fee simple absolute in possession and a term of years absolute: see section 1 of the Act of 1925. Common law, and statute following the common law, were faced with the problem of rendering effective the obligations under a lease which might endure for a period of 999 years or more beyond the control of any covenantor. The solution was to annex to the term and the reversion the benefit and burden of covenants which touch and concern the land. The covenants having been annexed, every legal owner of the term granted by the lease and every legal owner of the reversion from time to time holds his estate with the benefit of and subject to the covenants which touch and concern the land. The system of leasehold tenure requires that the obligations in the lease shall be enforceable throughout the term, whether those obligations are affirmative or negative. The owner of a reversion must be able to enforce the positive covenants to pay rent and keep in repair against an assignee who in turn must be able to enforce any positive covenants entered into by the original landlord. Common law retained the ancient rule that the burden of a covenant does not run with the land of the covenantor except in the case of a lease, but even that rule was radically modified by equity so far as negative covenants were concerned: see Tulk v. Moxhay (1848) 2 Ph. 774.

The effect of common law and statute on a lease is to create rights and obligations which are independent of the parallel rights and obligations of the original human covenantor who and whose heirs may fail or the parallel rights and obligations of a corporate covenantor which may be dissolved. Common law and statute achieve that effect by annexing those rights and obligations so far as they touch and concern the land to the term and to the reversion. Nourse L.J. neatly summarised the position when he said in an impeccable judgment [1993] Q.B. 589, 604:

> "The contractual obligations which touch and concern the land having become imprinted on the estate, the tenancy is capable of existence as a species of property independently of the contract."

The common law did not release the original tenant from liability for breaches of covenant committed after an assignment because of the sacred character of covenant in English law [. . .] This only means that the fortunate English landlord has two remedies after an assignment, namely his remedy against the assignee and his remedy against the original tenant. It does not follow that if the liability of the original tenant is released or otherwise disappears then the term granted by the lease will disappear or that the assignee will cease to be liable on the covenants.

As between landlord and assignee the landlord cannot enforce a covenant against the assignee because the assignee does not covenant. The landlord enforces against the assignee the provisions of a covenant entered into by the original tenant, being provisions which touch and concern the land, because those provisions are annexed by the lease to the term demised by the lease. The assignee is not liable for a breach of covenant committed after the assignee has himself in turn assigned the lease because once he has assigned over he has ceased to be the owner of the term to which the covenants are annexed.

2 THE ORIGINAL PARTIES (LO AND TO) AND CONTRACTUAL ENFORCEABILITY

2.1 PRE-1996 LAW

LO and TO remain contractually liable on their leasehold covenants throughout the term of the lease, even though they may have disposed of their respective interests, unless they have expressly agreed to limit their respective liabilities in their original covenants.

This contractual liability can operate harshly particularly against TO, who, many years after he or she has assigned the lease, can find him or herself sued in respect of a breach of the tenant's covenants (usually a failure to pay the rent or service charge) committed by TA. For example, the current landlord will be tempted to rely on this contractual liability where TA is insolvent.[3] Although this liability is more often relied upon in commercial leases, where rentals reflect market levels, the principles are equally applicable to residential long leases.

Lord Nicholls explained the problems in the following case.

Hindcastle Ltd v Barbara Attenborough & Associates Ltd
[1997] AC 70, HL

Lord Nicholls

At 83

The insolvency may occur many years after the lease was granted, long after the original tenant parted with his interest in the lease. He paid the rent until he left, and then took on the > responsibility of other premises. A person of modest means is understandably shocked when out of the blue he receives a rent demand from the landlord of the property he once leased. Unlike the landlord, he had no control over the identity of assignees down the line. He had no opportunity to reject them as financially unsound.

[3] The economic downturn of the late 1980s and early 1990s resulted in a number of well-publicized and criticized cases in which original leaseholders were successfully held liable.

TO does have the benefit of an indemnity covenant for the performance of the tenant's covenant from TA, which will build up a chain of indemnity covenants following each assignment of the lease,[4] and also a restitutionary action for any damages that TO may have to pay as a result of the default of another (i.e. TA).[5] But these actions will be of little value where the defaulter is insolvent or the chain of indemnity covenants has been broken.[6]

In a series of decisions, the courts added further to TO's woes by confirming that his or her liability could be affected by a variation in the lease terms (e.g. an upward rent review), where that variation was made in pursuance of the terms of the lease.[7] A variation would not affect TO where it resulted from the separate agreement of the current parties to the lease, whether that variation resulted in a renewal or extension of the leasehold term,[8] or was to the terms upon which the lease was held.[9]

This contractual liability was the target of criticism by the Law Commission.

Law Commission Report No 174, Landlord and Tenant Law: Privity of Contract and Estate (1988, [3.1]–[3.3])

> In Part III of the Working Paper, we identified the following criticisms of the present law:
>
> (a) It is intrinsically unfair that anyone should bear burdens under a contract in respect of which they derive no benefit and over which they have no control: contractual obligations undertaken in a lease should only regulate relations between current owners with interests in the property.
>
> (b) When demand is made under continuing liability of the original tenant it will often not only be unexpected, but beyond the means of the former tenant; there is no logical way in which a former tenant who does understand that there is a contingent liability can estimate the amount.
>
> (c) A single lease can contain some covenants of which the burden automatically passes to an assignee, by privity of estate, and others of which the burden does not pass automatically. This contrast in a single document, which is not apparent from its wording is unsatisfactory [. . .]

[4] See Law of Property Act 1925, s 77(1)(c), and Land Registration Act 2002, Sch 12, para 20. The indemnity is implied into each assignment of the lease and so can build up a chain of indemnity covenants to pass liability down to the defaulting leaseholder. As to the operation of indemnity covenants, see Chapter 26, section 2.4.2.

[5] Moule v Garrett (1872) LR 7 EX 101.

[6] RHP Ltd v Mirror Group Newspapers and Mirror Group Holdings (1992) 65 P & CR 252.

[7] See Centrovincial Estates plc v Bulk Storage Ltd (1983) 46 P & CR 393, in which the leaseholder was liable for rent varied from £17,000 to £40,000 pursuant to a rent review clause contained in the original lease, and Selous Street Properties Ltd v Oronel Fabrics Ltd (1984) 270 EG 643, in which the rent review took into account unauthorized alterations that were subsequently approved by the landlord.

[8] City of London Corp v Fell [1994] 1 AC 458.

[9] Friends Provident Life Office v British Railways Board (1997) 73 P & CR 9.

(d) Many laymen do not realise that the original parties have a continuing liability and most leases do not make this clear on their face.

(e) Where a lease contains a rent review clause, the original tenant's liability, under privity of contract, normally extends to payment of the higher rents after revision. For this reason, privity of contract sometimes results in the original tenant having a greater liability then he understood he was assuming. While this may merely reflect the increase in value of the premises it can cast on a former tenant a burden resulting from an increased value from which he has derived no benefit.

(f) Landlords who are in practice the main beneficiaries of the privity of contract principle are unduly protected. They have the ability to enforce obligations undertaken by tenants by action against both the original tenant and the current tenant [. . .] This makes the principle one-sided, and unreasonably multiplies the remedies available to landlords.

(g) Original tenants against whom covenants are enforced after they have assigned the lease are not adequately protected, nor do they have adequate means of reimbursement. They are not released even if the tenant in possession agrees materially to vary the extent of liability, they are not entitled to notice of default and they have no right to take back possession of the property. Former tenants are therefore often deprived of the opportunity to limit their liability by taking prompt remedial action. Faced with demands that they must meet, they are often unable even to have recourse to the property to recoup any losses.

(h) The contingent liability which privity of contract imposes on an original tenant who has parted with his interest in the property can create difficulty in winding-up and distributing the estates of tenants who have died. The response to the Working Paper suggests that this difficulty is more theoretical than practical.

[. . .]

Against these criticisms we pointed out that continuing liability of the parties to leases is a matter of contract. They are free to vary the normal rule. This is sometimes done, but not frequently. Some feel that a heavy burden lies on those who propose any further restriction on freedom of contract, but others question whether there is any true freedom here because there is widely thought to be an inequality of bargaining power between landlords and tenants, favouring landlords.

These criticisms have, in part, been addressed by the Landlord and Tenant (Covenants) Act 1995. The reforms of the 1995 Act affecting pre-1996 leases address only the worst excesses of privity of contract. The original parties' liability under post-1995 leases is subject to more far-reaching reform, which is considered below.

Section 18 of the 1995 Act provides that TO's liability to pay an amount due under the lease will not be altered by a variation of the lease, which the landlord had an absolute right to refuse, made after the time at which he or she has disposed of his or her interest.

Section 17 of the Act provides that the current landlord, who wishes to recover a fixed sum from TO, must give notice of the amount that he or she is intending to recover within six months of the sum becoming due.[10] Where TO complies with this notice, he or she may claim an overriding lease to secure any sums that he or she has been required to pay. An overriding lease takes effect as a statutory lease interposed between the current landlord and the current defaulting leaseholder. As such, it will enable TO to enforce the tenant's covenants, for example, by claiming the rental due and seeking forfeiture if the rent is not paid.[11] Thus TO is at least given a warning of his or her potential contractual liability for fixed sums, which should not exceed six months' rental or other charges, and is provided with a mechanism to try to recover the sums that he or she has had to meet. His or her contractual liability for unliquidated sums, however, is undiminished.

[10] Landlord and Tenant (Covenants) Act 1995, s 17. This notice must be in statutory form (see s 27) and is commonly referred to as a 'problem notice'.

2.2 POST-1995 LAW

2.2.1 Release of TO

Section 5 of the Landlord and Tenant (Covenants) Act 1995 releases TO from contractual liability once he or she has assigned his or her lease. It also confirms TA's release from liability should he or she, in turn, dispose of the leasehold estate.

Landlord and Tenant (Covenants) Act 1995, s 5

Tenant released from covenants on assignment of tenancy

(1) This section applies where a tenant assigns premises demised to him under a tenancy.

(2) If the tenant assigns the whole of the premises demised to him, he—

(a) is released from the tenant covenants of the tenancy, and

(b) ceases to be entitled to the benefit of the landlord covenants of the tenancy, as from the assignment.

Where the tenant requires the consent of the landlord to assign the lease, however, a landlord may refuse his or her consent unless the tenant enters into an authorized guarantee agreement, under which the tenant guarantees the assignee's payment of the rent and performance of the other tenant's covenants.[12] A landlord's consent to assign is a common feature of commercial leases, but not of residential long leases.

2.2.2 Release of LO

LO can also be released from his or her contractual liability, although a release is not available from liabilities that are expressed to be personal to LO.[13] LO's release does not operate automatically upon assignment of the reversion, but must be requested by LO serving a notice on TO, within four weeks of the assignment of his or her reversion.

Landlord and Tenant (Covenants) Act 1995, s 6

Landlord may be released from covenants on assignment of reversion

(1) This section applies where a landlord assigns the reversion in premises of which he is the landlord under a tenancy.

[11] Ibid, s 19. [12] Ibid, s 16.

[13] BHP Petroleum Great Britain Ltd v Chesterfield Properties Ltd [2002] Ch 194: see section 3.2.2 below.

(2) If the landlord assigns the reversion in the whole of the premises of which he is the landlord—

(a) he may apply to be released from the landlord covenants of the tenancy in accordance with section 8; and

(b) if he is so released from all of those covenants, he ceases to be entitled to the benefit of the tenant covenants of the tenancy as from the assignment.

The process is governed by s 8, which provides that, where TO refuses to grant a release, the county court may grant a release where it is reasonable to do so.

Landlord and Tenant (Covenants) Act 1995, s 8

Procedure for seeking release from a covenant under section 6 or 7

(1) For the purposes of section 6 or 7 an application for the release of a covenant to any extent is made by serving on the tenant, either before or within the period of four weeks beginning with the date of the assignment in question, a notice informing him of—

(a) the proposed assignment or (as the case may be) the fact that the assignment has taken place, and

(b) the request for the covenant to be released to that extent.

(2) Where an application for the release of a covenant is made in accordance with subsection (1), the covenant is released to the extent mentioned in the notice if—

(a) the tenant does not, within the period of four weeks beginning with the day on which the notice is served, serve on the landlord or former landlord a notice in writing objecting to the release, or

(b) the tenant does so serve such a notice but the court, on the application of the landlord or former landlord, makes a declaration that it is reasonable for the covenant to be so released, or

(c) the tenant serves on the landlord or former landlord a notice in writing consenting to the release and, if he has previously served a notice objecting to it, stating that that notice is withdrawn.

The provisions of the 1995 Act cannot be excluded or varied.[14] But the House of Lords has held that a limitation of liability contained in the terms of the original covenant does not fall foul of this prohibition. In so doing, the Lords explained the purpose and effect of the Act's limitation of LO and TO's contractual liability.

London Diocesan Fund v Phithwa
[2005] 1 WLR 3956, HL

Facts: A lease provided that the original landlord (Avonridge Property Co Ltd) would not be liable for the payment of rent under the head lease after it assigned the reversion.

14 Landlord and Tenant (Covenants) Act 1995, s 25. A contractual obligation upon the guarantor of TO to guarantee the liability of TA is void under s 25 unless they do so pursuant to an authorized guarantee agreement see Good Harvest Partnership LLP v Centaur Services Ltd [2010] EWHC 330 (Ch), [2010] Ch 426; K/S Victoria St. v House of Fraser (Stores Management) Ltd [2011] EWCA Civ 904, [2011] 2 P & CR 15.

After Avonridge assigned its leasehold reversion, the head lease was forfeited as a result of its assignee's failure to pay the rent under the head lease; the sub-lessees obtained relief from forfeiture, but had to pay the arrears of rent. They unsuccessfully claimed that the limitation of Avonridge's liability in the head lease was void under s 25 of the 1995 Act.

Lord Nicholls

At [13]–[21]

So sections 6 to 8 of the Act provide a landlord with a means which may result in his being released from the landlord covenants but will not necessarily do so. If the landlord assigns the whole of the premises of which he is landlord he may apply to be released from the landlord covenants of the tenancy. A landlord covenant is a covenant falling to be complied with by the landlord of the premises demised by a tenancy. An application for release is made by the landlord serving an appropriate notice on the tenant requesting a release of the landlord covenant wholly or in part. Where the landlord makes such an application the covenant is released to the requested extent if the tenant consents, or if he fails to object, or if he does object but the court decides it is reasonable for the covenant to be released: section 8.

These statutory provisions might readily be stultified if the parties to a lease could exclude their operation. In particular, the provision for automatic release of tenant covenants on assignment of a lease would be a weak instrument if it were open to a landlord to provide that the original tenant's contractual liability should continue for the whole term notwithstanding section 5. So the Act, in section 25, enacts a comprehensive anti-avoidance provision. Subsection (1) relevantly provides:

> "Any agreement relating to a tenancy is void to the extent that- (a) it would apart from this section have effect to exclude, modify or otherwise frustrate the operation of any provision of this Act, or (b) it provides for- (i) the termination or surrender of the tenancy, or (ii) the imposition on the tenant of any penalty, disability, or liability, in the event of the operation of any provision of this Act [. . .]"

The words in parenthesis in Avonridge's covenant in clause 6 of each sublease are an "agreement relating to a tenancy" within the meaning of this section: section 25(4). But does this agreement "frustrate the operation" of any provision of the Act? That is the key question.

The subtenants submit it does. The limited release provisions in sections 6 to 8 were intended to be the sole means whereby an original landlord could obtain a release from the landlord covenants when he assigned the reversion. The parenthetical words in clause 6 would frustrate that statutory purpose if they were allowed to have effect according to their tenor.

I am unable to agree. Where I part company with this submission is its statement of the statutory purpose. Sections 5 to 8 are relieving provisions. They are intended to benefit tenants, or landlords, as the case may be. That is their purpose. That is how they are meant to operate. These sections introduced a means, which cannot be ousted, whereby in certain circumstances, without the agreement of the other party, a tenant or landlord can be released from a liability he has assumed. The object of the legislation was that on lawful assignment of a tenancy or reversion, and irrespective of the terms of the tenancy, the tenant or the landlord should have an exit route from his future liabilities. This route should be available in accordance with the statutory provisions.

Thus the mischief at which the statute was aimed was the absence in practice of any such exit route. Consistently with this the legislation was not intended to close any other exit route already open to the parties: in particular, that by agreement their liability could be curtailed from the outset or later released or waived. The possibility that by agreement the parties may limit their liability in this way was not, it seems, perceived as having unfair consequences in practice, even though landlords normally have greater bargaining power than tenants. So there was no call for legislation to exclude the parties' capacity to make such an agreement, ending their liability in circumstances other than those provided in the Act.

Section 25 is of course to be interpreted generously, so as to ensure the operation of the Act is not frustrated, either directly or indirectly. But there is nothing in the language or scheme of the Act to suggest the statute was intended to exclude the parties' ability to limit liability under their covenants from the outset in whatever way they may agree. An agreed limitation of this nature does not impinge upon the operation of the statutory provisions.

[. . .] Whatever its form, an agreed limitation of liability does not impinge upon the operation of the statutory provisions because, as already noted, the statutory provisions are intended to operate to relieve tenants and landlords from a liability which would otherwise exist. They are not intended to impose a liability which otherwise would be absent. They are not intended to enlarge the liability either of a tenant or landlord. The Act does not compel a landlord to enter into a covenant with his tenant to pay the rent under a headlease. The Act does not compel this, even though it may be eminently reasonable that a landlord should do so. Nor do the statutory restrictions on the circumstances where a landlord can end his liability without his tenant's consent carry any implication that a tenant may not agree to end his landlord's liability in other circumstances. Such an implication would be inconsistent with the underlying scheme of these provisions.

This appraisal accords with the thrust of the Law Commission's report [. . .]

Nor do the events in this case exemplify a loophole in the Act Parliament cannot have intended. The risks involved were not obscure or concealed. They were evident on the face of the subleases. The sublessees were to pay up-front a capitalised rent for the whole term of the subleases. But clause 6 enabled Avonridge to shake off all its landlord obligations at will. Any competent conveyancer would, or should, have warned the sublessees of the risks, clearly and forcefully.

The decision does provide an escape route, particularly for landlords, who can use their bargaining power and superior knowledge of the law to limit their liability when negotiating the term of the lease.

Not all of the Law Lords were happy to accept this possibility.

London Diocesan Fund v Phithwa
[2005] 1 WLR 3956, HL

Lord Walker (dissenting)

At 35

I am driven to the conclusion that although the general legislative purpose of the Act was to effect the release from liability of landlords and tenants on their assignment of their interests, subject to and in accordance with the provisions of the Act, section 25 is expressed in terms wide enough to interfere with the freedom of contract which was available to the parties in negotiating a tenancy before the coming into force of the Act. By restricting the parties' freedom of contract, the Act (in a case such as the present) does operate to make it more difficult for a landlord to escape liability on landlord covenants (within the meaning of the Act). I would accept the submission of Mr Wells, for the respondents, that that can be done only by the procedure laid down in section 8 of the Act. To that limited extent the Act does operate, as it seems to me, to shut off what my noble and learned friend, Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead, has described as "any other exit route" previously open to the parties.

3 ASSIGNEES (LA AND TA) AND ESTATE-BASED LIABILITY

3.1 PRE-1996 LAW

The benefit and burden of the landlord's covenants and the tenant's covenants have run with the freehold reversion and the leasehold estate since the sixteenth century. Statute has conferred upon LA the right to sue upon the tenant's covenant given to LO and has imposed upon LA the obligation to observe the landlord's covenant's given by LO in the original lease. The current statutory provisions are now found in ss 141 and 142 of the Law of Property Act 1925 (LPA 1925).[15]

3.1.1 The landlord's covenants

Law of Property Act 1925, s 142(1)

Obligation of lessor's covenants to run with reversion

(1) The obligation under a condition or of a covenant entered into by a lessor with reference to the subject-matter of the lease shall, if and as far as the lessor has power to bind the reversionary estate immediately expectant on the term granted by the lease, be annexed and incident to and shall go with that reversionary estate, or the several parts thereof, notwithstanding severance of that reversionary estate, and may be taken advantage of and enforced by the person in whom the term is from time to time vested by conveyance, devolution in law, or otherwise; and, if and as far as the lessor has power to bind the person from time to time entitled to that reversionary estate, the obligation aforesaid may be taken advantage of and enforced against any person so entitled.

Section 142 relates both to the benefit and to the burden of the landlord's covenants given by LO to TO, by imposing upon LA the obligation to perform these covenants and conferring upon TA the right to enforce these covenants. Thus TO can sue LA and TA can sue LO or LA, as appropriate (see Figure 16).

[15] They were originally contained in the Grantee of Reversions Act 1540 and amended by the Conveyancing Acts of 1881 and 1911.

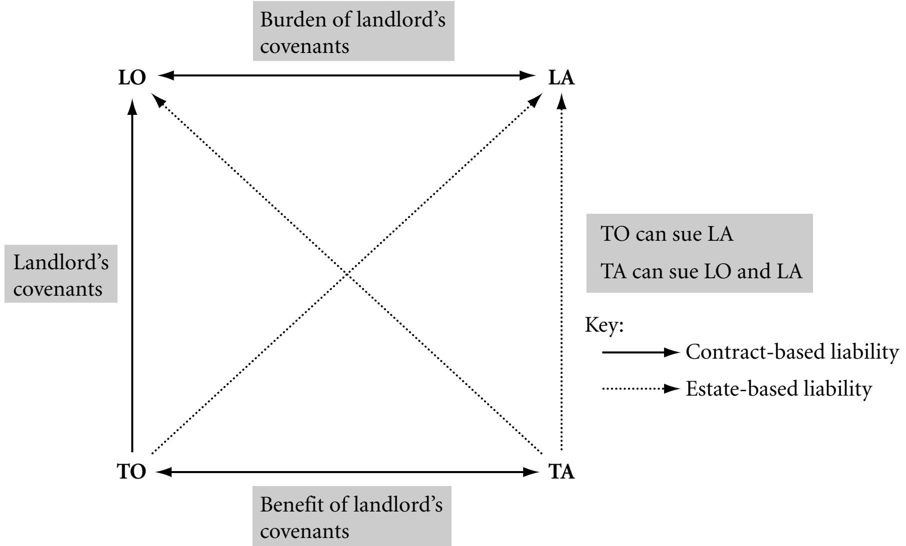

Figure 16 Law of Property Act 1925, s 142: benefit (who can sue) and burden (who can be sued) of landlord's covenants

3.1.2 The tenant's covenants

Law of Property Act 1925, s 141

Rent and benefit of lessee's covenants to run with the reversion

(1) Rent reserved by a lease, and the benefit of every covenant or provision therein contained, having reference to the subject-matter thereof, and on the lessee's part to be observed or performed, and every condition of re-entry and other condition therein contained, shall be annexed and incident to and shall go with the reversionary estate in the land, or in any part thereof, immediately expectant on the term granted by the lease, notwithstanding severance of that reversionary estate, and without prejudice to any liability affecting a covenantor or his estate.

(2) Any such rent, covenant or provision shall be capable of being recovered, received, enforced, and taken advantage of, by the person from time to time entitled, subject to the term, to the income of the whole or any part, as the case may require, of the land leased.

Section 141 relates to the benefit of the tenant's covenants, and confers upon LA the right to sue for the rent and upon the other covenants given by TO to LO in the original lease. Thus, LA can sue TO (see Figure 17).

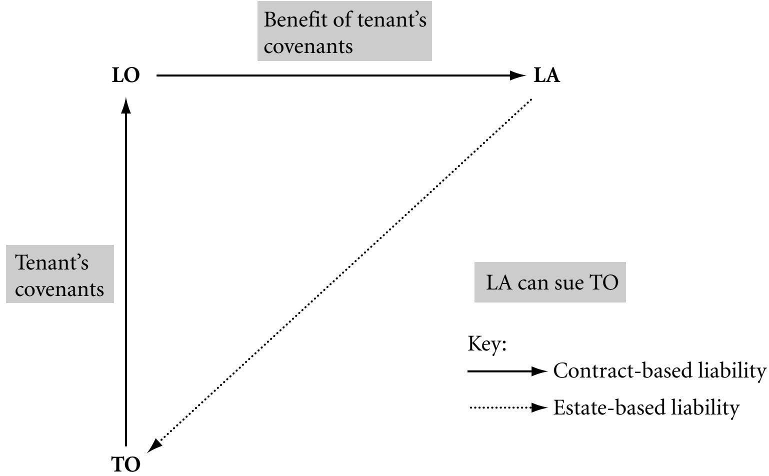

Figure 17 Law of Property Act, s 141: benefit of tenant's covenants (who can sue)

The missing link in the enforceability matrix is provided, not by statute, but by Spencer's Case,[16] which imposes upon TA the obligation to perform the tenant's covenants given by TO, including the covenant to pay rent.[17] Thus, LO and LA can sue TA (see Figure 18).

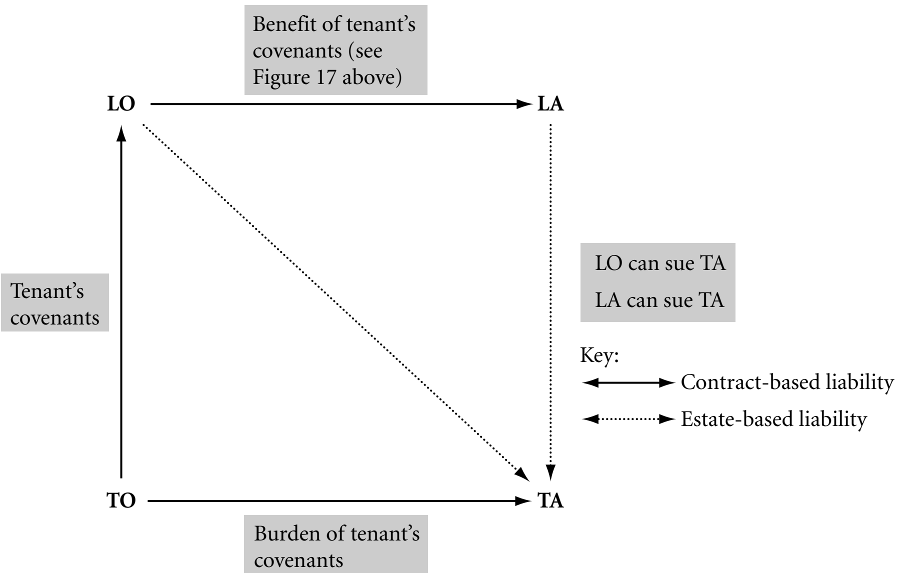

Figure 18 Spencer's Case: burden of tenant's covenants (who can be sued)

[16] (1583) 5 Co Rep 16a.

[17] The omission of this link from the statutory framework is a result of 'parliamentary fumbling': see Sparkes, A New Landlord and Tenant (2001) p 749–52.

Spencer's Case
(1583) 5 Co Rep 16a

If lessee for years covenants to repair the houses during the term, it shall bind all others as a thing which is appurtenant, and goeth with the land in whose hands soever the term shall come, as well those who come to it by act in law, as by the act of the party, for all is one having regard to the lessor. And if the law should not be such, great prejudice might accrue to him; and reason requires, that they, who shall take benefit of such covenant when the lessor makes it with the lessee, should on the other side be bound by the like covenant when the lessee makes it with the lessor.

3.1.3 Covenants that touch and concern, or have reference to the subject matter of, the lease Sections 141 and 142 relate to covenants that 'have reference to the subject matter of the lease', whilst Spencer's Case refers to covenants that 'touch and concern the land'. The expressions have identical meaning,[18] but that meaning has proved somewhat elusive.

Lord Oliver provides the clearest explanation in the following case.[19]

P&A Swift Investments v Combined English Stores Group plc
[1989] AC 632, HL

Lord Oliver

At 642

In my opinion the question of whether a surety's covenant in a lease touches and concerns the land falls to be determined by the same test as that applicable to the tenant's covenant.

Formulations of definitive tests are always dangerous, but it seems to me that, without claiming to expound an exhaustive guide, the following provides a satisfactory working test for whether, in any given case, a covenant touches and concerns the land: (1) the covenant benefits only the reversioner for time being, and if separated from the reversion ceases to be of benefit to the covenantee; (2) the covenant affects the nature, quality, mode of user or value of the land of the reversioner; (3) the covenant is not expressed to be personal (that is to say neither being given only to a specific reversioner nor in respect of the obligations only of a specific tenant); (4) the fact that a covenant is to pay a sum of money will not prevent it from touching and concerning the land so long as the three foregoing conditions are satisfied and the covenant is connected with something to be done on to or in relation to the land.

There should be no difficulty in the common covenants found in the long leases of flats satisfying this test: covenants for quiet enjoyment; the payment of rent or service charge; for repair and insurance; or relating to the user of the flat or the common areas and facilities.

[18] See Caern Motor Services Ltd v Texaco Ltd [1994] 1 WLR 1249.

[19] And Coronation Street Industrial Properties Ltd v Ignall Industries Ltd [1989] 1 WLR 304. These cases concerned a surety's covenant, rather than leasehold covenants, but the test has been subsequently applied to leasehold covenants in Caern Motor Services Ltd v Texeco Ltd [1994] 1 WLR 1249 and Cardwell v Walker [2003] EWHC 3117.

More difficult questions have tended to arise with commercial leases. Here, the application of test has led to 'arbitrary and inconsistent outcome(s)'.[20] A surety's covenant runs with the land,[21] but a covenant to repay a deposit does not;[22] an option for a tenant to purchase the reversion does not touch and concern with the land,[23] but an option to renew the lease does;[24] a covenant to sell only the landlord's products is a covenant that touches and concerns the land,[25] but a non-competition covenant by a landlord does not.[26]

3.1.4 Equitable leases and assignments

A further qualification affects the running of the burden of the tenant's covenants to TA under Spencer's Case, although not the passing of the benefit and burden under ss 141 and 142 of the LPA 1925. Spencer's Case operates where the leaseholder's covenants form part of leaseholder's legal estate in the land. Thus it has been held that the burden of the leaseholder's covenants will not pass to TA where the lease[27] or the assignment[28] to TA is equitable. This limitation has been described as 'anomalous and inconvenient',[29] and various other approaches have been suggested.[30]

Boyer v Warbey
[1953] 1 QB 234, CA

Denning LJ

At 246

[. . .] since the fusion of law and equity [by the Judicature Act 1873], the position is different. The distinction between agreements under hand and agreements under seal has largely been obliterated. There is no valid reason nowadays why the doctrine of covenants running with the land—or with the reversion—should not apply equally to agreements under hand as to covenants under seal; and I think we should so hold.

This view, whilst attractive, rather stretches the effect of the Judicature Act 187l. A more satisfactory route to overcome the problem could be based upon finding a separate contractual nexus, or even legal periodic tenancy, between LO (or LA) and TA, from the fact of TA's possession and payment of rent, and LO (or LA's) acceptance of that rent by way of acknowledgment of TA's position as tenant.

LO or LA are not without redress: they can still exercise a right to forfeit the lease in the event of a breach of covenant (see section 6.4 below), or, where the covenant is 20 Gray and Gray, Elements of Land Law (5th edn, 2009), [4.5.52].

21 See Kumar v Dunning [1989] QB 193 and P&A Swift Investments v Combined English Stores Group plc [1989] AC 632.

22 Hua Chiao Commercial Bank Ltd v Chiap Hua Industries Ltd [1987] AC 99.

23 Woodall v Clifton [1905] 2 Ch 257, 279.

24 Phillips v Mobil Oil Co Ltd [1989] 1 WLR 888, 891, per Nicholls LJ, who excuses the anomaly only on established practice.

25 Caern Motor Services Ltd v Texeco Ltd [1994] 1 WLR 1249 and Cardwell v Walker [2003] EWHC 3117.

26 Thomas v Hayward (1869) LR 4 Ex 311.

27 Purchase v Lichfield Brewery Co [1915] 1 KB 184.

28 Cox v Bishop (1857) 8 De GM & G 815.

29 Gray and Gray Elements of Land Law (5th edn, 2009), [4.5.86].

30 Smith, 'The Running of Covenants in Equitable Leases and Equitable Assignments of Legal Leases' [1978] CLJ 98.

negative, rely upon its enforceability as a restrictive covenant under the doctrine of Tulk v Moxhay.[31]

3.2 POST-1995 LEASES

3.2.1 The Landlord and Tenant (Covenants) Act 1995 framework of enforceability

The Landlord and Tenant (Covenants) Act 1995 provides a statutory framework for passing the benefit and burden of the landlord's and the tenant's covenants. TA is entitled to sue upon the landlord's covenants and is bound by the tenant's covenants by s 3(2), and LA becomes entitled to sue upon the tenant's covenants[32] and is bound by the landlord's covenants by s 3(3).

Landlord and Tenant (Covenants) Act 1995, s 3

Transmission of benefit and burden of covenants

(1) The benefit and burden of all landlord and tenant covenants of a tenancy—

(a) shall be annexed and incident to the whole, and to each and every part, of the premises demised by the tenancy and of the reversion in them, and

(b) shall in accordance with this section pass on an assignment of the whole or any part of those premises or of the reversion in them.

(2) Where the assignment is by the tenant under the tenancy, then as from the assignment the assignee—

(a) becomes bound by the tenant covenants of the tenancy except to the extent that—

(i) immediately before the assignment they did not bind the assignor, or

(ii) they fall to be complied with in relation to any demised premises not comprised in the assignment; and

(b) becomes entitled to the benefit of the landlord covenants of the tenancy except to the extent that they fall to be complied with in relation to any such premises.

(3) Where the assignment is by the landlord under the tenancy, then as from the assignment the assignee—

(a) becomes bound by the landlord covenants of the tenancy except to the extent that—

(i) immediately before the assignment they did not bind the assignor, or

(ii) they fall to be complied with in relation to any demised premises not comprised in the assignment; and

(b) becomes entitled to the benefit of the tenant covenants of the tenancy except to the extent that they fall to be complied with in relation to any such premises.

[. . .]

[31] See Chapter 26, section 2.

[32] Landlord and Tenant (Covenants) Act 1995, s 4, provides that the landlord's right of re-entry will also pass.

(6) Nothing in this section shall operate—

(a) in the case of a covenant which (in whatever terms) is expressed to be personal to any person, to make the covenant enforceable by or (as the case may be) against any other person; or

(b) to make a covenant enforceable against any person if, apart from this section, it would not be enforceable against him by reason of its not having been registered under the Land Registration Act 2002 or the Land Charges Act 1972.

3.2.2 All but personal covenants

The 1995 Act also removes any distinction between legal and equitable leases, and between covenants that touch and concern the land, and those that do not. All that is required is that the covenant is contained (either expressly or impliedly) in a legal or equitable lease and that the covenant is not expressed to be personal to any particular person.

Landlord and Tenant (Covenants) Act 1995, s 2

Covenants to which the Act applies

(1) This Act applies to a landlord covenant or a tenant covenant of a tenancy—

(a) whether or not the covenant has reference to the subject matter of the tenancy, and

(b) whether the covenant is express, implied or imposed by law

[. . .]

Landlord and Tenant (Covenants) Act 1995, s 28(1)

Interpretation

"landlord covenant", in relation to a tenancy, means a covenant falling to be complied with by the landlord of premises demised by the tenancy;

[. . .]

"tenancy" means any lease or other tenancy and includes—

(a) a sub-tenancy, and

(b) an agreement for a tenancy,

but does not include a mortgage term;

"tenant covenant", in relation to a tenancy, means a covenant falling to be complied with by the tenant of premises demised by the tenancy.

There is thus a shift in emphasis. There is no need to prove that a covenant touches and concerns the land: all covenants are transmissible, unless the parties specifically agree that they should not be so because they are expressed to be personal.[33]

[33] It seems extraordinary that a purely personal obligation can be transmissible because the parties do not expressly identify it as such: see Clarke and Kohler, Property Law: Commentary and Material (2005) p 647.

BHP Petroleum Great Britain Ltd v Chesterfield Properties Ltd
[2002] 2 Ch 195, CA

Facts: Chesterfield had covenanted personally to carry out certain remedial works to premises leased by BHP. It then transferred its reversion to an associated company and served a notice under s 8, seeking a release from its contractual liability on the covenant, to which BHP did not respond. Chesterfield unsuccessfully claimed that it had been released from its covenant when it was called upon to carry out repairs under the covenant.

Jonathan Parker LJ

At [59]–[62]

The crux, as we see it, is the definition of "landlord" in section 28(1) as meaning "the person for the time being entitled to the reversion expectant on the term of the tenancy". (My emphasis.) We find it impossible to read that definition as meaning only the original landlord. [. . .] we consider that those words clearly connote the person who may from time to time be entitled to the reversion on the tenancy. It follows that, transposing that definition into the definition of the expression "landlord covenant", what one has is an obligation "falling to be complied with by [the person who may from time to time be entitled to the reversion on the tenancy]". An obligation which (that is to say, the burden of which) is personal to the original landlord is, by definition, not such an obligation, since it does not fall to be performed by the person who may from time to time be entitled to the reversion on the tenancy.

It follows that in our judgment Chesterfield's obligations in clause 12 of the agreement, being expressed to be personal to Chesterfield, are not "landlord covenants" within the meaning of the 1995 Act, and that the notice was accordingly ineffective to release Chesterfield from such obligations.

With respect to Mr Lewison, Chesterfield's argument on the 1995 Act issue seems to us to be based on the fallacy that there is a direct antithesis between a personal covenant (that is to say a covenant which is personal in the sense that the burden of it is expressed to be personal to the covenantor) on the one hand and a covenant which "touches and concerns", or which relates to, the land on the other. As Mr Barnes correctly submits, there is no such direct antithesis. A covenant which relates to the land may nevertheless be expressed to be personal to one or other or both of the parties to it. That is a matter for the contracting parties.

Nor can we see anything in the 1995 Act to fetter the freedom of contracting parties to place a contractual limit on the transmissibility of the benefit or burden of obligations under a tenancy. On the contrary, that no such fetter was intended by Parliament is clearly demonstrated, in our judgment, by section 3(6)(a) (quoted earlier).

The decision seems, on the face of it, correct, but it could lead to unfortunate consequences. In BHP, it was the landlord who was denied a release from contractual liability, but the same reasoning might equally be applied to the tenant's covenants. If a tenant's covenant is expressed to be personal, then TO will be unable to obtain a release from his or her contractual liability, unless he or she can negotiate an express release from his or her current landlord.[34]

[34] Kenny [2007] Conv 1.

Slessinger, 'Precedents Editor's notes' [2007] Conv 198, 199

> If the argument stands up, the whole purpose of the 1995 Act is destroyed. The primary mischief at which it was aimed was the continuing liability of tenants despite assignment of the lease.
>
> [Slessinger goes onto to suggest that, to avoid this result, the courts might be tempted to conclude] [...] that there are certain covenants which are essential to the lease and cannot be made personal. Unfortunately the covenant in the BHP case was, essentially, a landlord's repairing covenant, so it would be difficult to distinguish the decision on that basis. In any case, such a distinction runs the risk of reintroducing the concept of covenants which "touch and concern" the lease by the back door when this too was intended to be swept away by the 1995 Act.
>
> A subtler version of the distinction would be for the courts to say that it is not for the parties to define what is a personal covenant merely by sticking a label on it (see, for example, the court's attitude to documents labelled "licences"). To be a personal obligation there must be some reason why this landlord or this tenant is peculiarly in a position to perform it.

The crux of the matter is the extent to which the 1995 Act provides a complete code or merely interferes with existing concepts of privity of contract and estate, as shaped by the parties' (or their draughtsmen's) expressed intentions.

This tension is also evident in the distinct views expressed by the majority and minority in London Diocesan Fund v Phithwa,[35] in respect of which Dixon makes the following observation.

Dixon, 'A Failure of Statutory Purpose or a Failure of Professional Advice?' [2006] Conv 79

> [...] a chance was missed, possibly deliberately, to establish the 1995 Act as a self contained scheme free from the dictates of privity of estate and privity of contract. So it seems that, after all, the 1995 Act is another example of piecemeal intervention in the landlord and tenant relationship and an intervention that can be sidestepped—in some circumstances—by careful draughtmanship.

4 THE CONTINUING LIABILITY FOR BREACHES OF COVENANT

An assignee's liability under privity of estate ends when he or she no longer holds the estate upon which enforceability depends.[36] Thus neither LA nor TA is liable for breaches of covenant that occur after they have disposed of their respective estates. They will also not be liable for breaches that occurred before they acquired their respective estates, unless those breaches are of a continuing nature.

This position is reflected by s 23 of the 1995 Act, as well as ss 5 and 6, which we have already considered.

[35] [2005] UKHL 70.

[36] Onslow v Corriw (1817) 2 Madd 330.

Landlord and Tenant (Covenants) Act 1995, s 23

Effects of becoming subject to liability under, or entitled to benefit of, covenant etc.

(1) Where as a result of an assignment a person becomes, by virtue of this Act, bound by or entitled to the benefit of a covenant, he shall not by virtue of this Act have any liability or rights under the covenant in relation to any time falling before the assignment.

(2) Subsection (1) does not preclude any such rights being expressly assigned to the person in question.

(3) Where as a result of an assignment a person becomes, by virtue of this Act, entitled to a right of re-entry contained in a tenancy, that right shall be exercisable in relation to any breach of a covenant of the tenancy occurring before the assignment as in relation to one occurring thereafter, unless by reason of any waiver or release it was not so exercisable immediately before the assignment.

4.1 CONTINUING RIGHTS TO ENFORCE BREACHES OF COVENANT

Where a breach of covenant occurs before the lease, or freehold reversion, is assigned, the question is who may sue for that breach: is it the assignee (e.g. LA or TA, as appropriate), or does the right to sue remain with the assignor (e.g. LO or TO, as appropriate)? The answer again differs according to whether or not the lease is governed by the Landlord and Tenant (Covenants) Act 1995.

4.1.1 Pre-1996 law

A landlord is not able to sue in respect of a breach that has occurred after he or she has sold his or her reversion, because he or she has suffered no damage, nor can he or she do so in respect of a breach of the tenant's covenants that occurred before the assignment. This result flows from the interpretation of s 141 in the following case.

Re King
[1963] Ch 459, CA

Facts: Mr King had owned a factory, the lease of which required him to repair and insure, and to lay out any insurance moneys successfully claimed in reinstating, the factory. The factory was destroyed during the Second World War, but, after the war, the land was resumed by the government and a housing estate built. Mr King's estate sought directions as to whether it remained liable for breach of the covenant to repair, insure, and reinstate the factory.

UpJohn LJ

At 487

I turn, then, to a consideration of the meaning of section 141 and construe the language used in its ordinary and natural meaning, which seems to me quite plain and clear. To illustrate this, consider the case of a lease containing a covenant to build a house according to certain detailed specifications before a certain day. Let me suppose that after that certain day the then lessor assigns the benefit of the reversion to an assignee, and at the time of the assignment the lessee has failed to perform the covenant to build. Who can sue the lessee for breach of covenant? It seems to me clear that the assignee alone can sue. Upon the assignment the benefit of every covenant on the lessee's part to be observed and performed is annexed and incident to and goes with the reversionary estate. The benefit of that covenant to build, therefore, passed; as it had been broken, the right to sue also passed as part of the benefit of the covenant and, incidentally, also the right to re-enter, if that has not been waived. I protest against the argument that because a right to sue is itself a chose in action it, therefore, has become severed from, and independent of, the parent covenant; on the contrary it remains part of it. The right to sue on breach is merely one of the bundle of rights that are contained in the concept "benefit of every covenant." [...] Suppose the right to sue for breach of that covenant did not pass, and that right remained in the assignor, then the assignee would take the lease without the benefit of that covenant and he could never enforce it. So he has not got the benefit of every covenant contained in the lease and the words of the section are not satisfied. That cannot be right. The obligation to build being (as I have assumed) clearly defined by detailed specifications in the lease, it seems to me quite plain that the assignee could bring an action for specific performance compelling the lessee to perform his covenant to build. That is one of the rights which passed to him when the benefit of that covenant passed. The assignor has by the operation of section 141 assigned his right to the benefit of the covenant and so has lost his remedy against the lessee. Of course, the assignor and assignee can always agree that the benefit of the covenant shall not pass, in which case the assignor can still sue, if necessary, in the name of the assignee.

This view has been followed in London & County (A&D) Ltd v Wilfred Sportsman Ltd[37] in respect of the right to recover rent. Accordingly, under s 141 of the 1925 Act, the right to sue for arrears of rent due before the assignment will pass to the landlord's assignee and cannot be recovered by the assignor landlord.

This approach is to be contrasted with the interpretation of s 142, which preserves the rights of the tenant to continue to sue, after he or she has disposed of his or her leasehold term, in respect of a breach that occurred before the assignment.

City and Metropolitan Properties Ltd v Greycroft Ltd
[1987] 1 WLR 1085, HC

Facts: Greycroft was in serious breach of its covenant to repair premises leased by City. After abortive attempts to sell the property, City successfully took action against Greycroft to carry out the much-needed repairs. It was then able to sell its lease, but also sought damages against Greycroft for the damages that it had suffered in its earlier, but abortive, sale attempt.

Mowbray QC

At 1086

The landlord's first defence is that, when the tenant assigned the lease, all its rights passed to the assignee, including any right to damages such as are claimed under the pre-existing 37 [1971] Ch 764 and, in so doing, has disapproved the pre-s 141 decision of Flight v Bentley (1835) 7 Sim 149.

> specially indorsed writ, so the tenant has no cause of action left to support its claim. In my view that defence is not well founded. No authority was cited on the precise question whether a tenant who has assigned his lease can afterwards recover damages from the landlord for breaches of the landlord's covenants committed while the tenant held the lease. It is common ground, though, that a tenant (not the original lessee) who has assigned his lease again remains liable to the landlord for breaches of covenant which he committed while tenant [...] Both this liability and the benefit of the landlord's covenants run with the lease at common law by privity of estate under Spencer's Case (1583) 5 Co.Rep. 16 a: see Smith's Leading Cases, 13th ed. (1929), vol. 1, p. 51. There is a close analogy between the two. I take the view that, by this analogy, the landlord's liability to the tenant for existing breaches survives the assignment of the lease, in the same way as the tenant's liability to the landlord.
>
> Mr. Moss argued for the landlord here that the tenant's rights against the landlord did not survive the assignment of the lease, because on the assignment section 142(1) of the Law of Property Act 1925 made a statutory transfer of the tenant's rights to the assignee of the lease. [...]
>
> He pointed out that the Court of Appeal has held section 141(1) to make a statutory transfer of the whole benefit of a tenant's covenant to an assignee of the reversion: In re King, decd. [1963] Ch. 459 and London and County (A. & D.) Ltd. v. Wilfred Sportsman Ltd. [1971] Ch. 764. He asked me to apply that principle by analogy to an assignment of the lease.
>
> It is not possible to apply those decisions. They turned on words corresponding to the first part of section 142(1), "shall [...] be annexed and incident to and shall go with that reversionary estate." The middle passage of section 142(1) is quite different. [...] If the intention had been to effect a statutory transfer of the right to an assignee of the term, I should have expected words to have been used similar to those in section 141(1) and the beginning of section 142(1) itself.

4.1.2 Post-1995 law

The divergence evident in Re King and Greycroft is resolved by s 23 of the 1995 Act in favour of the Greycroft solution. The right to sue in respect of a breach committed before an assignment of the lease or the freehold reversion remains with the assignor, although the benefit of the right to sue may be expressly assigned to the purchaser.

5 SUB-LESSEES

Where a tenant grants a lease for a shorter term than he or she enjoys, even if it is only a day shorter, he or she grants a new estate that is called a 'sublease', or 'underlease'. The sub-lessee is bound by covenants in the sublease by way of privity of contract, but he or she is not within the privity of estate of the head lease and thus is not bound by, or able to enforce, the covenants in the head lease on this basis. A sub-lessee cannot, however, ignore the covenants in the head lease.

Firstly, a well-drafted sublease will include a covenant that the sub-lessee must observe and perform the covenants contained in the head lease. The head tenant, as landlord of the sublease, can thus enforce this covenant by way of privity of contract to ensure that the sub-lessee acts in a manner that does not place the head lease in jeopardy. A carefully drafted covenant to this effect may also confer the benefit of the sub-lessee's covenant upon the head landlord, who, although not within privity of contract, may be able to rely upon s 56 of the LPA 1925, or the Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999, to enforce the covenant directly against the sub-lessee. An action based upon s 56 failed in Amsprop Trading Ltd v Harris Distribution Ltd[38] on the wording of the covenant, which was not expressed (as the section requires) as made with the head landlord. The Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999 is less restrictive and could enable a head landlord to rely upon a covenant in the sublease where it is merely made for his or her benefit.[39]

Secondly, if the covenants in the head lease are not observed, the head landlord may forfeit the head lease. A forfeiture of the head lease will trigger the automatic extinction of the sub-lease, unless the sub-lessee successfully applies for relief from forfeiture. Relief will usually only be granted on condition that the sub-lessee remedies the breach.[40]

Thirdly, the restrictive covenants in the head lease have independent proprietary status and may be enforced in accordance with the principles that we will examine in Chapter 26. The head landlord may thus require the sub-lessee (or, indeed, any occupier of the land) to observe the restrictive covenants in the head lease under the doctrine of Tulk v Moxhay. The requirement of land to be benefited by the covenant has traditionally been identified as the landlord's reversionary interest,[41] although Gardner suggest an alternative rationale and, in so doing, controversially questions the whole exclusion of sub-lessees from privity of estate.

Gardner, An Introduction to Land Law (2009, p 226)

This special application of the restrictive covenant rule involves a radical departure from the rules original thrust [. . .] the rule in its standard form makes obligations operate in rem if, and because, they protect the standard of amenity prevailing between neighbouring plots of (necessarily) physical land. By not conforming to that factual pattern, the special application therefore cannot rest on the same justification. It must have a basis of its own, on the lines that the distinction between assignee and sub-tenant [. . .] is unimportant: the protection of the landlord's reversionary interest requires the lease terms be effective against both. Contrary to the assumption made by the idea of privity of estate, that seems a very reasonable position, resting on the idea that a tenant, on sub-leasing, should not be able to confer more (in the sense of an interest with fewer obligations to the landlord) then he himself has [. . .] and that idea makes as much sense for positive obligations as it does for negative ones. This lesson can best be absorbed, however, not by extending the restrictive covenant rule to positive as well as negative obligations, but by attacking the fundamental problem—privity of estate—itself.

The 1995 Act confirms the operation of Tulk v Moxhay to post-1995 leases in s 3(5).

Landlord and Tenant (Covenants) Act 1995, s 3(5)

Any landlord or tenant covenant of a tenancy which is restrictive of the user of land shall, as well as being capable of enforcement against an assignee, be capable of being enforced against any other person who is the owner or occupier of any demised premises to which the covenant relates, even though there is no express provision in the tenancy to that effect.

The principle was applied in the following case to enforce a covenant prohibiting assignment and underletting against a sub-lessee. The action was for a mandatory injunction requiring

38 [1997] 1 WLR 1025.
39 See Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999, s 1(b), and Chapter 26, section 3.3.3.
40 See section 6.4 below.
41 Hall v Ewin (1887) 37 Ch D 74.

the sub-lessee to execute a surrender of its sublease, which afforded the sub-lessee no opportunity to seek relief from the loss of its sublease.[42]

Hemingway Securities Ltd v Dunraven Ltd
(1996) 71 P & CR 30, HC

Jacob J

At 33

I should say that the plaintiffs put their case also on the doctrine of Tulk v. Moxhay. They say here is a restrictive covenant; it is well settled that a restrictive covenant for the benefit of the landlords' reversion counts for the purposes for the doctrine of Tulk v. Moxhay; the restrictive covenant accordingly runs with the land; it accordingly binds the second defendants; they are acting in breach of it and, therefore, again, an injunction to compel them to stop acting in breach of it and in effect to gain a mandatory injunction should be granted.

Again, I do not see the answer to this way of putting the plaintiff's case. It was suggested that a covenant against alienation is not a restrictive covenant for the purposes of the Tulk v. Moxhay doctrine. That doctrine was limited to covenants in respect of the mode of user of property. No direct authority was cited to that effect and I do not see why, in principle, it should be so. One can have covenants subject to the doctrine not to build things without showing plans first; covenants against multiple occupation; and I do not see why this particular restrictive covenant against alienation should be treated differently.

The subsection may not, however, be employed to allow a sub-lessee to enforce a covenant in the head lease against the head landlord.[43]

In a block of flats in which the flat leases are all granted subject to the same covenants, the principles of a building scheme may also be applied to create a letting scheme,[44] with the head lease covenants creating a local law for the development, binding upon and enforceable by all leaseholders within the block.[45] This local law might also encompass sub-lessees.[46]

6 REMEDIES FOR BREACH OF LEASEHOLD COVENANTS

In addition to the usually contractual remedies of common law damages, and the equitable discretionary remedies of specific performance and injunction, the breach of a tenant's covenant may lead to the forfeiture of the lease. Where the breach is a failure to pay rent, the landlord may decide to sue the tenant in debt for the rent as it becomes due for payment. Where the tenant has effectively abandoned the premises the landlord is not obliged to repossess and re-let the premises to mitigate his or her loss.[47] There is also the possibility 42 See Wilkie and Luxton, 'Who Needs s 146? Injunctive Relief for Landlords' [1995] Conv 416.

43 Oceanic Village Ltd v United Attractions Ltd [2000] Ch 234 ('demised premises' refers to the land under the head lease and not the sublease).

44 See Chapter 26, section 3.3.

45 Williams v Kiley (t/a CK Supermarkets Ltd) (No 1) [2003] L & TR 20.

46 See Brunner v Greenslade [1971] Ch 993.

47 The landlord is suing for the rental due and not for contractual damages flowing from the breach of covenant see Reichman v Beveridge [2006] EWCA Civ 1659.

of recovering rent by seizing the tenant's goods, previously governed by the law of distress. In this section, we will concentrate on forfeiture, as the most common measure with which to compel performance of the tenant's covenants.

6.1 DAMAGES

Damages are recoverable, in accordance with usually contractual principles, either by a landlord or tenant, for the loss occasioned by a breach of a covenant.

A landlord's recovery of damages for breach by the tenant of a repairing obligation is, however, limited by statute. Firstly, s 18 of the Landlord and Tenant Act 1927 limits the amount recoverable to the loss in value to the landlord's reversion and provides that no damages are recoverable where the premises are demolished or the premises are so altered that the repairs are valueless.

Secondly, the landlord of a lease granted for more than seven years, and which has at least three years left to run, is precluded by the Leasehold Property (Repairs) Act 1938 from seeking damages for breach of a tenant's repairing covenant, unless notice is served under s 146 of the LPA 1925, which is extracted and considered below. This notice must include a statement that the tenant may serve a counter-notice, which will have the effect of prohibiting any further proceedings without leave of the court. This latter provision has caused difficulties where the landlord carries out the repairs and seeks to recover the cost of doing so from the tenant,[48] although where the landlord does so pursuant to a suitably drafted 'self-help' clause in the lease, it has been held that his or her recovery falls outside the Act as an action for a debt.[49]

A tenant suffering damage as a result of a landlord's breach of a repairing covenant cannot simply refuse to pay the rent.[50] He or she may resort to self-help by arranging for the necessary repairs and recovering the cost from the landlord, either by direct action or by offsetting the cost against the rent.[51] This convenient route to redress may, however, be excluded by the clear terms of the lease.[52] We will consider the more far-reaching issues of ensuring effective and efficient management of flats later in Chapter 27.

6.2 SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE

It is now clear that, where damages are an inadequate remedy, there is inherent jurisdiction, and also statutory jurisdiction limited to residential leases, for the court to award specific performance of a landlord's repairing obligations.[53] Specific performance may also be ordered of a tenant's obligations, although this jurisdiction is likely to be only rarely exercised.[54] Forfeiture is likely to remain the more appropriate remedy against a tenant.

48 SEDAC Investments Ltd v Tanner [1982] 1 WLR 1342.

49 See Jervis v Harris [1996] 1 ALL ER 303, overruling Swallow Securities Ltd v Brand (1981) 45 P & CR 328, noted at [1997] Conv 299.

50 Melville v Grapelodge Developments Ltd (1978) 39 P & CR 179. It should also be noted that recovery may lie for breach of statutory duty under the Defective Premises Act 1972.

51 Lee Parker v Izzet [1971] 1 WLR 1688; British Anzani (Felixstowe) Ltd v International Marine Management (UK) Ltd [1980] QB 137.

52 HSBC v Kloeckner [1990] 2 QB 514, but see Connaught Restaurants Ltd v Indoor Leisure Ltd [1994] 1 WLR 501.

53 See Jeune v Queen's Cross Properties Ltd [1974] Ch 97, and Landlord and Tenant Act 1985, ss 17 and 32.

54 See Rainbow Estates Ltd v Tokenhold Ltd 1999] Ch 64, noted at [1998] Conv 495 and [1998] JBL 564. The Law Commission has recommended that this jurisdiction be afforded a statutory basis: see Law Commission Report No 238, Responsibility for State and Condition of Property (1996), [11.33]–[11.34].

6.3 DISTRESS AND TAKING CONTROL OF THE TENANT'S GOODS

The ancient law of distress permits seizure and sale of the tenant's (and other person's) goods that are at the premises in order to pay arrears of rent. Distress has long been in the firing line of reformers given not only its antiquity and resulting complexity, but also the priority that it confers upon a landlord's claims over those of other creditors and its almost certain incompatibility with the Human Rights Act 1998 (HRA 1998). It is thus in the process of abolition and replacement by an alternative process by the Tribunals, Courts and Enforcement Act 2007.

Part 3 of this new statute abolishes the previous common law and statutory provisions, and enacts a new statutory code. In particular, distress for rent is abolished[55] and a new remedy termed 'commercial rent arrears recovery' is introduced.[56] As its name suggests, the remedy is unavailable to landlords of domestic premises, who entirely lose their right to seize goods to enforce rent arrears; they must rely on their right to sue for recovery of rent or rely upon forfeiture.

6.4 FORFEITURE

6.4.1 Introduction

Forfeiture is the process by which a landlord can extinguish a lease by exercising a right to re-enter the premises. A right of re-entry must be expressly granted,[57] as it invariably is, by the lease and it exists as a separate legal interest of the landlord.[58] An agreement for a lease will, however, imply (as a usual covenant) a right of re-entry, which the landlord can insist is included in the lease itself.[59]

A right of re-entry is generally expressed to be exercisable if the tenant fails to pay the rent, or if the tenant fails to observe or perform any of the other covenants contained in the lease. Occasionally, a right of re-entry may be triggered by some other specified event: for example, the tenant's bankruptcy, in the case of an individual tenant, or entry into one of the corporate insolvency regimes, where the tenant is a company.[60]

A common form of a right of re-entry is set out below.

Encyclopaedia of Forms and Precedents, Landlord and Tenant (Residential Tenancies): Vol 23(2) (2002, Form 9)

Recovery of possession

(1) The Landlord's rights under this clause arise if and whenever during this Term:

(i) the rent, or any part of it, or any other sum reserved as rent by this lease, lawfully due from the Tenant is unpaid [14 days] after becoming due, whether formally demanded or not, or

(ii) the Tenant breaches any covenant, condition or other term of this lease.

55 Tribunals, Courts and Enforcement Act 2007, s 71.
56 See ibid, ss 72–80.
57 A right to re-enter for denying the landlord's title is implied.
58 See Law of Property Act 1925, s 1(1)(e).
59 Chester v Buckingham Travel Ltd [1981] 1 WLR 96.
60 A right of re-entry on bankruptcy or insolvency is unlikely to be regarded as usual covenant: see ibid.

(2) If and whenever during the Term any of the above events occurs, the Landlord may bring an action to recover possession from the Tenant and re-enter the Property subject:

(i) in the case of unpaid rent to the Tenant's right to relief on payment of the arrears and costs, and

(ii) in the case of a breach of any obligation other than to pay rent, to his obligations to serve notice on the Tenant specifying the breach complained of, requiring its remedy if it is capable of remedy, and requiring the Tenant to pay compensation in any case, and to allow the Tenant a reasonable time to remedy a breach that is capable of remedy.

On the making of a court order for possession this tenancy shall cease absolutely, but without prejudice to any rights or remedies that may have accrued to the Landlord against the Tenant, or to the Tenant against the Landlord in respect of any breach of covenant or other term of this lease, including the breach in respect of which the re-entry is made.

The law has taken a broad approach to what constitutes a right of re-entry. Thus, for example, a right of the landlord to serve notice to terminate the lease upon a breach by the tenant of his or her obligations under the lease has been interpreted as a right of re-entry.[61]

Forfeiture provides 'an essential management tool, particularly in relation to commercial and long residential leases',[62] but it can also be a heavy-handed response. It is possible for a tenant holding for a long term to lose his or her whole interest because of a comparatively minor breach. What is more, any derivative interest granted out of that lease—for example, a sublease or mortgage—will also be lost. Forfeiture should thus only be employed as a long-stop remedy.

Clarke, 'Property Law' (1992) 45(1) CLP 81, 104

Forfeiture displays the best and worst features of a self help remedy. When exercised extra-judicially it is a fast and effective remedy for breach, and it is sufficiently drastic in effect to deter breaches. In fact it has been so successful in this jurisdiction that it has developed at the expense of the doctrines of repudiatory breach and frustration. On the other hand, its bad features are, first, that it affects the interests of third parties, who may have had no knowledge of the breach and no means of preventing it, and secondly that its effects between the parties bears no relation to the effects of the breach: it can inflict loss on the tenant quite disproportionate to the blameworthiness of the breach, and it can produce a windfall profit for the landlord.

The draconian nature of forfeiture is tempered, firstly, by the law's attitude to the ease with which a landlord is deemed to have waived a right of re-entry (see section 6.4.3 below), secondly, by the procedural steps that must be followed (see sections 6.4.4 and 6.4.5 below), and lastly, by the court's jurisdiction to grant relief from forfeiture (see section 6.4.6 below). In addition, certain short-term residential leases cannot be forfeited and the forfeiture of residential long leases is subject to additional controls, which we will examine when looking more closely at such leases.[63]

[61] Richard Clarke & Co Ltd v Widnall [1976] 1 WLR 845 and Law of Property Act 1925, s 146(7).
[62] Gravells [2006] JBL 830.
[63] See Chapter 23 and Chapter 27, section 2.6.

In the following case, Lord Templeman explains how the law has tempered the operation of forfeiture.

Billson v Residential Apartments Ltd
[1992] 1 AC 494, HL

Lord Templeman

At 534

By the common law, when a tenant commits a breach of covenant and the lease contains a proviso for forfeiture, the landlord at his option may either waive the breach or determine the lease. In order to exercise his option to determine the lease the landlord must either re-enter the premises in conformity with the proviso or must issue and serve a writ claiming possession. The bringing of an action to recover possession is equivalent to an entry for the forfeiture [. . .]

Before the intervention of Parliament, if a landlord forfeited by entering into possession or by issuing and serving a writ for possession, equity could relieve the tenant against forfeiture but only in cases under the general principles of equity whereby a party may be relieved from the consequences of fraud, accident or mistake or in cases where the breach of covenant entitling the landlord to forfeit was a breach of the covenant for payment of rent [. . .]

In 1881 Parliament interfered to supplement equity and to enable any tenant to be relieved from forfeiture. The need for such intervention was and is manifest because otherwise a tenant who had paid a large premium for a 999-year lease at a low rent could lose his asset by a breach of covenant which was remediable or which caused the landlord no damage. The forfeiture of any lease, however short, may unjustly enrich the landlord at the expense of the tenant. In creating a power to relieve against forfeiture for breach of covenant Parliament protected the landlord by conferring on the court a wide discretion to grant relief on terms or to refuse relief altogether. In practice this discretion is exercised with the object of ensuring that the landlord is not substantially prejudiced or damaged by the revival of the lease [. . .]

Section 146(1) prevents the landlord from enforcing a right of re-entry or forfeiture by action or otherwise so that the landlord cannot determine the lease by issuing and serving a writ or by re-entering the premises until the tenant has failed within a reasonable time to remedy the breach and make reasonable compensation. Section 146(2) enables the tenant to apply to the court for relief where the landlord "is proceeding, by action or otherwise" to enforce his right of re-entry or forfeiture. If the landlord "is proceeding" to determine the lease by issuing and serving a writ, the tenant may apply for relief after the writ has been served. If the landlord "is proceeding" to determine the lease by re-entering into possession, the tenant may apply for relief after the landlord has re-entered.

After considering the effect of forfeiture more closely, we will go on to examine each of these ways in which the law regulates its operation, before finally looking at the current proposals for reform in the light of the Law Commission's conclusion that the law governing forfeiture 'is complex, it lacks coherence, and it can lead to injustice'.[64]

[64] Law Commission Report No 174, Landlord and Tenant: Privity of Contract and Estate—Executive Summary (2004).

6.4.2 The effect of forfeiture

As Lord Templeman explains, where the tenant has breached a leasehold covenant, the landlord has a choice: he or she may either elect to ignore the breach, or he or she may exercise his or her right of re-entry and so trigger forfeiture. The lease will be brought to an end, but the landlord must then recover possession either by peacefully gaining entry to the premises, or by issuing and serving on the tenant proceedings for possession. It is the landlord's decision to re-enter, either peacefully or by court process, which forfeits the lease and not the court's order for possession.[65] From the time of the landlord's re-entry, the tenant is a trespasser and no longer liable to pay rent. Instead, the landlord may claim mesne profits—being damages for the tenant's use of the land—which is calculated according the current rental value of the land.

The Law Commission explains the artificiality of this process.

Law Commission Report No 303, Termination of Tenancies for Tenant Default (2006, [1.9])

> When a landlord commences court proceedings with a view to forfeiting the tenancy and recovering possession, a "constructive" re-entry takes place. This means, counter-intuitively, that the tenancy terminates not when the court makes an order to such effect, but on the date the proceedings are served on the tenant. This has several highly artificial consequences. First, the tenancy ends before there has been any opportunity for the parties to make representations to the court. Secondly, the tenant's obligations to pay the rent and observe the covenants are extinguished. Thirdly, the landlord's proceedings are not to terminate the tenancy (as forfeiture has technically already occurred) but are instead to recover possession of the premises. Fourthly, if the former tenant wishes the tenancy to continue, it is incumbent upon the tenant to bring a claim for "relief" in order retrospectively to revive the tenancy that has been forfeited.

We have described the lease as being extinguished by forfeiture, but until the proceedings for possession and, in particular, any claim for relief is decided, that is not quite accurate.[66]

Meadows v Clerical Medical & General Life Assurance Society
[1981] Ch 70, HC

> Sir Robert Megarry VC
>
> At 75
>
> There are, of course, curiosities in the status of a forfeited lease which is the subject of an application for relief against forfeiture. Until the application has been decided, it will not be known whether the lease will remain forfeited or whether it will be restored as if it had never been forfeited [. . .] The tenancy has a trance-like existence pendente lite; none can assert with assurance whether it is alive or dead.

[65] Canas Property Co Ltd v KL Television Services Ltd [1970] 2 QB 433.

[66] See also Driscoll v Church Commissioners [1957] Ch 70; Ivory Gate Ltd v Spetale (1999) 77 P & CR 141; Maryland Estate v Joseph [1991] 1 WLR 83; Twinsectra Ltd v Hynes [(1995) 71 P & CR 145.

Bignall describes the unsatisfactory position of the parties during this 'twilight period'[67] between the service of the landlord's application for possession and the determination of the proceedings.

Bignell, 'Forfeiture: A Long Overdue Reform?' [2007] L&T Rev 140, 142

> Such historic hangovers from the early days of forfeiture by physical re-entry mean the status of the occupier is now unclear during this time. Such a period may be a lengthy one. This is disadvantageous for landlords, tenants and those with derivative interests. Until matters are resolved one way or the other, the tenant is no longer bound by the covenants in the tenancy, including the obligation to pay rent, or to repair. If the tenant remains in possession, the landlord cannot rely on the covenants in the lease so as to make a claim for an interim injunction, or claim damages for dilapidation which have accrued during the "twilight period". There is no good reason for this and the practical consequences may be very serious for the landlord. By contrast, because the tenant has not elected to treat the lease as at an end, the tenant is entitled to seek an injunction to enforce the landlord's covenants, to pursue a claim for a new tenancy [. . .] and to collect rent from a sub-tenant.
>
> Further in the event that the tenant remains in possession whilst court proceedings are conducted, the tenant becomes a trespasser whose continuing use and occupation of the premises simply entitle the landlord to recover mesne profits, or damages, from the date of actual or notional re-entry. Where the rent payable under the tenancy represents the fair market value of the property, the mesne profits will be payable at the same rate. If the fair market rental value is higher or lower than the rent, the mesne profits will be different. The quantification of this claim to damages may lead to another round of litigation, and will compound any financial hardship suffered by a landlord who has receive no income at all from the property whilst the forfeiture proceedings have run their course.

6.4.3 Waiver

Landlords cannot rely on a breach of covenant to forfeit the lease where he or she has waived his or her right of re-entry. A waiver of a right of re-entry will occur where the landlord, with knowledge of the breach of covenant, acts in some way that recognizes the continued existence of the lease.[68] The most common action is the demand or acceptance of the rent payable under the lease.[69]

The effect of waiver has been criticized as operating unfairly to landlords, bearing in mind that a tenant may avoid the harsh consequences of forfeiture by applying for relief.

Smith, Property Law (6th edn, 2009, p 408)

> Three criticisms may be made of this rule. First, one must feel sympathy for the position of L [the landlord] who can claim neither rent nor mesne profits until the action is heard. Secondly, rent is usually accepted because of some mistake within L's offices: it is not as if a conscious decision has been made to keep the lease alive. Thirdly, and most damning, it does not matter that T [the tenant] is well aware that L has no intention of waiving the forfeiture.

67 This expression was used by Lightman J in GS Fashions Ltd v B&Q plc [1995] 1 WLR 1088, 1093.

68 Matthews v Smallwood [1910] 1 Ch 777; Central Estates (Belgravia) Ltd v Woolgar (No 2) [1972] 1 WLR 1048; Cornillie v Saha (1996) 72 P & CR 147.

69 The acceptance of rent due before the breach will not operate as a waiver.

Waiver is less of an issue where the breach is continuing in nature: the landlord can simply rely upon a subsequent breach. An example of a continuing breach is a breach of a covenant to repair,[70] or, as in the following case, a covenant that restricts the user of the premises.

Segal Securities Ltd v Thoseby
[1963] 1 QB 887, HC

Facts: Mrs Thoseby rented a maisonette under a 21-year lease for a rent of £300 a year, which was payable quarterly in advance. The lease contained a covenant that it should be used only as a residence for one household. After the death of her husband, Mrs Thoseby shared her accommodation with two other women, one of whom was a friend and the other, a paying guest. The landlord alleged that she had breached the user covenant and served the required statutory notice at the beginning of June. It demanded the rent that was payable in advance on the next quarter day at the end of June; its demand was expressed to be 'without prejudice' to any breaches. Mrs Thoseby, in the landlord's action for possession, unsuccessfully claimed that the landlord had waived the breach of the user covenant. The breach was continuing and, although the right to re-enter flowing from breaches occurring before the date of service of the notice had been waived, the demand for rent did not waive future breaches.

Sachs J

At 897

When one approaches the law relating to waiver of forfeiture, one comes upon a field—one might say a minefield—in which it is necessary to tread with diffidence and warily. That is to no small degree due to the number of points in that field that are of a highly technical nature, originating in the days before the court was able to give relief, if at all, with such freedom as it can nowadays.

[...] In this field of law, one point, however, is plain and was conceded by counsel for the landlord. The law as to the effect of the acceptance of rent "without prejudice" must be taken as that stated in a classic passage in the judgment of Parker J. in Matthews v. Smallwood [1910] 1 Ch 777 at 786 [...]:

> "It is also, I think, reasonably clear upon the cases that whether the act, coupled with the knowledge, constitutes a waiver is a question which the law decides, and therefore it is not open to a lessor who has knowledge of the breach to say 'I will treat the tenancy as existing, and I will receive the rent, or I will take advantage of my power as landlord to distrain; but I tell you that all I shall do will be without prejudice to my right to re-enter, which I intend to reserve.' That is a position which he is not entitled to take up. If, knowing of the breach, he does distrain, or does receive the rent, then by law he waives the breach, and nothing which he can say by way of protest against the law will avail him anything."

[...] It is thus a matter of law that once rent is accepted a waiver results [...] Where forfeiture is involved, in essence once the landlord has knowledge of a past breach, the law thus treats the rent as a piece of cake equivalent to the land out of which it derives: its nutritional qualities in the landlord's hands being unaffected by attaching to it the label "without prejudice," the law treats that attachment as having no effect.

[70] Penton v Barnett [1898] 1 QB 276.

Whether a demand for rent made without prejudice similarly operates as a waiver has, apparently, not been specifically decided. [. . .] As both demand and acceptance respectively are in law merely different forms of a notification by a landlord of election not to avoid or forfeit the lease, to my mind no distinction can nowadays be drawn between them in relation to a question whether the label "without prejudice" affects their quality as an election. [. . .]

At this stage it is right to mention that there was for a long time much able argument before me, and much discussion of authorities on the question whether the continued breach of covenant in the present case was a series of continuing breaches within the meaning of those words as they apply to breaches of covenants to repair, or whether, on the other hand, once it was discovered and known to the landlord that the tenant was in breach the landlord only had a single election. It was urged by counsel for the tenant that once the landlord had thus accepted rent he could not in future play cat and mouse with the tenant and bide the time for enforcing a forfeiture. At the very last moment, however, of his concluding address, counsel for the landlord cited Doe d. Ambler v. Woodbridge, a judgment of a strong court presided over by Lord Tenterden in which it was held that user by a lodger was a continuing breach: thereafter counsel for the tenant felt unable to press the argument that here the tenant was not guilty of a continuing breach [. . .]

One thus has to consider the position on the basis that this is a case where, according to the rule in Penton v. Barnett, [1898] 1 QB 276 there were a fresh series of breaches after July 6 of which the landlord is entitled, subject to any waiver, to take advantage without serving a further notice under section 146 of the Law of Property Act, 1925.

With that rule in mind, I now turn to the important and decisive question as to the circumstances in which a demand for or acceptance of rent payable in advance constitutes a waiver of breaches during the period covered by the rent demanded. Clearly it cannot be a waiver of future breaches of which the landlord has no advance knowledge: Ellis v. Rowbotham [1900] 1 QB 740 which relates to a default in payment of rent in advance, seems to illustrate this point, despite being an Apportionment Act case. Equally clearly, an acceptance of rent in advance does waive a once and for all—that is to say, a non-continuing—breach in the past: such a waiver applies both to the past and to the period covered by the rent.

As regards continuing breaches, it seems to me that, in the absence of express agreement, the acceptance of rent in advance can at highest only waive those breaches that are at the time of demand known to be continuing, and to waive them for such period as it is definitely known they will continue. When it is a question of estimating the chances as to whether the tenant's breach will continue, the position is, in my view, different, irrespective of whether those chances are high or low. The object of a covenant by which rent has to be paid in advance is to obtain a certain security for that payment: Ellis v. Rowbotham points to the nature and effect of that covenant. A landlord cannot, to my mind, lightly be deprived of the benefit of such rights: he cannot be put in the position of having to wait until the end of the period covered by the rent before demanding or accepting it merely because there are chances that the tenant may so break or continue in breach of covenant as to render himself liable to forfeiture.

6.4.4 Notice

The reason for requiring the landlord to give notice of a breach of covenant is explained in the following case.

Horsey Estate Ltd v Steiger
[1899] 2 QB 79, CA

Lord Russell

At 91

The object seems to be to require in the defined cases (1.) that a notice shall precede any proceeding to enforce a forfeiture, (2.) that the notice shall be such as to give the tenant precise information of what is alleged against him and what is demanded from him, and (3.) that a reasonable time shall after notice be allowed the tenant to act before an action is brought. The reason is clear: he ought to have the opportunity of considering whether he can admit the breach alleged; whether it is capable of remedy; whether he ought to offer any, and, if so, what, compensation; and, finally, if the case is one for relief, whether he ought or ought not promptly to apply for such relief. In short, the notice is intended to give to the person whose interest it is sought to forfeit the opportunity of considering his position before an action is brought against him.

When considering a landlord's obligation to warn the tenant of his or her intention to exercise his or her right of re-entry, we must distinguish between a re-entry based upon a tenant's failure to pay the rent and that based on a breach of another leasehold covenant.

Breach for non-payment of rent

Rent must be formally demanded before a right of re-entry can be exercised, unless, as is invariably the case, the right excludes the need for a formal demand.[71] The right of re-entry extracted at section 6.4.1 above provides an example in clause (1)(i).

Breach of covenants other than to pay rent

Where a breach of another covenant in the lease is relied upon,[72] the landlord must serve a notice under s 146(1) of the LPA 1925. A notice that fails to comply with the subsection is void and the landlord will have to serve another notice before re-entering.

Law of Property Act 1925, s 146(1)

Restrictions on and relief against forfeiture of leases and underleases

(1) A right of re-entry or forfeiture under any proviso or stipulation in a lease for a breach of any covenant or condition in the lease shall not be enforceable, by action or otherwise, unless and until the lessor serves on the lessee a notice—

(a) specifying the particular breach complained of; and

(b) if the breach is capable of remedy, requiring the lessee to remedy the breach; and

(c) in any case, requiring the lessee to make compensation in money for the breach;

71 Common Law Procedure Act 1852, s 210, also dispenses with the need for a formal demand where the rent is six months in arrears and there are insufficient goods at the premises to distrain for the arrears.

72 Save for certain cases in which re-entry is based upon the tenant's bankruptcy: see Law of Property Act 1925, s 146(9) and (10).

and the lessee fails, within a reasonable time thereafter, to remedy the breach, if it is capable of remedy, and to make reasonable compensation in money, to the satisfaction of the lessor, for the breach.

The purpose of the notice, as Lord Russell explains in his point (2) of the above extract, is not only to warn the tenant, but also to let them know what they must do to avoid forfeiture. The nature of the breach must thus be accurately and sufficiently stated.

Akici v LR Butlin Ltd

[2006] 1 WLR 201, CA

Facts: Mr Akici acquired a lease of commercial premises that contained a covenant 'not to charge assign [...] underlet or part with possession of a part of the demised premises [...] nor to share possession of the whole or any part of the [...] premises nor to part with possession of the whole of the [...] premises'. Mr Akici operated a takeaway pizza business at the premises, through a company owned by another. Butlin, as landlord, served a s 146 notice, alleging 'assignment or alternatively subletting or alternatively parting with possession of the premises without the landlord's consent'. The Court decided that Mr Akici was sharing (but had not parted with possession of) the premises with the company, although this breach of covenant had not been adequately identified in the s 146 notice.

Neuberger LJ

At [54]–[58]

I accept the submission that the approach of the majority of the House of Lords in Mannai [Investment Co Ltd v Eagle Star Life Assurance Co Ltd [1997] AC 749] to contractual notices would apply to section 146 notices, despite Mr Butler's submission to the contrary. However, I have none the less come to the conclusion that Mr Lloyd's defence of the notice cannot stand. Even applying the Mannai case the notice has to comply with the requirements of section 146(1) of the 1925 Act, and if, as appears pretty plainly to be the case, it does not specify the right breach, then nothing in the Mannai case can save it.

Quite apart from this, if, on its true construction, the section 146 notice did not specify sharing possession as a breach complained of, it can be said with considerable force that it neither informed the recipient of the breach complained of, nor indicated to him whether, and if so how, he must remedy any breach. On the basis that there was a sharing of possession, a reasonable recipient of the section 146 notice would have been entitled to take the view that he need do nothing, because the lessors were only complaining about the presence of the company if there was a parting with possession (or assigning or underletting) by Mr Akici to it.

Accordingly, a reasonable recipient in this case (and it is the understanding of such a hypothetical person by reference to which the validity of the notice is to be assessed according to the Mannai case) could, to put it at its lowest, reasonably have taken the view that the lessors were not objecting to any sharing of possession, and consequently that no steps need to be taken, either with a view to remedying the breach or with a view to improving the prospects of obtaining relief from forfeiture [...]

It is [. . .] appropriate to mention the decision of the House of Lords in Fox v Jolly [1916] 1 AC 1, 23 where the last sentence of the speech of Lord Parmoor appears to me to encapsulate the proper approach to section 146 notices and, it may be said, to notices generally:

> "I think that the notice should be construed as a whole in a common-sense way, and that no lessee could have any reasonable doubt as to the particular breaches which are specified."

In this case I think it is impossible to say that no lessee would have been in any doubt but that the lessors were not contending that he was sharing possession of the premises.

It is not necessary for the landlord to specify compensation if he or she is not seeking compensation,[73] but it is the requirements of s 146(1)(b) of the 1925 Act that have proved problematic. Where the breach is capable of remedy, the notice must call for the breach to be remedied. It is only where the breach is incapable of remedy that the landlord's notice can overlook s 146(1)(b). It is relatively easy for landlords to avoid the difficulty in distinguishing between those breaches that are capable of remedy and those that are not: they merely have to call for the breach to be remedy 'if it is capable of remedy'. Where a landlord has failed to use this convenient wording, it is vital to establish whether a particular breach is capable of remedy. As we will see, the question is also of significance when the court exercises its discretion to grant relief.

It could be argued that no breach can be remedied, in the sense that it is impossible to put the clock back to before the breach, but the courts have taken a wider approach by asking whether or not the harm occasioned by the breach can be remedied.

Savva v Hussein
(1997) 73 P & CR 150, CA

Facts: The lessees holding under a twelve-year lease of commercial premises in London carried out various alterations, including changing the sign and facia to the premises, without obtaining the prior consent of the landlords as they were required to do by the terms of the lease. In holding that the landlord's s 146 notice was invalid, the Court held that the breaches were capable of remedy.

Staughton LJ

At 154

[. . .] [T]he question is: whether the remedy referred to is the process of restoring the situation to what it would have been if the covenant had never been broken, or whether it is sufficient that the mischief resulting from a breach of the covenant can be removed. When something has been done without consent, it is not possible to restore the matter wholly to the situation which it was in before the breach. The moving finger writes and cannot be recalled. That is not to my mind what is meant by a remedy, it is a remedy if the mischief caused by the breach can be removed. In the case of a covenant not to make alterations without consent or not to display signs without consent, if there is a breach of that, the mischief can be removed by removing the signs or restoring the property to the state it was in before the alterations.

[73] Rugby School (Governors) v Tannahill [1935] 1 KB 87.

The courts have tended to draw a distinction between positive and negative covenants. A positive covenant is generally capable of remedy, whether it relates to a once-and-for-all breach or a continuing breach: for example, a covenant to repair is generally capable of being remedied by carrying out the necessary repairs.

Expert Clothing Service & Sales Ltd v Hillgate House Ltd
[1986] Ch 340, CA

Facts: Hillgate was granted a lease of premises, which it agreed to convert either into office space, or into a gym and health club. The conversion work was to be substantially completed by 28 September 1982—but, by this date, the work had not even started. The landlord served a s 146(1) notice on Hillgate, which claimed that its breach of covenant was incapable for remedy. The Court disagreed.

Slade LJ

At 351

In a case where the breach is "capable of remedy" within the meaning of the section, the principal object of the notice procedure provided for by section 146(1), as I read it, is to afford the lessee two opportunities before the lessor actually proceeds to enforce his right of re-entry, namely (1) the opportunity to remedy the breach within a reasonable time after service of the notice, and (2) the opportunity to apply to the court for relief from forfeiture. In a case where the breach is not "capable of remedy," there is clearly no point in affording the first of these two opportunities; the object of the notice procedure is thus simply to give the lessee the opportunity to apply for relief.

At 354

[After reviewing the authorities, Slade LJ continued] Mr. Neuberger, on behalf of the defendants, did not feel able to go so far as to support the view of MacKinnon J. that the breach of a positive covenant is always capable of remedy. He accepted, for example, that the breach of a covenant to insure might be incapable of remedy at a time when the premises had already been burnt down. Another example might be the breach of a positive covenant which in the event would be only capable of being fully performed, if at all, after the expiration of the relevant term.

Nevertheless, I would, for my part, accept Mr. Neuberger's submission that the breach of a positive covenant (whether it be a continuing breach or a once and for all breach) will ordinarily be capable of remedy. As Bristow J. pointed out in the course of argument, the concept of capability of remedy for the purpose of section 146 must surely be directed to the question whether the harm that has been done to the landlord by the relevant breach is for practicable purposes capable of being retrieved. In the ordinary case, the breach of a promise to do something by a certain time can for practical purposes be remedied by the thing being done, even out of time. For these reasons I reject the plaintiffs' argument that the breach of the covenant to reconstruct by 28 September 1982 was not capable of remedy merely because it was not a continuing breach [. . .]

In contrast with breaches of negative user covenants, the breach of a positive covenant to do something (such as to decorate or build) can ordinarily, for practical purposes, be remedied by the thing being actually done if a reasonable time for its performance (running from the service of the section 146 notice) is duly allowed by the landlord following such service and the tenant duly does it within such time [. . .]

> In my judgment, on the remediability issue, the ultimate question for the court was this: if the section 146 notice had required the lessee to remedy the breach and the lessors had then allowed a reasonable time to elapse to enable the lessee fully to comply with the relevant covenant, would such compliance, coupled with the payment of any appropriate monetary compensation, have effectively remedied the harm which the lessors had suffered or were likely to suffer from the breach? If, but only if, the answer to this question was "No," would the failure of the section 146 notice to require remedy of the breach have been justifiable [. . .] In the present case, [. . .] for the reasons already stated, I think the answer to it must have been "Yes."

By contrast, it has been suggested that a negative covenant is incapable of remedy. For example, MacKinnon J, at first instance in Rugby School (Governors) v Tannahill,[74] raised this possibility, although the Court of Appeal refused to indorse his view.[75] The Court did accept, however, that a covenant against an immoral or illegal user could be incapable of remedy where the breach carries a continuing stigma from which the premises cannot easily be cleansed. In Tannahill, the premises had been used for prostitution.[76] In the later case of Scala House & District Property Co Ltd v Forbes,[77] the Court of Appeal also decided that a once-and-for-all breach of a negative covenant against subletting, without the prior consent of the landlord, was incapable of remedy.

The Court of Appeal has subsequently backtracked from broad statements that negative covenants are incapable of remedy. In Expert Clothing, the decision in Scala was doubted and limited to covenants against subletting. This change in approach has gone hand in hand with an appreciation of the wider meaning of remedy explained in Savva, in which Aldous LJ also doubted the usefulness of distinguishing between positive and negative covenants.[78]

Neuberger LJ outlined the current approach in his dicta comments in the following case, in which he went so far as he was able, in the light of authority, to explain that all breaches of positive or negative covenants should be capable of remedy unless falling within the authority of Scala or the stigma cases.

Akici v LR Butlin Ltd
[2006] 1 WLR 201, CA

Neuberger LJ

At [64]–[75]

> In those circumstances it seems to me that the proper approach to the question of whether or not a breach is capable of remedy should be practical rather than technical. In a sense it could be said that any breach of covenant is, strictly speaking, incapable of remedy. Thus, where a lessee has covenanted to paint the exterior of demised premises every five years, 74 [1934] 1 KB 695, 701. 75 [1935] 1 KB 87, 90, per Greer LJ.

76 See also Egerton v Esplanade Hotel, London Ltd [1947] 2 All ER 88; Central Estates (Belgravia) Ltd v Woolgar (No 2) [1972] 1 WLR 1048; British Petroleum Pension Trust Ltd v Behrendt (1985) 52 P & CR 117. The court takes a less robust view where the breach against immoral user is indirect because the lessee acts promptly to end the immoral user committed by a sub-lessee see Glass v Kencakes [1966] 1 QB 611; Patel v K&J Restaurants Ltd [2010] EWCA Civ 1211. Other 'stigma' cases have related to: gambling (Hoffman v Fineberg [1949] Ch 245); pornography (Dunraven Securities Ltd v Hollaway [1982] 2 EGLR 47); and spying (Van Haarlam v Kasner (1992) 64 P & CR 214).

77 [1974] QB 575. 78 (1996) 73 P & CR 150, 157.

his failure to paint during the fifth year is incapable of remedy, because painting in the sixth year is not the same as painting in the fifth year, an argument rejected in Hoffmann v Fineberg [1949] Ch 245, 253, cited with approval by this court in Expert Clothing Service and Sales Ltd v Hillgate House Ltd [1986] Ch 340, 351c-d. Equally it might be said that where a covenant to use premises only for residential purpose is breached by use as a doctor's consulting room, there is an irremediable breach because even stopping the use will not, as it were, result in the premises having been unused as a doctor's consulting room during the period of breach. Such arguments, as I see it, are unrealistically technical.

In principle I would have thought that the great majority of breaches of covenant should be capable of remedy, in the same way as repairing or most user covenant breaches. Even where stopping, or putting right, the breach may leave the lessors out of pocket for some reason, it does not seem to me that there is any problem in concluding that the breach is remediable. That is because section 146(1) entitles the lessors to "compensation in money [. . .] for the breach" and, indeed, appears to distinguish between remedying the breach and paying such compensation.

On this basis I consider that it would follow, as a matter of both principle and practicality, that breaches of covenants involving parting with or sharing possession should be capable of remedy. One can see an argument, albeit that it strikes me as somewhat technical, for saying that the breach of covenant against assigning or subletting is incapable of remedy, because such a breach involves the creation or transfer of an interest in land, and a surrender or assignment back does not alter the fact that an interest in land has been created or transferred. Were the point free of authority, I would see much force in the contention that such an analysis is over-technical, and I would be attracted to the view that a surrender or assignment back could be a sufficient remedy, at least in most cases, for the purposes of section 146. So far as the authorities are concerned it appears to me that, at least short of the House of Lords, there are two types of breach of covenant which are as a matter of principle incapable of remedy. The first is a covenant against subletting: that is the effect of the reasoning of this court in the Scala House case [1974] QB 575. At least part of the reasoning in the leading judgment of Russell LJ, at p 588, justifying that conclusion is defective, as was explained by O'Connor LJ in the Expert Clothing case [1986] Ch 340, 364e-f in a judgment with which Bristow J agreed (at p 365c). However, as O'Connor LJ also said, the Scala House case is a decision which is binding on this court. In terms of principle (which may not be a wholly safe touchstone in this field) this is, I think, based on the proposition that one cannot, as it were, uncreate an underlease. It therefore appears to me that it should very probably follow that the general assumption that an unlawful assignment also constitutes an irremediable breach is correct. (This would suggest that breach of a covenant against charging a lease is irremediable, which strikes me as arguably unsatisfactory; failure to comply with a covenant to give notice of a charge, a somewhat different breach, is remediable: see the Expert Clothing case at p 355d).

The other type of breach of covenant which is incapable of remedy is a breach involving illegal or immoral use: see Rugby School (Governors) v Tannahill [1935] 1 KB 87 and British Petroleum Pension Trust Ltd v Behrendt [1985] 2 EGLR 97. This has been justified on the basis of illegal or immoral user fixing the premises with some sort of irremovable "stigma", which results in the breach being incapable of remedy. Especially in the light of the provision for damages in section 146, it is not entirely easy to justify this, particularly as it does not appear to apply where the lessee himself does not know of the illegal or immoral user: see Glass v Kencakes Ltd [1966] 1 QB 611. However, in terms of policy there is force in the view that a lessee, who has used premises for an illegal or immoral purpose, should not be able to avoid the risk of forfeiture simply by ceasing that use on being given notice of it, particularly as relief from forfeiture would still be available. Another example, mentioned in the Expert Clothing case [1986] Ch 340, 355a, might be a breach of covenant to insure against damage by fire, where the property burns down before insurance can be effected.

In the Expert Clothing case itself the Court of Appeal held that a covenant to carry out substantial building works was capable of remedy at the time of the service of the section 146 notice, even though the work should have been completed by the date of service and had not even been started. Slade LJ said, at p 357, that breach of a positive covenant could "ordinarily, for practical purposes, be remedied by the thing being actually done". However, the notion that any breach of a negative covenant will be irremediable plainly cannot be right, as is demonstrable by considering an innocuous and innocent breach of a user covenant.

There are three types of classification of covenants. They are (a) positive and negative (relevant to the transmission of the burden of freehold covenants, equitable in origin), (b) continuing and "once and for all" (relevant to waiver of forfeiture, with a common law origin), and (c) remediable and irremediable (relevant for section 146, and thus statutory in origin). These three types of classification are thus for different purposes and have different origins. Attempting to equate one class of one type with one class of a different type is therefore likely to be worse than unhelpful.

Any idea that negative covenants are by their nature irremediable has been put to rest by the decision of this court in Savva v Hussein (1996) 73 P & CR 150. In that case the breach of covenant consisted of carrying out alterations in breach of a covenant not to do so. After quoting the passage I have just cited from the Expert Clothing case, Aldous LJ said, at p 157, that he could "see no reason why similar reasoning should not apply to some negative covenants". He went on to quote with approval of a subsequent passage in Slade LJ's judgment [1986] Ch 340, 358:

> "if the section 146 notice had required the lessee to remedy the breach and the lessors had then allowed a reasonable time to elapse to enable the lessee fully to comply with the relevant covenant, would such compliance, coupled with the payment of any appropriate monetary compensation, have effectively remedied the harm which the lessors had suffered or were likely to suffer from the breach?"

As Aldous LJ, with whom Sir John May agreed, then went on to say 73 P & CR 150, 157: "It is only if the answer to that question is 'no' it can be said that the breach is not capable of being remedied."

In these circumstances it appears to me that, unless there is some binding authority, which either calls into question the conclusion or renders it impermissible, both the plain purpose of section 146(1) and the general principles laid down in two relatively recent decisions in this court, namely the Expert Clothing [1986] Ch 340 and Savva 73 P & CR 150 cases, point strongly to the conclusion that, at least in the absence of special circumstances, a breach of covenant against parting with possession or sharing possession, falling short of creating or transferring of legal interest, are breaches of covenant which are capable of remedy within the meaning of section 146.

The only authority which could be cited to call that conclusion into question is the Scala House case [1974] QB 575 itself, but that does not deter me from my conclusion. First, it was only concerned with underletting; secondly, the reasoning of the leading judgment in the case is, at least in part, demonstrably fallacious and inconsistent with common sense and many other authorities; thirdly, it has been overtaken and marginalised by the Expert Clothing and Savva cases; fourthly, there is no reason of logic or principle why the reasoning or conclusion in the Scala House case should be extended to apply to a breach which falls short of creating a legal interest.

> It is true that Slade LJ said in the Expert Clothing case [1986] Ch 340, 354g that the principle in the Scala House case extends to parting with possession, as well as assigning and underletting. That was an obiter observation, which I do not regard as binding. Bristow J, at p 365c, agreed with Slade LJ's judgment but he also agreed with the judgment of O'Connor LJ who, at p 365a-b, said that the Scala House case, while authority for the proposition that breach of a covenant against underletting was irremediable, was not "authority for any wider proposition". As I have indicated, my present view is an intermediate one. I think that principle and precedent probably require one to go along with Slade LJ and conclude that the Scala House case applies to assigning but, in agreement with O'Connor LJ, I certainly do not see why it extends to parting with (let alone sharing) possession.

Once a valid notice has been served, the tenant must be given a reasonable time to remedy the breach, if it is capable of remedy, or to pay any compensation. A reasonable time will depend primarily on the nature of the breach and the time frame of the dispute, including the remaining residue of the lease.

Slade LJ explained the significance of allowing a reasonable time.

Expert Clothing Service & Sales Ltd v Hillgate House Ltd
[1986] Ch 340. CA

Slade LJ

At 358

> An important purpose of the section 146 procedure is to give even tenants who have hitherto lacked the will or the means to comply with their obligations one last chance to summon up that will or find the necessary means before the landlord re-enters. In considering what "reasonable time" to allow the defendants, the plaintiffs, in serving their section 146 notice, would, in my opinion, have been entitled to take into account the fact that the defendants already had enjoyed 15 months in which to fulfil their contractual obligations to reconstruct and to subject the defendants to a correspondingly tight timetable running from the date of service of the notice, though, at the same time, always bearing in mind that the contractual obligation to reconstruct did not even arise until 29 June 1981, and that as at 8 October 1982 the defendants had been in actual breach of it for only some 10 days. However, I think they were not entitled to say, in effect: "We are not going to allow you any time at all to remedy the breach, because you have had so long to do the work already."

If the tenant does respond to the notice and remedies the breach, the landlord cannot forfeit the lease, even though the tenant's record in performing his or her leasehold obligations has been poor.[79]

Where the breach is incapable of remedy, the landlord must allow the tenant a short period before proceeding to forfeiting the lease; fourteen days is usually considered sufficient time for the tenant to prepare to accept his or her fate or plea for relief.[80]

79 Law Commission Report No 302 Termination of Tenancies for Tenant Default (2006), [1.12.6].

80 Scala House & District Property Co Ltd v Forbes [1974] QB 575, but see Horsey Estates Ltd v Steiger [1899] 2 QB 79.

6.4.5 Peaceful re-entry

The prospect of criminal liability under s 6 of the Criminal Law Act 1977, for forcible entry, or under the Protection from Eviction Act 1977, which prohibits the forfeiture of the lease of an occupied dwelling house other than by court order, discourages landlords from trying to enter peacefully, unless the premises are used for commercial purposes and they are empty. Despite these dangers, there was once an incentive for a landlord to try to re-enter peacefully, because it was believed that the tenant was then unable to apply to the court for relief from forfeiture under s 146(2) of the LPA 1925. The House of Lords held this belief to be erroneous in Billson v Residential Apartments Ltd,[81] a decision that we shall examine in more detail shortly. The decision also reflects a move away from self-help remedies, which have led to proposals for reform that we will examine below.

Gray and Gray, Elements of Land Law (5th edn, 2009, [4.4.25])

> There is nowadays a widespread apprehension that, although forfeiture by actual re-entry remains lawful at common law, it is 'undesirable to encourage landlords to self-help'. The gathering perception can only be intensified by the statutory assimilation of the European Convention guarantee of the right to a 'fair and public hearing' [. . .] The clear trend of modern human rights jurisprudence is to castigate the resort to self-help remedies as 'inimical to a society in which the rule of law prevails'. It is highly unlikely that the landlord's remedy of peaceable re-entry without court order can survive much longer as a general feature of the English law of landlord and tenant.

6.4.6 Relief from forfeiture

The draconian nature of forfeiture is tempered by the tenant's ability to apply for relief from forfeiture. Relief operates to recharacterize forfeiture from a tool of expropriation of the tenant's term to a security for the tenant's performance of the covenants contained in the lease. The rules governing relief are, however, complicated by the interplay between the courts' original equitable jurisdiction to grant relief and subsequent statutory measures. Furthermore, we again see a distinction drawn between different types of breach: namely, a failure to pay rent and breaches of other covenants. There are also differences in the treatment of the original tenant's right to relief and the rights to relief of holders of derivative interests: for example, under-lessees and sub-lessees; mortgagees and chargees.

Relief for non-payment of rent

Equity has long granted relief from forfeiture for non-payment of rent upon payment of the arrears and any costs, provided that it is equitable to grant relief.[82] This jurisdiction is overlain by various statutory measures. The result is 'an intricate maze'[83] of absolute and discretionary rights that differ according to whether the application is made

[81] [1992] 1 AC 494.

[82] Howard v Fanshawe [1895] 2 Ch 581, 588, per Stirling J; Ladup Ltd v William & Glyns Bank plc [1985] 1 WLR 851, 860, per Warner J. This jurisdiction is available for a failure to pay other charges, for example, a service charge, where those charges are expressed to be paid by way of rent: see Escalus Properties Ltd v Robinson [1996] QB 231.

[83] Luxton [1994] JBL 37.

before or after possession is ordered or the landlord has re-entered (whether peacefully or otherwise), and depend upon whether proceedings are brought in the High or county courts.[84]

In the High Court, relief before trial is available under s 212 of the Common Law Procedure Act 1852, which confers an absolute right to relief, and the continuance of the original lease, where the tenant pays the rent arrears and costs before trial. Under s 210 of the 1852 Act, the tenant may also claim similar relief after the hearing, provided that the claim is made within six months of execution of the order for possession. Relief under the 1852 Act is rather bizarrely only available where the rent is at least six months in arrears and there are no goods on the premises that would satisfy a landlord's claim for distress.[85] It is also unavailable where the landlord has re-entered peacefully.

Where proceedings are brought in the county court, s 138(2) of the County Court Act 1984 confers an absolute right to relief where the tenant pays the arrears and costs at least five days before the hearing. Under s 138(3), the court must allow at least four weeks before an order for possession can be executed. This period may be extended.[86] Where the possession order has been executed or where the landlord has re-entered peacefully, the tenant may apply for relief from forfeiture provided that his or her application is made within six months of the date on which the landlord regained physical possession.[87]

Where statutory relief is unavailable, the court's equitable jurisdiction may assist. The manner in which the court will exercise its discretion under its equitable jurisdiction is explained in the following case. Similar considerations apply where the court is exercising its discretion to grant relief under it statutory jurisdiction.[88]

Gill v Lewis
[1956] 2 QB 1, CA

Jenkins LJ

At 13

As to the conclusion of the whole matter, in my view, save in exceptional circumstances, the function of the court in exercising this equitable jurisdiction is to grant relief when all that is due for rent and cost has been paid up, and (in general) to disregard any other causes of complaint that the landlord may have against the tenant. The question is whether, provided all is paid up, the landlord will not have been fully compensated; and the view taken by the court is that is he gets the whole of his rent and costs, then he has got all he is entitled to so far as rent is concerned, and extraneous matters of breach of covenants, and so forth, are generally speaking irrelevant.

Exceptional circumstances may exist where the landlord has, not unreasonably, altered his or her position, or where a third party's interest would be affected.[89] The poor payment record of the tenant is irrelevant.

84 The county court has unlimited jurisdiction in forfeiture and relief proceedings.
85 Billson v Residential Apartments Ltd [1992] 1 AC 494, 529, per Nicholls LJ.
86 County Court Act 1984, s 138(4).
87 Ibid, ss 138(9A) and 139(2). See United Dominions Trust Ltd v Shellpoint Trustees Ltd [1993] 4 All ER 310.
88 Howard v Fanshawe [1895] 2 Ch 581 and Lovelock v Margo [1963] 2 QB 786.
89 See Gill v Lewis [1956] 2 QB 1, 9–10, per Jenkins LJ, referring to Stanhope v Haworth (1886) 3 TLR 34.

Where relief is granted after completion of forfeiture, whether by possession order or the landlord's peaceful re-entry, the lease will be restored and the landlord placed in the same position as if there had been no forfeiture.[90]

Relief from breach of other covenants

A tenant's right to relief, from a right of re-entry based upon a breach of the other covenants contained in the lease, is governed by s 146(2) of the LPA 1925.

Law of Property Act 1925, s 146(2)

Where a lessor is proceeding, by action or otherwise, to enforce such a right of re-entry or forfeiture, the lessee may, in the lessor's action, if any, or in any action brought by himself, apply to the court for relief; and the court may grant or refuse relief, as the court, having regard to the proceedings and conduct of the parties under the foregoing provisions of this section, and to all the other circumstances, thinks fit; and in case of relief may grant it on such terms, if any, as to costs, expenses, damages, compensation, penalty, or otherwise, including the granting of an injunction to restrain any like breach in the future, as the court, in the circumstances of each case, thinks fit.

The right to relief is available where the landlord has entered peacefully,[91] but not where the landlord has entered into possession pursuant to a court order. In the latter case, the tenant must apply for relief during the possession proceedings.

Billson v Residential Apartments Ltd
[1992] 1 AC 494, HL

Facts: In breach of covenant, Residential Apartments had made substantial alterations to the property without the written permission of Billson as landlord. Billson served notice under s 146(1) and, fourteen days later, at 6 a.m., peaceably re-entered the premises before workmen of Residential Apartments retook possession four hours later. At the centre of the dispute was whether Residential Apartments could apply for relief under s 146(2) of the 1925 Act.

Lord Templeman

At 535

Mr. Reid submitted and referred to authority for the proposition that on the true construction of section 146(2) a tenant cannot apply for relief against forfeiture after the landlord has re-entered without obtaining a court order. Thereafter the landlord is no longer "proceeding" to enforce his rights; he has succeeded in enforcing them. The proposition is in my opinion historically unsound because the effect of issuing and serving a writ is precisely the same as 90 Bland v Ingrams Estates Ltd [2001] EWCA Civ 1088, [13]–[15].

91 In Billson v Residential Apartments (No 2) [1993] EGCS 155, the court warned that it may be more disposed to grant relief where landlords have entered peacefully without the sanction of a court order for possession.

the effect of re-entry; in each case the lease is determined. The landlord is entitled to remain in possession if he has re-entered and he is entitled to possession if he has issued and served a writ because the lease no longer exists. In each case the tenant seeks relief because the lease has been forfeited. The proposition is also inconsistent with the language of section 146(2). The tenant may apply for relief where the landlord is "proceeding, by action or otherwise" to enforce his rights. The tenant may apply for relief where the landlord is "proceeding" by action and also where the landlord is proceeding "otherwise" than by action. This can only mean that the tenant may apply for relief where the landlord is proceeding to forfeit by re-entry after the expiry of a section 146 notice. If re-entry bars relief, the right of the tenant to apply for relief where the landlord is proceeding otherwise than by action is substantially inoperative and the words "or otherwise" in section 146(2) have no application. In my opinion those words must have been included because Parliament intended that a tenant should be able to obtain relief against a landlord whether the landlord has asserted his rights by a writ or by re-entering. It is said that a tenant served with a section 146 notice could during and after the expiration of the notice apply for relief under section 146(2) but if he fails to do so he is at the mercy of the landlord who decides to re-enter and whose rights are therefore, it is said, quite unaffected by the provisions of section 146(2) designed to relieve tenants from the consequences of breach of covenant. In my opinion the ambiguous words "is proceeding" can mean "proceeds" and should not be construed so as to produce the result that a tenant served with a section 146 notice can only ensure that he will be able to apply for relief if he does so before he knows whether or not the landlord intends to proceed at all or whether, if the landlord decides to proceed, he will issue and serve a writ or will attempt to re-enter.

When a tenant receives a section 146 notice he will not know whether the landlord can be persuaded that there is no breach or persuaded to accept in due course that any breach has been remedied and that he has been offered adequate and satisfactory compensation or whether the landlord will seek to determine the lease by issuing and serving a writ or will seek to determine the lease by re-entering the premises. The tenant will not wish to institute proceedings seeking relief from forfeiture if those proceedings will be aggressive and hostile and may be premature and unnecessary. Parliament cannot have intended that if the landlord employs the civilised method of determining the lease by issuing and serving a writ, then the tenant will be entitled to apply for relief, but if the landlord employs the dubious and dangerous method of determining the lease by re-entering the premises, then the tenant will be debarred from applying for relief.

Mr. Reid concedes that re-entry can only avail the landlord if the entry is lawful. Re-entry is unlawful where the premises are occupied by the tenant but not unlawful where the premises are occupied by the tenant's goods. If the argument of the landlords is correct, section 146 provides a method by which a landlord can sneak up on a shop at night, break into the shop, and install new locks so that the tenant loses his lease and can only press his nose against the shop window being unable to obtain the assistance of the court because he has become a trespasser entitled to no rights and to no relief. The farce in the present case when the landlords occupied the premises for four hours should not be allowed to defeat the statutory rights of the tenants.

The right conferred by section 146(2) on a tenant to apply for relief against forfeiture may without violence to the language, be construed as a right to apply "where a lessor proceeds, by action or otherwise" to enforce a right of re-entry. So construed, section 146(2) enables the tenant to apply for relief whenever and however the landlord claims that the lease has been determined for breach of covenant. I have no doubt that this was the object and intention and is the effect of section 146.

[His Lordship considered past authorities, which suggested the contrary conclusion, but which he held had not decided the point in issue.]

My Lords, I accept that it is now settled law that a tenant cannot apply for relief after the landlord has recovered judgment for possession and has re-entered in reliance on that judgment. But I do not accept that any court has deprived or is entitled to deprive a tenant of any right to apply for relief if the landlord proceeds to forfeit otherwise than by an action instituted for that purpose [. . .]

The landlords or their advisers, perhaps incensed by the activities of the tenants in the present case, conceived and carried out a dawn raid which fortunately did not result in bloodshed. Since the decision of the Court of Appeal in the instant case there has been a proliferation of section 146 notices followed by pressure on tenants to surrender on terms favourable to the landlord. If this appeal were not allowed, the only safe advice for a tenant would be to issue proceedings for relief against forfeiture as soon as a section 146 notice is received at a time when the tenant cannot know whether relief will be necessary. A tenant ignorant of the development in the law pioneered by the landlords in the present case will be at the mercy of an aggressive landlord. The conclusions which I have reached will not entail these consequences and will not again involve Parliament in correcting judicial constructions of statute by further legislation.

The results of section 146 and the authorities are as follows. A tenant may apply for appropriate declarations and for relief from forfeiture under section 146(2) after the issue of a section 146 notice but he is not prejudiced if he does not do so. A tenant cannot apply for relief after a landlord has forfeited a lease by issuing and serving a writ, has recovered judgment and has entered into possession pursuant to that judgment. If the judgment is set aside or successfully appealed the tenant will be able to apply for relief in the landlord's action but the court in deciding whether to grant relief will take into account any consequences of the original order and repossession and the delay of the tenant. A tenant may apply for relief after a landlord has forfeited by re-entry without first obtaining a court order for that purpose but the court in deciding whether to grant relief will take into account all the circumstances, including delay, on the part of the tenant. Any past judicial observations which might suggest that a tenant is debarred from applying for relief after the landlord has re-entered without first obtaining a court order for that purpose are not to be so construed.

Given this interpretation of s 146(2) of the LPA 1925, it was unnecessary for the House of Lords to consider whether the subsection provided a complete statutory code or whether there was a residual equitable jurisdiction to grant relief to a tenant from a breach of covenant, other than to pay rent. The majority of the Court of Appeal in Billson had decided that s 146(2) was a complete statutory code. The question remains significant to the holder of a derivative interest seeking relief under s 146(4), which we will consider below.

The court's jurisdiction to grant relief is wide and unfettered.[92] All of the circumstances of the case are to be considered, but particularly significant are the gravity of the breach, the conduct of the parties, the question of whether or not the breach can be remedied, and the disparity between the loss caused to the landlord by the breach and the loss caused to the tenant should the lease be forfeited.[93] Relief will rarely be granted where the breach is intentional or cannot be remedied, unless the breach is trivial and the damage to the landlord's

[92] Rose v Hyman [1912] AC 623, 631.

[93] See Ropemaker Properties Ltd v Noonhaven Ltd [1989] 2 EGLR 50, in which relief was granted, even though the breach was serious, because the financial loss to the tenants would be out of proportion to the loss suffered by the landlords.

reversion insignificant.[94] Here, we thus see an interface with the question of whether or not a breach can be remedied for the purposes of a s 146(1) notice.

Relief and derivative interests

We have already noted that the forfeiture of a lease will also extinguish interests that are carved out of that lease: namely, underleases (of the whole of the lease premises), subleases (of part of the leased premises), mortgages, and charges. It is thus important that persons holding such interests are also able to claim relief. There is a confusing array of possibilities.

The primary jurisdiction is found in s 146(4) of the LPA 1925, which provides a right for under-lessees and sub-lessees, mortgagees and legal chargees,[95] to apply for relief against forfeiture based upon a breach of a covenant, both to pay rent and other covenants. Equitable chargees are excluded.[96]

Law of Property Act 1925, s 146(4)

Where a lessor is proceeding by action or otherwise to enforce a right of re-entry or forfeiture under any covenant, proviso, or stipulation in a lease, or for non-payment of rent, the court may, on application by any person claiming as under-lessee any estate or interest in the property comprised in the lease or any part thereof, either in the lessor's action (if any) or in any action brought by such person for that purpose, make an order vesting, for the whole term of the lease or any less term, the property comprised in the lease or any part thereof in any person entitled as under-lessee to any estate or interest in such property upon such conditions as to execution of any deed or other document, payment of rent, costs, expenses, damages, compensation, giving security, or otherwise, as the court in the circumstances of each case may think fit, but in no case shall any such under-lessee be entitled to require a lease to be granted to him for any longer term than he had under his original sub-lease.

A successful application will result in the grant of a new lease held directly from the head landlord. Where relief is grant to a mortgagee, the expectation is that the new lease will be held on the same terms as the original lease. Where relief is grant to an under-lessee or sublessee, the new lease cannot exceed the length of the original term and where a sublease is in issue, the new sublease will also be limited to the relevant part of the premises.[97] If there is a difference in rental between the head and under/sublease, the higher rental will prevail.[98] The courts' discretion is exercised in a similar manner to relief granted under s 146(2), with an expectation that the breach will be remedied.[99] The court may also be circumspect in imposing upon the landlord a tenant that he or she has not chosen.

A derivative interest holder may also apply for relief from forfeiture based upon a breach of a covenant other than to pay rent under s 146(2), which we considered above.[100] The right is based upon the definition of 'lessee' found in s 146(5)(b).

94 See Central Estates (Belgravia) Ltd v Woolgar (No 2) [1972] 1 WLR 1048, Van Haarlam v Kasner (1992) 64 P & CR 214 and Patel v K&J Restaurants Ltd [2010] EWCA Civ 1211.

95 Grand Junction Co Ltd v Bates [1954] 2 QB 160.

96 Bland v Ingram Estates Ltd (No 2) [2002] Ch 177.

97 Cadogan v Dimovic [1984] 1 WLR 609.

98 Ewart v Fryer [1901] 1 Ch 499.

99 Hill v Griffin [1987] 1 EGLR 81.

100 Escalus Properties Ltd v Robinson [1996] QB 231.

Law of Property Act 1925, s 146(5)

(5) For the purposes of this section [. . .]

(b) "Lessee" includes an original or derivative under-lessee, and the persons deriving title under a lessee; also a grantee under any such grant as aforesaid and the persons deriving title under him;

[. . .]

The difference between relief granted under s 146(2) and the general ground in s 146(4) is that, under s 146(2), the existing lease will continue, whilst under s 146(4), a new lease is granted.

Relief from the breach of a covenant to pay rent is also available to a the holder of a derivative interest under the provisions of the Common Law Procedure Act 1852 and the County Court Act 1984, considered above.

Where the court is persuaded to exercise its jurisdiction to grant relief, the expectation is that the breaches will be made good in respect of the affected premises.[101]

Despite these various statutory routes to relief, there are still gaps. It is thought that the approach adopted in Billson will also apply to applications for relief by the holders of derivative interests, whether under s 146(2) or (4). Accordingly, the right will be lost where the landlord has obtained possession pursuant to a court order, although not where the landlord has entered peacefully. This possibility presents a real danger to lenders who, not being in possession, may well be unaware of the head landlord's proceedings. Equitable chargees also fall through the safety net provided by s 146(2) and (4), and the Common Law Procedure Act 1852. Equitable chargees can rely upon the county court jurisdiction, or, alternatively, may insist that the tenant asserts his or her right to relief in order to protect the security.[102]

These statutory gaps in the relief available to holders of derivative interests might be plugged if resort can be made to the courts' equitable jurisdiction. We have noted that the court has long exercised an equitable jurisdiction that provides relief from a breach of covenant to pay rent. The ability of the court to grant relief from forfeiture based upon breach of another covenant was doubted until the House of Lords decision in Shiloh Spinners Ltd v Harding.[103] But the House, whilst holding that such an inherent equitable jurisdiction did exist, indicated that the jurisdiction would not prevail where Parliament has made statutory provision covering the particular case. The question thus turns upon whether s 146 provides a complete statutory code. As we have already noted, the Lords in Billson did not provide an answer to this question.[104]

Rexhaven Ltd v Nurse[105] raises one further possibility for the derivative interest holder where the landlord has executed a possession order against the tenant—that is, to apply to have the possession order set aside on the basis that he or she has a good claim to relief, which he or she has been unable to present to the court, for example, because of his or her ignorance of the possession proceedings.

[101] Chatham Empire Theatres (1955) Ltd v Ultrans Ltd [1961] 1 WLR 817.

[102] Bland v Ingrams Estates Ltd [2001] Ch 767.

[103] [1973] AC 691.

[104] The Court of Appeal in Billson had reluctantly concluded that s 146 was a complete code, per Lord Browne Wilkinson VC [1991] 3 WLR 264, 279. See also Official Custodian for Charities v Parway Estates Development Ltd [1984] 3 WLR 525. There is conflicting first instance authority to the contrary in Abbey National Building Society v Maybeech [1985] Ch 190, which was heard at the same time, but without reference to Parway.

[105] (1995) 28 HLR 241.

6.4.7 Reform

It should come as no surprise that there have long been calls for reform of the law governing forfeiture. The Law Commission first mooted reform in 1968,[106] although it was not until 1985 that its first report on the question was published.[107] Implementation of these proposals was delayed by other projects and developments—most notably, title registration, the HRA 1998, and changes to the civil procedure rules—but, in 2006, a further report was issued.[108]

The proposals are to replace the existing forfeiture schemes for non-payment of rent and breaches of other covenants with a single scheme for the termination of leases based upon any relevant default by the tenant. This scheme is outlined in the Executive Summary to the report.

Law Commission Report No 303, Termination of Tenancies for Tenant Default: Executive Summary (2006, [1.9]–[1.24])

Tenant default

The scheme introduces a new concept of "tenant default" to define the circumstances in which a landlord may seek to terminate the tenancy before the end of its term. In simple terms, tenant default is a breach by the tenant of a covenant or condition of the tenancy. There is no need for a forfeiture clause or right of re-entry to be included in a tenancy agreement entered into post implementation, although the tenant should be given an "explanatory statement" explaining what can happen in the event of tenant default.

It is open to the parties to agree that the breach of one or more covenants will not comprise tenant default and so exclude or limit the application of the scheme. It is no longer possible for the landlord to "waive" the breach (either intentionally or inadvertently).

Tenant default notice

The scheme requires the landlord wishing to proceed to warn the tenant of the impending action by giving a written notice. The tenant default notice must set out the details of the breach, any remedial action required and the date by which it should be completed. The scheme limits the period after a tenant default during which a tenant can be served with a tenant default notice.

The tenant default notice must also be served on those who hold qualifying interests deriving out of the tenancy of which the landlord has knowledge (principally mortgagees and sub-tenants).

The primary purpose of the tenant default notice is to ensure that the tenant complies with the obligations under the tenancy. It can also provide a period for negotiation by the parties. For a minimum period of seven days, or until the date for remedy set out in the notice expires, the landlord cannot take any further steps in the process that might culminate in the termination of the tenancy.

106 Law Commission Working Paper No 16 (1968).

107 Law Commission Report No 142, Forfeiture of Tenancies (1985).

108 Law Commission Report No 303, Termination of Tenancies for Tenant Default (2006), following the favourable response to its Consultation Paper No 174 (2004).

Making a termination claim

If the service of a tenant default notice fails in its primary purpose, the landlord may make a termination claim. The claim is served on the tenant and on all qualifying interest holders who have previously been served with a tenant default notice.

The orders available to the court

Once the court is satisfied that the tenant default has occurred, it may make such order that it thinks appropriate and proportionate in all the circumstances. In arriving at this decision the court is required to take into account a number of considerations. These include the conduct of the landlord and the tenant, whether any action can be or has been taken to remedy the default and whether the deadline by which it was to be remedied was reasonable.

A termination order ends the tenancy and any interests deriving out of it on a date specified in the order.

A remedial order will set out what the tenant must do to remedy the default and the date by which it must be remedied. The order does not affect the continued existence of the tenancy. It stays the landlord's claim for a termination order for a period of three months from the day by which the tenant is required to have carried out the work. During that period the landlord can apply to lift the stay and proceed with the termination claim. On lifting the stay, the court may make any order available to it, including a termination order.

An order for sale requires that the tenancy is sold and the proceeds distributed. This may be appropriate where the tenancy has a significant capital value and a termination order would provide a disproportionate windfall to the landlord.

There are two orders that can only be sought by qualifying interest holders. The first is the transfer order. This requires the tenancy to be transferred to the applicant or a third party (for example, a tenants' management company). The second is the new tenancy order which grants the applicant a new tenancy of all or part of the demised premises [...]

[...]

Summary termination procedure

The scheme provides an alternative procedure under which the landlord can bring a tenancy to an end without applying to the court. It is intended for use in cases where the tenant would have no realistic prospect of resisting a termination order or where premises have been abandoned. The procedure cannot be used concurrently with the court-based procedure; the landlord must elect which route to take.

The procedure cannot be used where (1) someone is lawfully residing in the premises, (2) the unexpired term exceeds 25 years, or (3) the tenancy was granted for a term in excess of seven years and there are three or more years unexpired, and the default is breach of a repairing covenant.

The procedure is commenced by service of a summary termination notice and operates to bring the tenancy and all interests deriving out of it to an end one month after the notice is served. However, the tenant or any qualifying interest holder can resist the summary termination by applying to court to discharge the notice. This application suspends the termination of the tenancy until it has been decided. The landlord must rebut the presumption that the notice should be discharged by showing that, on a termination claim being made, the tenant would have no realistic prospect of persuading the court not to make a termination order and that there is no other reason why the matter should be disposed of by way of a hearing of a termination claim.

For six months after summary termination of a tenancy, the former tenant (or a former qualifying interest holder) can apply to court for a "post-termination order". This may be any order in connection with the tenancy that the court thinks appropriate and proportionate and includes the grant of a new tenancy to the applicant or the payment of compensation. However, the court cannot in any circumstances revive the terminated tenancy.

QUESTIONS

1. Explain what we mean by 'privity of estate'? Why does a sub-lessee fall outside the privity of estate matrix of the head lease and does this matter?
2. Why is the contractual liability of the original parties to a long lease unfair? How does the Landlord and Tenant (Covenants) Act 1995 address the problem? In any event, did this contractual liability present so much of a problem for long leases of flats?
3. Is it easier for the benefit and burden of a tenant's and landlord's covenants to pass in a post-1995 lease than in a pre-1996 lease?
4. The Landlord and Tenants (Covenants) Act 1995 abandons the concepts of a covenant 'touching and concerning', and 'having reference to the subject matter' of the lease. Is it sensible for it to do so?
5. How draconian a remedy is forfeiture?
6. Why does a 'twilight period' occur during the process of forfeiture?
7. Can a negative leasehold covenant be remedied?
8. Is there any role for equity's inherent jurisdiction to provide relief from forfeiture or does the statutory right to relief provided by s 146 of the Law of Property Act 1925 provide a complete code?

FURTHER READING

Bridge, 'Former Tenants, Future Liabilities and the Privity of Contract Principle' (1996) 55 CLJ 313

Clarke, 'Property Law' (1992) 45(1) CLP 81

Davey, 'Privity of Contract and Leases: Reform at Last' (1996) 59 MLR 78

Gravells, 'Forfeiture of Leases for Breach of Covenant' [2006] JBL 830

Law Commission Report No 174, Landlord and Tenant Law: Privity of Contract and Estate (1988)

Law Commission Report No 303, Termination of Tenancies for Tenant Default (2006)

Luxton, 'Waiver of Forfeiture: Time to Shake Away the Doctrine of Election' [1991] JBL 34

PART G

NEIGHBOURS AND NEIGHBOURHOODS

25

EASEMENTS

CENTRAL ISSUES

1. An easement is the proprietary right to enjoy limited use of the land of another, which may exist in both positive and negative form.
2. The defining characteristics of an easement are: (i) there must be a dominant and a servient tenement; (ii) each of the tenements must be in separate occupation; (iii) the easement must accommodate the dominant tenement; and (iv) the easement must be capable of being the subject matter of a grant.
3. Easements may be created by express, implied, or presumed grant.
4. An implied grant of an easement may arise: (i) by necessity; (ii) by common intention; (iii) under the rule in Wheeldon v Burrows;[1] or (iv) by the operation of s 62 of the Law of Property Act 1925.
5. A grant of an easement may be presumed by prescription as a result of long user as of right either at common law, or under the doctrine of lost modern grant or the Prescription Act 1832.
6. The status of easements as overriding interests presents a challenge to a complete register, which has been addressed by the Land Registration Act 2002.
7. An easement may be extinguished by common ownership of the dominant and servient land, by release, by abandonment, or by excessive user (in extreme cases).

1 INTRODUCTION

1.1 WHAT ARE EASEMENTS?

An easement is the right of a landowner to enjoy limited use of the land of another landowner.[2] There is thus a need for two pieces of land: the dominant land, to which the right is attached, and the servient land, over which the right is exercised and which must thus suffer the burden of the right. In England and Wales, easements are very common. Land Registry

[1] (1879) 12 LR Ch D 31.

[2] See Chapter 4, sections 5 and 6.

figures reveal that 65 per cent of existing registered freehold titles and 24 per cent of existing registered leasehold titles are subject to an easement.[3]

Easements may be positive or negative in nature. A positive easement will allow the owner of the dominant land to go onto the servient land to use some facility. The most common positive easement is a right of way to use a path or road on the servient land. A negative easement is a right to receive something from the servient land: for example, a right to receive light or air flowing from the servient land. It is negative in nature both because the dominant owner is not entitled to do anything over the servient land, and because the servient owner is not permitted to interfere with the right.

Easements are proprietary rights that exist for a defined estate.[4] They are thus capable of accruing to the benefit of purchasers of the dominant land and will bind purchasers of the servient land.[5] In this respect, they differ from licences, which, as mere gratuitous or contractual permissions, allow a person to use another's land without committing a trespass, but will only bind the parties personally.[6] We saw, in Chapters 4 and 5, that the boundary between personal and proprietary rights is strictly patrolled and that only rights over the land of another that display certain characteristics are accepted as easements. Those that fail to display these characteristics may operate as licences.

We will confine our attention in this chapter to easements, but easements sit within a range of other limited rights over the land of another. There are a number of public rights that are not dependent on owning land: for example, we all have a right to use the public highways and many will gain access to their properties directly from a public road.[7] The utility companies enjoy 'way-leaves' granted by statute to run the services that they provide over land in order to supply mains gas, electricity, water, and sewage services.[8] Landowners may also claim the benefit of natural rights of support from neighbouring land and, where appropriate, the right to water flowing naturally in a river or stream. Profits à prendre are private rights to take the natural produce from another's land: for example, the right to fish or take game. Profits are very similar to easements, save that they do not have to be connected with the use of any dominant land, but may be held purely for the benefit of a particular individual. In our next chapter, we will be looking at restrictive covenants, which can operate negatively to regulate the user of land for the benefit of adjacent land. As such, they are similar to easements—particularly negative easements.

In this chapter, we will examine the defining characteristics of easements, before looking at how they operate as proprietary interests in terms of their mode of creation, their effect on third parties, and the manner in which they may be extinguished. Before we do so, however, we should note the underlying concerns that have shaped the law governing easements.

[3] See Law Commission Consultation Paper No 186, Easements, Covenants and Profits à Prendre (2008, Appendix A). This percentage is based upon statistics for the years 2003–4 and 2004–5.

[4] To exist at law, an easement must be held for a freehold or leasehold estate. An easement for life can only exist in equity.

[5] See section 4 below. [6] See Chapter 21.

[7] The public also has rights of access to certain commons: see Law of Property Act 1925, s 193; the Countryside and Rights of Way Act 2000 now confers rights of public access to some areas of private land.

[8] For example, under the Water Industry Act 1991, Electricity Act 1989, Gas Act 1986, and Telecommunications Act 1984.

1.2 THE UTILITY BALANCE

Easements have a long history. They were known to medieval lawyers, but their essential characteristics remained rudimentary until the nineteenth century, when easements became increasingly prominent as a result of the agricultural and industrial revolutions that underpin much of our modern way of life.[9] It is no coincidence that it was in 1839 that Gale wrote an influential book on easements, which remains the leading text today.[10]

Gardner explains the reason why the nineteenth century saw a growth in the importance of easements when, to maximize its economic utility, communally owned land was divided into smaller areas of individual ownership. These imperatives remain relevant today as the intensity of land use continues to grow.

Gardner, Introduction to Land Law (2009, p 157–8)

> Division into sealed packets has a great merit: at a basic level, it gives the owner of each packet the maximum opportunity and incentive to exploit his own packet to the full. But a given packet of land may in practice not be self sufficient in the things required for its optimal exploitation. It may lack efficient access for example. Greater benefit can be extracted by running the land in question co-operatively with neighbouring packets, from which additional requirements can be sourced [. . .]
>
> The English law of easements thus developed most during the 19th century. During the first three quarters of that century, English agricultural land was being divided into sealed packets, in a process known as 'enclosure'. Previously, the land had been operated much more communally. Enclosure was born of a realisation that the old communal approach impeded the land's maximum exploitation. But easements were developed out of a realisation, in turn, that even greater exploitation was possible if one could have it both ways. At about the same period, too, intensive building was taking place, centred on the mills, factories and so on which were perceived as the most effective tools by which to exploit downstream resources. Maximum intensity was achieved by introducing easements to allow the collaborative use of neighbouring plots of land.
>
> Care is needed, however. Cross-exploitation does harm as well as good for it erodes the benefits to be had from dividing land into sealed packets. The less my land becomes simply 'mine' because there are obligations such as easements affecting its use, the further I shall be from having the maximum opportunity and incentive to exploit it, by growing crops myself, or building houses, or whatever. So the establishment of easements needs to be restricted to the situations in which sealed packets does more good than harm. The law does this by rules that limit the forms of benefit that can be associated with easements, favouring those that are traditional, ordinary, agricultural, and as a matter of business rather than recreation, and its rule limiting easements to rights that do not deprive me of 'any reasonable use' of my land.

As Gardner highlights, there is a need to balance the benefit of exploiting the dominant land against the burden placed upon the servient land. This balance is central in determining what characteristics a right must satisfy to qualify as an easement.

9 See Holdsworth, Historical Introduction to the Land Law (1927), p 265.
10 Now in its 18th edition: see Gale on Easements (eds Gaunt and Morgan, 2008).

A further balance that must be struck is between the desirability of implying an easement to promote utility and the conveyancing problems that arise where such rights are difficult to trace. This question was in minds of the architects of the Land Registration Act 2002 (LRA 2002) and we will consider their solution later in the chapter.[11]

2 THE CONTENT QUESTION

The leading case of Re Ellenborough Park summarizes the essential characteristics of an easement.

Re Ellenborough Park [1956] Ch 131, CA

Facts: Ellenborough Park is a development of houses surrounding a park. Each house was sold together with the right to full enjoyment of the park. During the Second World War, the park was requisitioned and a dispute arose as to who was entitled to the resulting compensation. It was held that the house owners' right to use the park was an easement, because it satisfied the legal characteristics of an easement, and so they were entitled to share the compensation.

Evershed MR

At 163

For the purposes of the argument before us Mr Cross and Mr Goff were content to adopt, as correct, the four characteristics formulated in Dr Cheshire's Modern Real Property 7th ed pp456 et seq. They are (1) there must be a dominant tenement and a servient tenement: (2) an easement must "accommodate" the dominant tenement: (3) dominant and servient owners must be different persons, and (4) a right over land cannot amount to an easement, unless it is capable of forming the subject matter of a grant.

We will use these four characteristics as our guide to explore the characteristics of easements, although we will look at them in a slightly different order.

2.1 'THERE MUST BE A DOMINANT TENEMENT AND A SERVIENT TENEMENT'

There must be two pieces of land: the servient tenement, over which the right is exercised, and the dominant tenement, which benefits from the right.

2.1.1 Should we have easements in gross?

In some jurisdictions, it is possible for there only to be a servient tenement, over which the right is exercised by a person who is not required to be the owner of any land. The easement is then said to exist in gross. English law accepts the possibility that profits may exist in gross and statutory way-leaves confer what are, in effect, easements in gross. For example, service suppliers, such as the gas, electricity, water, and telephone infrastructure companies, enjoy way-leaves to run their pipes and wires over and under land to maintain the national supply of these services.

11 See section 4 below.

Sturley has argued that easements in gross should also be permitted in English law.[12] He believes that the requirement for a dominant tenement is 'without authority or justification',[13] and that the arguments against easements in gross, in terms of imposing a potentially excessive or unjustified burden on the servient tenement, can be overcome.

Sturley, 'Easements in Gross' (1980) 96 LQR 557

At 562

Though no justification is given against the rule against easements in gross in the cases which establish it, it may nevertheless be possible to justify it after the fact. Two possibilities, both of which are suggested by nineteenth century cases, should be considered. The first, which may be labelled the "surcharge argument," holds that an easement in gross, not being limited to the needs of the dominant tenement is likely to burden the servient tenement with excessive use. The second and somewhat more convincing, which may be labelled the "clogs on title argument," holds that an easement in gross is likely to be an unjustified incumbrance on the title of the servient tenement [...]

At 563

Certainly surcharge concerns are genuine, but they should not be overemphasised. Though not limited by reference to the dominant tenement, an easement in gross would still be limited by the terms of its grant [...] Possibilities of surcharge have long existed, both in profits and easements, but there have not been problems sufficient to justify the total prohibition of the interests. It seems the same should be true of easements in gross [...]

The clogs on title argument may be seen as an underlying rationale of Keppel v Bailey and Hill v Tupper where it was decided that novel rights cannot be annexed to land. The concern in both cases, however, is the type of right held rather than the means of holding it, and thus they properly relate to Cheshire's fourth characteristic of an easement, the subject matter of a grant. With respect to easements in gross the argument suggests not that anything is wrong with the right, per se, but that the owner in gross may be difficult to discover, thus making any right an unjustified clog on title when held in gross [...]

At 566

A solution, it seems, is to be found in the Land Charges Act [1972 or Land Registration Act 2002] scheme. If an easement in gross has to be registered, it is not very different from an appurtenant easement from the point of view of the clogs on title argument.

The Law Commission has considered whether, as a matter of policy, easements in gross should be permitted, but, whilst acknowledging the arguments made by Sturley, its view is that the requirement for a dominant tenement should not be relaxed.[14] To do so would also 12 See also McClean, 'The Nature of an Easement' (1996) 5 West LR 32, 36–42.

13 Sturley, 'Easements in Gross' (1980) 96 LQR 557, 568.
14 Law Commission Consultation Paper No 186 (2008), [3.16].

require a rethink of the fundamental need for an easement to accommodate the dominant tenement.[15]

2.1.2 The need to identify the dominant tenement

The extent of the dominant land must be clearly established at the time that the easement is granted.

London & Blenheim Estates Ltd v Ladbroke Retail Parks Ltd
[1994] 1 WLR 31, CA

Facts: Leicestershire Co-op sold part of its land (the dominant land) to London & Blenheim, together with the right to park cars on land retained by the Co-op (the servient land). The agreement also included a provision that, in the event of London & Blenheim acquiring additional land, it should be entitled to give notice to the Co-op for that additional land (the alleged additional dominant land) to acquire similar parking rights. Before any notice was given, the servient land came into the ownership of Ladbrooke. London & Blenheim failed in its claim to a right to park for the benefit of the additional land that it had acquired, because, at the time that the servient land was sold by the Co-op, the alleged dominant land was not adequately identified.

Peter Gibson LJ

At 37

If one asks why the law should require that there should be a dominant tenement before there can be a grant, or a contract for the grant, of an easement sufficient to create an interest in land binding successors in title to the servient land, the answer would appear to lie in the policy against encumbering land with burdens of a uncertain extent. As was said by Fox LJ in Ashburn Ansalt v Arnold [1989] 1 Ch 26, "In matters relating to the title to land, certainty is of prime importance." A further related answer lies in the reluctance of the law to recognise new forms of burden on property conferring more than contractual rights. Thus in Ackroyd v Smith (1850) 10 CB 164, 188 Cresswell J., giving judgment of the judges of Common Pleas, after referring to the impossibility of a grant of a right of way in gross said "nor can the owner of the land render it subject to a new species of burden, so as to bind it in the hands of an assignee." "Incidents of a novel kind cannot be devised, and attached to property, at the fancy and caprice of any owner:" per Lord Brougham LC in Keppel v Bailey (1834) 2 Myl & K 517. A right intended as an easement and attached to a servient tenement before the dominant tenement is identified would in my view be an incident of a novel kind.

2.1.3 The rule in Harris v Flower[16]

A dominant owner, who acquires additional land adjacent to or close by the dominant land, may wish to use the easement that he or she enjoys for the benefit of that additional land. In general, he or she will be unable to do so without committing a trespass to the servient land.

[15] See also Lawson, 'Easements' in Land Law: Issues, Debates, Policy (ed Tee, 2002), p 71.
[16] (1904) 74 LJ Ch 127.

This prohibition is known as the 'rule in Harris v Flower', outlined by Romer LJ in the case of the same name as: '[I]f a right of way be granted for the enjoyment of Close A, the grantee because he owns or acquires Close B cannot use the way in substance for passing over the Close A to Close B [. . .]'[17]

Harris v Flower envisages the additional land being adjacent to the dominant land, so it is necessary to pass from the servient land to access the dominant land and then over the dominant land to access the additional land. Whilst it is perfectly acceptable for the dominant owner to use the right of way to access the dominant land, his or her use of the right of way will become unacceptable if he or she uses it to gain access to the additional land. The situation may be represented as in Figure 19.

Figure 19 Harris v Flower: Situation 1

An alternative situation may arise where the additional land does not lie beyond the dominant land, but to the side, or close by: there is then no need for the dominant owner to pass over the dominant land to gain access to the servient land. The situation may be represented as in Figure 20.

Figure 20 Harris v Flower: Situation 2

This is what happened in Das v Linden Mews,[18] in which mews houses in London enjoyed a right of way along a privately owned street. Two of the owners acquired ground at the end of the street on which to park their cars. The owners of the street (the servient land) successful argued that the rule in Harris v Flower prohibited the house owners from exercising the right of way attached to their house to drive along the street to the land that they had acquired for parking.

The rationale for the rule lies in keeping within the terms of the easement, rather than excessive use of the servient land.

17 Ibid, 127.

18 [2002] EWCA Civ 590, [2003] 2 P & CR 4.

Peacock v Custins
[2002] 1 WLR 1815, CA

Facts: Peacock owned a field ('the red land', i.e. the dominant land), which was accessed by a right of way over land owned by Custins ('the yellow strip', i.e. the servient land). Peacock also owned another field adjacent to the dominant land ('the blue land'), but he failed to prove that he could use his right of way over the servient land once or twice a year to access the additional field.

Schiebsmann LJ

At [25]

Considering the position as a matter of principle, we would consider that the defendants are entitled to the declaration that they seek. In our judgment the authorities to which we have referred, and in particular Harris v Flower (1904) 74 LJ Ch 127, also confirm that, where a court is being asked to declare whether the right to use a way comprises a right to use it to facilitate the cultivation of land other than the dominant tenement, the court is not concerned with any comparison between the amount of use made or to be made of the servient tenement and the amount of use made or that might lawfully be made within the scope of the grant. It is concerned with declaring the scope of the grant, having regard to its purposes and the identity of the dominant tenement. The authorities indicate that the burden on the owner of the servient tenement is not to be increased without his consent. But burden in this context does not refer to the number of journeys or the weight of the vehicles. Any use of the way is, in contemplation of law, a burden and one must ask whether the grantor agreed to the grantee making use of the way for that purpose [. . .]

At [27]

It is in our judgment clear that the grantor did not authorise the use of the way for the purpose of cultivating the blue land. This cannot sensibly be described as ancillary to the cultivation of the red land. We therefore allow the appeal and declare that the claimants are not entitled to use the yellow strip for the purpose of obtaining access to the blue land in order to cultivate it.

It has to be remembered that the dominant owner is perfectly entitled to use the right in connection with his or her enjoyment of the dominant land, and it may be that he or she goes onto, or makes some use of, the additional land, which is merely ancillary to his or her use of the dominant land.

Schiebsman LJ makes reference to this possibility earlier in his judgment.

Peacock v Custins
[2002] 1 WLR 1815, CA

Schiebsmann LJ

At [22]

The law is clear at the extremes. To use the track for the sole purpose of accessing the blue land is outside the scope of the grant. However in some circumstances a person who uses the way to access the dominant land but then goes off the dominant land, for instance to picnic on the neighbouring land, is not going outside the scope of the grant.

Such ancillary use will thus not fall foul of the rule in Harris v Flower. Whilst the cultivation of the 'blue land', or the use of the car park, was held not to be ancillary to the use of the dominant land in either Peacock v Custins or Das v Linden Mews, there are cases in which the use of the additional land has been considered ancillary. For example, in Massey v Boulden,[19] the Masseys claimed a prescriptive easement over a village green to gain access to their house. Their house had been extended by the addition of two rooms from an adjoining property. They had used the access to their original house for the required prescription period, but they had acquired the additional rooms just short of that period. It was nevertheless held that their use of the two additional rooms was ancillary to their use of their original house and thus fell within the prescriptive easement.[20]

The scope of the ancillary use exception is not easy to identify. The possible principles underlying ancillary use were explored in the following case, in which the court sought to reconcile the authorities by identifying that a use will be ancillary where the use is not 'in substance' for the benefit of non-dominant land, either because there is no benefit to the non-dominant land, or because any benefit is insubstantial.

Macepark (Whittlebury) Ltd v Sargeant (No 2)
[2003] 1 WLR 2284, HC

Facts: A hotel close to Silverstone race circuit was leased with the benefit of a right of way across adjoining land. A wood lay between the hotel and Silverstone. With the agreement of the owners of the wood, Macepark planned a short cut through the wood as a direct link to Silverstone. The hotel unsuccessfully claimed that the right of way could be used by hotel guests to drive from the hotel, and along the short cut through the wood, to Silverstone. The use of the right of way would not merely benefit the hotel as the dominant land, but would also substantially benefit the owners of the wood and Silverstone (the non-dominant land). The owners of the wood could charge for the short cut over their land and Silverstone would benefit from an additional access route.

Gabriel Moss QC (sitting as a High Court judge)

At [35]–[38]

The principle underlying the "ancillary" exception is not spelt out.

There seem to be at least two possibilities. One is that a use of the right of way to go on to non-dominant land can be ancillary where it is insubstantial, as in the case of going on to non-dominant land for a picnic, but cannot be ancillary if it is substantial, as where the access is used for going on to non-dominant land in order to cultivate another field or to store on the dominant land timber grown and felled on non-dominant land.

A second approach, which would often coincide with the first, would be that a use can be ancillary if it does not benefit the non-dominant land, ie does not in effect extend the

19 [2003] 1 WLR 1792.

20 See also National Trust v White [1987] 1 WLR 907, in which the use of a car park was held to be ancillary to the enjoyment of the ancient site of Figsbury Rings.

dominant land. The picnic for example concerned a situation where the use of the right of access involved going on to non-dominant land but not benefiting it [. . .] By contrast, non-dominant land is benefited if the access is used to enable it or to facilitate it to be cultivated or logged.

A third approach would be to say that a use was ancillary if it were either insubstantial or not a benefit [. . .]

At [47]–[52]

In accepting and applying the "ancillary" doctrine I must assume that the Court of Appeal in Massey v Boulden [2003] 1 WLR 1792 chose to follow the approach in Peacock v Custins [2002] 1 WLR 1815 rather than Das v Linden Mews Ltd [2002] 2 EGLR 76, since both cases are referred to in the judgment of Simon Brown LJ [2003] 1 WLR 1792, 1803, para 37. I must accept, therefore, that there is an "ancillary" doctrine.

The apparent clash with Harris v Flower (1904) 74 LJ Ch 127 is more difficult to resolve. The facts seem essentially similar. Moreover, there seems no doubt that in Massey v Boulden the access was used for the benefit of the non-dominant land as well as the dominant land. The only way, therefore, in which the Court of Appeal could have regarded the use of the access to benefit the non-dominant land as "ancillary" is if they regarded it as insubstantial: compare the use of the phrase "in substance" by Romer LJ in Harris v Flower at 132 and Morritt LJ in Jobson v Record [1998] 1 EGLR 113 at 114. The additional rooms which extended the dominant land appear to have been regarded as mere appendages to the dominant land, so that the use of the access could be seen as being in substance for the benefit of the dominant land and not in substance for the benefit of the non-dominant land.

If I have reconciled the apparently conflicting authorities on the question of ancillary use successfully, the result seems to be as follows. (1) There is a doctrine of "ancillary use". (2) It applies where the use of the access for the benefit of the non-dominant land in addition to the benefit of the dominant land is insubstantial, e g where it is used to reach rooms which are mere appendages to the dominant property. (3) It also applies where the use of the access to reach the dominant land and then go on to non-dominant land does not benefit the non-dominant land, e g where there is a picnic on the non-dominant land. (4) With regard to the question of what "benefits" the non-dominant land, where the access makes the use of the non-dominant land profitable, that access is being used to benefit the non-dominant land. For example, where the access, by an arrangement between the owner of the dominant land and the owner of the non-dominant land, is used to enable a profit to be made out of the use of the non-dominant land, there is a benefit to the non-dominant land.

Summary of the law

On the basis that I have accurately understood the current standing of the "ancillary" doctrine, the following propositions now seem to be correct. (1) An easement must be used for the benefit of the dominant land. (2) It must not "in substance" be used for the benefit of non-dominant land. (3) Under the "ancillary" doctrine, use is not "in substance" use for the benefit of the non-dominant land if (a) there is no benefit to the non-dominant land or if (b) the extent of the use for the benefit of the non-dominant land is insubstantial, ie it can still be said that in substance the access is used for the benefit of the dominant land and not for the benefit of both the dominant land and the non-dominant land. (d) "Benefit" in this context includes use of an access in such a way that a profit may be made out of the use of the non-dominant land, eg as a result of an arrangement with the owner of the dominant land.

The application of these principles can involve potentially difficult questions of fact and degree.

One significant factor, identified by the Court of Appeal in Peacock v Custins at para 24, is whether the benefit to the non-dominant land is likely to have its own "commercial value". It also seems from Peacock v Custins that it is not necessary to prove that separate value if it can be regarded as "self-evident".

A further feature of Macepark is that the court paid no regard to the fact that the hotel (as the dominant land), and the wood and race circuit (as the non-dominant land), were in separate ownership.

The rule in Harris v Flower has been the subject of criticism.

Paton and Seabourne, 'Can't Get There From Here? Permissible Use of Easements After Das' [2003] Conv 127, 132

If the rule is to be justified purely on grounds of doctrinal "neatness", then it must be recognised that its application, and the concept of "bona fide" or "colourable" use of a right of way for a particular purpose, produces some odd doctrinal consequences. It introduces something like "guilt by intention" to the law of trespass in this area. Conduct which externally is wholly consistent with the lawful exercise of right of way to land A—for example, the tractors driving along the way in Peacock v Custins—is made unlawful by the presence of an intention to carry on through A to B, land in which the servient owner has no legal or practical interest.

Yet in such cases where the right of way serving A is the only means of access to A and B, the courts have noticeably stopped short of the logical conclusion that land B is thereby landlocked and effectively sterilised. In Peacock v Custins, Schiemann L.J. suggested that the owner of land A could still go from A to B, perhaps for a picnic. What he could presumably not do was use the right of way serving A with that ultimate purpose (going to B) in mind. In other words, excursions from A to B, for picnics or otherwise, must be spontaneous, the idea originating once the owner is safely ensconced in A, having used the way to get there first. If, however, the servient owner one day spies the owner driving along the way with his car packed full of hampers, then sees him picnicking on B later that day, a trespass will have been committed [. . .]

The implication of this [. . .] is not a logically inevitable analysis. If lands A and B are contiguous and in common ownership, one of the most elementary incidents of such ownership must be the owner's right to move freely between the two. He needs no externally granted "right" to do this. There is no reason why use of the right of way to go to B via A can not be seen as a two stage process: use of the right of way to get to A, followed by access from A to B along the owner's own land as an incident of his ownership of both.

[. . .] In cases other than "passing through" ones, the above argument is not possible, but nor is it necessary. If the only threatened use of additional land B is by the owner/occupier of the land A which has the benefit of the right, such use of B is either ancillary or necessarily connected to the use of A, and the use of B generates no risk of increased user of the way, it is difficult to see any justification for a further, prohibitive rule.

Paton and Seabourne instead advocate that the determining principle should be based upon the concept of excessive user.[21]

[21] See section 5 below. Law Commission prefer this approach see Consultation Paper No 186 (2008), [5.64]–[5.71].

Paton and Seabourne, 'Can't Get There From Here? Permissible Use of Easements After Das' [2003] Conv 127, 134

A modified rule: excessive user

[...] As a controlling principle, excessive user is clearly related to the law of nuisance, in which the courts are more accustomed to balancing the competing activities, rights and convenience of neighbours, and giving some degree of latitude to worthwhile or productive uses of land. A court considering a claim of excessive user can have regard to the likely duration and nature of the proposed user, and the likelihood and severity of any actual or threatened damage, and can impose temporary or permanent conditions/restrictions on any relief granted.

The "rule in Harris v Flower", by contrast, originates in the strict construction of deeds and the conceptualisation of the law of easements around identifiable dominant and servient tenements. Ultimately, it is unnecessary. It can be qualified without collapsing the principle of appurtenance to an identified dominant tenement into "easements in gross". So long as the proposed additional activity bears some connection to the original dominant tenement, and does not generate excessive user or damage, the servient owner is protected. No further policy is served, or interest protected, by maintaining the strict rule for the sake of doctrinal purity.

2.1.4 Appurtenant to the dominant land or the dominant estate?

We have already noted that an easement may be granted for a freehold or leasehold term which will be co-extensive with the freeholder's or leaseholder's estate in the land. Orthodoxy has regarded easements as appurtenant to the grantee's estate in the dominant land rather than appurtenant to the land itself.[22] Thus, upon the early termination of a lease of the dominant land, for instance by notice or forfeiture, an easement enjoyed by the holder of the lease would also cease. But this orthodoxy has been challenged in the following case:

Wall v Collins
[2007] EWCA Civ 444 [2007] Ch 390

Facts: Adjoining semi detached houses were held on 999 year leases. The dominant land (House A) enjoyed the benefit of a right of way also for a term of 999 years along a passageway forming part of the servient land (House B). The freehold of House A was acquired by its leasehold owners so that their lease merged with the freehold reversion. The question arose whether their right to use the passageway which formed part of House B also merged and was extinguished.

Carnworth LJ

At [14]–[16]

As to the scope of the right granted in 1911, it is clear that Mr Hurst could neither grant the benefit, nor accept the burden, of a right in excess of his then 999-year interest in each 22 Although see the different views expressed by Cooke, 'The Genetics of Appurtenant Interests' in Modern Studies in Property Law: Vol 6 (ed Bright, Oxford: Hart, 2011), ch 10 and Lyall 'What are easements attached or appurtenant to' (2010) Conv 300.

> property. To that extent the judge's conclusion that the right granted at that stage could not benefit or burden the freehold reversion, in which Mr Hurst had no interest, is clearly right [...]
>
> That is not the same as saying that the right was "attached to" the leasehold interest. An easement must be appurtenant to a dominant tenement, but not necessarily to any particular interest for the time being [...] there is nothing to suggest that an easement for a term of years has to be attached to a leasehold interest of equivalent duration. All that matters is that the grantee has an interest at least co-extensive with the period of the easement [...]
>
> It follows in my view that merger of the lease into a larger interest in the dominant tenement is not in itself fatal to the continued existence of the easement , for the period for which it was granted. The dominant tenement remains unchanged and there is no legal impediment to the continued enjoyment of the easement by the occupier for the time being of that tenement.
>
> At [18]
>
> As a matter of common sense, it seems difficult to see why a lessee should be worse off, so far as concerns an easement annexed to the land merely because he has acquired a larger interest in the dominant tenement.

The decision is not thought to extend to situations where the dominant owner's lease is forfeited or disclaimed. However, as Carnworth LJ noted, the decision has its practical advantages upon merger. To bring practicality into line with orthodoxy the Law Commission has recommended that the decision be reverse by statute but that the dominant owner should be able to elect to retain the benefit of the easement upon merger or surrender.[23]

2.2 THE DOMINANT AND SERVIENT TENEMENTS MUST BE IN SEPARATE OWNERSHIP AND OCCUPATION

It is not possible to have an easement over your own land.[24] Any rights that are exercised over two adjoining pieces of land that you own are exercised as a result of your ownership. Accordingly, where the dominant and servient land come into the same ownership and occupation, the easement is extinguished, although if the dominant land is sold off, an easement may once again be created by implied grant.[25] If the dominant and servient land come only into the same occupation—for example, because a tenant takes a lease of both pieces of land—the easement is suspended until the common occupation comes to an end.

The necessity for separate ownership of the dominant and servient land can be inconvenient when housing estates are developed, because developers will be unable to create easements between the plots whilst the plots remain in their common ownership. The Law Commission has, thus, recommended, in respect of registered titles, that it should be possible for an easement to exist where the dominant and servient land are owned by the same person but held under separate registered titles.[26]

23 Law Commission, Law Comm 327 (2011), [3.255].

24 Roe v Siddons (1889) 22 QBD 224, 236; Metropolitan Railway Co v Fowler [1892] 1 QB 165; Kilgour v Gaddes [1904] 1 KB 457, 461.

25 See the rule in Wheeldon v Burrows: section 3.2 below.

26 Law Commission, Law Com 327 (2011), [4.44].

2.3 AN EASEMENT MUST ACCOMMODATE THE DOMINANT LAND

The right must benefit the land, as opposed to an individual owner of the land, if it is to have the necessary proprietary character to qualify as an easement. The concept of the land being able to enjoy rights is somewhat strained when it is the use of the land by its occupier that derives any benefit. The import of the requirement thus relates to the benefit enjoyed by the owner for the time being of the land, rather than a personal advantage of a particular owner. The point has been explained in the following case.

Moody v Steggles
(1879) 12 Ch D 261

Fry J

At 266

It is said that the easement in question relates, not to the tenement, but to the business of the occupant of the tenement, and that therefore I cannot tie the easement to the house. It appears to me that that argument is of too refined a nature to prevail, and for this reason, that the house can only be used by an occupant, and that the occupant only uses the house for the business he pursues, therefore in some manner (direct or indirect) an easement is more or less connected with the mode in which the occupant of the house uses it.

A right that was held to confer only a personal advantage is found in the early case of Hill v Tupper.[27] As we saw in Chapter 4, section 1, a canal company leased land beside the canal to Mr Hill and granted him the exclusive right to put or use boats on the canal. Mr Tupper owned a pub situated beside the canal and, when he also rented out boats to be used on the canal, Mr Hill objected. The court held that his exclusive right to put boats on the canal was not an easement, but a personal advantage. In the following case, Evershed MR explained why.

Re Ellenborough Park
[1956] Ch 131, CA

Evershed MR

At 175

It is clear that what the plaintiff was trying to do was to set up, under the guise of an easement, a monopoly which had no normal connexion with the ordinary use of his land, but which was merely an independent business enterprise. So far from the right claimed subserving or accommodating the land, the land was but a convenient incident to the exercise of the right.

The question of accommodation was of central importance in Re Ellenborough Park when the Court decided that the right to use the communal gardens satisfied the test.

[27] (1863) 2 H & C 121.

Re Ellenborough Park
[1956] Ch 131, CA

Evershed MR

At 173

Can it be said, then, of the right of full enjoyment of the park in question, which was granted by the conveyance of December 23, 1864, and which, for reasons already given, was, in our view, intended to be annexed to the property conveyed to Mr. Porter, that it accommodated and served that property? It is clear that the right did, in some degree, enhance the value of the property, and this consideration cannot be dismissed as wholly irrelevant. It is, of course, a point to be noted; but we agree with Mr. Cross's submission that it is in no way decisive of the problem; it is not sufficient to show that the right increased the value of the property conveyed, unless it is also shown that it was connected with the normal enjoyment of that property. It appears to us that the question whether or not this connexion exists is primarily one of fact, and depends largely on the nature of the alleged dominant tenement and the nature of the right granted. As to the former, it was in the contemplation of the parties to the conveyance of 1864 that the property conveyed should be used for residential and not commercial purposes [. . .] We have already stated that the purchasers of all the plots, which actually abutted on the park, were granted the right to enjoy the use of it, as were also the purchasers of some of the plots which, although not fronting upon the park, were only a short distance away from it. As to the nature of the right granted, the conveyance of 1864 shows that the park was to be kept and maintained as a pleasure ground or ornamental garden, and that it was contemplated that it should at all times be kept in good order and condition and well stocked with plants and shrubs; and the vendors covenanted that they would not at any time thereafter erect or permit to be erected any dwelling-house or other building (except a grotto, bower, summer-house, flower-stand, fountain, music-stand or other ornamental erection) within or on any part of the pleasure ground. On these facts Mr. Cross submitted that the requisite connexion between the right to use the park and the normal enjoyment of the houses which were built around it or near it had not been established. He likened the position to a right granted to the purchaser of a house to use the Zoological Gardens free of charge or to attend Lord's Cricket Ground without payment. Such a right would undoubtedly, he said, increase the value of the property conveyed but could not run with it at law as an easement, because there was no sufficient nexus between the enjoyment of the right and the use of the house. It is probably true, we think, that in neither of Mr. Cross's illustrations would the supposed right constitute an easement, for it would be wholly extraneous to, and independent of, the use of a house as a house, namely, as a place in which the householder and his family live and make their home; and it is for this reason that the analogy which Mr. Cross sought to establish between his illustrations and the present case cannot, in our opinion, be supported. A much closer analogy, as it seems to us, is the case of a man selling the freehold of part of his house and granting to the purchaser, his heirs and assigns, the right, appurtenant to such part, to use the garden in common with the vendor and his assigns. In such a case, the test of connexion, or accommodation, would be amply satisfied; for just as the use of a garden undoubtedly enhances, and is connected with, the normal enjoyment of the house to which it belongs, so also would the right granted, in the case supposed, be closely connected with the use and enjoyment of the part of the premises sold. Such, we think, is in substance the position in the present case. The park became a communal garden for the benefit and enjoyment of those whose houses adjoined it or were in its close proximity. Its flower beds, lawns and walks were calculated to afford all the amenities which it is the purpose of the garden of a house to provide; and, apart from the fact that these amenities extended to a number of householders, instead of being confined to one (which on this aspect of the case is immaterial), we can see no difference in principle between Ellenborough Park and a garden in the ordinary signification of that word. It is the collective garden of the neighbouring houses, to whose use it was dedicated by the owners of the estate and as such amply satisfied, in our judgment, the requirement of connexion with the dominant tenements to which it is appurtenant. The result is not affected by the circumstance that the right to the park is in this case enjoyed by some few houses which are not immediately fronting on the park. The test for present purposes, no doubt, is that the park should constitute in a real and intelligible sense the garden (albeit the communal garden) of the houses to which its enjoyment is annexed. But we think that the test is satisfied as regards these few neighbouring, though not adjacent, houses. We think that the extension of the right of enjoyment to these few houses does not negative the presence of the necessary "nexus" between the subject-matter enjoyed and the premises to which the enjoyment is expressed to belong.

It is evident from Evershed's judgment that there must be some physical proximity between the servient and dominant tenements for the necessary benefit to arise, although it was no objection that some of the houses did not immediately border the park, but were a short distance away.

It is also clear that an increase in economic value of the dominant land, whilst influential, is not the sole yardstick. The issue is whether or not the normal enjoyment of the land is enhanced, which is a question of fact to be determined by considering both the nature of the dominant land and the right itself.[28] Thus, a right to use a communal garden will accommodate a residence, but is most unlikely to accommodate a factory or farm. Where the land is used for commercial purposes, the right may enhance the business conducted on the land. Thus, in the case of Moody v Steggles,[29] a right to erect a sign to announce and promote a public house on the dominant land was held to be an easement.

Although labelled a test of fact, there are value judgments to be made, taking into account current social conditions, technical advances, and accepted modes of use of property. It has been suggested that a right of recreation and amusement cannot qualify as an easement. The Court of Appeal considered the question in Re Ellenborough Park, when it rejected the claim that the right to use the garden was a right of mere recreation and amusement. It did so as part of the fourth requirement that the right must be capable of being the subject matter of a grant, but, because the question relates to issues of benefit, it falls more appropriately within Cheshire's second condition.

Re Ellenborough Park
[1956] Ch 131, CA

Evershed MR

At 177–8

The third of the questions embraced in Dr. Cheshire's fourth condition rests primarily on a proposition stated in Theobald's The Law of Land, 2nd ed. (1929), at p. 263, where it is said > that an easement "must be a right of utility and benefit and not one of mere recreation and amusement." It does not appear that a proposition in similar terms is stated by Gale.

28 Lawson (2002) p 73.

29 (1879) 12 Ch D 261.

>
> [The Court considered the authorities quoted by Theobald in support being, Mounsey v. Ismay,[30] Dyce v Lady James Hay,[31] and Dempster v Cleghorn.[32]].
>
> In any case, if the proposition be well-founded, we do not think that the right to use a garden of the character with which we are concerned in this case can be called one of mere recreation and amusement [...] No doubt a garden is a pleasure—on high authority, it is the purest of pleasures—but, in our judgment, it is not a right having no quality either of utility or benefit as those words should be understood. The right here in suit is, for reasons already given, one appurtenant to the surrounding houses as such, and constitutes a beneficial attribute of residence in a house as ordinarily understood. Its use for the purposes, not only of exercise and rest but also for such domestic purposes as were suggested in argument—for example, for taking out small children in perambulators or otherwise—is not fairly to be described as one of mere recreation or amusement, and is clearly beneficial to the premises to which it is attached [...] the right in suit is, in point of utility, fairly analogous to a right of way passing over fields to, say, the railway station, which would be none the less a good right, even though it provided a longer route to the objective. We think, therefore, that the statement [...] must at least be confined to exclusion of rights to indulge in such recreations as [...] horse racing or perhaps playing games, and has no application to the facts of the present case.

It may well be that an aversion to rights of recreation and amusement are a reflection of social conditions of the time (Theobald was writing in 1929),[33] and that, where recreational rights are adequately defined, they now may be accepted as easements.

Gray and Gray, Elements of Land Law (5th edn, 2009, [5.1.39])

> The judicial animus against recreational easements has undoubtedly receded in recent times. It may be an index of a more hedonistic (or even more health conscious) age that it no longer seems inappropriate to acknowledge the easement character of certain recreational facilities annexed to dominant land. This is particularly the case where the claim of easement refers to a defined area over which a right of recreational enjoyment has been given not to the public but to a limited number of lot holders.

2.4 THE RIGHT MUST BE CAPABLE OF BEING THE SUBJECT MATTER OF A GRANT

Cheshire's fourth condition has been described as 'both obscure and unhelpful'.[34] At one level, the condition is deceptively simple: as a legal interest in land, an easement must be capable of being granted by deed. There must be a grantor and grantee, who have the necessary capacity and who enjoy the necessary title to create the easement in question. If the grantor does 30 (1865) 3 H & C 486. 31 (1852) 1 Macq 305. 32 (1813) 2 Dow 40.

33 Theobald, The Law of Land (2nd edn, 1929), p 263.

34 McClean, 'The Nature of an Easement' (1966) 5 West LR 32, 61. The Court of Appeal in Re Ellenborough Park [1956] Ch 131, 164, described the fourth condition as 'not entirely clear'.

not hold the appropriate title, the easement can only operate to estop the grantor denying the right as against the grantee.

In fact, the condition hides 'an inept shorthand'[35] for a number of criteria, the common features of which operate to circumscribe the effect upon the servient land of those rights that qualify as easements. We will examine these criteria under four headings:[36]

1. the requirement for certainty in the scope of the grant;
2. the requirement that the right places no positive burden on the servient owner;
3. the limitations on new easements;
4. the 'ouster' principle, which prohibits rights that amount to a claim to exclusive or joint ownership.

2.4.1 Certainty in the scope of the grant

Certainty is a constant refrain of the law when defining parties' rights and obligations. It must be clear what the dominant owner is entitled to do, and what is the nature and extent of the burden to which the servient owner must submit. The call for certainty is particularly insistent when rights are proprietary and thus capable of binding third parties. In the case of easements, certainty can be elusive when there are a wide variety of rights that can operate over another's land. There is thus a 'heightened emphasis on rigorous definitional clarity'.[37]

There is no right to an uninterrupted right to light or air; such a right can only operate through a defined channel.[38] Nor is there a right to a view,[39] to uninterrupted television reception[40] or to make a noise.[41] In Re Ellenborough Park, the Court of Appeal drew a distinction between the certainty of a right to use a communal garden attached to dominant residential land, and the uncertainty of a right to wander at will over a large and ill-defined area.[42]

Re Ellenborough Park
[1956] Ch 131, CA

Lord Evershed

At 176

To the first of these questions the interpretation which we have given to the typical deed provides, in our judgment, the answer; for we have construed the right conferred as being both well defined and commonly understood. In these essential respects the right may be

[35] Gardner, An Introduction to Land Law (2007), p 154.

[36] In Re Ellenborough Park [1956] Ch 131, 164, the Court of Appeal identified three criteria—prohibitions against: (i) vague and uncertain right; (ii) rights that are claims to joint user; and (iii) rights of mere recreation and amusement. We have examined (iii) in the context of Cheshire's second requirement of accommodation. Criteria (i) and (ii) relate to our criteria (1) and (4); our criteria (2) and (3) did not arise in the context of the case.

[37] Gray and Gray, Elements of Land Law (5th edn, 2009), [5.1.41]. See also the discussion of what can count as a property right in Chapter 4, section 5.

[38] Harris v De Pinna (1886) 33 Ch D 238, 250.

[39] Ibid, 262.

[40] Hunter v Canary Wharf [1997] AC 655, 699.

[41] Lawrence v Fen Tigers Ltd [2011] EWHC 360.

[42] But see Magrath v Parkside Hotels Ltd [2011] EWHC 143 where an undefined right to fire escape was found sufficiently certain because it did not allow unrestricted access over the servient land and would be rarely exercised.

said to be distinct from the indefinite and unregulated privilege which, we think, would ordinarily be understood by the Latin term "jus spatiandi," a privilege of wandering at will over all and every part of another's field or park, and which, though easily intelligible as the subject-matter of a personal licence, is something substantially different from the subject-matter of the grant in question, namely, the provision for a limited number of houses in a uniform crescent of one single large but private garden [. . .]

At 179

As appears from what has been stated earlier, the right to the full enjoyment of Ellenborough Park, which was granted by the 1864 and other relevant conveyances, was, in substance, no more that a right to use the park as a garden in the way in which gardens are commonly used. In a sense, no doubt, such a right includes something of a jus spatiandi, inasmuch as it involves the principle of wandering at will round each part of the garden, except of course, such parts as comprise flower beds, or are laid out for some other purpose, which renders walking impossible or unsuitable. We doubt, nevertheless, whether the right to use and enjoy a garden in this manner can with accuracy be said to constitute a mere jus spatiandi. Wandering at large is of the essence of such a right and constitutes the main purpose for which it exists. A private garden, on the other hand, is an attribute of the ordinary enjoyment of the residence to which it is attached, and the right of wandering in it is but one method of enjoying it.

2.4.2 No positive burden on the servient owner

An easement does not require the servient owner to do anything: he or she merely has to allow the dominant owner to exercise his or her easement without interference. Furthermore, he or she is not required to keep the subject matter of the easement in repair so that the dominant owner can exercise his or her right. Thus, if the easement is a right of way or drainage, the servient owner is not required to keep the road or drains in good repair.[43] For the same reason, a right to the passage of water through pipes running through the servient land does not require a continuous supply of water; the right imposes only a negative obligation not to interrupt any supply that there is.[44]

There is one exception to this rule: namely, a prescriptive right to require a neighbour to maintain a boundary fence. The right stems from the ancient and anomalous obligation to maintain stock-proof fences to keep out a neighbour's cattle, a breach of which is a defence to cattle trespass.[45]

An obligation to repair may, however, arise as a result of some other source of liability. For example, an obligation to repair may arise by contract, whether as a result of an express or implied term.[46] Although a positive obligation to repair will not usually be enforceable against third parties, it may be enforceable in certain circumstances, which we will explore in the next chapter. Liability to repair may also arise in tort, whether under the torts of negligence or nuisance,[47] or as a result of obligations imposed upon occupiers by the Occupiers Liability Act 1984.

43 Duke of Westminster v Guild [1985] QB 688.

44 Schwann v Cotton [1916] 2 Ch 459; Rance v Elvin (1985) 50 P & CR 9 and re electricity supplies Duffy v Lamb (1998) 75 P & CR 364; William Old International Ltd v Arya [2009] EWHC 599.

45 Jones v Price [1965] 2 QB 618.

46 See Liverpool City Council v Irwin [1977] AC 239.

47 See Rees v Sherrett [2001] EWCA Civ 760, in which a duty arose to take reasonable steps to weatherproof a wall after demolition of an adjoining wall; cf Phipps v Pears [1965] 1 QB 76.

2.4.3 Limitations on new easements

It is said that the class of easements is never closed,[48] because developments in lifestyle call for the recognition of new forms of easement.[49] Nevertheless, the courts are cautious in recognizing unusual new forms of easement. There is a particular reluctance to accept new negative easements, as Lord Denning MR explained in the following extract. He also pointed out that the same protection may be achieved by taking a restrictive covenant from the servient owner.[50]

Phipps v Pears
[1965] 1 QB 76, CA

Facts: There were two adjoining detached houses. The wall of the most recently constructed house was very close to the adjoining house and it had not been rendered to make it weatherproof. The other house was demolished, leaving the wall of the remaining house exposed to the weather. Because this wall was not weatherproof, cracks appeared. The owner unsuccessfully claimed a right to protection from the weather against the owner of the house that had been demolished.[51]

Lord Denning MR

At 82

But a right to protection from the weather (if it exists) is entirely negative. It is a right to stop your neighbour pulling down his own house. Seeing that it is a negative easement, it must be looked at with caution. Because the law has been very chary of creating any new negative easements.

The reason underlying these instances is that if such an easement were to be permitted, it would unduly restrict your neighbour in his enjoyment of his own land. It would hamper legitimate development, see Dalton v. Angus (1881) 6 App Cas 740 at 824 per Lord Blackburn. Likewise here, if we were to stop a man pulling down his house, we would put a brake on desirable improvement. Every man is entitled to pull down his house if he likes. If it exposes your house to the weather, that is your misfortune. It is no wrong on his part [. . .] There is no such easement known to the law as an easement to be protected from the weather. The only way for an owner to protect himself is by getting a covenant from his neighbour that he will not pull down his house or cut down his trees. Such a covenant would be binding on him in contract: and it would be enforceable on any successor who took with notice of it. But it would not be binding on one who took without notice.

48 Re Ellenborough Park [1956] Ch 131, 140, per Dankwerts J.

49 See Lord St Leonards' observations in Dyce v Lady James Hay (1852) 1 Macq 305, 312, that 'the category of servitudes must alter and expand with changes that take place in the circumstances of mankind'.

50 See Chapter 26. Dawson and Dunn advocate the formulation of a single means of creating negative property rights: see Dawson and Dunn, 'Negative Easements: A Crumb of Analysis' (1998) 18 LS 510.

51 Following Rees v Skerrett [2001] 1 WLR 1541, he might have claimed a tortuous remedy requiring the owner to take reasonable steps to protect a neighbour's wall from foreseeable damage occasioned by the withdrawal of support or protection.

2.4.4 The 'ouster' principle

An easement is a right to use the land of another for some limited purpose. It thus falls short of a claim to exclusive or joint possession or occupation. The Law Commission points out that this important distinction between easements and possessory rights is not easy to define.

Law Comm No 327, Easements, Covenants and Profits à Prendre (2011, [3.191])

> [...] an easement [...] is an interest in land, not an estate. If what the dominant owner can do on the servient land actually amounts to an ownership right [...] then it cannot be an easement. That much is clear. What is more difficult is to delineate precisely the point at which the dominant owner's rights can be said to be "too much" to be merely an interest in land.

The ouster principle has been developed to try and draw that distinction.

Copeland v Greenhalf
[1952] Ch 488, HC

Facts: A repairer of vehicles unsuccessfully claimed an easement by prescription (long user) over a strip of land belonging to Greenhalf. He had been using the strip of land for fifty years, as a place on which to store his customers' vehicles whilst awaiting repair or collection.

Upjohn J

At 498

> I think that the right claimed goes wholly outside any normal idea of an easement, that is, the right of the owner or the occupier of a dominant tenement over a servient tenement. This claim (to which no closely related authority has been referred to me) really amounts to a claim to a joint user of the land by the defendant. Practically, the defendant is claiming the whole beneficial user of the strip of land on the south-east side of the track there; he can leave as many or as few lorries there as he likes for as long as he likes; he may enter on it by himself, his servants and agents to do repair work thereon. In my judgment, that is not a claim which can be established as an easement. It is virtually a claim to possession of the servient tenement, if necessary to the exclusion of the owner; or, at any rate, to a joint user, and no authority has been cited to me which would justify the conclusion that a right of this wide and undefined nature can be the proper subject-matter of an easement. It seems to me that to succeed, this claim must amount to a successful claim of possession by reason of long adverse possession. I say nothing, of course, as to the creation of such rights by deeds or by covenant; I am dealing solely with the question of a right arising by prescription.

It is to be noted that Upjohn J suggested that a claim to ownership by adverse possession might have been successful. Alternatively, if Copeland had been granted permission to use the land, he may have claimed a lease or an occupational licence. Upjohn J also suggested that the different considerations may apply if the parties had been able to demonstrate their intentions by an express grant, rather than where an easement is claimed by prescription—but this distinction has been doubted.[52]

Difficulties arise in clearly defining the scope of the ouster principle. To some extent, all easements oust the servient owner from some use of the servient land: for example, the grant of a right of way will prevent the servient owner from building on the road so as to obstruct free passage. In Miller v Emcer Products,[53] the Court of Appeal saw no objection to the grant of a right to use a lavatory, although the servient owner would be excluded from the lavatory whilst the dominant owner was using it. In Re Ellenborough Park,[54] the Court of Appeal was also not impressed by the suggestion that use of a communal garden was effectively a claim to joint ownership because it excluded the servient owner from any use of the garden.

The uncertainty over the scope of the ouster principle has centred in recent years over rights of storage and car parking. In principle, rights of storage were accepted in AG for Southern Nigeria v John Holt & Co (Liverpool) Ltd[55] and in Wright v Macadam,[56] and the right to park cars has been accepted in principle in a number of cases—most recently, by the House of Lords in Moncrieff v Jamieson.[57]

The test has been said to be one of degree.[58]

London & Blenheim Estates Ltd v Ladbroke Retail Parks Ltd
[1992] 1 WLR 1278, HC

Judge Paul Baker QC

At 1288

The essential question is one of degree. If the right granted in relation to the area over which it is to be exercisable is such that it would leave the servient owner without any reasonable use of his land whether for parking or anything else, it could not be an easement, though it might be some larger or differing grant.

Thus, it is suggested that, if the area of storage or car parking is relatively small when compared with the area of the servient land, the ouster principle does not apply, because the servient owner is still able to make 'reasonable use' of the servient land. This test was applied in Batchelor v Marlow[59] to reject a right to park where an exclusive right to park was claimed on weekdays between the hours of 9.30 a.m. and 6.00 p.m. But the House of Lord has cast doubt on this approach in dicta in the Scottish case of Moncrieff v Jamieson.[60] Lord Scott 52 Hill-Smith, 'Rights of Parking and the Ouster Principle After Batchelor v Marlow' [2007] Conv 223, 232. See also Moncrieff v Jamieson [2007] UKHL 42, 59, per Lord Scott.

53 [1956] Ch 304, 316.

54 [1958] Ch 131, 176.

55 [1915] AC 599 (right to store materials and trade goods and produce).

56 [1949] 2 KB 744 (right to store coal).

57 [2007] UKHL 42, [2007] 1 WLR 2620. See also London and Blenheim Estates Ltd v Ladbroke Retail Parks Ltd [1992] 1 WLR 1278, HC; [1994] 1 WLR 31, CA; Hair v Gillman (2000) 80 P & CR 108; Bachelor v Marlow [2001] EWCA Civ 1051, [2003] 1 WLR 764; Central Midlands Estates Ltd v Leicester Dyers Ltd [2003] 2 P & CR D1; Saeed v Plustrade Ltd [2001] EWCA Civ 2011, [2002] 2 P & CR 19; Montrose Court Holdings Ltd v Shamash [2006] All ER D 272. The right to moor boats has also been accepted as an easement: see P&S Platt Ltd v Crouch [2003] EWCA Civ 1110, [2004] 1 P & CR 18.

58 See also Grigsby v Melville [1972] 1 WLR 1355, 1364, per Brightman J.

59 [2001] EWCA Civ 1051, [2003] 1 WLR 764.

60 The case is thus not binding precedent, although the House of Lords noted that, in this respect, there was no divergence in Scottish and English law.

suggested that the test should be refocused to consider whether or not the servient owner retains possession and control over that part of the servient land over which the right to park is exercised.[61]

Moncrieff v Jamieson
[2007] 1 WLR 2620, HL

Lord Scott

At [57]

It has often been commented that Wright v Macadam was not cited to Upjohn J and the possible inconsistency between the two cases was addressed by Judge Paul Baker QC in London & Blenheim Estates Ltd v Ladbroke Retail Parks Ltd where a right of parking had been claimed. He commented, at p 1286, that the question whether the right to park that had been claimed was consistent with the nature of an easement was one of degree: "A small coal shed in a large property is one thing. The exclusive use of a large part of the alleged servient tenement is another." I think, with respect, that this attempt to reconcile the two authorities was addressing the wrong point. The servient land in relation to a servitude or easement is surely the land over which the servitude or easement is enjoyed, not the totality of the surrounding land of which the servient owner happens to be the owner. If there is an easement of way over a 100-yard roadway on a 1,000-acre estate, or an easement to use for storage a small shed on the estate access to which is gained via the 100-yard roadway, it would be fairly meaningless in relation to either easement to speak of the whole estate as the servient land. Would the right of way and the storage right fail to qualify as easements if the whole estate bar the actual land over which the roadway ran and on which the shed stood, with or without a narrow surrounding strip, were sold? How could it be open to the servient owner to destroy easements by such a stratagem? In my opinion such a stratagem would fail. It would fail because the servient land was never the whole estate but was the land over which the roadway ran and on which the shed stood. Provided the servient land was land of which the servient owner was in possession, the rights of way and of storage would continue, in my opinion, to qualify as easements [. . .]

At [59]

In my respectful opinion the test formulated in the London & Blenheim Estates case and applied by the Court of Appeal in Batchelor v Marlow [2003] 1 WLR 764, a test that would reject the claim to an easement if its exercise would leave the servient owner with no "reasonable use" to which he could put the servient land, needs some qualification. It is impossible to assert that there would be no use that could be made by an owner of land over which he had granted parking rights. He could, for example, build above or under the parking area. He could place advertising hoardings on the walls. Other possible uses can be conjured up. And by what yardstick is it to be decided whether the residual uses of the servient land available to its owner are "reasonable" or sufficient to save his ownership from being "illusory"? It is not the uncertainty of the test that, in my opinion, is the main problem. It is the test itself. I do not see why a landowner should not grant rights of a servitudal character over his land to any extent that he wishes. The claim in Batchelor v Marlow for an easement to park cars was a prescriptive claim based on over 20 years of that use of the strip of land. There is no difference between the characteristics of an easement that can be acquired by grant and the characteristics of an easement that can be acquired by prescription. If an easement can be created by grant it can be acquired by prescription and I can think of no reason why, if an area of land can accommodate nine cars, the owner of the land should not grant an easement to park nine cars on the land. The servient owner would remain the owner of the land and in possession and control of it. The dominant owner would have the right to station up to nine cars there and, of course, to have access to his nine cars. How could it be said that the law would recognise an easement allowing the dominant owner to park five cars or six or seven or eight but not nine? I would, for my part, reject the test that asks whether the servient owner is left with any reasonable use of his land, and substitute for it a test which asks whether the servient owner retains possession and, subject to the reasonable exercise of the right in question, control of the servient land.

[61] He was influenced by arguments made by Hill-Smith [2007] Conv 223.

Lord Neuberger was rather more reserved in accepting this different test.

Moncrieff v Jamieson
[2007] 1 WLR 2620, HL

Lord Neuberger

At [143]–[144]

I see considerable force in the views expressed by Lord Scott in paras 57 and 59 of his opinion, to the effect that a right can be an easement notwithstanding that the dominant owner effectively enjoys exclusive occupation, on the basis that the essential requirement is that the servient owner retains possession and control. If that were the right test, then it seems likely that Batchelor v Marlow was wrongly decided. However, unless it is necessary to decide the point to dispose of this appeal, I consider that it would be dangerous to try and identify what degree of ouster is required to disqualify a right from constituting a servitude or easement, given the very limited argument your Lordships have received on the topic.

As I have mentioned, there are a number of cases which can be said to support the approach of the Court of Appeal in Batchelor v Marlow, although it may be possible to distinguish them. The point does not appear to be settled in Australia: see the difference of opinion in the recent case White v Betalli [2007] NSWCA 243. I am also concerned that, if we were unconditionally to suggest that exclusion of the servient owner from occupation, as opposed to possession, would not of itself be enough to prevent a right from being an easement, it might lead to unexpected consequences or difficulties which have not been explored in argument in this case. Thus, if the right to park a vehicle in a one-vehicle space can be an easement, it may be hard to justify an effectively exclusive right to store any material not being an easement, which could be said to lead to the logical conclusion that an occupational licence should constitute an interest in land.

Luther has argued that what matters is 'what the claimant could do by virtue of his easement not what the owner could not do'.[62] He draws a distinction between two types of case: the first, in which the claimant is, in effect, claiming to be the owner, and thus the issue is the grant of a possessory right and not an easement; the second covers more limited uses, in which the defining test is one of certainty.

62 Luther, 'Easements and Exclusive Possession' (1996) 16 LS 51, 59

Luther, 'Easements and Exclusive Possession' (1996) 16 LS 51, 61

> At this extreme level, where a claimant is in effect acting as owner, it does not matter whether the principle is expressed in terms which focus on the claimant (either by referring to the certainty of his rights, as in Copeland v Greenhalf, or to his state of mind when exercising them, as in the Southern Nigeria case) or on the person against whom the right is claimed (as in Re Ellenborough Park and many later cases). The result will be the same in all cases: if a grant is involved, the claimant will be the owner (Reilley v Booth), if prescription is involved, his claim for an easement will fail, but he may have satisfied the criteria for a claim of adverse possession, and so become the owner. This then is the first category. The second category is a residual category, covering claims which fall short of exclusive possession properly speaking—either because they are not 'exclusive', in the sense that they do not absolutely exclude the owner, or because they are not 'possession', in that they do not involve a claim to perform an unlimited range of activities. Upjohn J appears to have considered, in accordance with authority, that the appropriate criterion to apply to this second category was that of certainty: so a claim for joint user (possession, because the activities were unlimited, but not to the exclusion of the owner) would fail because it was not sufficiently certain.

Focusing either on the dominant or servient owner is rather like looking at different sides of the same coin, but Luther suggests that it is more straightforward to look at the issue from the point of the view of the claimant—that is, the potential dominant owner.

Luther, 'Easements and Exclusive Possession' (1996) 16 LS 51, 62

> Surely to ask 'What the claimant can do?' (the certainty approach) is the same as to ask 'What can the servient owner not do? (the exclusion/substantial interference approach)? There is some substance in this argument, and certainly it is possible to imagine cases where it would be difficult to answer one question without answering the other. A line would have to be drawn in difficult cases. But against this it must be said that to look at the positive characteristics of a claimed right must in many cases be easier than to assess its negative impact on someone else's rights. This latter enquiry must involve a large number of external factors, not least as noted above the total size of the servient tenement, the characteristics of the owner and the uses to which he might wish to put his land. It might also involve uncertainty in the definition of rights.

The Law Commission believes that the ouster principle is not useful and recommends that, if the parties so wish, a right should not be rejected as an easement merely because it prevents the servient owner from making any reasonable use of servient land.[63]

3 THE ACQUISITION QUESTION

We have already noted that easements lie in grant and there are three mechanisms by which that grant may arise: (i) by express grant; (ii) by implied grant; and (iii) by presumed grant as result of long user. Rights in the nature of easements may also arise by statute: for example, [63] Law Com 327 (2011) [3.207]–[3.209].

the Access to Neighbouring Land Act 1992 and the Party Walls Act 1996 both grant an owner a right to go onto neighbouring land in order to carry out certain repairs and building work.[64]

3.1 EXPRESS GRANT

Easements may be created by the methods examined in Chapter 7. A legal easement must be created by deed and, where a legal easement is created after 13 October 2003, that deed must be registered where the land is registered,[65] with the benefit of the easement being recorded in the property register of the dominant land and the burden of the easement being noted in the charges register of the servient land.[66] A legal easement created by deed before that date may, but need not, be registered. An equitable easement may be created in writing, by agreement, or by estoppel.[67]

3.2 IMPLIED GRANT

An easement may be acquired by implied grant usually when land is subdivided into two or more parts, whether by sale or lease. There are four ways in which a grant may be implied:

- easements of necessity;
- intended easements;
- the rule in Wheeldon v Burrows;[68] and
- by the operation of s 62 of the Law of Property Act 1925 (LPA 1925).

The Law Commission has described these methods as providing a 'complex matrix of overlapping rules',[69] which 'have developed in piecemeal and uncoordinated fashion'.[70]

The underlying rationale for the first three of these rules lies in the principle that a seller or landlord should not be allowed to derogate from his or her grant: 'A grantor having given a thing with one hand, is not to take away the means of enjoying it with the other.'[71] Thus a landowner who has disposed of part of his or her land for a particular purpose cannot use his or her retained land in such a way as to make the disposed portion unfit for its particular purpose.

The principle of non-derogation from grant is general in its application and may itself form the basis for an implied easement.[72] Hopkins explains the influence of non-derogation from grant upon the implied grant of easements.

[64] See Gratton, 'Proprietarian Conceptions of Statutory Access Rights' in Modern Studies in Property Law: Vol 2 (ed Cook, 2003), ch 18.

[65] Land Registration Act 2002, s 27.

[66] Where the servient land is unregistered, the dominant owner may enter a caution against first registration of the servient land to ensure that the relevant notice will be entered when the servient land is registered: see ibid, ss 15–21.

[67] For an example of an easement by estoppel, see Crabb v Arun District Council [1976] Ch 179, discussed in Chapter 10.

[68] (1878) 12 Ch D 31.

[69] Law Commission Consultation Paper No 186 (2008), [4.109].

[70] Ibid, at [4.99].

[71] Birmingham, Dudley and District Banking Co v Ross (1887) 38 Ch D 295, 312, per Bowen LJ.

[72] See Cable v Bryant [1908] 1 Ch 259. The Law Commission proposal for the statutory implication of easements would exclude the general principle of non-derogation from grant as an independent ground: see Law Comm 327 (2011), [3.45].

Hopkins, The Informal Acquisition of Rights in Land (2000, p 205)

> The rule of non-derogation from grant is seen as the basis for three specific rules enabling the acquisition of an easement [...] The general rule itself may give rise to the acquisition of easements. Therefore the question arises to what extent there is an overlap between the general and specific rules. It seems that there are three characteristics that separate the specific rules. First, each specific rule has its own requirements which are distinct, in some respects, from the general rule. Secondly, in each case the right claimed must fulfil the general characteristics of an easement. The specific rules are not the source of proprietary rights sui generis. In these respects the specific rules are more restrictive in their application than the general rule. However, thirdly it seems that the specific rules alone can create positive easements. The general rule may be limited to enabling the creation of negative easements. In addition to the three rules derived from non-derogation from grant, there is a fourth, related, rule enabling the acquisition of a legal easement by words implied into a conveyance by statute.

Even though the rationale for implied grant stems from the principle of non-derogation from grant, the basis for the rules is confused. They are said to be based upon the presumed intention of the parties and may indeed be excluded by a contrary intention, but in the background lurks the public policy of maximizing the effective use of land. Easements of necessity, in particular, reveal this confused interaction. The Law Commission recommends that utility should become the overt basis for implication, by replacing the four rules with a single rule based upon what is "necessary for the reasonable use of the land" at the time of the disposition.[73] This test would take into account the use of the land, the presence on the land of any relevant physical features (including any available routes for the easement), any intention for the future use of the land known to the parties and any potential interference with the servient land or inconvenience to the servient owner.

Before we examine the four methods of implying an easement, we must consider two contrasting situations. Firstly, we will consider that in which the dominant land is sold or let and the new dominant owner or tenant claims an easement over the servient land retained by the seller or landlord. If an easement is implied, it will be by means of an implied grant. This is illustrated in Figure 21.

Secondly, we will consider that in which the servient land is sold or let and the seller or landlord claims an easement over the servient land for the benefit of the dominant land that he or she retains. If an easement is implied, it will be by means of an implied reservation. This is illustrated in Figure 22.

The law is more reluctant to imply a reservation than the grant of an easement. The seller or landlord is expected to take steps to protect the use of his or her retained dominant land. The possibility of an implied reservation only arises where easements are implied on the basis of necessity or intended use. Here, the implication looks to the future use of the land. The implied grant of an easement also may arise in these circumstances and, in addition, under the rule in Wheeldon v Burrows or s 62 of the LPA 1925, where the implied grant looks to the past use of the land.

[73] Ibid. See also the statutory schemes for the implications of easements in Australia canvassed in Burns, 'Easements and Servitudes Created by Implied Grant, Implied Reservation or Prescription and Title-by-Registration Systems' in Modern Studies in Property Law: Vol 5 (ed Dixon, Oxford: Hart 2009).

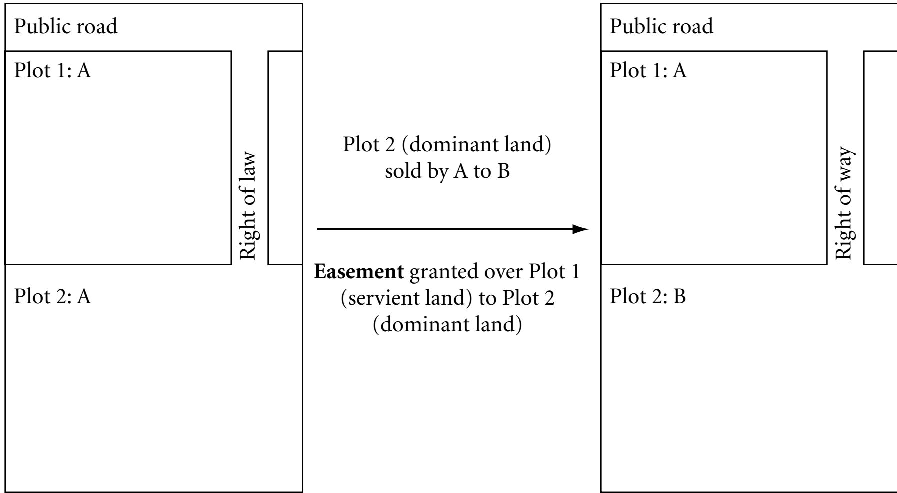

Figure 21 Easement by implied grant

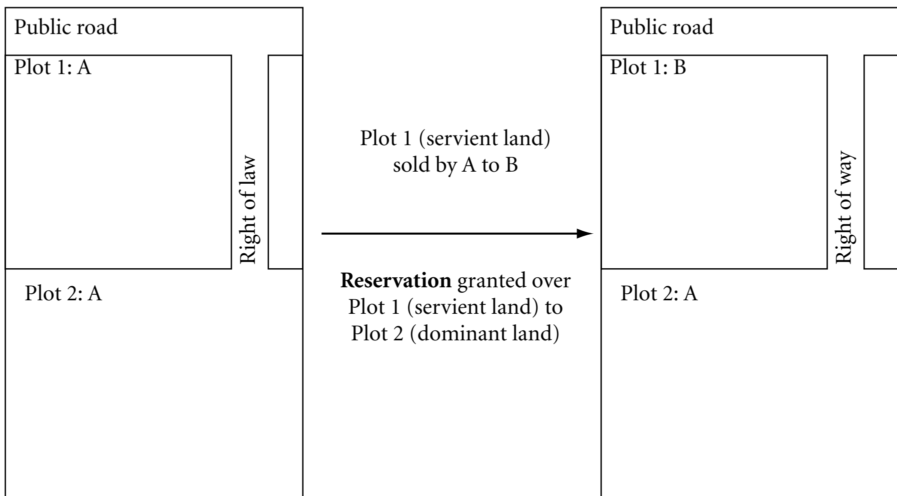

Figure 22 Easements by implied reservation

The Law Commission has recommended that the distinction between the implication of easements and reservations should be abandoned.[74]

3.2.1 Easements of necessity

The requirements for implying an easement of necessity were explained in the following case.

[74] Ibid, [3.30].

Manjang v Drammeh
(1991) 61 P & CR 194, PC

Lord Oliver

At 197

There has to be found, first, a common owner of a legal estate in two plots of land. It has, secondly, to be established that access between one of those plots and the public highway can be obtained only over the other plot. Thirdly, there has to be found a disposition of one of the plots without any specific grant or reservation of a right of access. Given these conditions, it may be possible as a matter of construction of the relevant grant [. . .] to imply the reservation of an easement of necessity.

Easements of necessity are confined to situations in which land becomes landlocked when a common owner sells (or leases) part of his or her land. In this situation, it is clear that the burden of the right of way does not fall upon some third party, whose land happens to provide the required access.[75]

An easement of necessity will only be implied where the land cannot otherwise be used at all. A high degree of necessity is thus required, which is likely only to be found where a right of way is necessary to provide access.[76] Even then, a right will not arise where an alternative access is available, however inconvenient or impractical that access might be.[77] The scope of the right is limited to what is essential to the use of the dominant land[78] at the date of its disposal.[79] It is unclear whether an easement of necessity will cease should the right subsequently become unnecessary.[80]

The basis of easements of necessity lies in intention and not public policy.[81]

Nickerson v Barraclough
[1981] Ch 426, CA

Brightman LJ

At 440

In this court we have heard a great deal of argument about ways of necessity—what is their basis, how they can be acquired and whether they can be lost. With the utmost respect to the Vice-Chancellor, I have come to the conclusion that the doctrine of way of necessity is 75 Thus avoiding a claim that the third party's human rights had been infringed by an unjustified interference with his possessions under Art 1 of the First Protocol to the European Convention on Human Rights. See further Chapter 3.

76 An essential right of support might be another candidate.

77 Union Lighterage Co v London Graving Dock Co [1902] 2 Ch 577; Manjang v Drammeh (1990) 61 P & CR 194; Titchmarsh v Royston Water Co Ltd (1899) 81 LT 673.

78 For example, vehicular access will not be necessary where pedestrian access is adequate: see MRA Engineering Ltd v Trimster (1988) 50 P & CR 1.

79 Corporation of London v Riggs (1880) 13 Ch D 798.

80 See the conflicting authority in Holmes v Goring (1824) 2 Bing 76; Donaldson v Smith [2006] All ER (D) 293; Proctor v Hodgson (1855) 10 Exch 824; Barkshire v Grubb (1881) 18 Ch D 816; Huckvale v Aegean Hotels Ltd (1989) 58 P & CR 163.

81 These comments are dicta, but have been subsequently approved by the Court of Appeal in Adealon International Corp Pty Ltd v Merton LBC [2007] EWCA Civ 362, [2007] 1 WLR 1898.

not founded upon public policy at all but upon an implication from the circumstances. I accept that there are reported cases, and textbooks, in which public policy is suggested as a possible foundation of the doctrine, but such a suggestion is not, in my opinion, correct. It is well established that a way of necessity is never found to exist except in association with a grant of land: see Proctor v. Hodgson (1855) 10 Exch. 824, where it was held that land acquired by escheat got no way of necessity; and Wilkes v. Greenway (1890) 6 T.L.R. 449, where land acquired by prescription got no way of necessity. If a way of necessity were based upon public policy, I see no reason why land acquired by escheat or by prescription should be excluded. Furthermore, there would seem to be no particular reason to father the doctrine of way of necessity upon public policy when implication is such an obvious and convenient candidate for paternity. There is an Australian case, North Sydney Printing Pty. Ltd. v. Sabemo Investment Corporation Pty. Ltd. [1971] 2 N.S.W.L.R. 150, where that conclusion was reached. Furthermore, I cannot accept that public policy can play any part at all in the construction of an instrument; in construing a document the court is endeavouring to ascertain the expressed intention of the parties. Public policy may require the court to frustrate that intention where the contract is against public policy, but in my view public policy cannot help the court to ascertain what that intention was. So I reach the view that a way of necessity is not founded upon public policy; that considerations of public policy cannot influence the construction of the 1906 conveyance; and that this action is not concerned with a way of necessity strictly so called.

This view has limited the scope of easements of necessity in a number of respects. Most obviously, an easement of necessity will give way to a contrary intention, but the intention-based nature of the rule has other consequences. For example, easements of necessity will not arise where land has been acquired by adverse possession or compulsory purchase where there is no agreement from which to derive any intention. The need for common ownership of the dominant and servient land, and the static assessment of necessity at the date of severance of the land, also flow from the constraints of intention.

Several commentators have argued that public policy is a more attractive foundation for easements of necessity. They argue that any intention of the parties is purely fictional,[82] and suggest that the rational development of the doctrine has been compromised by the focus upon intention rather than utility.[83]

Bradbrook, 'Access to Landlocked Land: A Comparative Study of Legal Solutions' (1983–85) 10 Syd LR 39

At 46

[T]he development of easements of necessity has proceeded on an ad hoc basis rather than as a result of a co-ordinated response to a social problem, and the courts have shown themselves to be more interested in maintaining the conceptual purity of the law of implied grants than in devising an effective means of resolving a practical problem.

82 Simonton, 'Ways by Necessity' (1925) 25 Col LR 571. 576 and 601; Jackson (1981) 34 CLP 133, 152; Bodkin (1973) 89 LQR 87.

83 Bradbrook, 'Access to Landlocked Land: A Comparative Study of Legal Solutions' (1983–85) 10 Syd LR 39, 44–6; Davis, 'Informal Acquisition and Loss of Rights in Land: What Justifies the Doctrines?' (2000) 20 LS 198, 219; Lawson (2002), p 81.

At 56

[A] guaranteed access to landlocked land could most easily be achieved in common law jurisdictions if the courts were to recognise public policy as the basis of the easement of necessity. This change would remove the limitations on the scope of easements [. . .] for example, if it were based upon public policy rather than intention of the parties it would not be restricted to cases where the landlocking arose on a subdivision, and in appropriate cases could be granted through private land belonging to third parties. While this change would run contrary to the recent Court of Appeal decision in Nickerson v Barraclough, it would not be revolutionary as the earliest reported cases on the easement of necessity appear to have accepted public policy rather than intention as the basis of the easements [. . .] The change to the present basis of intention did not occur until the nineteenth century and appears to have been due to the jurist tendency by the courts at that time to treat all legal transactions as if they were based on contracts.

3.2.2 Intended easements

The circumstances when an easement may be implied on the basis of intention were explained in the following case.

Pwllbach Colliery Co Ltd v Woodman
[1915] AC 634

Lord Parker

At 646

[. . .] the cases in which an easement can be granted by implication may be classified under two heads. The first is where the implication arises because the right in question is necessary for the enjoyment of some other right expressly granted [. . .] Thus the right of drawing water from a spring necessarily involves the right of going to the spring for the purpose. The implication suggested in the present case does not fall under this principle; there is no express grant of any right to which the right claimed must be necessarily ancillary, [. . .] The second class of cases in which easements may impliedly be created depends not upon the terms of the grant itself, but upon the circumstances under which the grant was made. The law will readily imply the grant or reservation of such easements as may be necessary to give effect to the common intention of the parties to a grant of real property, with reference to the manner or purposes in and for which the land granted or some land retained by the grantor is to be used [. . .] But it is essential for this purpose that the parties should intend that the subject of the grant or the land retained by the grantor should be used in some definite and particular manner. It is not enough that the subject of the grant or the land retained should be intended to be used in a manner which may or may not involve this definite and particular use.

Lord Parker identifies two circumstances: the first, where the easement is necessary for the enjoyment of a right that is expressly granted; the second, where the easement is necessary to enable the dominant owner to use the land for the purpose for which it was sold or leased. An example of the first instance is given by Lord Parker in the above extract and an example of the second instance is found in Wong v Beaumont Property Trust Ltd.[84] Mr Wong leased the basement of a building to use as a Chinese restaurant. The lease provided that the basement should be used for this purpose, and, furthermore, that Mr Wong should control and eliminate all smells, comply with the required health regulations, and should not cause any nuisance to the landlord or adjoining occupiers. It became clear that the existing ventilation system was inadequate and a larger flue was required, but his landlords objected. An easement was implied to enable Mr Wong to comply with his obligations under the lease. In this second situation, it is clear that the implication does not arise because the parties necessarily intended that an easement be granted: it was clear in Wong that the parties had not anticipated the need for the larger flue, but they had made clear the intended use of the premise in the terms of the lease and it is from this intention that the right was implied.

[84] [1965] 1 QB 173. See also Davies v Bramwell [2007] EWCA Civ 821.

Nourse LJ in the following case explains the process of proof being, firstly, to establish on a balance of probabilities the nature of the intended user, and secondly, to prove that the easement claimed is necessary to give effect to that use. In Wong, the parties had clearly expressed their intended use, but as the following case shows, the requisite intention may be established on a balance of probabilities.

Stafford v Lee
(1993) 63 P & CR 172, CA

Facts: In 1955, an area of woodland that fronted on a private drive was conveyed to Mrs Lee's predecessor in title, but no right of way was expressly granted over the drive. Mrs Lee wanted to build a house on the woodland, and claimed a pedestrian and vehicular right of way over the drive, on the basis that it was the intention of the parties to the 1955 conveyance that a house be built upon the woodland.

Nourse LJ

At 175

Intended easements, like all other implied easements, are subject to the general rule that they are implied more readily in favour of a grantee than a grantor. But even there, as Lord Parker points out, the parties must intend that the subject of the grant shall be used in some definite and particular manner. If the grantee can establish the requisite intention, the law will then imply the grant of such easements as may be necessary to give effect to it.

There are therefore two hurdles which the grantee must surmount. He must establish a common intention as to some definite and particular user. Then he must show that the easements he claims are necessary to give effect to it. Notwithstanding the submissions of Miss Baker, for the defendants, to the contrary, I think that the second hurdle is no great obstacle to the plaintiffs in this case. The real question is whether they can surmount the first.

It is axiomatic that in construing any conveyance you must take into account the facts in reference to which it was made. But here, no extrinsic evidence having been adduced on either side, we can refer only to the 1955 deed [. . .] The defendants admitted in their defence that the 1955 deed did pass to Mrs Walker a right to use Marley Drive and that that right had passed to the plaintiffs. But they have at all times contended that the right was limited to use for all purposes necessary for the reasonable enjoyment of the land as woodland, being the manner of its enjoyment in 1955. Such a right is manifestly inadequate for the plaintiffs' purposes.

The first point to be made about the defendants' contention is that, although it may sometimes come to the same thing, the material question in a case of an intended easement is not how was the land enjoyed in 1955, but did the parties to the 1955 deed intend that it should be used in some definite and particular manner and, if so, what? [...] The requirement that the parties should have intended a definite and particular use for the land does not require that the intention be proved as a certainty. As always, it is enough that it is proved on the balance of probabilities. What help do we get from the 1955 deed in this regard? First, it is to be observed that Mrs. Walker's address, far from being in the neighbourhood, is stated to be in distant Sussex. Secondly, and far more significantly, there is the plan [...]

The significant, indeed the eye-catching, feature of the plan here is that it delineates, as the land conveyed, a plot adjoining and of comparable area to two other enclosures, each adjoining the other, which, from the legends they bear, are seen to be plots of land on which dwellings have already been constructed. In these circumstances and given, as the defendants accept, that some appurtenant right of way was intended over and along Marley Drive, what are the probabilities as to the intended use of the land? In my judgment, on the balance of probabilities, the parties can only have intended that it should be used for the construction of another dwelling to be used thereafter for residential purposes. I cannot see what other intention could reasonably be imputed to them. Having got to that point, I am satisfied that the easements claimed by the plaintiffs and declared in their favour by the judge are necessary, and are no more than are necessary, to give effect to the intention so established.

Lawson points out that there is a third situation in which an intended easement may be implied, which, although broadly based upon Pwllbach, is distinguishable from an easement of intended use.[85] This third category is derived from the following case, in which the Court indicated that a reservation[86] could be implied, based upon the parties' intention—although here it is the parties' intention as to creation of the right itself.

The case concerned an implied reservation, which, as Nourse LJ observed in the above extract, is less readily implied then an easement—the rationale being that the grantor should avoid the risk of derogating from his or her grant by taking care to expressly reserve any rights that he or she wishes to enjoy. Jenkins LJ explains in the case that although a reservation will not generally be implied, there are exceptions: we have already considered easements of necessity; another exception is intended easements.

Re Webb's Lease

[1951] Ch 808, CA

Facts: Webb ran a butchers shop on the ground floor of a building that he leased in south London. He sublet the upper floors, on the external walls of which advertisements were displayed. For many years, the tenant of the upper floors raised no objection to these advertisements, but he then demanded payment for them to be retained.

Jenkins LJ

At 823

As to the law applicable to the case, it is not disputed that as a general rule a grantor, whether by conveyance or lease, of part of a hereditament in his ownership, cannot claim any 85 Lawson (2002), p 83.

86 The case concerns a reservation, but there seems no reason why the grant of an easement should not also be implied under this third category, although there have been no such cases. Lawson (2002), p 85 explains that other grounds for the implication of the grant of an easement present more attractive options.

easement over the part retained unless it is expressly reserved out of the grant [. . .] There are however, certain exceptions to the general rule. Two well-established exceptions relate to easements of necessity and mutual easements such as rights of support between adjacent buildings. But it is recognised in the authorities that these two specific exceptions do not exhaust the list which is indeed incapable of exhaustive statement, as the circumstances of any particular case may be such as to raise a necessary inference that the common intention of the parties must have been to reserve some easement to the grantor, or such as to preclude the grantee from denying the right consistently with good faith, and there appears to be no doubt that where circumstances such as these are clearly established the court will imply the appropriate reservation.

The question arises as to how the courts are to find this intention. In Re Webb's Lease, Jenkins LJ went on to state that the appropriate test was one of necessary inference, based upon proof by the landlord that the facts were not reasonably consistent with any other explanation—a test that Mr Webb failed to satisfy.[87] It was not sufficient that his tenant knew and had raised no objection to the advertisements.

Re Webb's Lease
[1951] Ch 808, CA

Jenkins LJ

At 828

The question is whether the circumstances of the case as proved in evidence are such as to raise a necessary inference that the common intention of the parties was to reserve to the landlord during the twenty-one years' term some, and if so what, rights in regard to the display of advertisements over the outer walls of the demised premises, or such as to preclude the tenant from denying the implied reservation to the landlord of some such rights consistently with good faith.

That question must be approached with the following principles in mind: (i) If the landlord intended to reserve any such rights over the demised premises it was his duty to reserve them expressly in the lease of August 11, 1949 (Wheeldon v. Burrows); (ii) The landlord having failed in this duty, the onus was upon him to establish the facts to prove, and prove clearly, that his case was an exception to the rule (Aldridge v. Wright); (iii) The mere fact that the tenant knew at the date of the lease of August 11, 1949, that the landlord was using the outer walls of the demised premises for the display of the advertisements in question did not suffice to absolve the landlord from his duty of expressly reserving any rights in respect of them he intended to claim, or to take the case out of the general rule [. . .]

Does this circumstance suffice to raise a necessary inference of an intention common to both parties at the date of the lease that the landlord should have reserved to him the right to maintain these advertisements throughout the twenty-one years' term thereby granted? I cannot see that it does. The most that can be said is that the facts are consistent with such a common intention. But that will not do. The landlord must surely show at least that the facts are not reasonably consistent with any other explanation. Here he manifestly fails.

There is considerable uncertainty as to the interface between easements of necessity and of intention. They seem to overlap, but it is clear that intended easements may be applied to a wider range of rights than the rights of access to which easements of necessity are largely confined.

[87] The test was also not satisfied in Chaffe v Kingsley (2000) 79 P & CR 404, but was met in Peckham v Ellison (2000) 79 P & CR 276. The decision has been criticized: see Fox [1999] Conv 353.

Lawson advocates realigning the categories, with easements of intended use ('Pwllbach easements') encompassing and taking over from easements of necessity, and intended easements being confined to those based upon the parties' intention to create such rights ('Re Webb's Lease easements').

Lawson, 'Easements' in Land Law: Issues, Debates and Policy (ed Tee, 2002, p 85)

[...] there is a great deal of uncertainty about the precise relationship between easements of necessity and Pwllbach easements. In Nickerson v Barrowclough Megarry V-C seemed to regard them as 'two distinct but overlapping' ways in which easements might be implied on the basis of necessity. Both require the right to be strictly necessary for the use of the land concerned. The distinction is that for easements of necessity the right must be necessary in order for the land to be used in any manner at all, whereas for intended easements the right must be necessary in order for the land to be used in the particular manner intended by the parties.

The distinction between easements of necessity and the Pwllbach intended easements is frequently clouded by a judicial tendency to refer to both as easements of necessity. It may be that, in any event, it is a distinction without a difference. It is arguable that, as the courts are now prepared to imply a common intention to use the land in a specific way, they will be able to find such an intention whenever landlocked plot is conveyed—thus eclipsing the traditional easements of necessity. The precise limits of the situations in which the courts are prepared to find that there is an implied intention to use the land in a particular way have not yet been fully explored, however. It is suggested, for instance that a court will not be as inclined to find that a use was intended in the case of a reservation as it is in relation to a grant.

The view that the easement of necessity, at least in relation to implied grant, has been subsumed within the Pwllbach intended easement is very attractive. Both are driven by the policy that land should not become sterile but be used to its full potential. Though intention is relevant to both, neither requires proof that the parties actually intended the claimed easement. The Pwllbach easement could drop the misleading title of 'intended easements' and become a legitimate easement of necessity. The title 'intended easement' could, instead, be reserved for easements implied under Re Webbs Lease. These do not require the easement to be necessary for the land to be used and are therefore quite distinct.

3.2.3 The rule in Wheeldon v Burrows

The rule in Wheeldon v Burrows is stated by Thesiger LJ in the case of that name.

Wheeldon v Burrows
(1879) 12 LR Ch D 31

Thesiger LJ

At 49

[...] on the grant by the owner of a tenement or part of that tenement as it is then used and enjoyed, there will pass to the grantee all those continuous and apparent easements (by which, of course, I mean quasi easements) or, in other words, all those easements which are > necessary for the reasonable enjoyment of the property granted, and which have been and are at the time of the grant used by the owner of the entirety for the benefit of the part granted.

The rule thus applies on the sale or lease of part of property when certain qualifying rights, enjoyed for the benefit of the part sold or leased (the dominant land) over the part retained (the servient land), will mature into easements. Prior to the sale or lease, such rights could not exist as easements, because of the common ownership of the dominant and servient land; they are thus referred to as 'quasi-easements'.

The rule is based upon the intention of the parties that the grantor should not derogate from his or her grant and thus gives way to a contrary intention. The rule only applies to the grant of easements, or where the sales of the dominant and servient land are simultaneous.[88] It does not operate to imply a reservation; indeed, this was the point at issue in Wheeldon v Burrows,[89] and is referred to as the 'second rule in Wheeldon v Burrows', found later in Thesiger LJ's judgment.

Wheeldon v Burrows
(1879) 12 LR Ch D 31

Thesiger LJ

At 58–9

> These cases [. . .] support the propositions that in the case of a grant you may imply a grant of such continuous and apparent easements or such easements as are necessary to the reasonable enjoyment of the property conveyed, and have in fact been enjoyed during the unity of ownership, but that, with the exception which I referred to of easements of necessity, you cannot imply a similar reservation in favour of the grantor of land.

Only certain quasi-easements qualify to pass under the rule. They must be enjoyed at the time of the sale or lease, be 'continuous and apparent', and/or be reasonably necessary for the enjoyment of the property.

The first requirement is relatively straightforward. It imposes a timing constraint on the application of the rule that flows from the principle of non-derogation from grant.[90] It is the second and third requirements, and their interrelationship, that has led to the greatest uncertainty and debate.

The second requirement has its origins in the French Civil Code.[91] 'Continuous', in this context, does not mean that the right must be continuously exercised, but rather invokes the sense of permanence, so that the right might be exercised whenever necessary. 'Apparent'

[88] Schwann v Cotton [1916] 2 Ch 120. See also Donaldson v Smith [2006] All ER (D) 293, [16], per Donaldson QC, measuring simultaneity in context to look not solely at chronological proximity, but also at the interconnection between the two transactions.

[89] Burrows was seeking a right to light from land owned by Wheeldon, after a hoarding was erected that blocked the light to Burrows' workshop. Burrows and Wheeldon had acquired their land from a common vendor, with Burrows purchasing his land after Wheeldon.. Any rights that Burrows wished to claim over Wheeldon's land would, thus, have to be reserved by their common vendor—but there had been no express reservation and thus Burrows' claim failed.

[90] Sovmots Investment Ltd v Secretary of State for the Environment [1979] AC 144.

[91] Simpson, 'Wheeldon v Burrows and the Code Civile' [1967] 83 LQR 240.

is the more significant part of the second requirement. Indeed, it has been suggested that 'continuousness is little more than a distraction' and could be jettisoned.[92] For a right to be apparent, it should be discoverable from a reasonably careful physical inspection of the land. There must thus be some feature on the servient land—for example, a roadway or manhole cover—that signals the right to a purchaser.

Ward v Kirkland
[1967] Ch 194, HC

Facts: The Wards' cottage adjoined Kirkland's farm, which, at one time, had been owned by a common owner. The cottage was built so close to the farm's boundary that the only practical way for its walls to be maintained was to go onto the farm. The Wards and their predecessor in title had done so for some time before Kirkland objected.

Ungoed-Thomas J

At 225

Here, there certainly has been continuous user, in the sense that the right has in fact been used whenever the need arose. But the words "continuous and apparent" seem to be directed to there being on the servient tenement a feature which would be seen on inspection and which is neither transitory nor intermittent; for example, drains, paths, as contrasted with the bowsprits of ships overhanging a piece of land.

Here it is conceded that it was only possible or practicable for the occupiers of the cottage to maintain the boundary wall by going onto the defendant's property as claimed in this case. That would be obvious on an inspection of the properties. But there was no feature on the defendant's property designed or appropriated for such maintenance.

The third requirement calls for the right to be necessary for the reasonable enjoyment of the land and flows directly from the principle that the grantor should not derogate from his or her grant. 'Necessity', in this context, is significantly wider than the test demanded of easements of necessity, although the degree of necessity is unclear.

Thompson bemoans this uncertainty and advocates a test that merely calls for the right to be capable of being an easement by accommodating the dominant land.

Thompson, 'Paths and Pigs' [1995] Conv 239, 240–1

What appears to be necessary is that, to acquire an easement under Wheeldon v. Burrows, the right in question must do more than merely accommodate the dominant tenement but need not be an absolute necessity. Rather, it hovers somewhere in between, at some ill-defined point between the two. The difference between what is essential for the land to be used and what is necessary for its reasonable use is not an easy one to draw and, in consequence, it may, in the future, prove difficult to predict when a quasi-easement will be transformed into a full easement under the rule.

[. . .] [I]t would seem preferable that the second limb of Wheeldon v. Burrows should be interpreted to mean, in essence, that the right claimed accommodates the dominant tenement; the same requirement as exists when section 62 is in issue.

[92] Lawson (2002) p 88.

The uncertainty is illustrated by cases in which an alternative means of access is claimed to be reasonably necessary for the enjoyment of the land. An existing means of access will not be fatal to a claim under Wheeldon v Burrows, but it is evident that simply providing a more convenient access is unlikely to be enough:[93] the alternative access should offer some additional advantage.[94] The impact upon the servient land of the additional access should also be considered.[95]

A question that has dogged debate on Wheeldon v Burrows is whether the second and third requirements are synonymous, alternative, or cumulative. The authorities are not conclusive,[96] but the case for a cumulative interpretation has strong advocates.[97]

Gardner, An Introduction to Land Law (2009, p 166)

[...] [T]he rule in Wheeldon v Burrows [...] actually creates an easement, by imputing an intention to confer it. And the existence of a continuous and apparent quasi-easement alone is an inadequate basis on which to do this. The imputation is acceptable only when the additional utilitarian argument for it is sufficiently powerful. The fact that I visibly did something in the past may contribute to the making of such an argument, by giving a prima facie indication that the alleged easement would be useful. But to complete the argument, the easement must be positively needed: as the law has it, 'necessary for the reasonable enjoyment' of the land transferred. Perhaps for this reason, although the relevant case law is in disarray, the majority of commentators agree that this third requirement is essential.

3.2.4 Law of Property Act 1925, s 62

Law of Property Act 1925, s 62(1)[98]

(1) A conveyance of land shall be deemed to include and shall by virtue of this Act operate to convey, with the land, all buildings, erections, fixtures, commons, hedges, ditches, fences, ways, waters, watercourses, liberties, privileges, easements, rights, and advantages whatsoever, appertaining or reputed to appertain to the land or any part thereof, or, at the time of conveyance, demised, occupied, or enjoyed with, or reputed or known as part or parcel of or appurtenant to the land or any part thereof.

93 See Goldberg v Edwards [1950] Ch 247 and Wheeler v Saunders [1996] Ch 19.

94 See Borman v Griffith [1930] 1 Ch 493, in which the alternative access was more suitable for the claimant's business as a poultry dealer, the other access being impassable to heavy vehicles at certain times of the year; Millman v Ellis (1995) 71 P & CR 158, 163, in which the right to use a lay-by to join a busy road was held to be reasonably necessary as 'a matter concerned with safety and possible injury to life and limb'.

95 Ferris, 'Problems Postponed:The Rule in Wheeldon v Burrows and Wheeler v Saunders' (1996) 3 Web JCLI.

96 See Hansford v Jargo [1921] 1 Ch 322, 338, per Russel J; Borman v Griffith [1930] 1 Ch 493, 499, per Maugham J; Ward v Kirkland [1967] Ch 194, 224–5, per Ungoed Thomas J; Savmots v Investments Ltd v Secretary of State for the Environment [1979] AC 145, 169, per Lord Wilberforce, and 175, per Lord Edmund-Davies; Squarrey v Harris Smith (1981) 42 P & CR 118, 124, per Oliver LJ; Wheeler v Saunders [1996] Ch 19, 31, per Peter Gibson LJ.

97 See also Harpum, 'Easements and Centre Point: Old Problems Resolved in a Novel Setting' (1977) 41 Conv 415, 422, who points out that the two limbs of the rule have separate functions: one that facilitates discovery and the other derived from non-derogation from grant.

98 Replacing Conveyancing Act 1881, s 6.

Section 62(4) of the LPA 1925 provides that the 'section applies only if and as far as a contrary intention is not expressed in the conveyance'.[99]

The section was conceived as a word-saving device by implying what is known as a 'general words clause' into conveyances of land, with the object of ensuring that, on a sale or other disposal, all rights and privileges appurtenant to the land at the time of the conveyance will pass without express mention.[100] It can only operate where there has been the creation or transfer of a legal right in a deed—that is, a conveyance.[101] Judicial interpretation of the section has, however, extended its operation: not only will the section pass existing easements, but it will also operate to upgrade a mere permission into a full-fledged legal easement. In effect, the informality of the original permission is cured by the formality of the subsequent conveyance, which is 'deemed to include and shall [. . .] operate to convey' the right. It is this aspect of the section that we must explore further, as a means of implied grant.[102]

Farwell J first held that this was the effect of what is now s 62 of the 1925 Act[103] in the following case.

International Tea Stores Co v Hobbs
[1903] 2 Ch 165

Facts: Hobbs was a blacksmith who let the shop adjoining his forge to the claimants and allowed them to use a private road, which formed part of the forge, to access the rear of the shop. The claimants subsequently bought the shop from Hobbs, who tried to prevent them from using the road. They successfully claimed that the privilege that they had enjoyed to use the road had become an easement by virtue of the implied general words. Farwell J rejected as immaterial the fact that the privilege was enjoyed merely by permission; it was only significant that they had used the road.

Farwell J

At 171

But, in my opinion, precariousness has nothing to do with this sort of case, where a privilege which is by its nature known to the law—namely, a right of way—has been in fact enjoyed [. . .] The real truth is that you do not consider the question of title to use, but the question of fact of user; you have to inquire whether the way has in fact been used, not under what title has it been used, although you must of course take into consideration all the circumstances of the case [. . .]

Farewell's views were indorsed by the Court of Appeal in the following case, in which the Court also set out the other characteristics of the rights that come within the section.

[99] Selby DC v Samuel Smith Old Brewery (Tadcaster) Ltd (2000) 80 P & CR 466; P&S Platt Ltd v Crouch [2003] EWCA Civ 1110.

[100] Legal easements pass automatically, without express mention, and thus the primary focus was upon equitable and quasi-easements. It was conveyancing practice to include an express general words clause.

[101] In contrast to Wheeldon v Burrows, which may operate at the contractual stage: see Borman v Griffith [1930] 1 Ch 493.

[102] Section 62 is sometimes categorized as giving rise to an express grant because the right is read into the conveyance. It is perhaps more convenient to view the grant as implied, given that it does not need to be completed by registration: see Land Registration Act 2002, s 27(7).

[103] The provision was previously comprised in s 6 of the Convenyancing Act 1881.

Wright v Macadam
[1949] 2 KB 744, CA

Facts: Wright was a weekly tenant of two rooms on the top floor of Macadam's house when Macadam gave her permission to use the coal shed at the bottom of the garden to store coal. Subsequently, Wright took a new tenancy of the two rooms, plus another room; the tenancy agreement contained no reference to the use of the coal shed, which Wright continued to use until Macadam asked her to pay for the privilege. Wright refused and successfully claimed that she had an easement to use the coal shed by virtue of s 62 of the 1925 Act.

Jenkins LJ

At 748

First, the section is not confined to rights which, as a matter of law, were so annexed or appurtenant to the property conveyed at the time of the conveyance as to make them actual legally enforceable rights. Thus, on the severance of a piece of land in common ownership, the quasi easements de facto enjoyed in respect of it by one part of the land over another will pass although, of course, as a matter of law, no man can have a right appendant or appurtenant to one part of his property exerciseable by him over the other part of his property. Secondly, the right, in order to pass, need not be one to which the owner or occupier for the time being of the land has had what may be described as a permanent title. A right enjoyed merely by permission is enough. The leading authority for that proposition is the case of International Tea Stores Co. v. Hobbs [. . .]

At 750

There is, therefore, ample authority for the proposition that a right in fact enjoyed with property will pass on a conveyance of the property by virtue of the grant to be read into it under s. 62, even although down to the date of the conveyance the right was exercised by permission only, and therefore was in that sense precarious.

The next proposition deducible from the cases is the one laid down in Burrows v. Lang [1912] 2 Ch 502, which has been referred to in some of the passages I have already read. It is that the right in question must be a right known to the law [. . .] It is necessary to keep clearly in mind the distinction between "precariousness" in the sense in which it is used in relation to quasi rights of that description, and precariousness of title as used in relation to a permissively exercised right. For the purposes of s. 62, it is only necessary that the right should be one capable of being granted at law, or, in other words, a right known to the law. If it is a right of that description it matters not, as the International Tea Stores case shows, that it has been in fact enjoyed by permission only. The reason for that is clear, for, on the assumption that the right is included or imported into the parcels of the conveyance by virtue of s. 62, the grant under the conveyance supplies what one may call the defect in title, and substitutes a new title based on the grant.

There is one other point to be mentioned. A further exception has been recognized in cases in which there could in the circumstances of the case have been no expectation that the enjoyment of the right could be other than temporary. That exception was recognized by Cotton L.J. in Birmingham & Dudley District Banking Company v. Ross (1889) 38 Ch D 295 [. . .] [A]pplying the principles [. . .] to the present case one finds, I think, this. First of all, on the evidence the coal shed was used by Mrs. Wright by the permission of Mr. Macadam, but International Tea Stores Co. v. Hobbs shows that that does not prevent s. 62 from applying, because permissive as the right may have been it was in fact enjoyed.

> Next, the right was, as I understand it, a right to use the coal shed in question for the purpose of storing such coal as might be required for the domestic purposes of the flat. In my judgment that is a right or easement which the law will clearly recognize, and it is a right or easement of a kind which could readily be included in a lease or conveyance by the insertion of appropriate words in the parcels. This, therefore, is not a case in which a title to a right unknown to the law is claimed by virtue of s. 62. Nor is it a case in which it can be said to have been in the contemplation of the parties that the enjoyment of the right should be purely temporary. No limit was set as to the time during which the coal shed could continue to be used. Mr. Macadam simply gave his permission; that permission was acted on; and the use of the coal shed in fact went on down to August 28, 1943, and thereafter down to 1947. Therefore, applying to the facts of the present case the principles which seem to be deducible from the authorities, the conclusion to which I have come is that the right to use the coal shed was at the date of the letting of August 28, 1943, a right enjoyed with the top floor flat within the meaning of s. 62 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, with the result that (as no contrary intention was expressed in the document) the right in question must be regarded as having passed by virtue of that letting, just as it would have passed if it had been mentioned in express terms in cl. 1, which sets out the subject-matter of the lease.

This 'metamorphosis from personal to property right'[104] has been subject to widespread academic[105] and judicial[106] criticism, and the Law Commission has recommended that this aspect of s 62 should be abrogated.[107]

Tee explains why the Court's reasoning is faulty.

Tee, 'Metamorphoses and Section 62 of the Law of Property Act 1925'
[1998] Conv 115, 123

> [. . .] [T]he word "right" is being used in two quite different meanings, to illogical effect. A right in technical terms is enforceable—it may be enforceable only in equity, in which case it is an equitable right, or it may be enforceable at law. To start with, the only right which Mrs Wright had was the negative and precarious right not to be sued in trespass before the permission was revoked. An easement to store coal is quite a different matter; once created, it is enforceable against not only third parties, but against the original grantor as well. It is, in the technical and full sense of the word, a right [. . .] Jenkins L.J. was using the word "right" in its technical and full meaning; but [. . .] the right referred to must mean Mrs Wright's original "right", i.e. not to be sued.

Thus, a licence is not a proprietary right that is capable of binding third parties; it is merely a defence to an action for trespass.[108] As such, it should not be construed as a privilege appurtenant to land within the meaning of s 62.

104 Tee, 'Metamorphoses and Section 62 of the Law of Property Act 1925' [1998] Conv 115, 115.

105 See ibid and Megarry and Wade: The Law of Real Property (6th edn, ed Harpum, 2000), [18–111].

106 See Wright v Macadam [1949] 2 KB 744, 755, per Tucker LJ; Green v Ashco Horticulturist Ltd [1966] 1 WLR 889, 897, per Cross J; Hair v Gillman (2000) 80 P & CR 108, 116, per Chadwick LJ; Commission for the New Towns v Gallagher [2002] EWHC 2668, (2003) 2 P & CR 24, [61], per Neuberger J.

107 Reform has been advocated by the Law Commission since 1971. Its most recent recommendation is found in Law Comm 327 (2011), [3.64].

108 See Chapter 21, sections 2 and 3.

Section 62 may thus operate to create an easement where the dominant and servient land are in common ownership, and the dominant land is sold or leased in circumstances under which an informal right has been enjoyed by the purchaser or tenant over the servient land retained by the seller or landlord. It cannot operate to create an implied reservation where the servient land is sold or leased.[109] In this respect, it looks similar to Wheeldon v Burrows, but there are important distinctions:

- s 62 requires a conveyance by deed to create/transfer a legal estate, but Wheeldon v Burrows may operate upon the creation/transfer of an equitable interest;
- s 62 operates only where there is diversity of occupation of the dominant and servient land, whereas Wheeldon v Burrows operates only where there has been common ownership and occupation of the dominant and servient land;
- the nature of the rights that are capable of passing as easements under s 62 are wider than those that can pass under Wheeldon v Burrows.

Diversity of occupation

Section 62 of the LPA 1925 calls for the right to be appurtenant to the dominant land. This requirement has been interpreted as requiring diversity of occupation between the dominant and servient land. Where the dominant and servient land are in common ownership and occupation, the rights exercised over the servient land are exercised by virtue of the occupier's ownership of servient land and not by virtue of the any right appurtenant to the dominant land.

Long v Gowlett
[1923] 2 Ch 177, HC

Facts: Long was the owner of a water mill. He claimed a right of access across fields to repair the riverbank and to cut back the weeds. The previous owners of the mill and fields had done so, and Long unsuccessfully claimed that, upon the sale of the mill, the right had passed to him under the predecessor provision to s 62.

Sargant J

At 199

It is, therefore, necessary for the purpose of dealing with the matter on this footing to consider whether, during the common ownership and occupation of Lot 1 and Lot 2 by Mr. Nichols and his widow, and therefore at the date of the conveyance, there was a "privilege, easement, right or advantage" of the kind now claimed, which can properly be said to have been "demised, occupied or enjoyed" with Lot 1 over Lot 2. It is very difficult to see how this can have been the case. No doubt the common owner and occupier did in fact repair the bank of Lot 2, and cut the weeds there; and no doubt also this repair and cutting would enure not solely for the benefit of Lot 2 (which comprised, amongst other things, a lawn tennis court), so as to prevent its being flooded, but also and very likely to a greater extent for the benefit of Lot 1. But there is nothing to indicate that the acts done on Lot 2 were done otherwise than > in the course of the ownership and occupation of Lot 2, or that they were by way of using a "privilege, easement or advantage" over Lot 2 in connection with Lot 1. The common owner and occupier of Whiteacre and Blackacre may in fact use Blackacre as an alternative and more convenient method of communication between Whiteacre and a neighbouring village. But it has never been held, and would I think be contrary to principle to hold, that (in default of there being a made road over Blackacre forming a continuous and apparent means of communication) a sale and conveyance of Whiteacre alone would carry a right to pass over Blackacre in the same way in which the common owner had been accustomed to pass. As it seems to me, in order that there may be a "privilege, easement or advantage" enjoyed with Whiteacre over Blackacre so as to pass under the statute, there must be something done on Blackacre not due to or comprehended within the general rights of an occupying owner of Blackacre, but of such a nature that it is attributable to a privilege, easement, right or advantage, however precarious, which arises out of the ownership or occupation of Whiteacre, altogether apart from the ownership or occupation of Blackacre. And it is difficult to see how, when there is a common ownership of both Whiteacre and Blackacre, there can be any such relationship between the two closes as (apart from the case of continuous and apparent easements or that of a way of necessity) would be necessary to create a "privilege, easement, right or advantage" within the words of s. 6, sub-s. 2,of the statute. For this purpose it would seem that there must be some diversity of ownership or occupation of the two closes sufficient to refer the act or acts relied on not to mere occupying ownership, but to some advantage or privilege (however far short of a legal right) attaching to the owner or occupier of Whiteacre as such and de facto exercised over Blackacre.

[109] Kent v Kavanagh [2006] EWCA Civ 162, [2007] Ch 1. An implied reservation may arise upon enfranchisement under Leasehold Reform Act 1967, ss 8 and 10.

Long v Gowlett was a controversial decision,[110] but has now been cited with approval by the House of Lords in Sovmots Investment Ltd v Secretary of State for the Environment[111] and followed by the Court of Appeal in the following case, in which the Court noted the distinction between Wheeldon v Burrows and s 62.[112] As Chadwick LJ explains, the situations are usually mutually exclusive: Wheeldon v Burrows applies where there is common ownership and occupation of the dominant and servient land, and s 62 operates where there is common ownership, but diversity of occupation.

Kent v Kavanagh
[2007] Ch 1, CA

Chadwick LJ

At [43]–[47]

> The two propositions which, together, comprise the rule (or rules) in Wheeldon v Burrows are confined, in their application, to cases in which, by reason of the conveyance (or lease), land formerly in common ownership ceases to be owned by the same person. It is in cases of that nature that, in order to give effect to what must be taken to be the common intention of the 110 Harpum, 'Easements and Centre Point: Old Problems Resolved in a Novel Setting' (1977) 41 Conv 415; Smith, 'Centre Point: Faulty Towers with Shaky Foundations' [1978] Conv 449; Harpum, 'Long v Gowlett: A Strong Fortress' [1979] Conv 113.

111 [1979] AC 144, 176, but see [42].

112 The Court of Appeal also endorsed diversity of occupation in Alford v Hannaford [2011] EWCA Civ 1099 but declined to comment in Campbell v Banks [2011] EWCA Civ 61 and appeared to overlook the requirement in P&S Platt Ltd v Crouch [2003] EWCA Civ 1110, [2004] 1 P & CR 18.

grantor and the grantee, the conveyance (or lease) will operate as a grant (for the benefit of the land conveyed) of such easements over the land retained by the grantor as are necessary to the reasonable enjoyment of the land conveyed. But, because the principle is founded on the common intention of the parties, the easements necessary to the reasonable enjoyment of the land conveyed are those which reflect (and, following separation of ownership, are needed to give effect to) the use and enjoyment of the land conveyed at the time of the conveyance and while that land and the retained land were in the common ownership of the grantor.

It is necessary to ask how far either of the two propositions which Thesiger LJ identified in Wheeldon v Burrows can have any application in a case where, at the time of the conveyance, the land conveyed and the land retained, although in common ownership, were not in common occupation. In particular, can either of the two propositions have any application where the land conveyed was occupied by a tenant holding under a lease from the common owner. Assuming, for the moment, that the land is not conveyed to the tenant, there are, of course, two distinct questions: (i) what easements over the retained land pass with the conveyance of the freehold and (ii) what easements are reserved out of the land conveyed for the benefit of the retained land. The rights of the tenant over the land retained; and the rights of the grantor (as owner of the land retained) over the land held under the lease are unaffected by the conveyance. Prima facie, those rights will depend on the terms of the lease—but may include rights which passed to the tenant under the first rule in Wheeldon v Burrows when the lease was granted.

In the absence of an express grant, the answer to the first of those questions—what easements over the retained land pass with the conveyance of the freehold turns, as it seems to me, not on any application of the first rule in Wheeldon v Burrows but on the operation of section 62 of the Law of Property Act 1925. Under section 62 a conveyance of land operates to convey with the land "all [...] ways [...] easements, rights, and advantages whatsoever, appertaining or reputed to appertain to the land [...] or, at the time of conveyance, demised [...] or enjoyed with [...] the land". I can see no reason why those words are not apt to convey, with the freehold, rights of way over the retained land which are, at the time of the conveyance, enjoyed by the tenant in occupation of the land conveyed. For my part, I find that analysis more attractive than one which relies upon the first rule in Wheeldon v Burrows. It seems to me an unnecessary and artificial construct to hold that the grantor, as common owner and the landlord of the land conveyed, is himself using the rights over the retained land which his tenant enjoys under the lease.

In reaching that conclusion I have had regard to the observations of Lord Wilberforce in the Sovmots appeal at 169, that:

> "section 62 does not fit this case. The reason is that when land is under one ownership one cannot speak in any intelligible sense of rights, or privileges, or easements being exercised over one part for the benefit of another. Whatever the owner does, he does as owner and, until a separation occurs, of ownership or at least of occupation, the condition for the existence of rights, etc, does not exist: see Bolton v Bolton (1879) 11 Ch D 968, 970 per Fry J and Long v Gowlett at 189, 198, in my opinion a correct decision."

As Lord Wilberforce pointed out, there can be no sensible concept of rights over one part of land for the benefit of another part while the two parts are in common ownership and occupation. But, once there is a separation of occupation (because part of land in common ownership is held by a tenant under a lease) there is no conceptual difficulty. There may well be rights over the untenanted part of the land for the benefit of the tenanted part. If there are, those rights are within the wide compass of section 62 of the 1925 Act.

> Section 62 of the 1925 Act cannot operate to reserve rights out of the land conveyed for the benefit of the land retained. The words of the section cannot be given that effect. Nor can assistance be found in Wheeldon v Burrows.

Section 62, thus, largely operates in the leasehold context, in which the dominant land is leased and the tenant is granted some privilege over the servient land that is owned and occupied by his landlord.[113] That privilege may be converted to an easement under s 62 upon the renewal of the lease or upon the tenant purchasing the freehold reversion of the dominant land. In Kent v Kavanagh, s 62 also operated where a tenant (including adjoining tenants) exercised a right to acquire their freehold reversions by enfranchisement.[114]

Section 62 may also operate where a purchaser or lessee of the dominant land has been let into possession before the formal conveyance or lease has been executed, and the seller or landlord confers an informal privilege over the servient land. This danger arises because the operative date is the time of the formal conveyance rather than the time at which the purchaser or tenant is let into possession, or, in the case of a lease, the stipulated commencement of the term.[115]

The nature of the rights implied under s 62

A further distinction between Wheeldon v Burrows and s 62 flows from the nature of the rights that can pass under each rule. We have examined the need for rights under Wheeldon v Burrows to be continuous and apparent, and reasonably necessary for the enjoyment of the dominant land; there are no such limitations under s 62, which, accordingly, can apply to a wider range of rights.[116] In so doing, s 62 runs the danger of failing the utility test that underpins implied grant, although the discoverability of the right presents less of a problem.[117]

Gardner, An Introduction to Land Law (2009, p 169–170)

> [...] the implied grant rules in fact operate to impute easements, rather than on the basis of a genuine implicit intention, and section 62 is certainly no exception. To justify the imputation requires a utilitarian argument for the easement in question, bolstered by the degree of consent discernable in my failure to stipulate against it. Even given the prior usage, the rule in Wheeldon v Burrows demands that the claimed easement be 'necessary for the reasonable enjoyment 'of the land transferred, but section 62 has no such requirement, the section demands only a lesser degree of utility to operate. Arguably, that degree is insufficient, even given the element of consent.
>
> There is less difficulty, however, about the fact that section 62 has no requirement that the prior usage be 'continuous and apparent' [...] Such a requirement is in principle useful, as it enables the parties to the transfer to identify the rights the transfer will create. But as we 113 A licence to use the land may not satisfy the necessary diversity of occupation, see Alford v Hannaford ibid.

114 See Lewison LJ, at [70]–[76].

115 Goldberg v Edwards [1950] Ch 247, 256. There appears to be some latitude in determining if the right is being exercised at the time of the conveyance: see Green v Ashco Horticulturist Ltd [1966] 1 WLR 889, 898.

116 There are a number of cases in which claims have failed under Wheeldon v Burrows, but succeeded under s 62: see Goldberg v Edwards [1950] Ch 247 and Ward v Kirkland [1967] Ch 194.

117 Although others have argued that the right should be apparent: see Lawson (2002), p 93.

have seen, for section 62 to apply, the two pieces of land in question must previously have been occupied by different people, with the licence of one over the other. Under these circumstances, the right is likely to be discoverable in its very nature.

Nevertheless, to pass under s 62, the right must be capable of existing as an easement.

Phipps v Pears
[1965] 1 QB 76, CA

Lord Denning

At 84

A fine view, or an expanse open to the winds may be an advantage to a house, but it would not pass under section 62. Whereas a right to use a coal shed or to go along a passage would pass under section 62. The reason being that these last are rights known to the law, whereas the others are not. A right to protection from the weather is not a right known to the law. It does not therefore pass under section 62.

Rights that are capable of fulfilling the easement test, however, may not pass under s 62 where the particular permission given is personal to the individual, or merely temporary, or inherently precarious.[118]

Goldberg v Edwards
[1950] Ch 247, CA

Facts: Mrs Edwards owned a house and rented an annex to Goldberg, from which he ran a business. Prior to the formal entry into the lease, Mrs Edwards had let Goldberg into possession, and has allowed him and his customers to pass through the house to get to the annex, although access could be obtained via an outside passage. She also gave him permission to put up an advertising sign, bell, and a letterbox for the business. The right for Goldberg to use the access through the house became an easement by the operation of s 62, but the other rights were limited to the period of Mrs Edward's ownership of the house and thus did not pass.

Evershed MR

At 255

The various rights here claimed are these: first, a right for the plaintiffs personally to pass through the front door and along the passage of the house [. . .] Secondly, a right to maintain a signboard and an electric bell; thirdly, as a necessary corollary to that, a right for the plaintiffs' customers to use the front door and passage; and, fourthly, a right to use it for the passage of goods. As regards the signboard and the bell, it is to be observed that there is no indication of that matter in the pleadings or in the form of injunction. I need not pursue it, because the finding of the Vice-Chancellor shows quite clearly, to my mind, that everything > except the plaintiffs' right to come and go via this route was expressly limited to such time as the landlord should occupy the house herself. In other words, it was a privilege which she herself allowed so long as she was there, because it did not interfere with her own affairs and business. It was clear that she was not making that privilege any part of the bargain between herself and the tenants of the annex. It is plain, in my view, that these rights, other than the plaintiffs' personal right of passage, were not within the language of s. 62 so as to be covered by the demise to them.

118 See also Green v Ashco Horticulturist Ltd [1966] 1 WLR 889.

>
> That leaves only the personal right. As I have indicated, my main difficulty has been in deciding whether that was similarly limited or limited in some other way so as not properly to be capable of being annexed to the subject-matter of the demise. Having regard to his judgment, I think that I am bound to regard the view of the judge as having been that, in contradistinction to the other rights, it was intended to be something which the plaintiffs should enjoy qua lessees during the term of the demise, though it should not be enjoyed by their servants, workmen or any other persons with their authority.
>
> [. . .] As I have held, though it is limited to the lessees themselves and does not extend to other persons, it would be capable of formulation and incorporation as a term of the lease, and it is, in my judgment, covered by s. 62. To that extent, therefore, but to that limited extent only, the plaintiffs are entitled to succeed [. . .]
>
> I am anxious to guard myself from saying that rights, which were purely personal in the strict sense of that word, would necessarily in every case be covered by s. 62. I base myself on the view that the right here given, though limited to the lessees, was given to them qua lessees; and, as such, it seems to me, it is covered by the principle of Wright v. Macadam and by s. 62.

Gardner[119] has accused the courts of displaying 'a degree of carelessness' in monitoring the easement-like qualities of the rights that have been held to pass as easements under s 62. For example, we have already noted that Wright v Macadam[120] failed to consider whether rights storage ousted the servient owner, whilst the distinctions drawn in Goldberg[121] between rights conferred upon the tenant as a personal favour and as a lessee are not wholly convincing.

3.3 PRESUMED GRANT: PRESCRIPTION

A grant of an easement may be presumed as a result of long user. Lord Hoffman explains the development of the law governing prescription in the following case, which concerned the registration of land as a village green by reason of the long user of the land for recreation by the inhabitants of the village.[122] The claim was for acquisition of a public right, but the same prescription principles apply to the acquisition of easements by private landowners.

[119] Gardner, An Introduction to Land Law (2009), p 168.

[120] [1949] 2 KB 744, CA.

[121] See also Green v Ashco Horticulturist Ltd [1966] 1 WLR 889.

[122] Attempts to prevent development by registering land as a town or village green has led to a surge in cases, a number of which have reached our highest court see R v Oxfordshire CC, ex p Sunningwell Parish Council [2000] 1 AC 335, R (Beresford) v Sunderland CC [2003] UKHL 60, and R (Lewis) v Redcar & Cleveland BC [2010] UKSC 11.

R v Oxfordshire CC, ex p Sunningwell Parish Council
[2000] 1 AC 335

Lord Hoffmann

At 349

English law [. . .] has never had a consistent theory of prescription. It did not treat long enjoyment as being a method of acquiring title. Instead, it approached the question from the other end by treating the lapse of time as either barring the remedy of the former owner or giving rise to a presumption that he had done some act which conferred a lawful title upon the person in de facto possession or enjoyment. Thus the medieval real actions for the recovery of seisin were subject to limitation by reference to various past events. In the time of Bracton the writ of right was limited by reference to the accession of Henry I (1100). The Statute of Merton 1235 (20 Hen. 3, c. 4) brought this date up to the accession of Henry II (1154) and the Statute of Westminster I 1275 (3 Edw. 1, c. 39) extended it to the accession of Richard I in 1189.

The judges used this date by analogy to fix the period of prescription for immemorial custom and the enjoyment of incorporeal hereditaments such as rights of way and other easements. In such cases, however, the period was being used for a different purpose. It was not to bar the remedy but to presume that enjoyment was pursuant to a right having a lawful origin. In the case of easements, this meant a presumption that there had been a grant before 1189 by the freehold owner.

As time went on, however, proof of lawful origin in this way became for practical purposes impossible. The evidence was not available. The judges filled the gap with another presumption. They instructed juries that if there was evidence of enjoyment for the period of living memory, they could presume that the right had existed since 1189. After the Limitation Act 1623 (21 Jac. 1, c. 16), which fixed a 20-year period of limitation for the possessory actions such as ejectment, the judges treated 20 years' enjoyment as by analogy giving rise to the presumption of enjoyment since 1189. But these presumptions arising from enjoyment for the period of living memory or for 20 years, though strong, were not conclusive. They could be rebutted by evidence that the right could not have existed in 1189; for example, because it was appurtenant to a building which had been erected since that date. In the case of easements, the resourcefulness of the judges overcame this obstacle by another presumption, this time of a lost modern grant. As Cockburn C.J. said in the course of an acerbic account of the history of the English law of prescription in Bryant v. Foot (1867) L.R. 2 Q.B. 161, 181:

> "Juries were first told that from user, during living memory, or even during 20 years, they might presume a lost grant or deed; next they were recommended to make such presumption; and lastly, as the final consummation of judicial legislation, it was held that a jury should be told, not only that they might, but also that they were bound to presume the existence of such a lost grant, although neither judge nor jury, nor any one else, had the shadow of a belief that any such instrument had ever really existed."

The result of these developments was that, leaving aside the cases in which (a) it was possible to show that the right could not have existed in 1189 and (b) the doctrine of lost modern grant could not be invoked, the period of 20 years' user was in practice sufficient to establish a prescriptive or customary right. It was not an answer simply to rely upon the improbability of immemorial user or lost modern grant. As Cockburn C.J. observed, the jury were instructed that if there was no evidence absolutely inconsistent with there having been immemorial user or a lost modern grant, they not merely could but should find the prescriptive right established. The emphasis was therefore shifted from the brute fact of the right or custom having existed in 1189 or there having been a lost grant (both of which were acknowledged to be fictions) to the quality of the 20-year user which would justify recognition of a prescriptive right or customary right. It became established that such user had to be, in the Latin phrase, nec vi, nec clam, nec precario: not by force, nor stealth, nor the licence of the owner. (For this requirement in the case of custom, see Mills v. Colchester Corporation (1867) L.R. 2 C.P. 476, 486.) The unifying element in these three vitiating circumstances was that each constituted a reason why it would not have been reasonable to expect the owner to resist the exercise of the right—in the first case, because rights should not be acquired by the use of force, in the second, because the owner would not have known of the user and in the third, because he had consented to the user, but for a limited period. So in Dalton v. Angus & Co. (1881) 6 App. Cas. 740, 773, Fry J. (advising the House of Lords) was able to rationalise the law of prescription as follows:

> "the whole-law of prescription and the whole law which governs the presumption or inference of a grant or covenant rest upon acquiescence. The courts and the judges have had recourse to various expedients for quieting the possession of persons in the exercise of rights which have not been resisted by the persons against whom they are exercised, but in all cases it appears to me that acquiescence and nothing else is the principle upon which these expedients rest."

In the case of easements, the legislature intervened to save the consciences of judges and juries by the Prescription Act 1832 (2 & 3 Will 4, c. 71), of which the short title was "An Act for shortening the Time of Prescription in certain cases." Section 2 (as amended by the Statute Law Revision (No. 2) Act 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 57), section 1, Schedule and the Statute Law Revision Act 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 33), section 1, Schedule 1) provided:

> "No claim which may be lawfully made at the common law, by custom, prescription, or grant, to any way or other easement [. . .] when such way or other matter [. . .] shall have been actually enjoyed by any person claiming right thereto without interruption for the full period of 20 years, shall be defeated or destroyed by showing only that such way or other matter was first enjoyed at any time prior to such period of 20 years, but nevertheless such claim may be defeated in any other way by which the same is now liable to be defeated [. . .]"

Thus in a claim under the Act, what mattered was the quality of enjoyment during the 20-year period. It had to be by a person "claiming right thereto" or, in the language of section 5 of the same Act (as amended by the Act of 1888), which dealt with the forms of pleadings, "as of right." In Bright v. Walker (1834) 1 C.M. & R. 211, 219, two years after the passing of the Act, Parke B. explained what these words meant. He said that the right must have been enjoyed "openly and in the manner that a person rightfully entitled would have used it" and not by stealth or by licence. In Gardner v. Hodgson's Kingston Brewery Co. Ltd. [1903] A.C. 229, 239, Lord Lindley said that the words "as of right" were intended "to have the same meaning as the older expression nec vi, nec clam, nec precario."

As Lord Hoffman explains, the user must be of a certain quality—that is, it must be open and exercised without force or the permission of the servient owner—and it must be established that this user has been exercised for one or more of the three prescription periods. Prescription at common law requires use from time immemorial, which means 1189; accordingly, a successful claim is most unlikely. Prescription by lost modern grant calls for proof of twenty years' user, which will lead to a presumption that a grant of the right had been made, but has now been lost. This presumption is strong and will not be rebutted by positive proof that no grant was made.[123] The Prescription Act 1832 operates by preventing a servient owner from contesting a claim at common law because the right could not have been exercised in 1189 where the claimant can prove user for the twenty years immediately preceding the commencement of proceedings in which the right is claimed. The Act also introduces a long prescription period, which operates positively to give rise to an absolute right on the expiry of the forty years' user.[124]

The Prescription Act 1832 has been much criticized as 'one of the worst drafted Acts on the Statute Book'[125] and, as such, has not supplanted the fiction of lost modern grant. In particular, lost modern grant will operate whenever twenty years' uninterrupted user is established, even if that user was some time ago. In contrast to the Prescription Act 1832, the period of use does not have to continue up to the commencement of proceedings.

3.3.1 The basis of prescription

In Chapter 8, we saw that an adverse possessor may: (i) acquire a property right by taking possession of land; and (ii) later be able to rely on a limitation period that extinguishes the right of the paper owner to recover possession. Prescription operates in a different manner. Long user justifies a presumption or fiction that the servient owner has granted an easement. The presumption is founded upon the acquiescence of the servient owner in failing to prevent the dominant owner from exercising the claimed right.

Dalton v Angus & Co
(1881) 6 LR App Cas 740

Fry J

At 773

[I]n my opinion, the whole law of prescription and the whole law which governs the presumption or inference of a grant or covenant rests upon acquiescence. The Courts and the Judges have had recourse to various expedients for quieting the possession of persons in the exercise of rights which have not been resisted by the persons against whom they are exercised, but in all cases it appears to me that acquiescence and nothing else is the principle upon which these expedients rest. It becomes then of the highest importance to consider of what ingredients acquiescence consists. In many cases, as, for instance, in the case of that acquiescence which creates a right of way, it will be found to involve, 1st, the doing of some act by one man upon the land of another; 2ndly, the absence of right to do that act in the person doing it; 3rdly, the knowledge of the person affected by it that the act is done; 4thly, the power of the person affected by the act to prevent such act either by act on his part or by action in the Courts; and lastly, the abstinence by him from any such interference for such a 123 See Tehidy Minerals Ltd v Norman [1971] 2 QB 518, 543, per Buckley LJ; Mills v Silver [1991] Ch 271, 278, per Dillon LJ. The presumption will be rebutted by proof that the grant could not have been made because of the incapacity of the servient owner, although incapacity may not affect the 40-year prescription period under the Prescription Act 1832 : see dicta of the Court of Appeal in Housden v Conservators of Wimbledon and Putney Commons [2008] EWCA Civ 200 [2008] 1 WLR 1172 noted at [2009] Conv 349. See also the recommendation of the Law Commission in Law Comm 327 (2011), [3.168].

124 The forty-year period must also expire immediately before the commencement of proceedings in which the right is claimed.

125 Law Reform Committee, Fourteenth Report: Acquisition of Easements and Profits by Prescription (Cmnd 3100, 1966), [40].

> length of time as renders it reasonable for the Courts to say that he shall not afterwards interfere to stop the act being done. In some other cases, as, for example, in the case of lights, some of these ingredients are wanting; but I cannot imagine any case of acquiescence in which there is not shewn to be in the servient owner: 1, a knowledge of the acts done; 2, a power in him to stop the acts or to sue in respect of them; and 3, an abstinence on his part from the exercise of such power. That such is the nature of acquiescence and that such is the ground upon which presumptions or inferences of grant or covenant may be made appears to me to be plain, both from reason, from maxim, and from the cases.
>
> As regards the reason of the case, it is plain good sense to hold that a man who can stop an asserted right, or a continued user, and does not do so for a long time, may be told that he has lost his right by his delay and his negligence, and every presumption should therefore be made to quiet a possession thus acquired and enjoyed by the tacit consent of the sufferer. But there is no sense in binding a man by an enjoyment he cannot prevent, or quieting a possession which he could never disturb.

The fiction of a presumed grant raises the distinction that we made in Chapter 4 between independent and dependent acquisition. The fiction suggests that a prescriptive easement is acquired by dependent acquisition—that is, because a grant from A is presumed—rather than because of independent acquisition as a result of B's own unilateral conduct. McFarlane questions whether prescription really is a dependent grant.

McFarlane, The Structure of Property Law (2008, pp 864–5)

> It is possible for B to acquire an Easement simply through the consistent exercise, over a long period, of a right to use A's land. This method of acquisition, referred to as prescription, looks very much like a form of independent acquisition:
>
> 1. B acquires the right through his own, independent conduct, without needing to show that A has exercised his power to give B an Easement.
> 2. Once B has behaved, for a long period, as though he has the right, it is no longer possible for A to deny B that right.
>
> However, the courts do not currently treat prescription as an example of independent acquisition. Instead, when B acquires an Easement through long use, it is assumed that A, or a former owner of A's land, exercised his power to give B an Easement. Strictly speaking then, prescription is simply another type of implied grant. This approach seems puzzling: why should we rely on an (almost certainly incorrect) assumption that the claimed Easement was once granted by an owner of A's land to an owner of B's land? It would seem simpler to say that prescription is an example of an independent acquisition.

The idea that a grant of an easement by prescription is presumed has been the subject of much criticism. Indeed, it has been described as a 'revolting fiction'.[126]

Goymour provides a number of reasons why this approach is so misguided.

126 Angus v Dalton (1877) LR 3 QBD 85, 94, per Lush J.

Goymour, 'Rights in Property and the Effluxion of Time' in Modern Studies in Property Law: Vol 4 (ed Cooke, 2007, p 182)

First, the notion of a presumed grant is so fictitious that it offends common sense and is furthermore inconsistent with the technical requirements for prescription. The idea that prescriptive rights rest in a grant conflicts with the condition that prescription must be nec precario [without permission]. Any indication that the owner had given permission for another person to enjoy the land, whether by grant of an easement or merely a licence, will prevent a prescriptive right from arising. For the doctrine to be internally inconsistent is unsatisfactory.

Secondly, in conjunction with the first point, the technical mechanism of presumed grant has led to an acceptance by many that the policy rationale for prescriptive rights is 'acquiescence' by the servant owner in the other party's long-established enjoyment. So long as there is a theory of grant, it follows logically that acquiescence is relevant. However, it is far from obvious that acquiescence is the policy rationale for prescription, for the following reasons. First, as is apparent in the previous point, the requirement that use must be nec precario introduces an element of adversity into the prescriptive claim that cannot easily be explained by acquiescence. Furthermore, it is often equally fictitious to assume acquiescence on the part of the servient owner as it is to presume a grant. Finally the assumption that acquiescence is the rationale for prescriptive rights fails to take account of the fundamental distinction between rights that arise by consensual grant and rights that arise otherwise, by operation of law. The policy that lies behind the recognition of expressly granted rights can be explained by the law's respect for the wishes of the legal actors when they are executed in legally recognised forms, for which acquiescence is relevant. However, once it is accepted that prescriptive easements arise not by grant but by operation of law, it no longer follows that the policy justification for their existence is acquiescence [. . .]

The third problem with time's masked effect is linked to the first two. Because the law has inappropriately tied itself to the mechanism of grant and the rationale of acquiescence, the questions that occupy the courts in prescription cases tended to concern whether or not the technicalities of a hypothetical conveyance are satisfied [. . .] This focus comes at the expense of a proper consideration of why and in what circumstances long use should, as a matter of policy, give rise to a prescriptive right.

Clarke and Kohler point out that, whilst the presumption of a grant may make some (if unsatisfactory) sense to support positive easements by long user, the presumed grant of negative easements cannot be rationalized.

Clarke and Kohler, Property Law (2005, p 495)

There are two important points about negative easements. First, is the absence of an easement, I do not have a right to receive these forces, but only a liberty to make use of them. Secondly, when I exercise my liberty to enjoy these forces, I do not infringe any rights of yours [. . .] In other words, from the outset I had the liberty to receive the forces and you had the liberty to obstruct them. So from the outset I had no need of your authorisation to 'use' the light, or air, or support etc for twenty years: I would automatically receive them unless and until you exercised your liberty to interrupt them [. . .] It would be odd to infer from the fact that I have enjoyed uninterrupted receipt of these forces for twenty years that you positively promised not to interrupt them: this is a promise I had no need for, and you had no reason to give. A much more likely explanation is that you did nothing because you had no selfish reason to develop your land in a way that would interrupt my receipt of these forces.

A particular concern arises when a negative easement is claimed by prescription, because the right will arise even though there is no evidence of the user because the dominant owner has not made any positive use of the servient land. Lord Hope referred to this concern in the following case, in which the House of Lords canvassed (and rejected) possible redress (including the possibility of a new negative easement) for interference with television reception.

Hunter v Canary Wharf Ltd
[1997] AC 655, HL

Lord Hope

At 726

The presumption however is for freedom in the occupation and use of property. This presumption affects the way in which an easement may be constituted. A restraint on the owners' freedom of property can only be effected by agreement, by express grant or—in the case of the easement of light—by way of an exception to the general rule by prescription. The prospective developer should be able to detect by inspection or by inquiry what restrictions, if any, are imposed by this branch of the law on his freedom to develop his property. He should be able to know, before he puts his building up, whether it will constitute an infringement.

The presumption also affects the kinds of easement which the law will recognise. When the easements are negative in character—where they restrain the owners' freedom in the occupation and use of his property—they belong to certain well known categories. As they represent an anomaly in the law because they restrict the owners' freedom, the law takes care not to extend them beyond the categories which are well known to the law. It is one thing if what one is concerned with is a restriction which has been constituted by express grant or by agreement. Some elasticity in the recognised categories may be permitted in such a case, as the owner has agreed to restrict his own freedom. But it is another matter if what is being suggested is the acquisition of an easement by prescription. Where the easement is of a purely negative character, requiring no action to be taken by the other proprietor and effecting no change on the owner's property which might reveal its existence, it is important to keep to the recognised categories. A very strong case would require to be made out if they were to be extended. I do not think that that has been demonstrated in the present case.

The three existing forms of prescription at common law, under lost modern grant, and under the Prescription Act 1832 have been described as 'anomalous and undesirable',[127] and the consequences of their interrelationship as 'messy overlaps'.[128] The Law Commission have recommended that these three forms of the prescription should be replaced and prescription

[127] Tehidy Minerals Ltd v Norman [1971] 2 QB 518, 543, per Buckley LJ
[128] Goymour, 'Rights in Property and the Effluxion of Time' in Modern Studies in Property Law: Vol 4 (ed Cooke, Oxford: Hart, 2007), p 185.

should be based simply upon the passage of time,with a single prescription period of twenty years.[129]

3.3.2 User as of right

Given that the servient owner's acquiescence of the claimant's user underpins the prescription, the nature of that user is of central significance. The vital connection is explained in the following case.

Sturges v Bridgman
(1879) LR 11 Ch D 852

Thesiger LJ

At 863

Consent or acquiescence of the owner of the servient tenement lies at the root of prescription, and of the fiction of a lost grant, and hence the acts of user, which go to the proof of either the one or the other, must be, in the language of the civil law, nec vi nec clam, nec precario; for a man cannot, as a general rule, be said to consent to or acquiesce in the acquisition by his neighbour of an easement through an enjoyment of which he has no knowledge, actual or constructive or which he contests and endeavours to interrupt or which he temporarily licenses.

The phrase that describes the required user is that the claimant's user must be 'as of right'—a phrase that is discussed by Riddall.

Riddall, 'A False Trail: The Meaning of "As Of Right" in the Public Law of Prescription' (1997) Conv 199, 201

Since for the user to be "as of right" it must be nec vi, without force; nec clam, without secrecy; and nec precarious, without permission, the meaning of the phrase becomes apparent. User "as of right" means that the user must be in the same fashion as if there was a legal right to use the way. As the matter was expressed by Parke B in Bright v Walker (1834) 1 CM&R 211, user is as of right if exercised "in the same manner that a person rightfully entitled would have used it". In the same manner, this is the crux of the matter. Since this is what "as of right" means; its meaning cannot have anything to do with whether users believe that they are entitled to use a path. A person can use a path in the same manner as if he had a right to use it nec clam, nec vi and nec precario without having any shred of belief that he has a legal right to do so.

The question has arisen as to whether user can be as of right where the prescriptive user defers to the servient owner's continued use of the land. This issue looks to reconciling competing uses of the land as Lord Hope observes.

129 Law Comm 327 (2011) [3.123]. The civilian systems look to the Roman law concept of usucapio, by which rights may be acquired by the passing of time.

R (Lewis) v Recar & Cleveland Borough Council
[2010] UKSC 11, [2010] 2 AC 70

Facts: Local inhabitants had used a council owned golf course for recreation but had not interrupted the golfers' play by stopping when the golfers were playing their shots. Upon an application for the registration of the golf course as a town green, it was held that the local inhabitant's user was as of right despite the deference they had showed to the servient owner's user.

Lord Hope

At 75–6

But once one accepts, as I would do, that the rights on either side can coexist after registration subject to give and take on both sides, the part that deference has to play in determining whether the local inhabitants indulged in lawful sports or pastimes as of right takes on an entirely different aspect. The question is whether the user by the public was of such amount and in such manner as would reasonably be regarded as being the assertion of a public right. Deference by the public to what the owner does on his land may be taken as an indication that the two uses can in practice coexist.

Of course, the position may be that the two uses cannot sensibly coexist at all. But it would be wrong to assume, as the inspector did in this case, that deference to the owner's activities, even if it is as he put it overwhelming, is inconsistent with the assertion by the public to use of the land as of right for lawful sports and pastimes. It is simply attributable to an acceptance that where two or more rights coexist over the same land there may be occasions when they cannot practically be enjoyed simultaneously

We have seen that prescription looks to the intention of the servient owner rather than the prescriptive user as it is based upon a presumed grant by the servient owner. The competing uses and their possibly inconsistency should, thus, be viewed from the perspective of the servient owner. Lord Walker makes this point whilst characterizing the local inhabitant's use as mere civility and not deference to another's ownership. He does, however, also stress that the situation may differ where a private as opposed to a public right is being claimed.

Lord Walker

At [36]–[38]

[. . .] I have no difficulty in accepting that Lord Hoffmann was absolutely right, in Sunningwell [2000] 1 AC 335 , to say that the English theory of prescription is concerned with "how the matter would have appeared to the owner of the land" (or if there was an absentee owner, to a reasonable owner who was on the spot). But I have great difficulty in seeing how a reasonable owner would have concluded that the residents were not asserting a right to take recreation on the disputed land, simply because they normally showed civility (or, in the inspector's word, deference) towards members of the golf club who were out playing golf. It is not as if the residents took to their heels and vacated the land whenever they saw a golfer. They simply acted (as all the members of the court agree, in much the same terms) with courtesy and common sense. But courteous and sensible though they were (with occasional exceptions) the fact remains that they were regularly, in large numbers, crossing the fairways as well as walking on the rough, and often (it seems) failing to clear up after their dogs when they defecated. A reasonably alert owner of the land could not have failed to recognise that this user was the assertion of a right and would mature into an established right unless the owner took action to stop it (as the golf club tried to do, ineffectually, with the notices erected in 1998).

There is in my opinion a significant difference, on this point, between the acquisition of private and public rights. As between neighbours living in close proximity, what I have referred to as "body language" may be relevant. In a Canadian case of that sort, Henderson v Volk (1982) 35 OR (2d) 379, 384, Cory JA (delivering the judgment of the Court of Appeal of Ontario) observed:

> "It is different when a party seeks to establish a right-of-way for pedestrians over a sidewalk. In those circumstances the user sought to be established may not even be known to the owner of the servient tenement. In addition, the neighbourly acquiescence to its use during inclement weather or in times of emergency such as a last minute attempt to catch a bus, should not too readily be accepted as evidence of submission to the use. It is right and proper for the courts to proceed with caution before finding that title by prescription or by the doctrine of lost modern grant was established in a case such as this. It tends to subject a property owner to a burden without compensation. Its ready invocation may discourage acts of kindness and good neighbourliness; it may punish the kind and thoughtful and reward the aggressor."

That is, if I may say so, obviously good sense. But I do not think it has any application to a situation, such as the court now faces, in which open land owned by a local authority is regularly used, for various different forms of recreation, by a large number of local residents. The inspector's assessment did in my opinion amount to an error of law. He misdirected himself as to the significance of perfectly natural behaviour by the local residents.

The Latin phrase nec vi, nec clam, nec precario, meaning 'without force, without secrecy, and without permission', is commonly used to describe user as of right and the Law Commission's definition of qualifying user continues to rely upon these requirements.[130] We, thus, need to explore a little more the implications of this phrase.

The use of force refers not only to physical force, but also to the exercise of the right despite protests by the servient owner.

Smith v Brudenell-Bruce
[2002] 2 P & CR 51, HC

Pumfrey J

At [12]

It seems to me a user ceases to be user "as of right" if the circumstances are such as to indicate to the dominant owner, or to a reasonable man with the dominant owner's knowledge of the circumstances, that the servient owner actually objects and continues to object and will back his objection either by physical obstruction or by legal action. A user is contentious when the servient owner is doing everything, consistent with his means and proportionately to the user, to contest and to endeavour to interrupt the user.

130 Ibid.

Thus, the breaking down of fences or breaking through locked gates will amount to force. Ignoring prohibitory signs may not be a forceful action unless the signs themselves are suitably worded and maintained by the servient owner against the risk of removal.[131]

There has been some controversy over the circumstances in which an illegal user can qualify as user as of right. At first sight, it might seem inappropriate to condone any illegal user, but, until the prescription period has expired, the claimants user is inevitably illegal—in the sense that it is a trespass. The House of Lords has settled the controversy by distinguishing between those illegal actions that the servient owner cannot legitimatize and those actions that would cease to be illegal if the servient owner were to choose to permit their exercise. The Law Commission recommendations adopt this distinction.[132]

Bakewell Management Ltd v Brandwood
[2004] 2 AC 519, HL

Facts: The owners of several houses adjoining Newtown Common had driven over the common via a track to gain access to their homes. The common came into the ownership of Bakewell, which demanded payment for the house owners' continued use of the track. The owners successfully claimed a right of way over the track by prescription, although their user was illegal, being a breach of s 193(4) of the Law of Property Act 1925 (as amended).

Lord Scott

At [46]–[47]

It is accepted, however, that a prescriptive right, or a right under the lost modern grant fiction, can be obtained by long use that throughout was illegal in the sense of being tortious. That is how prescription operates. Public policy does not prevent conduct illegal in that sense from leading to the acquisition of property rights. The decision in Hanning's case can only be justified on the footing that conduct illegal in a criminal sense is, for public policy purposes, different in kind from conduct illegal in a tortious sense. Why should that necessarily be so? Why, in particular, should it be so where the conduct in question is use of land that is not a criminal use of land against which the public law sets its face in all cases? It is criminal only because it is a user of land for which the landowner has given no "lawful authority". In that respect, the use of land made criminal by section 193(4) of the 1925 Act, or by section 34(1) of the 1988 Act, has much more in common with use of land that is illegal because it is tortious than with use of land that is illegal because it is criminal.

In my opinion, if an easement over land can be lawfully granted by the landowner the easement can be acquired either by prescription under section 2 of the 1832 Act or by the fiction of lost modern grant whether the use relied on is illegal in the criminal sense or merely in the tortious sense. I can see no valid reason of public policy to bar that acquisition.

The user must not be secret, in the sense that a reasonable person in the position of the servient owner should be able to discover that the right is being exercised. A servient owner cannot acquiesce unless he or she knows, or ought to have known, of the exercise of the right.

131 See R (Beresford) v Sunderland CC [2003] UKHL 60 [2004] 1 AC 889, [72], per Lord Walker.
132 Law Comm 327 (2011), [3.123].

Union Lighterage Co v London Graving Dock Co
[1902] 2 Ch 557, CA

Facts: A dry dock was secured to an adjoining wharf by underground rods, which were not visible to the eye. The owner of the dock failed in his claim for an easement of support by prescription, because the Court decided that his user was not reasonably discoverable.

Romer LJ

At 570

Now, on principle, it appears to me that a prescriptive right to an easement over a man's land should only be acquired when the enjoyment has been open—that is to say, of such a character that an ordinary owner of the land, diligent in the protection of his interests, would have, or must be taken to have, a reasonable opportunity of becoming aware of that enjoyment. And I think on the balance of authority that this principle has been recognised as the law, and ought to be followed by us. In support of this statement I do not think it necessary to do more than refer to those parts, which deal with this point, of the speeches made by Lord Selborne and Lord Penzance in the House of Lords in Dalton v. Angus (1881) 6 App Cas 740, and I gather that their views as there expressed on this point were not dissented from by the other members of the House who took part in the hearing of that case, and, indeed, Lord Blackburn said at 827 that no prescriptive right "can be acquired where there is any concealment, and probably none where the enjoyment has not been open."

Although the right of support failed in Union Lighterage, it is clear that rights of support are not inherently secret, they may be evident from the way in which buildings are constructed.[133]

The permission of the servient owner to the claimant's exercise of the right will prevent prescription. Although, in the following case, the House of Lords decided that no permission had been given, they acknowledged that permission might be implied as well as express.

R (Berrisford) v Sunderland CC
[2008] UKHL 60

Facts: An open area had been grassed over by the local authority and seats installed. The local inhabitants used the area for recreation whilst the local authority continued to maintain it. A successful application was made for the registration of the area as a village green based upon the local inhabitants prescriptive user.

Lord Rogers

At 56–61

It is not suggested that members of the public used the sports arena vi, by force: the owners did not try to stop them and so there was no question of them overcoming any resistance on the owners' part. Equally, the public were not enjoying themselves clam, by stealth: on the contrary, they used the land openly and the owners knew what was going on. The council concluded, however, that the local residents and others enjoying the land had been doing so precario, by virtue of the licence of the owners of the land. Admittedly, there was nothing to show that the owners had given any express permission or licence to the public. But the facts as a whole, and cutting the grass and constructing the seating in particular, showed that the owners had actively encouraged the use of the area for recreation and so had impliedly granted a licence, or given permission, for it to be used in that way. Use of the land by virtue of this licence or permission could not constitute use "as of right" for purposes of section 22(1) of the 1965 Act. Smith J [2001] 1 WLR 1327 dismissed Mrs Beresford's application for certiorari to quash the council's decision, and the Court of Appeal [2002] QB 874 dismissed her appeal.

[133] Dalton v Angus & Co (1881) 6 LR App Cas 740, per Lord Selbourne at [798].

In Roman law "precarium" is the name given to a gratuitous grant of enjoyment of land or goods which is revocable at will. The arrangement is informal and is based on the grantor's goodwill, whether more or less enthusiastic. But, however informal, the arrangement does involve a positive act of granting the use of the property, as opposed to mere acquiescence in its use [. . .]

In De legibus et consuetudinibus Angliae Bracton took over the noun precarium and its congeners from the vocabulary of Roman law and used them in a number of contexts, but always with reference to a gratuitous grant which is revocable at any time at the grantor's pleasure. See, for instance, lib 2 ff 52 and 52b. In lib 4 f 221 Bracton discusses the acquisition of easements by use for some time nec vi nec clam nec precario—the last being, the author says, the same as de gratia, of grace. Under reference to the second of these passages, in speaking of the use of a watercourse in Burrows v Lang [1901] 2 Ch 502, 510, Farwell J asked "What is precarious?" and answered his own question: "That which depends, not on right, but on the will of another person." Some years before, in Sturges v Bridgman (1879) 11 Ch D 852, 863, Thesiger LJ had indicated that, if a man "temporarily licenses" his neighbour's enjoyment, that enjoyment is precario in terms of the civil law phrase "nec vi nec clam nec precario". It is important to notice that, in this regard, English law distinguishes between an owner who grants such a temporary licence or permission for an activity and an owner who merely acquiesces in it: Gale on Easements, 17th ed (2002), para 4-83. Someone who acts with the mere acquiescence of the owner does so nec precario.

The council were, accordingly, entitled to refuse Mrs Beresford's application for registration of the area as a town or village green only if those who used the sports arena did so by the revocable will of the owners of the land, that is to say, by virtue of a licence which the owners had granted in their favour and could have withdrawn at any time. The grant of such a licence to those using the ground must have comprised a positive act by the owners, as opposed to their mere acquiescence in the use being made of the land. Prudent landowners will often indicate expressly, by a notice in appropriate terms or in some other way, when they are licensing or permitting the public to use their land during their pleasure only. But I see no reason in principle why, in an appropriate case, the implied grant of such a revocable licence or permission could not be established by inference from the relevant circumstances.

In the present case the owners did not expressly license the use of the land by the public. The council rely on two circumstances, however, as justifying the inference that those who used the sports arena did so precario, merely by licence from the owners of the land. The first is that the owners cut the grass. But that is at least equally explicable on the basis that the owners were concerned, as many owners would be, for the appearance of such a large and prominent area of open land in the heart of the town. Like charity, care of amenities begins at home. The second matter relied on is the, now rather dilapidated, wooden seating along the > perimeter. Whatever may have been its original purpose, the continued existence of the seating is consistent with the owners of the land having acquiesced, perhaps quite happily, in people using the area for football or other games which their friends or relatives would wish, or feel obliged, to watch. To an extent the owners may thus have encouraged these activities. The mere fact that a landowner encourages an activity on his land does not indicate, however, that it takes place only by virtue of his revocable permission. In brief, neither cutting the grass nor constructing and leaving the seating in place justifies an inference that the owners of the sports arena positively granted a licence to local residents and others, who were then to be regarded as using the land by virtue of that licence, which the owners could withdraw at any time.

>
> In these circumstances I would conclude that local people used the land nec precario.

As Lord Rogers makes clear, in the above extract, it is important to distinguish permission from the servient owner's acquiescence, which underlies prescription. It is clear that toleration of user without objection does not constitute permission; some positive approval is needed.[134] The inter-relationship between acquiescence and user as of right is fundamental, as Meager explains:

Meager, Prescription and User 'As of Right': Ripe for Wholesale Reform? in Modern Studies in Property Law Vol 6 (ed Bright, Oxford Hart: 2011, p 254)

> Notwithstanding the apparent importance of acquiescence and its role in establishing that user has been of right, it does not appear to be an added component of the as of right test. Its role is simply confined to a recognition that, in the face of user which is nec vi, nec clam, nec precario, it is necessary for the landowner to do something, to take some positive steps, to bring the user to an end; acquiescence, as a matter of fact, in the face of such user, will be determinative that user as of right is continuing.

Meager goes on to suggest that, even though the Law Commission's proposal that prescription be established solely by qualifying long user may suggest that acquiescence should no longer underpin prescription, 'it will be impossible to depart from the many judicial statements which recognise the central importance of acquiescence' and, in order to prove prescriptive use, to 'sever the link between acquiescence and user as of right.'[135]

3.3.3 User in fee simple

The presumption that a permanent grant has been made at some time in the past dictates that prescriptive user must be by, and against, a fee simple owner.[136] A lessee thus cannot acquire a prescriptive easement over adjoining land held either by his or her landlord or by anyone else.[137] This position has been criticized, for instance, by Lord Millett when sitting as a judge of the Final Court of Appeal in Hong Kong where the rule is particular significant as all land

134 See also Mills v Silver [1991] Ch 271 at 279–81; London Tara Hotel Ltd v Kensington Close Hotel Ltd [2010] EWHC 2749.

135 Meager, Prescription and User 'As of Right': Ripe for Wholesale Reform? in Modern Studies in Property Law Vol 6 (ed Bright, Oxford: Hart, 2011), p 254.

136 Simmons v Dobson [1991] 1 WLR 720; Kilgour v Gaddes [1904] 1 KB 457.

137 The benefit of their prescriptive user accrues to the holder of the freehold.

is leasehold. Indeed in China Field the Hong Kong Final Court of Appeal abandoned the rule.[138]

China Field Ltd v Appeal Tribunal (Buildings)
[2009] HKCU 1650

> The [fee simple] rule is both counter intuitive and contrary to the policy of the law. It is counter intuitive because it is difficult to see why it should be impossible to presume a lost grant of an easement by or to a lessee for the term of his lease when such a grant may be made expressly [. . .] It is contrary to the policy of the law, for if the disturbance of long established de facto enjoyment of a right is contrary to legal policy, then this is equally the case whether the enjoyment is by or against a freeholder or leaseholder.

However, there are no proposals to follow suit in this jurisdiction. Law Commission has abandoned its proposals to extend the benefit of prescription to leaseholders because they wish to keep prescription within narrow confines.[139]

An owner of dominant land also is unable to claim prescription against servient land that is let, when the servient freehold owner cannot object to the use either because they did not know about it or because they were unable to take any action to stop it under the terms of their lease.[140] However, where the prescriptive user is initiated between freehold owners, the subsequent grant of a lease, either of the dominant or servient land, will not interrupt the prescription period.[141]

3.3.4 The function of prescription

Lord Hoffman in Sunningwell[142] noted that '[a]ny legal system must have rules of prescription which prevent the disturbance of long-established de facto enjoyment'. The Law Commission, in rejecting the abolition of prescription, has summarized the most important arguments for and against prescription.

Law Commission, Law Comm 327 Easements, Covenants and Profits à Prendre (2011)

> At [3.75]–[3.76]
>
> The arguments in favour of retention are that prescription has proved invaluable over the centuries as a way of regularising long use, bringing the legal position into line with practical reality. More specifically, it is valued as a way of ensuring the continuation of facilities that are essential to the use and marketability of land, and making good omissions in conveyancing.
>
> However, the other side of the coin is that prescription penalises neighbourliness and generosity. A landowner who has made no objection to a neighbour's walking across his or her land may regard it as unfair if that tolerance eventually leads to the land being burdened with a legal easement.

138 Noted at [2010] Conv 176.
139 Law Comm 327 (2011), [3.150]
140 Williams v Sandy Lane (Chester) Ltd [2006] EWCA Civ 1738 and Llewellyn v Lorey [2011] EWCA Civ 37. See also Law Commission's proposals to codify this position in Law Comm 327 (2011), [3.127].
141 Pugh v Savage [1970] 2 QB 373.
142 [2000] 1 AC 335, 349.

4 EASEMENTS: THE DEFENCES QUESTION

4.1 REGISTERED LAND

We have already explored the aim of the LRA 2002 that the register 'should be a complete and accurate reflection of the state of the title of the land'.[143] Easements presented a challenge to that goal, stemming from the fact that easements can arise by express, implied, and presumed grant, and that, under the Land Registration Act 1925 (LRA 1925), all easements potentially took effect as overriding interests.[144] Thus legal easements (whether arising by express, implied, or presumed grant) did not need to be entered on the register to bind a third party, although it was common practice for express easements to be so recorded. Somewhat controversially, equitable easements—arising, for example, from an agreement to create an easement—were also held to take effect as overriding interests, provided that they were openly enjoyed.[145]

The LRA 2002 has risen to the challenge by providing that:

- easements that are protected by registration will bind a purchaser;[146]
- easements created before the Act came into force on 13 October 2003, which are not protected by registration, but which are overriding interests, will continue to override;[147]
- an express easement created after 13 October 2003 must be registered if it is to take effect as a legal easement;[148]
- an equitable easement created after 13 October 2003 can no longer count as an overriding interest in its own right and so is vulnerable to the lack of registration defence (see Chapter 12, section 3.2, and Chapter 14, section 5);
- implied or presumed legal easements will only override if certain conditions are met – see Sch 3, paragraph 3 extracted below.

Implied easements arising by necessity, common intention, under Wheeldon v Burrows, or by the operation of s 62 of the LPA 1925, and presumed easements created by prescription present a particular problem to a system of title by registration.[149] If the grant or reservation of such an easement is implied into the grant or reservation of a legal estate in land, the implied easement will be a legal interest in land. Similarly, an easement arising by prescription is also a legal easement, of which there need be no documentary record. Such legal easements may be difficult to discover, because there is no express grant that can be lodged at the Land Registry.

The LRA 2002 seeks to overcome this problem by providing that implied and presumed legal easements will only override if they satisfy certain conditions that focus upon their discoverability.

143 Law Commission Report No 271, Land Registration for the Twenty-First Century: A Conveyancing Revolution (2001), [1.5]. See further Chapter 14.

144 Land Registration Act 1925, s 70(1)a.

145 Celsteel Ltd v Alton House Holdings Ltd [1985] 1 WLR 204, reversed in part on another point [1986] 1 WLR 512.

146 Land Registration Act 2002, s 29(2)(a).

147 Ibid, Sch 12, para 9.

148 Ibid, s 27.

149 See Burns (2008).

Land Registration Act 2002, Sch 3, para 3

(1) A legal easement or profit a prendre, except for an easement, or a profit a prendre which is not registered under the Common Registration Act 1965 (c64) which at the time of the disposition—

(a) is not within the actual knowledge of the person to whom the disposition is made, and

(b) would not have been obvious on a reasonably careful inspection of the land over which the easement or profit is exerciseable.

(2) The exception in sub-paragraph (1) does not apply if the person entitled to the easement or profit proves that it has been exercised in the period of one year ending with the day of the disposition.

Thus, an implied or presumed legal easement created after 13 October 2003 will only bind a purchaser of the servient land if the purchaser knew, or should have known from a reasonably careful inspection of the servient land, of the easement, or the easement had been exercised by the dominant owner in the year preceding the sale. Those easements that fail to satisfy these conditions will vanish upon a disposal of the servient land, because they will not bind a registered purchaser for value.[150] A dominant owner claiming the benefit of an implied or presumed easement, however, may avoid this unhappy result by applying to have the easement registered.[151]

4.2 UNREGISTERED LAND

The priority rules governing easements where the land is unregistered are relatively straightforward. Legal easements, whether arising by express, implied, or presumed grant, bind a purchaser of the servient land. Equitable easements, however, only bind if they are protected by entry in the land charges register as a Class D(iii) land charge.[152]

A disposal of the servient land, whether by way of transfer, a lease for more than seven years, or first mortgage, will now trigger first registration of that land.[153] Existing legal easements over the servient land (whether by express, implied, or presumed grant) will, on first registration, bind the purchaser as overriding interests.[154] Equitable easements will not, however, bind a purchaser of the servient land and the owner of the dominant land is well advised to lodge a caution against first registration of the servient land, so that they can assert their right against any purchaser.[155]

5 EXCESSIVE USER

Where a dominant owner exceeds the ambit of the right that he or she has been granted, the servient owner, or another dominant owner whose own rights are affected, may seek redress in nuisance for excessive user. That redress may include the grant of an injunction or an 150 Kenny, 'Vanishing Easements in Registered Land' [2003] Conv 304; Battersby, 'More Thoughts on Easements under the Land Registration Act 2002' [2005] Conv 195.

151 Land Registration Rules 2003 (SI 2003/1417), r 74.

152 See Chapter 13, section 5.2.

153 Land Registration Act 2002, s 4.

154 Ibid, Sch 1, para 3.

155 Ibid, Pt 2.

award of compensatory damages, or, in extreme cases, the extinguishment of the easement. In addition, a servient or another dominant owner may take self-help measures to stop the excessive user.

Whether or not a user is excessive will depend on the terms of the grant. Where the easement has been expressly granted, that will be determined by looking at the terms of the deed. Where the easement is implied or presumed, the courts will look at the use and the nature of the land at the time of the implied or presumed grant.[156] A mere increase in user will not be excessive; what is required is a radical change in the character of the user of the dominant land, which leads to a substantial increase in the burden that user places upon the servient land.

The Court of Appeal considered the question of excessive user in the following case.

McAdams Homes Ltd v Robinson
[2005] 1 P & CR 30, CA

Facts: The MacAdams built two homes on the site of an old bakery, which enjoyed a right of drainage over Robinson's land under Wheeldon v Burrows. Robinson successfully prevented McAdams from using the drain once the two houses were built, because the Court of Appeal found that McAdams' user was excessive, representing a substantial increase in the burden on the servient land.

Lord Neuberger

At [50]–[51]

The authorities discussed above appear to me to indicate that that issue should have been determined by answering two questions. Those questions are:

i) whether the development of the dominant land, ie the site, represented a "radical change in the character" or a "change in the identity" of the site [. . .] as opposed to a mere change or intensification in the use of the site [. . .]

ii) whether the use of the site as redeveloped would result in a substantial increase or alteration in the burden on the servient land, ie the cottage [. . .]

In my opinion, the effect of the authorities in relation to the present case is that it would only be if the redevelopment of the site represented a radical change in its character and it would lead to a substantial increase in the burden, that the dominant owner's right to enjoy the easement of passage of water through the pipe would be suspended or lost.

At 55

The [. . .] potentially unsatisfactory feature of the approach I have suggested is that both questions could be said to involve an exercise which, in many circumstances, may have a rather uncertain outcome. What may appear to be "a radical change in character" to one judge could easily appear differently to another judge; equally, one judge may consider a particular increase in the burden on the servient land to be "substantial", whereas another judge may not. It is, perhaps, inevitable that the questions have to be expressed in this rather generalised way, because each case will very much turn on its own facts, with regard to the particular easement, the position on the ground at the date of grant, the surrounding circumstances at the date of grant, and the nature and effect of the redevelopment that has > subsequently taken place. What [the] cases [. . .] demonstrate is that, before a change of use or redevelopment can be sufficiently substantial for the servient owner to succeed on the first question, it really must involve something "radical". Similarly, before the servient owner can succeed on the second question, the cases show that the court must be satisfied that there has not merely been an increase (or change) in the enjoyment of the easement as a result of the changed character of the dominant land, but that there has been a real increase (or change) in the burden on the servient land.

[156] British Railways Board v Glass [1965] Ch 538.

6 EXTINGUISHMENT OF EASEMENTS

We have already seen that an easement will be extinguished, in the case of freehold land, where the dominant and servient land come into common ownership, and will be suspended, in the case of leasehold land, where the dominant and servient land come into common occupation.[157] We have also considered when an easement attached to a lease will be extinguished upon the termination of that lease.[158]

The dominant and servient owners may bring an easement to an end by express release and, more controversially, a release may also be implied as a result of abandonment.[159] An easement is abandoned if the dominant owner acts, or fails to act, with an intention to relinquish the right. The permanence of proprietary rights is demonstrated by the difficulty of proving that intention.[160] The fact of non-user does not raise any presumption of abandonment;[161] something more is required—particularly where the right by its nature is not continuously exercised.[162] For example, the alteration of the dominant land may demonstrate an intention to abandon where the right can no longer be exercised.[163]

McFarlane has suggested that abandonment is better viewed as an application of estoppel.

McFarlane, The Structure of Property Law (2008, p 873)

> However the concept of abandonment is very problematic. In general, a party with a property right does not have the power to simply give up that right: if he wishes to dispose of the right, he needs to transfer it to another. B [the dominant owner] can of course release an Easement; but only if a deed is used. Cases of so-called informal abandonment are hence better seen as examples of: (i) C [the servient owner] having a defence to B's Easement as a result of defensive estoppel; or C [the servient owner] relying on proprietary estoppel to show that B [the dominant owner] is under a duty to release his Easement.

157 See section 2.2 above. 158 See section 2.1.4 above.

159 Shorrock, 'Non-user of Easements' (1998) 4 Nott LJ 26.

160 Tehidy Minerals Ltd v Norman [1971] 2 QB 528.

161 The Law Commission has suggested that a presumption of abandonment should arise after twenty years—see Law Comm 327 (2011), [3.230].

162 Amstrong v Shappard & Shroff [1959] 2 QB 384; Benn v Hardinge (1993) 66 P & CR 246.

163 Ecclesiastical Commissioners for England v Kino (1880) 14 Ch D 213; Williams v Sandy Lane (Chester) Ltd [2006] EWCA Civ 1738.

An example of estoppel forming the basis for abandonment is found in Lester v Woodgate,[164] where the dominant owner's failure to object to the servient owner's actions in obstructing a right of way formed the basis for an estoppel by acquiescence upon which the servient owner had relied to his detriment such that it was unconscionable for the dominant owner (and his or her successors in title) to continue to assert his or her legal rights to use the right of way.

The Law Commission, meanwhile, has recommended that the jurisdiction of the Lands Chamber of the Upper Tribunal under s 84 of the LPA 1925, which we examine in the next chapter, should be extended to provide for the modification and discharge of easements.[165]

QUESTIONS

1. Do you think that a right to use a swimming pool could exist as an easement?
2. Why has the right to park caused such difficulty in being recognized as an easement?
3. What conceptual challenges do negative easements present?
4. An easement can be impliedly granted either by looking at the future use of the dominant land, or by looking at how the grantor has used the land in the past. In what circumstances can an easement be impliedly reserved?
5. Does it matter whether easements of necessity are based upon public policy or intention?
6. Wheeldon v Burrows and s 62 look deceptively similar, but how do they differ?
7. Should prescription be abolished?
8. In what circumstances will an implied or presumed easement vanish upon the sale of the servient land?

FURTHER READING

Bradbrooke, 'Access to Landlocked Land: A Comparative Study of Legal Solutions' (1983–85) 10 Syd LR 39

Burns, 'Easements and Servitudes Created by Implied Grant, Implied Reservation or Prescription and Title by Registration Systems' in Modern Studies in Property Law: Vol 5 (ed Dixon, Oxford: Hart, 2009)

Burns, 'Prescriptive Easements in England and Legal Climate Change' [2007] Conv 133

Getzler, 'Roman and English Prescription for Incorporeal Property' in Rationalizing Property, Equity and Trusts: Essays in Honour of Edward Burn (ed Getzler, London: Butterworths, 2003, ch 11)

Goymour, 'Rights in Property and the Effluxion of Time' in Modern Studies in Property Law: Vol 4 (ed Cooke, Oxford: Hart, 2007)

Haley and McMurty, 'Identifying an Easement: Exclusive Use, De Facto Control and Judicial Constraints' (2007) 58 NILQ 490

164 [2010] EWCA Civ 199.

165 See Law Comm 327 (2011) Part 7.

Harpum, 'Easements and Centre Point: Old Problems Resolved in a Novel Setting' (1977) 41 Conv 415

Hill Smith, 'Rights of Parking and the Ouster Principle after Batchelor v Marlow' [2007] Conv 223

Law Commission Consultation Paper No 186, Easements, Covenants and Profits à Prendre (2008)

Law Commission Report No 327 Making Land Work: Easements, Covenants and Profits à Prendre (2011)

Lawson, 'Easements' in Land Law: Issues, Debates, Policy (ed Tee, Devon: Willan, 2002)

Luther, 'Easements and Exclusive Possession' (1996) 16 LS 51

Meager, 'Prescription and User "As of Right": Ripe for Wholesale Reform?' in Modern Studies in Property Law Vol 6 (ed Bright, Oxford: Hart, 2011)

McClean, 'The Nature of an Easement' (1966) 5 West LR 32

Paton and Seabourne, 'Can't Get There From Here? Permissible Use of Easements After Das' [2003] Conv 127

Shorrock, 'Non-user of Easements' (1995) 4 Nott LJ 26

Simpson, 'Wheeldon v Burrows and the Code Civile' [1967] 83 LQR 240

Special Issue on Easements [2012] Conv 1–65

Sturley, 'Easements in Gross' (1980) 96 LQR 557

Tee, 'Metamorphoses and Section 62 of the Law of Property Act 1925' [1998] Conv 115

26

FREEHOLD COVENANTS

CENTRAL ISSUES

1. Restrictive covenants play an important role in controlling land use, supplementing and complementing public planning laws.
2. A covenant is an agreement by deed and, as such, generally only enforceable between the parties—but restrictive covenants can be enforced by and against subsequent owners of the land to which they relate.
3. A restrictive covenant must: (i) relate to land; (ii) be intended to be enforceable against subsequent owners of the land; (iii) be capable of benefiting adjacent land; and (iv) be negative in nature.
4. To be enforceable as an equitable proprietary interest, a restrictive covenant must be protected by appropriate registration.
5. The benefit of a restrictive covenant will run if it is: (i) expressly assigned; (ii) annexed to the land; or (iii) subject to a building scheme.
6. The breach of a restrictive covenant may result in an award of damages or the court may exercise its discretion to grant an injunction to restrain a breach or order action to 'cure' the breach.
7. The Lands Chamber of the Upper Tribunal has jurisdiction under s 84 of the Law of Property Act 1925 to modify or extinguish restrictive covenants.
8. The law governing covenants has long been regarded as unsatisfactory and has been subject to repeated proposals for reform.

1 INTRODUCTION

A covenant is an agreement entered into by deed and, as such, it binds the parties to the covenant. We saw in Chapter 24 how leasehold covenants may be enforced by and against a landlord's assignee of the freehold reversion and a tenant's assignee of the leasehold estate by privity of estate.[1] In this chapter, we will examine how certain covenants relating to land between freehold owners can overcome the normal privity of contract rule, and can be enforced by and against third parties. For example, where neighbouring freeholders agree with each other that they will not build on their land without the consent of the other, the covenant will be of little value unless it can be enforced not only between the parties to this mutual covenant, but also any person who becomes an owner of either piece of land. Incidentally, the same principles may also be applied to enforce leasehold covenants against parties who are not within privity of estate: for example, subtenants.

[1] See Goulding, 'Privity of Estate and the Enforcement of Real Covenants' (2007) 36 3 CLWR 193 for an interesting view that privity of estate, at one time, extended to covenants affecting the freehold estate and a comparative examination of the US position.

1.1 THE ROLE OF LAND COVENANTS

The transformation of land covenants from mere personal contracts between landowners to proprietary obligations that affect subsequent owners of the land occurred during the nineteenth century, when the Chancery courts developed the rules that will be the subject of this chapter.

Gardner explains what prompted these developments.

Gardner, An Introduction to Land Law (2009, p 179)

> They date from the first half of the 19th century, a time of rapid growth of English towns. Many inhabitants were poor, but there was also an affluent urban middle class, which aspired to a high standard of living. The prevailing environment of slum housing, factories and so on was inimical to this: even if a middle class family's home was inwardly agreeable, stepping outside the front door could entail a quite different experience. Things could be improved, however, by creating enclaves of middle class housing, producing a more pleasant external as well as internal environment. The techniques by which this was done included the architectural (eg the terrace; and the square was an especially useful way of creating such an enclave especially if the rear rooms of the houses facing the squalor beyond, were made the servants quarters), and the horticultural (eg creating a pleasant garden in the middle of the square, a larger space than each individual house could command, and a place for socialising with persons similarly circumstanced).
>
> But the trick would work only if it was possible to secure the enclave's integrity over time [. . .] This was a task for the law. Restrictive covenants are best understood as the new right in rem developed to perform it.

It was thus a desire to control land use that was the major driver at a time when there was little public health or planning control. Of course, there are now many legal controls over land ownership. Indeed, Gray and Gray[2] describe land ownership as being 'intrinsically delimited by social or community-orientated obligations of a positive nature'. There are extensive public planning laws and building control regulations, so an owner cannot build on his or her land without the approval of the local planning authority, and other than in a manner that accords with high safety and environmental standards. Conservation of the built and natural environment is promoted through legislative regulation, whilst public health and environmental controls, and the private law of nuisance, provide protection against uses that may endanger quiet and safe enjoyment.

2 See Gray and Gray, Elements of Land Law (5th edn, 2009), [1.5.54]–[1.5.57].

Despite these measures, privately negotiated land covenants still have a very important role to play. Every estate of new homes is made subject to a range of restrictive covenants to regulate the ambience, and thus maintain the value, of the estate. Land Registry figures estimate that 79 per cent of registered freehold titles are subject to restrictive covenants. In 2003 alone, over 300,000 new covenants were registered over freehold land; only slightly fewer new covenants were created in 2004.[3]

Gray and Gray explain the role that land covenants play.

Gray and Gray, Elements of Land Law (4th edn, 2005, [13.20])

> Although public planning processes have now taken over much of the function of privately contracted arrangements, there still remains an important role for private and quasi-private governance of land use. It is often the case that private covenants deal more satisfactorily with the detailed organisation of land use than can existing public planning controls. Private covenants can be particularly significant in regulating the immediate local environment of neighbours as, for instance, where parties contract for the maintenance and repair of boundary features or agree to adhere to a vernacular style of construction or a specific pattern of density in any future development. More generally, however, it is painfully apparent nowadays that privately bargained covenants operate frequently as a longstop guardian of wider, community-orientated conservationist concerns, protecting a range of environmental amenities which are no longer assured by the local planning process.

1.2 THE STRUCTURE AND TERMINOLOGY OF LAND COVENANTS

Before we go on to examine the detailed legal rules that achieve this regulation of land use and amenity, it is important that we understand the structure in which these rules operate and the terminology employed.

As illustrated in Figure 23, A (the owner of Plot A) may agree with his or her neighbour B (the owner of Plot B) that he or she will not build on Plot A without B's consent. Here, A has the burden of the covenant: his or her ability to build is restricted and he or she can be sued if he or she builds without consent. A is called the covenantor, while B is the covenantee. B has the benefit of the covenant: he or she can sue if A breaches the covenant.

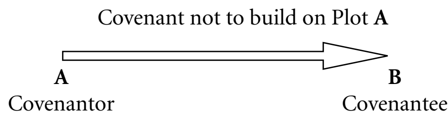

Figure 23 A restricted land covenant

As illustrated in Figure 24, if A sells Plot A, B will need to prove that the burden of A's covenant has passed with Plot A to the new owner. If B, in turn, sells Plot B, his or her purchaser will need to prove that the benefit of the covenant passes with Plot B to the new owner. These processes are referred to as the 'running of' the burden and the benefit.[4] We will use the expression 'dominant land' to refer to the land that has the benefit of the covenant and 'servient land' to refer to the land that is burdened.

[3] The figure for 2004 was 268,394: see Law Commission Consultation Paper No 186, Easements, Covenants and Profits à Prendre (2008, Appendix A).

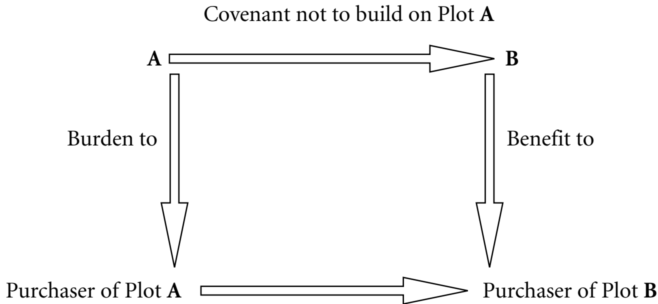

Figure 24 The transmission of the benefit and burden of land covenants

Where the purchasers of Plots A and B acquire, whether by sale or gift, A and B's full freehold title, they are known as the successors in title to A and B, but if A leases Plot A and B mortgages Plot B, the new lessee and mortgagee are referred to as persons deriving title from A and B, respectively, because the interests that they acquire are carved out of A and B's freehold estates.

As illustrated in Figure 25, the structure becomes a little more complicated in the common situation in which A and B agree with each other that neither of them will build on their land without the consent of the other. Here, the covenants are mutual: A and B have both the benefit and the burden of the covenants; they are each both covenantor and covenantee. To work out, in a given scenario, whether we need to prove whether it is the benefit or the burden that has passed to the current owner of Plots A or B it is easier to ask whom we wish to sue (we need to prove that the burden has run) and then who wishes to sue (he or she must have the benefit of the covenant to do so).

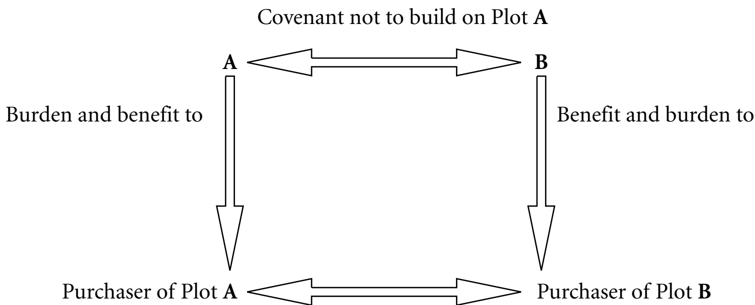

Figure 25 The transmission of mutual land covenants

4 Gardner has rightly pointed out that it is not the covenant that runs, but the owners of Plots A and B. The benefit and burden of the covenant is attached to the land itself, and thus goes nowhere; it is the owners that change: see Gardner, Introduction to Land Law (2009), p 190.

2 THE BURDEN: WHO CAN SUE?

The burden of a covenant does not run at law,[5] so we must turn to the equitable principles initially formulated in the following leading case.[6]

Tulk v Moxhay
(1848) 2 Ph 774

Facts: In 1808, Tulk sold part of land that he owned in Leicester Square to Elms, who covenanted to Tulk that he would 'at all times thereafter at his own cost keep and maintain the piece of ground in sufficient and proper repair, and in an open state, uncovered with any buildings, in neat and ornamental order'. This land came into the ownership of Moxhay, who had notice of the covenant that Elms had given to Tulk. When Moxhay made plans to develop the land, Tulk obtained an injunction to restrain him from doing so.

Lord Cottenham LC

At 777

That this Court has jurisdiction to enforce a contract between the owner of land and his neighbour purchasing part of it, that the latter shall either use or abstain from using the land purchased in a particular way, is what I never knew disputed. Here there is no question about the contract: the owner of certain houses in the square sells the land adjoining, with a covenant from the purchaser not to use it for any other purpose than as a square garden. And it is now contended, not that the vendee could violate that contract, but that he might sell the piece of land, and that the purchaser from him may violate it without this Court having any power to interfere. If that were so, it would be impossible for an owner of land to sell part of it without incurring the risk of rendering what he retains worthless. It is said that, the covenant being one which does not run with the land, this Court cannot enforce it; but the question is, not whether the covenant runs with the land, but whether a party shall be permitted to use the land in a manner inconsistent with the contract entered into by his vendor, and with notice of which he purchased. Of course, the price would be affected by the covenant, and nothing could be more inequitable than that the original purchaser should be able to sell the property the next day for a greater price, in consideration of the assignee being allowed to escape from the liability which he had himself undertaken.

That the question does not depend upon whether the covenant runs with the land is evident from this, that if there was a mere agreement and no covenant, this Court would enforce it against a party purchasing with notice of it; for if an equity is attached to the property by the owner, no one purchasing with notice of that equity can stand in a different situation from the party from whom he purchased.

As we saw when examining the decision in Chapter 6, section 2.6, Lord Cottenham's reasoning is primarily based on the fact that Moxhay acquired the land with knowledge of the 5 Austerberry v Oldham Corp (1885) 29 Ch D 750, affirmed in Rhone v Stephens [1994] 2 AC 310.

6 It appears that the principles first emerged in the earlier cases of Whatman v Gibson (1839) 2 My & K 517 and Mann v Stephens (1846) 15 Sim 377.

promise that Elms had made to Tulk. On this reasoning, Tulk did not assert a pre-existing equitable interest against Moxhay; rather, Tulk acquired a new, direct right as a result of Moxhay's conduct. But Lord Cottenham also hinted that the initial promise made by Elms to Tulk had proprietary characteristics. Certainly, as the doctrine developed during the latter half of the nineteenth century, the Chancery courts reinterpreted Tulk v Moxhay as a case in which Tulk did assert a pre-existing equitable interest, arising as a result of Elms' covenant with Tulk. This process is discussed in Chapter 6.[7]

In doing so, those courts also defined the characteristics of that equitable interest more clearly. The rules that they developed may be summarized as follows.

1. The burden of the covenant must not be personal, but must relate to, and be intended to run with, the land to which it relates.
2. There must be dominant land that is capable of benefiting from the covenant.
3. The covenant must be negative in nature.

These characteristics define the content of a land covenant, which, in common with any proprietary interest, must conform to the relevant creation and priority rules if it is to bind the parties and a subsequent purchaser.

2.1 THE COVENANT MUST RELATE TO LAND

The covenant must relate to the land and not to some personal obligation between the parties. A might agree to send B a dozen red roses on Valentine's Day, but whilst that might say something about A's personal attraction to B, it has nothing whatsoever to do with A's ownership of Plot A. The most common covenants that relate to land are concerned with the use of the land, or its repair or maintenance.[8] The parties must also intend that the covenant should affect them as owners of the land, rather than in a solely personal capacity, although such an intention is presumed.

Law of Property Act 1925, s 79(1)

> (1) A covenant relating to any land of the covenantor or capable of being bound by him, shall, unless a contrary intention is expressed, be deemed to be made by the covenantor on behalf of himself his successors in title and the persons deriving title under him or them and subject as aforesaid, shall have effect as if such successors and other persons were expressed.

There have been several attempts to argue that s 79 of the Law of Property Act 1925 (LPA 1925) in itself enables the burden to run with the land, but these attempts have failed.[9]

[7] For more detail, see McFarlane [2003] Conv 473, 482–7.

[8] Some covenants prohibiting competition have been held to be personal (see Morrells of Oxford Ltd v Oxford United Football Club Ltd [2001] Ch 459), although restricting the user of land to prevent a particular commercial activity may not be (Newton Abbott Co-operative Society v Williamson & Treadgold Ltd [1952] 1 Ch 286).

[9] Re Royal Victoria Pavilion, Ramsgate [1961] Ch 58; Tophams Ltd v Earl of Sefton [1967] 1 AC 50; Rhone v Stephens [1994] 2 AC 310; Morrells of Oxford Ltd v Oxford United Football Club Ltd [2001] Ch 459; but see Turano, 'Intention, Interpretation and the Mystery of Section 79 of the Law of Property Act 1925' [2000] Conv 377.

Section 79 is a word-saving device that makes it unnecessary to refer to 'successor in title' and 'persons deriving title' expressly in the covenant itself.

Robert Walker LJ explained (as dicta) its role in the following case, which concerned whether a covenant limiting competition was a personal covenant displaying a contrary intention for the purposes of s 79.

Morrells of Oxford Ltd v Oxford United Football Club Ltd
[2001] Ch 459

Robert Walker LJ

At [40]

Section 79 is concerned with simplifying conveyancing by creating a rebuttable presumption that covenants relating to land of the covenantor are intended to be made on behalf of successors in title, rather than be intended as purely personal. That is a necessary condition, but not a sufficient condition, for making the burden of the covenants run with the land.

A little earlier in his judgment, he explained its effect.[10]

Morrells Oxford Ltd v Oxford United Football Club Ltd
[2001] Ch 459, CA

Robert Walker LJ

At [35]

My tentative view, therefore, coinciding, I think, with the judge's, is that section 79, where it applies, and subject always to any contrary intention, extends the number of persons whose acts or omissions are within the reach of the covenant in the sense of making equitable remedies available, provided that the other conditions for equity's intervention are satisfied. Where [. . .] section 79 applies, its normal effect is not to turn "A covenants with X that A will not build" into "A and B covenant with X that A will not build". Rather it is that "A (on behalf of himself and B) covenants with X that A (or, as the circumstances may require, B) will not build".

2.2 BENEFIT TO DOMINANT LAND

In a similar way to easements, there must be dominant land to which the benefit of the covenant is attached.[11] The benefit is attached to the covenantee's estate in the land[12] and, once he or she has disposed of that estate, he or she cannot enforce the covenant unless, as the original covenantee, he or she has a contractual right to do so. It is thus not possible for a covenant to exist in gross.

10 See also Hurst, 'The Transmission of Restrictive Covenants' (1982) 2 LS 53, 75.

11 Some earlier authorities had suggested otherwise: see Catt v Tourle (1869) LR 4 Ch 654 and Luker v Dennis (1877) 7 Ch D 227.

12 A landlord's reversion is a sufficient estate for these purposes: see Hall v Erwin (1887) 37 Ch D 74.

A common scenario arises where an owner of land sells part and requires the purchaser to enter into a covenant restricting what he or she can do with the purchased land, to maintain the amenity and value of the land that the seller retains.

London CC v Allen
[1914] 3 KB 642, CA

Facts: In order to obtain permission to form a street on part of his land, Mr Allen entered into a covenant with the London County Council that he would not build on the land at the end of the proposed street so that the new street could be extended. He then sold the land subject to the covenant to his wife, who built on the land. The London County Council tried to enforce the covenant against Mrs Allen, but was unsuccessful because it held no land that could benefit from the covenant.

Buckley LJ

At 654

The reasoning of Lord Cottenham's judgment in Tulk v. Moxhay is that if an owner of land sells part of it reserving the rest, and takes from his purchaser a covenant that the purchaser shall use or abstain from using the land purchased in a particular way, that covenant (being one for the protection of the land reserved) is enforceable against a sub-purchaser with notice. The reason given is that, if that were not so, it would be impossible for an owner of land to sell part of it without incurring the risk of rendering what he retains worthless. If the vendor has retained no land which can be protected by the restrictive covenant, the basis of the reasoning of the judgment is swept away. In Haywood v. Brunswick Permanent Benefit Building Society the Court of Appeal declined to extend the doctrine of Tulk v. Moxhay to covenants other than restrictive covenants. They rejected the doctrine that, inasmuch as the defendants took the land with notice of the covenants, they were bound in equity to perform them. That therefore is not the principle upon which the equitable doctrine rests. In the present case we are asked to extend the doctrine of Tulk v. Moxhay so as to affirm that a restrictive covenant can be enforced against a derivative owner taking with notice by a person who never has had or who does not retain any land to be protected by the restrictive covenant in question. In my opinion the doctrine does not extend to that case. The doctrine is that a covenant not running with the land, but being a negative covenant entered into by an owner of land with an adjoining owner, binds the land in equity and is enforceable against a derivative owner taking with notice. The doctrine ceases to be applicable when the person seeking to enforce the covenant against the derivative owner has no land to be protected by the negative covenant. The fact of notice is in that case irrelevant.

The particular equity recognized in Tulk v. Moxhay has been said to be analogous to an equitable charge upon land subsisting in the owner of the adjoining land, or to a negative easement enjoyed, not in gross, but by the adjoining land over the land to which the covenant relates. It arises from the possession by the covenantee of land enjoying the benefit of the negative covenant coupled with notice of the existence of the covenant. In London and South Western Ry. Co. v. Gomm Sir George Jessel says:

> "The doctrine of Tulk v. Moxhay, rightly considered, appears to me to be either an extension in equity of the doctrine of Spencer's Case to another line of cases, or else an extension in equity of the doctrine of negative easements; such, for instance, as a right to the access of light, which prevents the owner of the servient tenement from building so as to obstruct the light. The > covenant in Tulk v. Moxhay was affirmative in its terms, but was held by the Court to imply a negative. Where there is a negative covenant expressed or implied, as, for instance, not to build so as to obstruct a view, or not to use a piece of land otherwise than as a garden, the Court interferes on one or other of the above grounds. This is an equitable doctrine, establishing an exception to the rules of common law which did not treat such a covenant as running with the land, and it does not matter whether it proceeds on analogy to a covenant running with the land or on analogy to an easement."

The situation of the London County Council would not arise today, because statute has granted local authorities (and some other bodies) the ability to enforce covenants in the exercise of certain of their powers, although they hold no dominant land.[13]

Identification of the dominant land

The dominant land needs to be identified with reasonable certainty, although general words, such as the references to the covenantee's retained land, will suffice and it is evident that the courts may look beyond the terms of the conveyance to the surrounding circumstances at the time of the creation of the covenant in order to ascertain the dominant land.[14]

Newton Abbott Co-operative Society v Williamson & Treadgold Ltd
[1952] Ch 286, HC

Facts: Mrs Mardon owned premises known as 'Devonia', on which she carried on business as an ironmonger. She also owned property across the street, which she sold, taking a covenant from the purchaser that he or she would not carry on business as an ironmonger. There was no indication in the covenant that it was taken for the benefit of Devonia. Some years later, the property subject to the covenant came into the ownership of Williamson & Treadgold, who began to sell items of ironmongery and hardware. The Co-op, as the present owner of Devonia and to which the benefit of the covenant had been assigned successfully, obtained an injunction restraining them from doing so.

Upjohn J

At 296

In my judgment, therefore, the problem which I have to consider is this: First, when Mrs. Mardon took the covenant in 1923, did she retain other lands capable of being benefited by the covenant? The answer is plainly yes. Secondly, was such land "ascertainable" or "certain" in this sense that the existence and situation of the land must be indicated in the conveyance or otherwise shown with reasonable certainty?

Apart from the fact that Mrs. Mardon is described as of Devonia, there is nothing in the conveyance of 1923 to define the land for the benefit of which the restrictive covenant was taken, and I do not think that carries one very far; but, for the reasons I have given, I am, in my judgment, entitled to look at the attendant circumstances to see if the land to be benefited is 13 See (in the cases of local authorities) Housing Act 1985, s 609 considered in Cantrell v Wycombe DC [2008] EWCA Civ 866, and (in the case of local planning authorities) Town and Country Planning Act 1990, s 106.

14 See also Marten v Flight Refueling Ltd [1962] 1 Ch 115.

shown "otherwise" with reasonable certainty. That is a question of fact and, on the admitted facts, bearing in mind the close juxtaposition of Devonia and the defendants' premises, in my view the only reasonable inference to draw from the circumstances at the time of the conveyance of 1923 was that Mrs. Mardon took the covenant restrictive of the user of the defendants' premises for the benefit of her own business of ironmonger and of her property Devonia where at all material times she was carrying on that business, which last-mentioned fact must have been apparent to the purchasers in 1923.

The benefit of the covenant must also accommodate the dominant land of the covenantee, in the sense that it affects 'either the value of the land or the method of its occupation or enjoyment'.[15] In the Newton Abbott Case, the Co-op's counsel unsuccessfully argued that the covenant was a personal anti-competition covenant, which only benefited Mrs Mardon's business and not Devonia.

Newton Abbott Co-operative Society v Williamson & Treadgold Ltd
[1952] Ch 286, HC

Upjohn J

At 292

The second main question was whether the defendants are liable to have the covenant enforced against them. This was Mr. Bowles' main defence in this action and he says that the restrictive covenant was not taken for the benefit of Devonia, and he puts his case in this way: [. . .] he says that in any event this was not taken for the benefit of any land, but was a covenant with Mrs. Mardon personally, solely for the benefit of her business [. . .] Mr. Bowles strongly urged that the covenant was taken solely to protect the goodwill of the business carried on at Devonia, that it had no reference to the land itself, and that it was not taken for the benefit of that land; in brief, that it was a covenant in gross incapable of assignment. He urged that taking such a covenant would benefit the business in that an enhanced price could be obtained for the business, but no such enhanced price would be obtained for the land. He relied on the fact that the covenant did not mention the vendors' assigns and that it was a covenant against competition. Further, he pointed out that when Leonard Soper Mardon assigned to the Bovey Tracey Cooperative Society, the benefit of the covenant was assigned in the deed which assigned the business and not in the lease of Devonia. If that be the right view, then he said there could be no right to enforce the covenant against the defendants because the mere fact that the defendants took with notice is not sufficient to bind their consciences in equity, and he relied on the two cases of Formby v. Barker and London County Council v. Allen. Those cases show, he submitted, and I agree with him, that in order to enforce a covenant such as this against an assign of the covenantor, you must show that the covenant created something analogous to an equitable easement, that is, you must find something in the nature of a dominant tenement for the benefit of which the covenant was taken and a servient tenement which was to be subject to that covenant. Here he says there was no dominant tenement; the covenant was taken not for the benefit of any land, but for the benefit of the business.

I do not accept this view of the transaction of 1923. In 1923 Mrs. Mardon was carrying on the business of an ironmonger at Devonia. No doubt the covenant was taken for the benefit of that business and to prevent competition therewith, but I see no reason to think, and there is nothing in the conveyance of 1923 which leads me to believe, that that was the sole object of taking the covenant. Mrs. Mardon may well have had it in mind that she might want ultimately to sell her land and the business and the benefit of the covenant in such manner as to annex the benefit of the covenant to Devonia for, by so doing, she would get an enhanced price for the totality of the assets which she was selling; a purchaser would surely pay more for a property which would enable him to sue in equity assigns of the defendants' premises taking with notice and to pass on that right, if he so desired, to his successors, than for a property which would only enable him to sue the original covenantor, for that is the result of the view urged on me by Mr. Bowles.

[15] Re Gadds Land Transfer [1966] Ch 56, 66, per Buckley LJ.

Establishing benefit

Accommodation will normally require reasonable proximity between the servient and dominant land, although it is conceivable that a comparatively large area can benefit where it forms an identifiable unit.[16] There tends to be a presumption of benefit unless such a conclusion just cannot be sustained.[17]

The approach is illustrated and explained in the following case.[18]

Wrotham Park Estate Co Ltd v Parkside Homes Ltd

[1974] 1 WLR 798, HC

Facts: Part of the Wrotham Estate was conveyed subject to a covenant that the land should only be developed in accordance with a layout plan approved by the estate company. Most of the land was developed in accordance with the covenant, but, when Parkside proposed to develop the remaining central area without obtaining prior approval, the estate company successfully took action on the covenant.

Brightman J

At 808

There can be obvious cases where a restrictive covenant clearly is, or clearly is not, of benefit to an estate. Between these two extremes there is inevitably an area where the benefit to the estate is a matter of personal opinion, where responsible and reasonable persons can have divergent views sincerely and reasonably held. In my judgment, in such cases, it is not for the court to pronounce which is the correct view. I think that the court can only decide whether a particular view is one which can reasonably be held.

If a restriction is bargained for at the time of sale with the intention of giving the vendor a protection which he desires for the land he retains, and the restriction is expressed to be imposed for the benefit of the estate so that both sides are apparently accepting that the 16 See Marten v Flight Refueling Ltd [1962] Ch 115 and Earl of Leicester v Wells-next-the-Sea UDC [1973] Ch 110, but note the earlier case of Re Ballard's Conveyance [1937] Ch 473. Conveyancers usually circumvent any problem by providing for the severance of the covenant between those parts of a large estate that do benefit from the covenant and those parts that do not: see Marquess of Zetland v Driver [1939] Ch 1.

17 It is for the party being sued, i.e. the covenantor or his or her successors in title, to prove the lack of benefit: see Cryer v Scott Brothers (Sudbury) Ltd (1988) 55 P & CR 183.

18 See also Marten v Flight Refuelling [1962] Ch 115, 136, per Wilberforce J.

restriction is of value to the retained land, I think that the validity of the restriction should be upheld so long as an estate owner may reasonably take the view that the restriction remains of value to his estate, and that the restriction should not be discarded merely because others may reasonably argue that the restriction is spent.

2.3 NEGATIVITY

The covenant in Tulk v Moxhay had both negative and positive aspects: firstly, it called for keeping the land in an open state, i.e. it should not be built upon; and secondly, it called for the maintenance and repair of the land, although it was the negative obligation against building that was enforced.[19] In the later cases of Hayward v Brunswick Permanent Benefit Building Society[20] and London and South West Railway v Gomm,[21] the court made clear that it would only enforce negative obligations. Negative obligations restrain the owner of the servient land from acting in some way, whilst a positive obligation requires owners to put their hands in their pockets to fund some activity: for example, to maintain the land or repair some building upon it.

There has been growing pressure to enforce positive land covenants, but the judiciary has firmly passed this particular buck to Parliament. In the following case, the House of Lords refused to overcome more than a century of orthodoxy.

Rhone v Stephens
[1994] 2 AC 310, HL

Facts: Walford House was divided into two dwellings—a house and a cottage—in such a way that one of the cottage bedrooms lay under the roof of the house. Upon the sale of the cottage, the owner of the house covenanted with the purchaser to keep the roof in repair. Some years later, when the roof had fallen into disrepair, the owner of the cottage unsuccessfully brought action against the then owner of the house: a successor in title to the original covenantor.

Lord Templeman

At 317

My Lords, equity supplements but does not contradict the common law. When freehold land is conveyed without restriction, the conveyance confers on the purchaser the right to do with the land as he pleases provided that he does not interfere with the rights of others or infringe statutory restrictions. The conveyance may however impose restrictions which, in favour of the covenantee, deprive the purchaser of some of the rights inherent in the ownership of unrestricted land. In Tulk v. Moxhay (1848) 2 Ph. 774, a purchaser of land covenanted that no buildings would be erected on Leicester Square. A subsequent purchaser of Leicester Square was restrained from building. The conveyance to the original purchaser deprived him and every subsequent purchaser taking with notice of the covenant of the right, otherwise part and parcel of the freehold, to develop the square by the construction of buildings. Equity does not contradict the common law by enforcing a restrictive covenant against a successor in title of the covenantor but prevents the successor from exercising a right which he never acquired. Equity did not allow the owner of Leicester Square to build because the owner never acquired the right to build without the consent of the persons (if any) from time to time entitled to the benefit of the covenant against building [. . .] Equity can thus prevent or punish the breach of a negative covenant which restricts the user of land or the exercise of other rights in connection with land. Restrictive covenants deprive an owner of a right which he could otherwise exercise. Equity cannot compel an owner to comply with a positive covenant entered into by his predecessors in title without flatly contradicting the common law rule that a person cannot be made liable upon a contract unless he was a party to it. Enforcement of a positive covenant lies in contract; a positive covenant compels an owner to exercise his rights. Enforcement of a negative covenant lies in property; a negative covenant deprives the owner of a right over property. As Lord Cottenham L.C. said in Tulk v. Moxhay, at p. 778: 'if an equity is attached to the property by the owner, no one purchasing with notice of that equity can stand in a different situation from the party from whom he purchased.'

[19] In Morland v Cook (1868) LR 6 Eq 252 and Cooke v Chilcott (1876) 3 Ch D 694, positive obligations were enforced. See Bell, 'Tulk v Moxhay Revisited' [1981] Conv 55; Griffiths, 'Tulk v Moxhay Reclarified' [1983] Conv 29.

[20] (1881) 8 QBD 403.

[21] (1882) 20 Ch D 562.

Following Tulk v. Moxhay there was some suggestion that any covenant affecting land was enforceable in equity provided that the owner of the land had notice of the covenant prior to his purchase.

[His Lordship then considered the authorities: namely, the cases of Morland v Cook,[22] Cooke v Chilcott,[23] Haywood v Brunswick Permanent Benefit Building Society,[24] and London and South Western Railway Co v Gomm.[25]]

At 321

For over 100 years it has been clear and accepted law that equity will enforce negative covenants against freehold land but has no power to enforce positive covenants against successors in title of the land. To enforce a positive covenant would be to enforce a personal obligation against a person who has not covenanted. To enforce negative covenants is only to treat the land as subject to a restriction.

[His Lordship then referred to academic criticism of the rule and to recommendations by the Law Commission to alter the law.]

In these circumstances your Lordships were invited to overrule the decision of the Court of Appeal in the Austerberry case. To do so would destroy the distinction between law and equity and to convert the rule of equity into a rule of notice. It is plain from the articles, reports and papers to which we were referred that judicial legislation to overrule the Austerberry case would create a number of difficulties, anomalies and uncertainties and affect the rights and liabilities of people who have for over 100 years bought and sold land in the knowledge, imparted at an elementary stage to every student of the law of real property, that positive covenants, affecting freehold land are not directly enforceable except against the original covenantor. Parliamentary legislation to deal with the decision in the Austerberry case would require careful consideration of the consequences. Moreover, experience with leasehold tenure where positive covenants are enforceable by virtue of privity of estate has demonstrated that social injustice can be caused by logic.

[22] (1868) LR 6 Eq 252.
[23] (1876) 3 Ch D 694.
[24] (1881) 8 QBD 403.
[25] (1882) 20 Ch D 562.

Lord Templeman argues that where land is burdened by a negative covenant, the purchaser never receives the ability to act in breach of that covenant. Where the covenant is positive, however, he argues that the purchaser's title is burdened with an additional obligation that equity cannot order should be performed without contradicting the common law. O'Connor explains the distinction:

O'Connor, 'Careful what you wish for: positive freehold covenants'
[2011] Conv 191

> A restrictive covenant removes one or more use rights from the burdened owner's bundle of use rights, making it inequitable for a purchaser with notice to assert a use right which he or she did not acquire. Positive obligations to other landowners never formed part of the bundle in the first place. They can only be added by contract, and they bind only those who have agreed to undertaken them.

Gardner comments that Lord Templeman's reasoning is not convincing; rather, the decision springs from an understandable reluctance to entertain judicial legislation.

Gardner, 'Two Maxims of Equity' (1995) 54 CLJ 60, 67

> He appears to suppose that the common law, with its privity rule, "objects" to covenants being enforced against purchaser, but is "content" for them to bind purchasers under nemo dat, if some other system—equity—wants to make them do so.
>
> But this analysis is surely chimerical. We simply do not know whether the common law "objects" to covenants being enforced against non-parties, either as such or by virtue of nemo dat; or whether it is "content" for this to happen; or whether indeed, it aches for it to happen. And the reason we do not know is, of course, that the common law cannot possess such states of mind or emotions. That is not quite to say that Lord Templeman's version of the proposition is unworkable, however. It can be made workable if the judges are prepared to make the attitude of the common law the subject of oracular pronouncement, as though it were a mystery of which they were the priests. This is in effect how Lord Templeman proceeds when he tells us that to make positive covenants binding on purchasers would "contradict", rather than "supplement", the common law. But when we understand that the proposition must operate, if at all, in this way, we cannot but find it a quite remarkably indeterminate and opaque tool of reasoning, outstripping in these respects even the established maxims. Its acceptability in the law must therefore be in extreme doubt.
>
> In Rhone v Stephens, the considerations which resort to the proposition concealed were essentially as follows. Whilst it is widely felt that to provide for the running of positive covenants is desirable, the reform is an unsuitable one for judicial legislation, for two reasons. First it would need to be accompanied by a good deal of fine print, which could only be supplied by statute. Secondly, a judicial decision to enforce positive covenants would necessarily operate retrospectively, which would defeat the legitimate expectation of purchasers, advised on the basis of existing law, that they take free of such covenants.

The Law Commission has again looked at the question and we will be considering its proposals in section 5 below. In the meantime, there are a number of mechanisms that conveyancers use to try to enforce positive covenants.

2.4 INDIRECT ENFORCEMENT OF POSITIVE COVENANTS

The inability to directly enforce positive freehold covenants against subsequent purchasers of the servient land causes inconvenience and conveyancers have needed to be inventive. The need to enforce positive obligations is particularly acute where properties share facilities when provision needs to be made for their upkeep and repair. We have already seen, in Chapter 24, that the same problem does not affect positive leasehold covenants and, in the next chapter, we will examine the mechanisms employed to address the repair and maintenance of shared facilities in flat ownership. For now, we will consider the other devices that have been employed.

2.4.1 Mutual benefit and burden

The principle of mutual benefit and burden is encapsulated in the maxim that 'he who takes the benefit of a right must bear the burden upon which it is dependent'. As we noted in Chapter 6, section 2.5, if A enters into a positive covenant with B, the principle may sometimes impose a duty on C, a party later acquiring A's land, to perform that positive covenant. The principle is illustrated by the case of Halsall v Brizell,[26] in which purchasers of houses on an estate in Liverpool were granted a right to use the estate roads, the drains, the promenade, and the sea wall, subject to an obligation to contribute to the repair and upkeep of these facilities. When Brizell, a successor in title to one of the original purchasers, questioned his contribution, the court held that he could not claim the benefit of the right to use these facilities without accepting the attendant obligation to pay for their upkeep.

In Tito v Wadell (No 2),[27] Megarry V-C drew a distinction between conditional benefits, in which the benefit was conferred subject to a condition that a burden be accepted, and independent obligations, in which the right and obligation, although granted by the same instrument, were not interdependent. In the case of conditional benefits, the burden clearly passes, because the obligation is an intrinsic part of the right. In the case of independent obligations, Megarry V-C argued that the burden should also pass, under what he called the 'pure benefit and burden' principle, where the construction of the instrument demonstrated that a successor in title was not intended to take the benefit without also accepting the burden. In other words, although the initial grant was not conditional upon the burden, its subsequent assignment was. The principle of pure benefit and burden, taken to its logical conclusion, could have circumvented the common laws' prohibition on the burden of covenants passing, but the House of Lords has rejected the principle.

Rhone v Stephens
[1994] 2 AC 310, HL

Lord Templeman

At 322

Mr. Munby also sought to persuade your Lordships that the effect of the decision in the Austerberry case had been blunted by the 'pure principle of benefit and burden' distilled by Sir Robert Megarry V.-C. from the authorities in Tito v. Waddell (No. 2) [1977] 1 Ch. 106, 301 et seq. I am not prepared to recognise the 'pure principle' that any party deriving any benefit from a conveyance must accept any burden in the same conveyance. Sir Robert Megarry V.-C. relied on the decision of Upjohn J. in Halsall v. Brizell [1957] Ch. 169. In that case the defendant's predecessor in title had been granted the right to use the estate roads and sewers and had covenanted to pay a due proportion for the maintenance of these facilities. It was held that the defendant could not exercise the rights without paying his costs of ensuring that they could be exercised. Conditions can be attached to the exercise of a power in express terms or by implication. Halsall v. Brizell was just such a case and I have no difficulty in wholeheartedly agreeing with the decision. It does not follow that any condition can be rendered enforceable by attaching it to a right nor does it follow that every burden imposed by a conveyance may be enforced by depriving the covenantor's successor in title of every benefit which he enjoyed thereunder. The condition must be relevant to the exercise of the right. In Halsall v. Brizell there were reciprocal benefits and burdens enjoyed by the users of the roads and sewers. In the present case clause 2 of the 1960 conveyance imposes reciprocal benefits and burdens of support but clause 3 which imposed an obligation to repair the roof is an independent provision. In Halsall v. Brizell the defendant could, at least in theory, choose between enjoying the right and paying his proportion of the cost or alternatively giving up the right and saving his money.

[26] [1957] Ch 169.   [27] [1977] 1 Ch 106.

The Court of Appeal has subsequently formulated a two-stage test to establish whether a covenant falls within the mutual benefit and burden principle. The first stage looks to proof that the benefit is conferred conditionally upon performance of the burden; the second stage calls for the successor in title to have a choice as to whether he or she will accept the benefit and its attendant burden.

Thamesmead Town Ltd v Allotey
(2000) 79 P & CR 557, CA

Facts: A tenant on the Thamesmead Estate purchased the freehold reversion of his house under a right to buy. In the conveyance, he entered into a covenant to contribute to the upkeep of the roads, footpaths, sewers, and cables, as well as the landscaped and communal areas. The conveyance included a right for the purchaser to use the roads, footpaths, sewers, and cables, but no right to use the landscaped or communal areas. The tenant sold his house and his purchaser, Mr Allotey, questioned the amount of the service charge that he was required to pay. The Court held that he was not liable to pay that proportion of the charge which related to the costs of the landscaped and communal areas, because he had not been granted a right to use these facilities.

Peter Gibson LJ

At 564

The reasoning of Lord Templeman suggests that there are two requirements for the enforceability of a positive covenant against a successor in title to the covenantor. The first is that the condition of discharging the burden must be relevant to the exercise of the rights which enable the benefit to be obtained. In Rhone v. Stephens the mutual obligations of support was unrelated to, and independent of, the covenant to maintain the roof. The second is that the successors in title must have the opportunity to choose whether to take the benefit or having taken it to renounce it, even if only in theory, and thereby to escape the burden and that the successors in title can be deprived of the benefit if they fail to assume the burden.

> On both those grounds Halsall v. Brizell was distinguished. Although Lord Templeman expressed his wholehearted agreement with Upjohn J.'s decision, Lord Templeman's description of that decision was limited to the defendant being unable to exercise the rights to use the estate roads and to use the sewers without paying his costs of ensuring that they could be exercised. Nothing was expressly said about the cost of maintaining the sea wall or promenade and it is a little difficult to see how, consistently with Lord Templeman's reasoning and, in particular, the second requirement for the enforceability of a positive covenant, the cost of maintaining the sea wall would fall within the relevant principle [. . .]
>
> Lord Templeman was plainly seeking to restrict, not enlarge, the scope of the exception from the rule that positive covenants affecting freehold land are not directly enforceable except against the original covenantor. Lord Templeman treated Halsall v. Brizell as a case where the right to use the estate roads and sewers was conditional on a payment of a due proportion of the maintenance expenses for those facilities. Whilst agreeing with the decision, Lord Templeman made clear that for a burden to be enforceable it must be relevant to the benefit. He said that simply to attach a right to a condition for payment would not render that condition enforceable. Similarly, it is not possible to enforce every burden in a conveyance by depriving the covenantor's successors in title of every benefit which he enjoyed under the conveyance. There must be a correlation between the burden and the benefit which the successor has chosen to take. Lord Templeman plainly rejected the notion that taking a benefit under a conveyance was sufficient to make every burden of the conveyance enforceable. Further, there is no authority to suggest that any benefit obtained by a successor in title, once the property has been transferred to him, to enable the enforcement of a burden under the conveyance is sufficient, even if that benefit was not conferred as of right by the conveyance. In my judgment, it cannot be sufficient that the taking of an incidental benefit should enable the enforcement of a burden against a person who has not himself covenanted to undertake the particular burden.

2.4.2 Chain of indemnity covenants

It is common practice for conveyancers to build up a chain of personal covenants between successors in title of the covenantor, to try to ensure that contractual liability may be passed down from the original covenantor to the current owner of the servient land. If the current owner breaches a positive covenant, the covenantee can sue the original covenantor, who, in turn, can sue his or her direct successor in title on his or her personal covenant—and so on down the chain of covenants, until liability comes to rest upon culprit. The mechanism provides an unsatisfactory solution, both because the covenantee may only recover damages in respect of the breach, rather than an injunction, and because the chain may easily be broken by the disappearance or insolvency of one of the links.

2.4.3 Estate rentcharges

The expenses incurred in maintaining and repairing common facilities within an estate may be recoverable by imposing an estate 'rentcharge' on the land.[28] An estate rentcharge is a legal interest that requires the owner of the burdened land to pay a periodic sum, which may be recovered by exercising an attached right of re-entry.[29] That sum may be nominal, [28] Whilst new rent charges cannot generally be created following the Rentcharges Act 1977, estate rent charges are exempt from this prohibition: see Rentcharges Act 1977, ss 2(1), (2), and (3)(c).

[29] Bright, 'Estate Rentcharges and the Enforcement of Positive Obligations' [1988] Conv 99.

where the estate rentcharge is used as a device to enforce positive covenants, or may reflect the cost incurred by the holder of the rentcharge (i.e. the developer or manager, as owner of the estates' common parts) of 'meeting or contributing towards the cost of performance [...] of covenants for the provision of services, carrying out maintenance or repairs, effecting insurance or the making of any benefit'.[30]

2.5 THE ACQUISITION AND PRIORITY OF RESTRICTIVE COVENANTS

2.5.1 Creation of covenants

Covenants are invariably expressly created by deed—usually in the conveyance, when part of land is sold off—and are made pursuant to the contract for the sale of that land.[31] Because restrictive covenants operate in equity rather than at law, however, it is theoretically possible for a restrictive covenant to be created by signed writing[32] or even through the operation of proprietary estoppel.[33]

2.5.2 The priority of covenants

The decision of Lord Cottenham in Tulk v Moxhay was based upon the unconscionability that would result if purchasers with notice of the covenant could then claim that they were not bound. Indeed, purchasers could be unjustly enriched if the land, freed from the burden covenant, were then to increase in value. As the doctrine developed, the courts came to recognize restrictive covenants as equitable proprietary interests, which would bind all save for a bona fide purchaser of the legal estate without notice of the covenant. This metamorphosis of restrictive covenants from personal obligation to proprietary status was a remarkable development. It is not surprising that the courts then had to work hard to keep the doctrine within clear definitional bounds, to maintain a balance between the amenity advantages of restrictive covenants and the danger of sterilizing land development by 'incidents of a novel kind [...] devised [...] at the fancy and caprice of any owner'.[34]

The proprietary status of restrictive covenants is explained in the following case, in which the question before the court was whether a squatter took subject to restrictive covenants affecting the title that had been extinguished.

Re Nisbet & Potts Contract
[1906] 1 Ch 386, CA

Collins MR

At 402

It seems to me, therefore, that the principal question before us is whether or not Sir George Jessel was right in the view that he took in London and South Western Ry. Co. v. Gomm, that an obligation created by a restrictive covenant is in the nature of a negative easement, creating 30 Rentcharges Act 1977, s 2(4)(b) and (5).

31 Theoretically, a covenant might be implied as a result of the usual contractual principles governing the implication of terms.
32 See Law of Property Act 1925, s 53(1)(a).
33 See Chapter 10.
34 Keppel v Bailey (1834) 2 My & K 517, 535, per Lord Brougham.

a paramount right in the person entitled to it over the land to which it relates. If that is so, then, in the present case, the squatter, by his squatting, simply acquired a right to land subject to this incident. Of course, the burden of that incident must pass to all persons who subsequently become assignees of the land, and the squatter is not entitled to hand it over freed from the obligation that was imposed on the person whose title he has ousted by his possession.

Now, is that the law or not? In the first place, I do not think there was anything inconsistent in the view taken by Sir George Jessel with the law as laid down in the leading case of Tulk v. Moxhay, though, no doubt, words are used there pointing to the equity arising out of the injustice which would accrue if a person who had acquired land at a reduced price by reason of its user being subject to a restriction were afterwards enabled to pass on that land to other persons freed from that restriction receiving in return, on that ground, an increased price. That element, no doubt, does enter into consideration, when one comes to inquire what is the position of a person who acquires for value the legal estate in land subject to a right that has previously been created in another person to restrict the user of that land. The right so created is an equitable right, and, therefore, it is one capable of being defeated in certain circumstances by a person who acquires the legal estate for value. The question thus arises whether, in the circumstances of the particular case, there is anything which would make it inequitable for that person to avail himself of his legal estate to defeat that equitable right. That, as Mr. Upjohn pointed out, is an inquiry which is inevitable in cases where you are dealing with equitable rights and legal estates. But that does not in the least prevent the right in question being what Sir George Jessel considered it to be, namely, a burden imposed upon the land, and passing with the land, subject, of course, to this, that it may be defeated by a purchaser for value without notice; but the burden is upon the person who takes the land to shew that he has acquired it under such conditions as to defeat the right as against him, namely, that he has acquired it for value and without notice.

The priority of restrictive covenants created before 1925 continues to be regulated by notice, but restrictive covenants created after 1925 have been assimilated into the relevant registration regime. Where the servient land is unregistered, a restrictive covenant must be registered as a Class D(iii) land charge,[35] whilst where the servient land is registered, the covenant must be protected by the entry of a notice on the charges register.[36]

3 THE BENEFIT: WHO CAN SUE?

Those entitled to the benefit of a land covenant defines those who can take action on the covenant. There are three ways in which the benefit of a covenant can pass from the original covenantee to a new owner of the dominant land:

- by assignment, both at law and in equity;
- by annexation of the benefit of the covenant to the land, either by express words, implication, or by the operation of s 78 of the LPA 1925; or
- under a building scheme.

These three methods, particularly annexation, have been the subject of highly technical rules that have been described as providing 'one of the richest areas of fantasy in printed English'.[37]

35 See Chapter 13; Land Charges Act 1925, s 101; Land Charges Act 1972, s 2(5).
36 See Chapter 14; Land Registration Act 2002, ss 29, 32–34.
37 Kenny, 'Conveyancer's Notebook' [2006] Conv 1, 2.

The search has been to find both an intention that the benefit of the covenant should pass and also to identify, with a degree of certainty, the land to which the benefit is attached.

Wade explains the tensions that have resulted.

Wade, 'Covenants: "A Broad and Reasonable View"' (1972) 31 CLJ 157, 162–5

After making much heavy weather over the transmission of the benefit, and so producing a body of law of notorious and unnecessary difficulty, the Chancery judges have now for twenty years been striving to relax their own rules. They have been working towards what might be called implied annexation, where there is no requirement of any formality but the decisive factor is the intention of the parties to the covenant, as inferred not only from its language but also from the surrounding facts at the time when it was made. The tendency is thus to assimilate the law of covenants to the law of easements, where no formalities are required for establishing the rights as appurtenant to the dominant tenement.

This policy is uncomfortable to conveyancers, who inhabit a world of paper and ink in which all important facts are expected to be clearly stated in documents of title [. . .]

Accordingly there may be said to be two opposing views: the "conveyancers' view," if it may be so called advocates compulsory formality; and the "judicial view" which at present indicates away from formality, and which at all times is concerned to temper the injustice which compulsory formality entails [. . .]

The question is very much one of degree. No one complains that it is excessively strict to require that freehold land should be conveyed by deed. But the law of restrictive covenants is at present being judicially purged of an overdose of formalism.

Many of the decisions have been excessively technical, and at times the courts seem bemused by their own refinements. But this is because they have been pressed with the subtle arguments prompted by the "conveyancers' view" that the benefited land should be clearly defined in the deed of covenant. Occasionally they have appeared to accept this, and judges and others have slipped into saying that the deed must identify the land. But in general they have resisted it.

3.1 ASSIGNMENT

Like the benefit of any other contract, the benefit of a land covenant may be assigned. Thus the original covenantee may transfer both the land and the benefit of the covenant to a purchaser of the land by using express words of assignment, provided that the covenant relates to the land, in the sense that it is not personal to the covenantee. The benefit of the covenant will need to be expressly assigned on each disposal of the land to build up a continuous chain of assignments. The assignment may take effect at law where the original covenantee and his or her assignee hold a legal estate in the land, although that need not be the same legal estate.[38]

Assignment at law is, however, of limited value: only the original convenator can be sued, given that the burden does not run at law, and, because a covenant cannot be severed at law, a legal assignment will not assist where part of the dominant land is sold.

Assignment in equity, the requirements of which are found in the following case, overcomes these deficiencies and is frequently employed by conveyancers.

[38] Smith and Snipes Hall Farm Ltd v River Douglas Catchment Board [1949] 2 KB 500.

Miles v Easter
[1933] Ch 611, CA

Romer LJ

At 631

It is plain, however, from these and other cases, and notably that of Renals v. Cowlishaw, that if the restrictive covenant be taken not merely for some personal purpose or object of the vendor, but for the benefit of some other land of his in the sense that it would enable him to dispose of that land to greater advantage, the covenant, though not annexed to such land so as to run with any part of it, may be enforced against an assignee of the covenantor taking with notice, both by the covenantee and by persons to whom the benefit of such covenant has been assigned, subject however to certain conditions. In the first place, the "other land" must be land that is capable of being benefited by the covenant—otherwise it would be impossible to infer that the object of the covenant was to enable the vendor to dispose of his land to greater advantage. In the next place, this land must be "ascertainable" or "certain," to use the words of Romer and Scrutton L.JJ. respectively. For, although the Court will readily infer the intention to benefit the other land of the vendor where the existence and situation of such land are indicated in the conveyance or have been otherwise shown with reasonable certainty, it is impossible to do so from vague references in the conveyance or in other documents laid before the Court as to the existence of other lands of the vendor, the extent and situation of which are undefined. In the third place, the covenant cannot be enforced by the covenantee against an assign of the purchaser after the covenantee has parted with the whole of his land.

3.2 ANNEXATION

Annexation is a once-and-for-all process by which the benefit of the covenant is glued to the land, so as to become part of the land and thus pass automatically upon a conveyance of the land. Two concerns need to be met to ensure annexation: firstly, there must be an intention that the benefit of the covenant should become part of the land; and secondly, it is necessary to determine the physical limits of the land to which the covenant is annexed—that is, what area is covered by the annexing glue? These questions are the flip side of the requirement for accommodation that we examined in section 2.2.

It is in the clarity of the evidence required to prove these two elements that the tension between the 'conveyancers' view' and the 'judicial view' is most evident. Conveyancers have looked to express words of annexation contained in the covenant and to clear evidence of the physical definition of the land in the conveyancing documents, whilst the courts have accepted a lower standard of evidence.

3.2.1 Express annexation

Express words of annexation can be demonstrated by contrasting the wording of the covenants in Rogers v Hosegood[39] and that in Renals v Cowlishaw.[40]

[39] [1900] 2 Ch 388.
[40] (1878) 8 Ch D 125.

In Rogers v Hosegood, a covenant was made in the following terms.

> With the intent that the covenant might as far as possible bind the premises [. . .] conveyed and every part thereof, into whosoever hands the same might come, and might enure to the benefit of the mortgagees, their heirs and assigns and others claiming under them to all or any of their lands adjoining or near the premises.

In Renals v Cowlishaw, the covenants merely stated that it was taken for 'the vendors, their heirs, executors, administrators and assigns'.

Thus, in Rogers v Hosegood, it was clear that the covenant was to become part of the land, because it was made with the covenantee and his or her successors in title in their capacity as owners of adjoining land; in Renals v Cowlishaw, the absence of any reference to the covenantee's land was fatal.

The technicality of express annexation and its relationship with the passing of the burden is illustrated by the following judgment of Farwell J.

Marquess of Zetland v Driver
[1939] Ch 1, CA

Facts: A conveyance of a shop in Redcar made by the Marquess' estate contained a covenant by the purchaser not to commit any nuisance to the vendor or occupiers of any adjoining property in the neighbourhood. The covenant was expressed to be made for the benefit of such parts of the Marquess' estate as should remain unsold or be sold with the benefit of the covenant. An injunction was granted to restrain the use of the shop for the sale of fish and chips.

Farwell J

At 8

[. . .] [C]ovenants can only be validly imposed if they comply with certain conditions. Firstly, they must be negative covenants. No affirmative covenant requiring the expenditure of money or the doing of some act can ever be made to run with the land. Secondly, the covenant must be one that touches or concerns the land, by which is meant that it must be imposed for the benefit or to enhance the value of the land retained by the vendor or some part of it, and no such covenant can ever be imposed if the sale comprises the whole of the vendor's land. Further, the land retained by the vendor must be such as to be capable of being benefited by the covenant at the time when it is imposed. Thirdly, the land which is intended to be benefited must be so defined as to be easily ascertainable, and the fact that the covenant is imposed for the benefit of that particular land should be stated in the conveyance and the persons or the class of persons entitled to enforce it. The fact that the benefit of the covenant is not intended to pass to all persons into whose hands the unsold land may come is not objectionable so long as the class of persons intended to have the benefit of the covenant is clearly defined. Finally, it must be remembered that these covenants can only be enforced so long as the covenantee or his successor in title retains some part of the land for the benefit of which the covenant was imposed. Applying those conditions to the present case, the covenant sued upon appears to comply with them [. . .]

Under those circumstances, there does not appear to be any ground on which the appellant can properly be refused the relief which he seeks; but Bennett J. took the opposite view and held that the benefit of the covenant had not passed to the appellant. In coming to that conclusion he founded himself upon a decision of Clauson J. in re Ballard's Conveyance, which he considered to be exactly in point and binding upon him. In our judgment the learned judge was wrong in thinking that In re Ballard's Conveyance was an authority in this case. It is not necessary for us, and we do not propose, to express any opinion as to that decision beyond saying that it is clearly distinguishable from the present case, if only on the ground that in that case the covenant was expressed to run with the whole estate, whereas in the present case no such difficulty arises because the covenant is expressed to be for the benefit of the whole or any part or parts of the unsold settled property.

There is some support for the view that proof of annexation may also be gleaned from the circumstances surrounding the making of the conveyance: for example, where those circumstances demonstrate to which land the benefit is to be annexed.[41]

In the above extract, Farwell distinguished Re Ballards Conveyance,[42] in which annexation failed because the dominant land was so large that it was impossible to prove that the entire area benefited.[43] Whilst part of the land clearly could benefit, the court refused to sever the covenant so that the benefit could at least pass with that part. This unfortunate result was avoided in Marquess of Zetland v Driver, in which the covenant was expressed to be annexed to 'each and every part of the estate'.

Brightman LJ doubted the need for these words in the following case.

Federated Homes Ltd v Mill Lodge Properties Ltd
[1980] 1 WLR 594, CA

Brightman LJ

At 606

[. . .] [T]he idea of annexation of a covenant to the whole of the land but not to part of it is a difficult conception to grasp [. . .] I would have thought, if a covenant is, on a proper construction of a document, annexed to the land, prima facie it is annexed to every part thereof, unless the contrary clearly appears.

His views have subsequently been followed at first instance in Small v Oliver & Saunders.[44]

3.2.2 Statutory annexation

The technicalities of express annexation have been sidestepped by judicial recognition that s 78 of the LPA 1925 provides automatic annexation in respect of covenants entered into after 1925.[45]

[41] See Rogers v Hosegood [1900] 2 Ch 388, 408, and Marten v Flight Refueling Ltd [1962] Ch 115, 133.

[42] [1937] Ch 473.

[43] The area was a 1,700-acre estate.

[44] [2006] EWHC 1293, [29].

[45] Express annexation continues to be necessary under Conveyancing and Law of Property Act 1881, s 58, where the covenant is entered into before 1925: see J Sainsbury plc v Enfield LBC [1989] 1 WLR 590, Southwark Roman Catholic Diocesan Corp v South London Church Fund and Southwark Diocesan Board of Finance [2009] EWHC 3368 and Seymour Road (Southampton) Ltd v Williams [2010] EWHC 111.

Law of Property Act 1925, s 78

(1) A covenant relating to any land of the covenantee shall be deemed to be made with the covenantee and his successors in title and the persons deriving title under him or them, and shall have effect as if such successors and other persons were expressed.

For the purposes of this subsection in connection with covenants restrictive of the user of land 'successors in title' shall be deemed to include the owners and occupiers for the time being of the land of the covenantee intended to be benefited.

(2) This section applies to covenants made after the commencement of this Act, but the repeal of section fifty eight of the Conveyancing Act 1881 does not affect the operation of covenants to which that section applied.

The Court of Appeal considered the effect of this section in the following case.

Federated Home Ltd v Mill Lodge Properties Ltd

[1980] 1 WLR 594, CA

Facts: A vendor sold an area of land for development ('the blue land') to Mill Lodge, subject to a covenant restricting the density of development so as not to prejudice development of the vendor's retained land under an existing planning permission. Subsequently, two further areas of land ('the red land' and 'the green land') were sold by the vendor and came into the ownership of Federated Homes. Mill Lodge threatened to breach the covenant and Federated Homes successfully sought an injunction claiming the benefit of the covenant. There was no express annexation conferring the benefit of the covenant upon the red and green land, although there was an express assignment of the benefit of the covenant in respect of the green land.

Brightman LJ

At 604

Mr. Price submitted that there were three possible views about section 78. One view, which he described as "the orthodox view" hitherto held, is that it is merely a statutory shorthand for reducing the length of legal documents. A second view, which was the one that Mr. Price was inclined to place in the forefront of his argument, is that the section only applies, or at any rate only achieves annexation, when the land intended to be benefited is signified in the document by express words or necessary implication as the intended beneficiary of the covenant. A third view is that the section applies if the covenant in fact touches and concerns the land of the covenantee, whether that be gleaned from the document itself or from evidence outside the document.

For myself, I reject the narrowest interpretation of section 78, the supposed orthodox view, which seems to me to fly in the face of the wording of the section. Before I express my reasons I will say that I do not find it necessary to choose between the second and third views because, in my opinion, this covenant relates to land of the covenantee on either interpretation of section 78. Clause 5 (iv) shows clearly that the covenant is for the protection of the retained land and that land is described in clause 2 as "any adjoining or adjacent property retained by the vendor." This formulation is sufficient for annexation purposes: see Rogers v. Hosegood [1900] 2 Ch. 388.

There is in my judgment no doubt that this covenant "related to the land of the covenantee," or, to use the old-fashioned expression, that it touched and concerned the land, even if Mr. Price is correct in his submission that the document must show an intention to benefit identified land. The result of such application is that one must read clause 5 (iv) as if it were written: "The purchaser hereby covenants with the vendor and its successors in title and the persons deriving title under it or them, including the owners and occupiers for the time being of the retained land, that in carrying out the development of the blue land the purchaser shall not build at a greater density than a total 300 dwellings so as not to reduce, etc." I leave out of consideration section 79 as unnecessary to be considered in this context, since Mill Lodge is the original covenantor.

The first point to notice about section 78 (1) is that the wording is significantly different from the wording of its predecessor section 58 (1) of the Conveyancing Act 1881. The distinction is underlined by section 78 (2), which applies section 78 (1) only to covenants made after the commencement of the Act. Section 58 (1) of the Act of 1881 did not include the covenantee's successors in title or persons deriving title under him or them, or the owner or occupiers for the time being of the land of the covenantee intended to be benefited. The section was confined, in relation to realty, to the covenantee, his heirs and assigns, words which suggest a more limited scope of operation than is found in section 78.

If, as the language of section 78 implies, a covenant relating to land which is restrictive of the user thereof is enforceable at the suit of (1) a successor in title of the covenantee, (2) a person deriving title under the covenantee or under his successors in title, and (3) the owner or occupier of the land intended to be benefited by the covenant, it must, in my view, follow that the covenant runs with the land, because ex hypothesi every successor in title to the land, every derivative proprietor of the land and every other owner and occupier has a right by statute to the covenant. In other words, if the condition precedent of section 78 is satisfied—that is to say, there exists a covenant which touches and concerns the land of the covenantee—that covenant runs with the land for the benefit of his successors in title, persons deriving title under him or them and other owners and occupiers.

The decision was controversial and has been criticized by those taking the traditional 'conveyancers' view'.[46] Two particular objections have been raised. The first, it is argued, is that this interpretation of s 78 is at odds with the interpretation given to its sister provision concerning the running of the burden found in s 79.[47] But the wording of the two sections is different, as Snape explains.

Snape, 'The Benefit and Burden of Covenants: now where are we?'
(1994) 68 Nott LJ 68, 71

The crucial difference between the two sections is that, whilst section 78 [. . .] deems the covenant to be made "with the covenantee and his successors in title and the persons deriving title under him or them ", section 79 [. . .] deems the covenant to be made "on behalf of [the covenantor] and his successors in title and the persons deriving title under him or them". Whatever the precise scope of the word "deemed" is in each section, this difference in 46 Newsome, 'Universal Annexation' (1981) 97 LQR 32, (1982) 98 LQR 202; Snape, 'The Benefit and Burden of Covenants: Now Where Are We?' (1994) 3 Nott LJ 68; but see Hurst, 'The Transmission of Restrictive Covenants' (1982) 2 LS 53.

47 See section 2.1.

wording makes it clear that the benefit is, in principle, to pass to the covenantor's successors etc quite easily, whilst section 79 is intended, in the absence of contrary intention, to ensure that the burden remains firmly with the original covenantor.

The second objection is that, whilst s 79 expressly gives way to a contrary intention, s 78 does not. This objection is considered in the following case, in which the vendor of plots sold off from an estate imposed building restrictions, but provided that the benefit of these restrictions should not pass unless expressly assigned.

Roake v Chadha
[1984] 1 WLR 40, HC

Paul Baker QC

At 45

The Federated Homes case shows that section 78 of the Act of 1925 brings about annexation, and that the operation of the section cannot be excluded by a contrary intention. As I have indicated, he supports this last point by reference to section 79, which is expressed to operate "unless a contrary intention is expressed," a qualification which, as we have already noticed, is absent from section 78. Mr. Walter could not suggest any reason of policy why section 78 should be mandatory, unlike, for example, section 146 of the Act of 1925, which deals with restrictions on the right to forfeiture of leases and which, by an express provision "has effect notwithstanding any stipulation to the contrary."

I am thus far from satisfied that section 78 has the mandatory operation which Mr. Walter claimed for it. But if one accepts that it is not subject to a contrary intention, I do not consider that it has the effect of annexing the benefit of the covenant in each and every case irrespective of the other express terms of the covenant.

The true position as I see it is that even where a covenant is deemed to be made with successors in title as section 78 requires, one still has to construe the covenant as a whole to see whether the benefit of the covenant is annexed. Where one finds, as in the Federated Homes case, the covenant is not qualified in any way, annexation may be readily inferred; but where, as in the present case, it is expressly provided:

> "this covenant shall not enure for the benefit of any owner or subsequent purchaser of any part of the vendor's Sudbury Court Estate at Wembley unless the benefit of this covenant shall be expressly assigned [. . .]"

One cannot just ignore these words. One may not be able to exclude the operation of the section in widening the range of the covenantees, but one has to consider the covenant as a whole to determine its true effect. When one does that, then it seems to me that the answer is plain and in my judgment the benefit was not annexed. That is giving full weight to both the statute in force and also what is already there in the covenant.

The Court of Appeal indorsed this view in the following case, by explaining that 'successors in title' is limited to those purchasers who are intended to benefit from the covenant and thus a contrary intention may exclude certain purchasers.[48]

[48] A contrary intention has been found in the following cases Margerison v Bates [2008] EWHC 1211; Norwich City College of Further and Higher Education v McQuillin [2009] EWHC 1496; Churchhill v Temple [2010] EWHC 3369.

Crest Nicholson Residential (South) Ltd v McAllister
[2004] 1 WLR 2409, CA

Chadwick LJ

At [41]–[44]

I respectfully agree, first, that it is impossible to identify any reason of policy why a covenantor should not, by express words, be entitled to limit the scope of the obligation which he is undertaking; nor why a covenantee should not be able to accept a covenant for his own benefit on terms that the benefit does not pass automatically to all those to whom he sells on parts of his retained land. As Brightman LJ pointed out, in the passage cited by Judge Paul Baker QC, a developer who is selling off land in lots might well want to retain the benefit of a building restriction under his own control. Where, as in Roake v Chadha and the present case, development land is sold off in plots without imposing a building scheme, it seems to me very likely that the developer will wish to retain exclusive power to give or withhold consent to a modification or relaxation of a restriction on building which he imposes on each purchaser; unfettered by the need to obtain the consent of every subsequent purchaser to whom (after imposing the covenant) he has sold off other plots on the development land. I can see no reason why, if original covenantor and covenantee make clear their mutual intention in that respect, the legislature should wish to prevent effect being given to that intention.

Second, it is important to keep in mind that, for the purposes of its application to restrictive covenants-which is the context in which this question arises where neither of the parties to the dispute were, themselves, party to the instrument imposing the covenant or express assignees of the benefit of the covenant-section 78 of the 1925 Act defines "successors in title" as the owners and occupiers of the time being of the land of the covenantee intended to be benefited. In a case where the parties to the instrument make clear their intention that land retained by the covenantee at the time of the conveyance effected by the transfer is to have the benefit of the covenant only for so long as it continues to be in the ownership of the original covenantee, and not after it has been sold on by the original covenantee—unless the benefit of the covenant is expressly assigned to the new owner—the land of the covenantee intended to be benefited is identified by the instrument as (i) so much of the retained land as from time to time has not been sold off by the original covenantee and (ii) so much of the retained land as has been sold off with the benefit of an express assignment, but as not including (iii) so much of the land as has been sold off without the benefit of an express assignment. I agree with the judge in Roake v Chadha that, in such a case, it is possible to give full effect to the statute and to the terms of the covenant.

This approach to section 78 of the 1925 Act provides, as it seems to me, the answer to the question why, if the legislature did not intend to distinguish between the effect of section 78 (mandatory) and the effect of section 79 (subject to contrary intention), it did not include the words "unless a contrary intention is expressed" in the first of those sections. The answer is that it did not need to. The qualification "subject to contrary intention" is implicit in the definition of "successors in title" which appears in section 78(1); that is the effect of the words "the land of the covenantee intended to be benefited". If the terms in which the covenant is imposed show—as they did in Marquess of Zetland v Driver and in Roake v Chadha—that the land of the covenantee intended to be benefited does not include land which may subsequently be sold off by the original covenantee in circumstances where (at the time of that subsequent sale) there is no express assignment of the benefit of the covenant, then the owners and occupiers of the land sold off in those circumstances are not "owners and occupiers for the time being of the land of the covenantee intended to be benefited"; and so are not "successors in title" of the original covenantee for the purposes of section 78(1) in its application to covenants restrictive of the user of land.

By contrast, the definition of "successors in title" for the purposes of section 79(1) appears in subsection (2) of that section: "the owners and occupiers for the time being of such land". In that context "such land" means "any land of a covenantor or capable of being bound by him [to which the covenant relates]." The counterpart in section 79 of "land of the covenantee intended to be benefited" (in section 78(1)) is "such land". "Such land" in that context means the land referred to in section 79(1); that is to say "any land of a covenantor or capable of being bound by him". But section 79(1) imposes two qualifications; (i) the land must be land to which the covenant relates and (ii) there must be no expression of contrary intention. The section could, perhaps, have described the land as "land of the covenantor (or capable of being bound by him) intended to be burdened". But the effect would have been the same. If the parties did not intend that land, burdened while in the ownership of the covenantor, should continue to be subject to the burden in hands of his successors (or some of his successors), they could say so. On a true analysis there is no difference in treatment in the two sections. There is a difference in the drafting technique used to achieve the same substantive result. That may well simply reflect the legislative history of the two sections. Section 78(1) of the 1925 Act re-enacted section 58 of the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act 1881 (44 & 45 Vict c 41) as applied by section 96(3) of the Law of Property Act 1922 and amended by section 3 of, and paragraph 11 of Schedule 3 to, the Law of Property (Amendment) Act 1924. Section 79 was a new provision, first introduced in the 1925 Act.

Statutory annexation may address the first evidential concern—namely, to demonstrate an intention that the benefit is to run to the covenantee's successors in title as owners of the dominant land—but it is still necessary to satisfy the second evidential requirement that the dominant land is adequately identified.[49]

Crest Nicholson Residential (South) Ltd v McAllister
[2004] 1 WLR 2409, CA

Facts: Crest intended to develop land that formerly comprised a number of different plots, originally sold off between 1926 and 1936, when they were made subject to similar covenants restricting their development and user. Some of the covenants contained express words of annexation, but others did not. Mrs McAllister, who lived in a house built on part of the plot sold off in 1936, opposed the development, claiming to be entitled to the benefit of the covenants. She was unsuccessful. Her land was insufficiently identified for the benefit to be expressly annexed or annexed via s 78.

Chadwick LJ

At [30]

The decision of this court in the Federated Homes case leaves open the question whether section 78 of the 1925 Act only effects annexation when the land intended to be benefited is described in the instrument itself (by express words or necessary implication, albeit that it may be necessary to have regard to evidence outside the document fully to identify that land) or whether it is enough that it can be shown, from evidence wholly outside the document, 49 See also Mohammadzadeh v Joseph [2006] EWHC 1040.

that the covenant does in fact touch and concern land of the covenantee which can be identified.

[The judge then referred to the cases of Rogers v Hosegood and Marquess of Zetland v Driver.]

At [33]–[34]

In its later decision in the Federated Homes case this court held that the provisions of section 78 of the 1925 Act had made it unnecessary to state, in the conveyance, that the covenant was to be enforceable by persons deriving title under the covenantee or under his successors in title and the owner or occupier of the land intended to be benefited, or that the covenant was to run with the land intended to be benefited; but there is nothing in that case which suggests that it is no longer necessary that the land which is intended to be benefited should be so defined that it is easily ascertainable. In my view, that requirement, identified in Marquess of Zetland v Driver remains a necessary condition for annexation.

There are, I think, good reasons for that requirement. A restrictive covenant affecting land will not be enforceable in equity against a purchaser who acquires a legal estate in that land for value without notice of the covenant. A restrictive covenant imposed in an instrument made after 1925 is registrable as a land charge under class D(ii): section 10(1) of the Land Charges Act 1925 and, now, section 2(5) of the Land Charges Act 1972. If the title is registered, protection is effected by entering notice of the restrictive covenant on the register: section 50 of the Land Registration Act 1925 and, now, section 11 of the Land Registration Act 2002. Where practicable the notice shall be by reference to the instrument by which the covenant is imposed and a copy or abstract of that instrument shall be filed at the registry: section 50(1) of the Land Registration Act 1925 and section 3(5) of the Land Charges Act 1972. It is obviously desirable that a purchaser of land burdened with a restrictive covenant should be able not only to ascertain, by inspection of the entries on the relevant register, that the land is so burdened, but also to ascertain the land for which the benefit of the covenant was taken-so that he can identify who can enforce the covenant. That latter object is achieved if the land which is intended to be benefited is defined in the instrument so as to be easily ascertainable. To require a purchaser of land burdened with a restrictive covenant, but where the land for the benefit of which the covenant was taken is not described in the instrument, to make inquiries as to what (if any) land the original covenantee retained at the time of the conveyance and what (if any) of that retained land the covenant did, or might have, "touched and concerned" would be oppressive. It must be kept in mind that (as in the present case) the time at which the enforceability of the covenant becomes an issue may be long after the date of the instrument by which it was imposed.

Section 78 is, thus, not a panacea for poor covenant drafting. The land to be benefited must be identified 'from a description, plan or other reference in the conveyance itself, but aided, if necessary, by external evidence to identify the land so described, depicted or otherwise referred to'.[50] Even so, as Howell points out, identifying the land intended to be benefited can be problematic—particularly where time has elapsed and the original covenantee's land has been fragmented.

[50] Crest Nicholson Residential (South) Ltd v McAllister [2004] EWCA Civ 410, [45], per Chadwick LJ. See also Stocks v Whitgift Homes Ltd [2001] EWCA Civ 1732. Note the different evidence required to identify the dominant land where the burden and benefit pass: see section 2.2 above.

Howell, 'The Annexation of the Benefit of Covenants to Land' [2004] Conv 507, 513

> The necessity of the benefited land to be sufficiently identified is the same whether the covenant is annexed by express words or by s78. The problem is that actually identifying the land on the ground which is to be benefited may be impossible and raise all the difficulties of enquiry which Chadwick LJ deplored. Simply stating as in Rogers v Hosegood that the land to be benefited "is nearby" and is all the land owned by X is surely no identification at all. In Marquess of Zetland v Driver the covenant imposed in 1928 was expressed for the benefit of land which was part of a settlement set up in 1871. The breach of the covenant was in 1938 and as it happened the whole of the land settled in 1871 was still intact in the hands of the tenant for life in possession, so identification of the land benefited was straightforward. It would be different where the covenants were imposed many years before and the land to be benefited had been sold in pieces [. . .]
>
> There is no similar requirement in the law of easements that the land to be benefited be identified in the conveyance. In Johnstone v Holdway an express reservation of an easement of way which made no mention of land to be benefited was good since it could be identified by information known to the parties at the time. Again, the challenge to the validity of the easement was a relatively short time after the conveyance but there does not seem anything in the different natures of an easement and a restrictive covenant which justifies the difference in principle.

Drawing upon the easements analogy, arguments[51] have been put forward from time to time that the benefit of a covenant should pass under s 62 of the LPA 1925, which we considered in the last chapter. In both Roake v Chadha[52] and Kumar v Dunning,[53] however, the courts were unimpressed by the analogy and declined to accept that a covenant that is not annexed to the land is a right appertaining to it.[54]

3.3 BUILDING SCHEME

Early in the development of restrictive covenants, the Chancery courts recognized that the enforcement of common covenants within a development merited special consideration.[55] Where a building scheme or scheme of development can be proved, equity supports the reciprocal enforcement of common covenants between all owners of the development, creating, in effect, a 'local law'.[56] A building scheme thus permits both the burden and the benefit of a covenant to pass to all owners for the time being within the scheme, but it is in the context of determining who can sue that building schemes are most often employed. The reason for this lies in the timing of sales.

51 See Hayton (1971) 87 LQR 539, 570, and Wade (1972) 31 CLJ 157, 175. The argument was raised in Federated Homes Ltd v Mill Lodge Properties Ltd [1980] 1 WLR 594 and in Shropshire CC v Edwards (1982) 46 P & CR 270, 279, but in each case, the courts have declined to consider the issue.

52 [1984] 1 WLR 40, 46.

53 [1989] QB 193, 198.

54 In Sugarman v Porter [2006] EWHC 331, a similar argument was rejected based upon s 63 of the Law of Property Act 1925.

55 There is evidence of mutually enforceable covenants as early the late 1830s: see Lawrence v South County Freeholds Ltd [1939] Ch 656, 675, per Simonds J; Re Pinewood Estates [1958] Ch 280, 286, per Wynn Parry J.

56 See Reid v Bickerstaff [1909] 2 Ch 305, 319, per Coxens Hardy MR; Re Dolphin's Conveyance [1970] Ch 654, 662, per Stamp J.

3.3.1 The timing problem

Whilst the burden of a covenant can be imposed upon the sale of each plot within a development, the benefit is more difficult to pass once the first plots have been sold, because the dominant land shrinks. Thus, if we have a small development of ten plots, the benefit of covenants taken by the developer from the purchaser of Plot 1 may be annexed to the plots that the developer still owns (i.e. Plots 2–10). When Plot 2 is sold, the benefit of the covenants taken from the purchaser cannot be annexed to Plot 1, which, having been sold, does not form part of the developer's dominant land. By the time that the later plots are sold, the problem is magnified. Thus when Plot 9 is sold, the purchaser's covenants cannot be annexed to Plots 1–8; the benefit can only be annexed to the Plot 10. Once Plot 10 is sold, the developer retains no land capable of benefiting from the covenant, and thus neither the burden nor benefit of the covenants can pass.

3.3.2 A local law

Where a building scheme is found, timing is not an issue. All of the current owners of land within the scheme may sue (i.e. claim the benefit) and be sued (i.e. subject to the burden) on the common covenants, regardless of when the covenants were originally imposed upon their properties or when they acquired ownership.

The classic statement of the evidence required to prove a building scheme is found in Parker J's judgment in the following case.[57]

Elliston v Reacher
[1908] 2 Ch 374, HC

Parker J

At 384

[. . .] [I]t must be proved (1) that both the plaintiffs and defendants derive title under a common vendor; (2) that previously to selling the lands to which the plaintiffs and defendants are respectively entitled the vendor laid out his estate, or a defined portion thereof (including the lands purchased by the plaintiffs and defendants respectively), for sale in lots subject to restrictions intended to be imposed on all the lots, and which, though varying in details as to particular lots, are consistent and consistent only with some general scheme of development; (3) that these restrictions were intended by the common vendor to be and were for the benefit of all the lots intended to be sold, whether or not they were also intended to be and were for the benefit of other land retained by the vendor; and (4) that both the plaintiffs and the defendants, or their predecessors in title, purchased their lots from the common vendor upon the footing that the restrictions subject to which the purchases were made were to enure for the benefit of the other lots included in the general scheme whether or not they were also to enure for the benefit of other lands retained by the vendors. If these four points are established, I think that the plaintiffs, would in equity be entitled to enforce the restrictive covenants entered into by the defendants or their predecessors with the common vendor irrespective of the dates of the respective purchases.

[57] Approved on appeal at [1908] 2 Ch 665.

Whilst these requirements will be met by many housing developments, in some cases, they have proved too prescriptive. As a result, the courts in recent decades have looked to the more general requirements articulated in the following case,[58] in which the Court of Appeal outlined two essential elements: first, that there must be a defined area of land subject to the scheme; and secondly, that there must be an intention that all owners of plots within that area are subject to, and have the benefit of, the covenants that are imposed on each plot.

Reid v Bickerstaff
[1909] 2 Ch 305, CA

Cozens Hardy MR

At 319

What are some of the essentials of a building scheme? In my opinion there must be a defined area within which the scheme is operative. Reciprocity is the foundation of the idea of a scheme. A purchaser of one parcel cannot be subject to an implied obligation to purchasers of an undefined and unknown area. He must know both the extent of his burden and the extent of his benefit. Not only must the area be defined, but the obligations to be imposed within that area must be defined. Those obligations need not be identical. For example, there may be houses of a certain value in one part and houses of a different value in another part. A building scheme is not created by the mere fact that the owner of an estate sells it in lots and takes varying covenants from various purchasers. There must be notice to the various purchasers of what I may venture to call the local law imposed by the vendors upon a definite area.

Buckley LJ

At 322

First as to the existence of a building scheme and the application of the doctrine of Spicer v. Martin. For the application of the principle of that case it is, I think, essential to establish as matter of fact the following state of things: that the vendor expressly or by implication contracted with the defendant in the action or his predecessor in title (whom I will call the purchaser) upon the footing that at the date of that contract the vendor told the purchaser that he was proposing to deal with a defined estate in a defined way, and that he offered to sell to the purchaser a plot forming a part of that defined estate on the terms that the purchaser should enter into such restrictive covenants relating to his plot as the scheme contemplated upon the footing that the purchaser should reciprocally have the benefit of such restrictive covenants relating to the other plots on the estate as were indicated by the scheme. There can be no building scheme unless two conditions are satisfied, namely, first, that defined lands constituting the estate to which the scheme relates shall be identified, and, secondly, that the nature and particulars of the scheme shall be sufficiently disclosed for the purchaser to have been informed that his restrictive covenants are imposed upon him for the benefit of other purchasers of plots within that defined estate with the reciprocal advantage that he shall as against such other purchasers be entitled to the benefit of such restrictive covenants as are in turn to be imposed upon them. Compliance with the first condition identifies the class of persons as between whom reciprocity of obligation is to exist. Compliance with the second discloses the nature of the obligations which are to be mutually enforceable. There must be as between the several purchasers' community of interest and reciprocity of obligation.

[58] Decided only six months after Elliston v Reacher, and reflecting the earlier authorities of Renals v Colishaw (1878) 9 Ch D 125 and Spicer v Martin (1888) 14 App Cas 12. This relaxation is attributed to the cases of Baxter v Four Oaks Properties Ltd [1965] Ch 816 and Re Dolphin's Conveyance [1970] Ch 654.

The first element reflects the concerns that we have already considered in the context of annexation. But in contrast to annexation, that area need not be precisely identified from the conveyance itself, 'provided it can be otherwise shown with reasonable certainty'.[59]

The second element requires proof of intention that the covenants were imposed for the common benefit of all of the owners within the scheme.

Re Dolphin's Conveyance

[1970] Ch 654, HC

Facts: Robert Dolphin owned Selly Hill Estate in Birmingham. After his death, the bulk of the estate was sold off by nine conveyances: the first four were sold by his sisters, and the remaining five, by his nephew. All except the last were in identical form and contained covenants as to the type of house that could be built on each plot. The vendors further covenanted that they would impose similar covenants on the sale of other plots. The current owner of one of the plots wished to redevelop in breach of the covenants and requested a declaration on the enforceability of the covenants. The court decided that a building scheme had been created, although there was no common vendor and the estate had not been laid out into plots prior to its sale.

Stamp J

At 661

[. . .] [T]o quote a passage in the judgment of Cross J. in Baxter v. Four Oaks Properties Ltd. [1965] Ch, 816, 825:

> "[. . .] for well over 100 years past where the owner of land deals with it on the footing of imposing restrictive obligations on the use of various parts of it as and when he sells them off for the common benefit of himself (in so far as he retains any land) and of the various purchasers inter se a court of equity has been prepared to give effect to this common intention notwithstanding any technical difficulties involved."

It is the submission of the defendants that that was done by the vendors in the present case.

That it was the intention of the two Miss Dolphins, on the sale of the parcel comprised in Coleman's conveyance, that there should be imposed upon each and every part of the Selly Hill Estate the restrictions set out in the conveyance—precluding the erection of buildings other than dwelling houses having the characteristics specified in the restrictions—cannot be doubted. And each conveyance evidenced the same intention. Nor can it be doubted that [59] Per Stamp J in Re Dolphin's Conveyance [1970] Ch 654, 659, applying Marten v Flight Refuelling Ltd [1962] Ch 115. The area was defined in the case by reference to evidence produced by the Town Clerk of Birmingham City Corporation that the area of the estate was well known, in the same sense that Richmond Park is well known. See also Stocks v Whitgift Homes Ltd [2001] EWCA Civ 1732.

each purchaser, when he executed his conveyance, was aware of that intention. The covenant by the vendor in each conveyance, to the effect that the same restrictions would be placed on all future purchasers and lessees, makes this clear. Furthermore, I would, unless constrained by authority to the contrary, conclude as a matter of construction of Coleman's conveyance, and of all the others, that the vendor was dealing with the Selly Hill Estate on the footing of imposing obligations for the common benefit, as well of himself, as of the several purchasers of that estate. It is trite law that if you find conveyances of the several parts of an estate all containing the same or similar restrictive covenants with the vendor, that is not enough to impute an intention on the part of that vendor that the restrictions should be for the common benefit of the vendor and of the several purchasers inter se: for it is at least as likely that he imposed them for the benefit of himself and of the unsold part of the estate alone. That is not this case. Here there is the covenant by the vendors that on a sale or lease of any other part of Selly Hill Estate

> "it shall be sold or leased subject to the stipulations above mentioned numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7 and that the vendors their heirs or assigns will procure a covenant from each purchaser or lessee upon Selly Hill Estate to the effect of those seven stipulations."

What was the point of it? For what possible reason does a vendor of part of an estate who has extracted restrictive covenants from a purchaser, covenant with that purchaser that the other parts of the estate, when sold, shall contain the same restrictions, unless it be with the intention that the purchaser with whom he covenants, as well as he himself, shall have the benefits of the restrictions when imposed? In view of these covenants by the vendor in the several conveyances, I cannot do otherwise than find that the covenants were imposed, not only for the benefit of the vendors or of the unsold part of their estate, but as well for the benefit of the several purchasers. As a matter of construction of the conveyances, I find that what was intended, as well by the vendors as the several purchasers, was to lay down what has been referred to as a local law for the estate for the common benefit of all the several purchasers of it. The purpose of the covenant by the vendors was to enable each purchaser to have, as against the other purchasers, in one way or another, the benefit of the restrictions to which he had made himself subject.

Stamp J points out that the fact that similar covenants are taken from purchasers of several plots within an estate is not enough, although it is not necessarily an objection that different covenants are imposed on different properties within the estate.[60] What is required is that the covenants were taken on the understanding (of which all purchasers were aware) that they should be for the benefit of all of the purchasers of plots within the estate, not only the vendor. This wider community of interest was proved in Re Dolphin's Conveyance, because the vendor covenanted with each purchaser that he would impose the same user restrictions on the sale of each plot.

Proof of the requisite intention is a question of fact that may be proved from a number of sources. Early cases looked to a deed of mutual covenant entered into by all of the purchasers of plots—a convenient means where there are a limited number of plots all sold at the same time, but increasingly impractical where a large number of plots are sold over an extended period.[61] Deeds of mutual covenant are now rare and the necessary intention is more often found (as in Re Dolphin's Conveyance) from the terms of the conveyances themselves.

60 Elliston v Reacher [1908] 2 Ch 374 , 387, per Parker J, [1908] 2 Ch 665, 672, per Coxens-Hardy MR.
61 See Baxter v Four Oaks Properties Ltd [1965] Ch 816, 825.

Occasionally, an intention may be gleaned from the surrounding circumstances when the courts look to the stricter approach of Elliston v Reacher.[62] The distinction between these circumstances helps to account for the so-called 'relaxation' of building scheme requirements between the time of Elliston v Reacher and more recent decisions.[63]

Re Dolphin's Conveyance
[1970] Ch 654, HC

Stamp J

At 662

As Cross J. pointed out in the course of the judgment in Baxter v. Four Oaks Properties Ltd, to which I have already referred, the intention that the several purchasers from a common vendor shall have the benefit of the restrictive covenants imposed on each of them, may be evidenced by the existence of a deed of mutual covenant to which all the several purchasers are to be parties. That common intention may also be evidenced by, or inferred from, the circumstances attending the sales: the existence of what has often been referred to in the authorities as a building scheme. I have been referred to a considerable number of authorities where the court has had to consider whether there were, or were not, present in the particular case those facts from which a building scheme—and, therefore, the common intention to lay down a local law involving reciprocal rights and obligations between the several purchasers—could properly be inferred. In Elliston v. Reacher [1908] 2 Ch. 374, 384, Parker J. laid down the necessary concomitants of such a scheme.

What has been argued before me is that here there is neither a deed of mutual covenant nor a building scheme. In the latter connection, it is pointed out that there was not a common vendor, for the parcels were sold off, first by the Dolphins and then by Watts. Nor, prior to the sales, had the vendors laid out the estate, or a defined portion of it, for sale in lots. Therefore, so it is urged, there were not present the factors which, on the authority of Elliston v. Reacher, are necessary before one can find the existence of a building scheme.

In my judgment, these submissions are not well founded. To hold that only where you find the necessary concomitants of a building scheme or a deed of mutual covenant can you give effect to the common intention found in the conveyances themselves, would, in my judgment, be to ignore the wider principle on which the building scheme cases are founded and to fly in the face of other authority of which the clearest and most recent is Baxter v. Four Oaks Properties Ltd. The building scheme cases stem, as I understand the law, from the wider rule that if there be found the common intention and the common interest referred to by Cross J. at p. 825 in Baxter v. Four Oaks Properties Ltd. the court will give effect to it, and are but an extension and example of that rule.

The local law of a building scheme is a creature of equity founded not on contract, but on a community of interests. Megarry J observed, in Brunner v Greenslade,[64] that '[t]he major theoretical difficulties based on the law of covenant seem to me to disappear where instead there is an equity created by circumstances which is independent of contractual obligation'. He 62 See Lund v Taylor (1975) 31 P & CR 16; Jamaica Mutual Life Assurance Society v Hillsborough Ltd [1989] 1 WLR 1101; Emile Elias & Co Ltd v Pine Groves Ltd [1993] 1 WLR 305.

63 A point that he reiterated when elevated to the Court of Appeal in Lund v Taylor (1975) 31 P & CR 16, 177.

64 [1971] Ch 993, 10005. See also Parker J in Elliston v Reacher [1908] 2 Ch 374, 385.

continued: '[I]n the field of schemes of development, equity readily gives effect to the common intention notwithstanding any technical difficulties involved. It may be, indeed, that this is one of those branches of equity which work best when explained least.'

It is a somewhat unusual equity. It may revive following the common ownership of plots within the scheme[65] and can apply with equal force where a lot within the scheme is subdivided into smaller units.[66]

3.3.3 Contractual solutions

Possible contractual solutions to the timing problem are provided by s 56 of the LPA 1925 and by s 1 of the Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999.

Law of Property Act 1925, s 56(1)

(1) A person may take an immediate or other interest in land or other property, or the benefit of any condition, right of entry, covenant or agreement over or respecting land or other property, although he may not be named as a party to the conveyance or other instrument.

In Chapter 6, section 2.2, we saw that when a covenantor makes a promise to a covenantee, a third party who also benefits from that covenant may, in limited circumstances, be able to rely on s 56 of the 1925 Act to acquire a direct right against the covenantor. Thus, if a covenant is expressed to be made not only with the developer (as the owner of the rest of the development), but also with the owners for the time being of the plots already sold, those owners are entitled to claim the benefit of the covenant as named covenantees.[67]

A similar result is achieved by the Contract (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999, which governs covenants entered into after 11 May 2000.

Contract (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999, s 1

(1) [...] a person, who is not a party to a contract (a "third party") may in his own right enforce a term of the contract if:

(a) the contract expressly provides that he may, or

(b) subject to subsection (2), the term purports to confer a benefit on him.

(2) Subsection (1)(b) does not apply if on a proper construction of the contract it appears that the parties did not intend the term to be enforceable by a third party.

(3) The third party must be expressly identified by name, as a member of a class or as answering a particular description but need not be in existence when the contract is entered into.

As noted in Chapter 6, section 2.2, s 1 of the 1999 Act can also be used by a third party to acquire a direct right against a promisor. We saw there that the terms of s 1 of the 1999 Act open up possibilities beyond the circumstances catered for by s 56(1) of the LPA 1925. In particular, the covenant does not have to be made with the non-party: it is sufficient if it is 65 Texaco Antilles v Kernochan [1973] AC 609.

66 Brunner v Greenslade [1971] Ch 993.
67 These provisions also apply to restrictive covenants that do not form a building scheme.

made for his or her benefit. Additionally, the non-party, whilst he or she must be identified by name or by a defined class, need not be in existence when the covenant is made. Thus a covenant could be made for the benefit of the future owners of the dominant land and come within the scope of s 1 of the 1999 Act, even though those owners (as a class) are not yet in existence when the covenant was made.

4 ENFORCEMENT, DISCHARGE, AND MODIFICATION OF COVENANTS

4.1 ENFORCEMENT

A restrictive covenant may be enforced by an award of damages or by the grant of an injunction, either prohibitory (to restrain a threatened or continuing breach) or mandatory (to require the covenantee to act to remedy a breach that has already occurred). Damages are available at law where action is against the original covenantor, and in equity, under Lord Cairns Act 1858, where a subsequent owner of the servient land has committed the breach. Injunctive relief is important because, in most cases, the owner of dominant land wishes to make sure that his or her neighbour does not act in breach of the covenant. Damages are unlikely to be considered an adequate remedy—but the award of an injunction is discretionary.

Millett LJ summarized in the following case the principles that the courts adopt when exercising that discretion.[68]

Jaggard v Sawyer
[1995] 1 WLR 269, CA

Millett LJ

At 287

When the plaintiff claims an injunction and the defendant asks the court to award damages instead, the proper approach for the court to adopt cannot be in doubt. Clearly the plaintiff must first establish a case for equitable relief, not only by proving his legal right and an actual or threatened infringement by the defendant, but also by overcoming all equitable defences such as laches, acquiescence or estoppel. If he succeeds in doing this, he is prima facie entitled to an injunction. The court may nevertheless in its discretion withhold injunctive relief and award damages instead. How is this discretion to be exercised? In a well known passage in Shelfer v. City of London Electric Lighting Co. [1895] 1 Ch. 287, 322–323, A. L. Smith L.J. set out what he described as "a good working rule" that

"(1) If the injury to the plaintiff's legal right is small,

(2) And is one which is capable of being estimated in money,

(3) And is one which can be adequately compensated by a small money payment,

(4) And the case is one in which it would be oppressive to the defendant to grant an injunction:—then damages in substitution for an injunction may be given."

68 These principles have been affirmed by the Court of Appeal in the grant of an injunction to restrain a nuisance; see Regan v Paul Properties Ltd [2006] EWCA Civ 1391, [2007] Ch 135 and Watson v Croft-Promo Sport Ltd [2009] EWCA Civ 15.

> Laid down just 100 years ago, A. L. Smith L.J.'s check-list has stood the test of time; but it needs to be remembered that it is only a working rule and does not purport to be an exhaustive statement of the circumstances in which damages may be awarded instead of an injunction.
>
> Reported cases are merely illustrations of circumstances in which particular judges have exercised their discretion, in some cases by granting an injunction, and in others by awarding damages instead. Since they are all cases on the exercise of a discretion, none of them is a binding authority on how the discretion should be exercised. The most that any of them can demonstrate is that in similar circumstances it would not be wrong to exercise the discretion in the same way. But it does not follow that it would be wrong to exercise it differently.
>
> The outcome of any particular case usually turns on the question: would it in all the circumstances be oppressive to the defendant to grant the injunction to which the plaintiff is prima facie entitled? Most of the cases in which the injunction has been refused are cases where the plaintiff has sought a mandatory injunction to pull down a building which infringes his right to light or which has been built in breach of a restrictive covenant. In such cases the court is faced with a fait accompli. The jurisdiction to grant a mandatory injunction in those circumstances cannot be doubted, but to grant it would subject the defendant to a loss out of all proportion to that which would be suffered by the plaintiff if it were refused, and would indeed deliver him to the plaintiff bound hand and foot to be subjected to any extortionate demands the plaintiff might make [. . .]
>
> In considering whether the grant of an injunction would be oppressive to the defendant, all the circumstances of the case have to be considered. At one extreme, the defendant may have acted openly and in good faith and in ignorance of the plaintiff's rights, and thereby inadvertently placed himself in a position where the grant of an injunction would either force him to yield to the plaintiff's extortionate demands or expose him to substantial loss. At the other extreme, the defendant may have acted with his eyes open and in full knowledge that he was invading the plaintiff's rights, and hurried on his work in the hope that by presenting the court with a fait accompli he could compel the plaintiff to accept monetary compensation. Most cases [. . .] fall somewhere in between.

Gray and Gray have noted the trend towards 'a new social ethic of "reasonableness between neighbours"',[69] in which the enforcement of restrictive covenants through a monetary award rather than injunctive relief plays its part.

4.1.1 Injunction

The grant of an injunction is a natural remedy for breach of a restrictive covenant and there is an expectation that injunctive relief will be available.[70] A mandatory injunction is less readily granted, even though, by refusing injunctive relief, the court will be authorizing an unlawful state of affairs. As Millett LJ describes in Jaggard v Sawyer, the decision whether or not to grant an injunction can raise tricky issues: on the one hand, the courts is reluctant to sanction effectively the breach of a legal obligation; on the other hand, the dominant owner may not actually suffer any real monetary damage, and, indeed, may try to use the breach to extract some payment from the servient owner.[71] The court needs to balance whether or not damages provide an adequate remedy to the dominant owner against whether the grant 69 Gray and Gray, Elements of Land Law (5th edn, 2009), [3.4.78] and [3.4.79].

70 Doherty v Allman (1878) 3 App Cas 709.

71 For example, in Gafford v Graham (1999) 77 P & CR 73, 83, the fact that Gafford tried to negotiate a release of the covenant was influential in the refusal of an injunction.

of an injunction would cause oppression to the servient owner.[72] Nevertheless, a mandatory injunction may be granted where the covenantor's conduct is particularly reprehensible, because, for example, the breach is in flagrant disregard of warnings.[73]

Timing can present problems for the dominant owner seeking an injunction. As we have seen, the law in this area is far from straightforward and the case may not be finally heard for some time.[74] The dominant owner can preserve the status quo by seeking an interlocutory injunction pending the full hearing, but he or she will have to give an undertaking that he or she will indemnify the servient owner if the case is lost. If the dominant owner fails to seek interlocutory relief, however, he or she runs the risk that the court will be less inclined to grant an injunction at the final hearing.[75]

4.1.2 Damages

As Millett LJ explained in the above extract from Jaggard v Sawyer, damages will be granted where it would be oppressive to grant an injunction, and where the dominant owner's damage is small and capable of monetary estimation, so that compensation provides adequate redress.[76]

At common law, the measure of damages is guided by the loss suffered by the dominant owner.[77] Equitable damages under Lord Cairns Act 1858 may be awarded where the dominant owner continues to live with the effects of the breach: for example, where a user or building restriction is breached, even though there is little (if any) monetary loss to the value of the land. Damages in this case reflect the market cost to secure a release of the covenant.[78] The measure of damages both at common law and equity thus remains compensatory, rather than restitutionary.[79]

Nourse LJ explains the position in the following case.

Gafford v Graham
(1999) 77 P & CR 73, CA

Nourse LJ

At 86

A welcome consequence of Jaggard v. Sawyer is that it has firmly established the Wrotham Park basis of assessing damages as the basis appropriate to cases such as this. There have 72 See Shepherd Homes Ltd v Sandham [1971] Ch 340, in which the court refused to order a mandatory injunction to pull down a fence built in breach of covenant where the claimant had delayed in bringing the action and the defendant intended to apply for the discharge of the covenant. See also Wrotham Park Estate Co Ltd v Parkside Homes Ltd [1974] 1 WLR 798 and Site Developments (Ferndown) Ltd v Barrett Homes Ltd [2007] EWHC 415.

73 See Wakeham v Wood (1982) 43 P & CR 40, but see Wrotham Park Estate Co v Parkside Homes Ltd [1974] 1 WLR 798.

74 In Gafford v Graham (1999) 77 P & CR 73, the case was not finally heard at first instance until 1996, some seven years after the breaches. The appeal was heard in 1998.

75 See Shaw v Applegate [1977] 1 WLR 970 and Gafford v Graham (1999) 77 P & CR 73, 82.

76 See Shelfer v City of London Electric Lighting Co [1895] 1 Ch 287.

77 See Surrey County Council v Bredero Homes Ltd [1993] 1 WLR 1361.

78 Wrotham Park Estate Co Ltd v Parkside Home Ltd [1974] 1 WLR 798; Jaggard v Sawyer [1995] 1 WLR 269; Winter v Traditional & Contemporary Contracts [2007] EWCA Civ 1088.

79 This view has been criticized by restitution lawyers: see Birks (1993) 109 LQR 518; O'Dair [1993] 1 RLR 31. See also AG for Hong Kong v Blake [2001] 1 AC 268, 283.

been some differences of opinion as to the correct analysis of that decision, the difficulty being, as the plaintiffs there conceded, that the defendants' breaches of covenant had caused no diminution in the value of the land to which the benefit of the covenant was annexed; see [1974] 1 W.L.R. at 182F–G. No doubt it was for that reason that in Surrey County Council v. Bredero Homes Ltd [1993] 1 W.L.R. 1361, 1369, Steyn L.J. expressed the view that the Wrotham Park damages were defensible only on the basis that they were restitutionary in nature. However, that view was rejected in Jaggard v. Sawyer by both Sir Thomas Bingham M.R. and Millett L.J. who, agreeing with Megarry V.-C. in Tito v. Waddell (No. 2) [1977] Ch. 106, 335, thought that Brightman's approach had been compensatory, in that the damages awarded were intended to compensate the plaintiffs for not having obtained the price they would have been able to obtain for giving their consent, had they been asked to give it.

The compensatory analysis, if accompanied by a recognition that it was not a diminution in value of the dominant tenement that was compensated, is perfectly acceptable. Equally, in a case where there has been such a diminution, there seems to be no reason why it should not be taken into account in assessing the sum which might reasonably have been demanded as a quid pro quo for relaxing the covenant. Whatever the correct analysis may be, Jaggard v. Sawyer, as both sides agree, is clear authority for the adoption of the Wrotham Park basis of assessing damages in this case. I therefore proceed to assess them by reference to the sum which the plaintiff might reasonably have demanded as a quid pro quo for relaxing the restrictions in perpetuity [...]

4.1.3 Defences

A servient owner may defend an action for breach of covenant on a number of grounds. We have already seen that the dominant owner must be able to claim the benefit of the covenant in order to sue upon it and that the servient owner must be bound by the covenant, both because it qualifies as a restrictive covenant and because it is protected by appropriate registration.

In addition, the servient owner may argue that his or her actions do not constitute a breach on a proper construction of the covenant, or because the dominant owner agreed to release the covenant. The action or inaction of the dominant owner may give rise to an implied release by way of estoppel where it would be unconscionable to allow the dominant owner to enforce the covenant. An estoppel may arise where the dominant owner is implicated in the breach,[80] or, as a result of his or her acquiescence, where he or she knows of the breach, but fails to take sufficiently prompt action.[81]

4.2 EXTINCTION AND MODIFICATION OF COVENANTS

The character of neighbourhoods change over time, so that the covenants imposed on a particular piece of land or estate may outlive their usefulness and impose a break on much-needed development. In addition to the limits on injunctive relief already considered, the court may, on rare occasions, be persuaded that a covenant should not be enforced because it has become obsolete.[82]

[80] Sayers v Collyer (1885) 28 Ch D 103. [81] See Gafford v Graham (1998) 77 P & CR 73, 80.

[82] See Duke of Bedford v British Museum Trustees (1822) 2 My & K 552; Sobey v Sainsbury [1913] 2 Ch 513; Chatsworth Estates Co v Fewell [1931] 1 Ch 224; AG for Hong Kong v Fairfax Ltd [1997] 1 WLR 149.

Far more significant, however, is the jurisdiction of the Lands Chamber of the Upper Tribunal to discharge or modify a restrictive covenant conferred by s 84 of the LPA 1925.[83] It is not uncommon for enforcement proceedings to be stayed to allow the servient owner to make such an application.[84] An application may be made by any person interested in the servient land in respect of any restrictive covenant whenever made for valuable consideration.[85] The application is publicized, to alert the owners of any dominant land in the neighbourhood who may wish to object and then can be joined as parties.[86]

Law of Property Act 1925, s 84(1)

The Upper Tribunal shall [. . .] have power from time to time, on the application of any person interested in any freehold land affected by any restriction arising under covenant or otherwise as to the user thereof or the building thereon, by order wholly or partially to discharge or modify any such restriction on being satisfied—

(a) that by reason of changes in the character of the property or the neighbourhood or other circumstances of the case which the Upper Tribunal may deem material, the restriction ought to be deemed obsolete; or

(aa) that (in a case falling within subsection 1A below) the continued existence thereof would impede some reasonable user of the land for public or private purposes or, as the case may be, would unless modified so impede such user; or

(b) that the persons of full age and capacity for the time being or from time to time entitled to the benefit of the restriction, whether in respect of estates in fee simple or any lesser estates or interests in the property to which the benefit of the restriction is annexed, have agreed, either expressly or by implication, by their acts or omissions, to the same being discharged or modified; or

(c) that the proposed discharge or modification will not injure the persons entitled to the benefit of the restriction; [. . .]

Discharge or modification on the grounds of consent in s 84(1)(b) does not usually raise any particular problems, so we will concentrate on the remaining grounds.

4.2.1 Ground (a): obsolescence

The yardstick of obsolescence is whether or not, in the light of changes to the servient land or the surrounding area, the restriction still achieves its original purpose.[87] An obsolete covenant may still retain some value to the dominant owner because it achieves another purpose that was not originally contemplated, but this is relevant only to grounds (aa) or (c).[88] The reasonableness of the servient owner's proposed use is also an issue for ground (aa) rather than ground (a).[89]

83 The section does not apply to positive covenants.

84 The Lands Tribunal may also order consideration to be paid: see Law of Property Act 1925, s 84(1) and (1A).

85 Ibid, s 84(7). 86 Ibid, s 84(3).

87 Re Truman Hanbury Buxton & Co Ltd's Application [1956] 1 QB 261. See Re Quaffers Ltd (1988) 56 P & CR 142, in which the covenants were obsolete as soon as they were imposed because of the motorway network that surrounded the land.

88 Re Kennet Properties Ltd's Application (1996) 72 P & CR 353.

89 McMorris v Brown [1999] 1 AC 142, 147.

4.2.2 Ground (aa): obstruction of reasonable user

This ground was added in 1970 to expand the Upper Tribunal's jurisdiction to balance public utility against the current benefits derived from the covenant, when the damage caused by its removal or modification can be compensated in money. The obstruction of reasonable user needs to be considered in the light of s 84(1A) and (1B) of the 1925 Act.

Law of Property Act 1925, s 84(1A) and (1B)

(1A) Subsection (1)(aa) above authorises the discharge or modification of a restriction by reference to its impeding some reasonable user of land in any case in which the Upper Tribunal is satisfied that the restriction, in impeding that user, either—

(a) does not secure to person entitled to the benefit of it any practical benefits of substantial value or advantage to them; or

(b) is contrary to the public interest;
and that money will be an adequate compensation for the loss or disadvantage (if any) which any such person will suffer from the discharge or modification.

(1B) In determining whether a case is one falling within subsection (1A) above, and in determining whether (in any such case or otherwise) a restriction ought to be discharged or modified, the Upper Tribunal shall take into account the development plan and any declared or ascertainable pattern for the grant or refusal of planning permissions in the relevant areas, as well as the period at which and context in which the restriction was created or imposed and any other material circumstances.

The Upper Tribunal must thus:

- consider the reasonableness of the proposed user;
- be satisfied either that the covenant no longer provides any practical benefit of substantial value or advantage to the dominant owner, or that the covenant is contrary to the public interest; and
- be satisfied that any damage that its removal or modification may cause can be adequately addressed by monetary compensation.

The reasonableness of the proposed user does not normally present a problem, thus attention is focused upon the practical benefit or advantage.

In considering the value of the practical benefit, the Upper Tribunal looks not only to the original purpose of the covenant, but also to the present benefits which fall within the ambit of the covenant.[90] For example, surviving practical benefits might include retaining a property's value,[91] or preserving environmental advantages (including a view or privacy),[92] or the low density of a development even though the surrounding area is of a higher density.[93]

[90] Stannard v Issa [1987] AC 175; Re Kennet Properties Ltd Application (1996) 72 P & CR 353; Sheppard v Turner [2006] 2 P & CR 28.

[91] Re Azfar's Application (2002) 1 P & CR 215, Duffield v Gandy [2008] EWCA Civ 379.

[92] Re Page's Application (1996) 71 P & CR 440; Re Azfar's Application (2002) 1 P & CR 215.

[93] Re Hydeshire Ltd's Application (1994) 67 P & CR 93; Re Snaith and Dolding's Application (1995) 67 P & CR 93.

In this respect, a higher burden of proof will be required to displace the evident community interest of covenants under a building scheme.[94] The alternative filter of public interest is less commonly asserted. Here, it is not enough that proposed user is in the public interest; the covenant, by preventing that user, must be shown to be contrary to the public interest. Thus the need for building land[95] or for a particular community facility, such as a residential home,[96] will not necessarily suffice where there is other suitable land available. In determining the public interest, the Upper Tribunal is required by s 54(1B) to consider the planning policies applied in the area, as evidenced by the development plan and the pattern of planning decisions.

If the Upper Tribunal decides to discharge or modify the covenant, then it may order the servient owner to pay the dominant owner compensation either for any damage that the dominant owner has suffered, or to account for the increased value of the servient land now that it is freed for the restriction.[97]

4.2.3 Ground (b): no injury to the dominant owner

The last ground provides a long-stop test against vexatious objections and, as such, provides the most stringent test.[98] No compensation is payable to the dominant owner because no loss has been suffered. In determining whether or not the dominant owner's interest is injured, the courts are sympathetic to 'the thin end of the wedge' argument that whilst relaxing a covenant in the current situation may not be particularly injurious, it may be so because of its consequences for future applications and development.[99]

It is clear that 'restrictive covenants cannot be regarded as absolute and inviolable for all time'.[100] Where a court exercises its discretion to award damages in lieu of an injunction, a clear breach of covenant is condoned and the dominant owner is forced to accept monetary compensation.[101] Likewise, where the Upper Tribunal is persuaded to discharge or modify a covenant, a dominant owner is powerless to prevent the unwanted development. But the rationale underlying the proprietary nature of covenants lies in the amenity that they afford. Where those continuing benefits can no longer be justified against wider social utility, a covenant's proprietary status is in jeopardy. There are human rights implications here, but there have been few serious challenges either to the exercise of the courts' discretion, or to s 84.[102] Any interference that there may be with the dominant owner's possessions is more than likely to be justified under the public interest balance upon which enforcement, modification, or discharge decisions are made.

The ability to sweep away unwanted burdens has played its part in lifting the rigidity of the 'conveyancer's view' of covenants to allow the judiciary to develop a more flexible attitude to those covenants that continue to serve their purpose.[103]

94 Re Lee's Application (1996) 72 P & CR 439.

95 Re Collins Application (1974) 30 P & CR 527.

96 Re Azfar's Application (2002) 1 P & CR 215, but see Re Lloyds and Lloyds Application (1993) 66 P & CR 112.

97 Law of Property Act 1925, s 84(1).

98 Re Kennet's Application (1996) 72 P & CR 353; McMorris v Brown [1991] 1 AC 142.

99 McMorris v Brown [1991] 1 AC 142, 151.

100 Per Lord Bingham in Jaggard v Sawyer [1995] 1 WLR 296, 283.

101 Mrs Jaggard complained of 'expropriation' of her property: see ibid, at 286.

102 See Scott v UK (App No 10741/84); Lawntown Ltd v Kamenzuli [2007] EWCA Civ 949; Site Developments (Ferndown) Ltd v Barrett Homes Ltd [2007] EWHC 415.

103 Gray and Gray, Elements of Land Law (5th edn, 2009), [3.4.84].

5 REFORM

There have long been calls for the reform of the law governing land covenants. The main defects identified are the need to provide for the running of the burden of positive covenants, the undue complexity of the rules governing the running of the benefit of covenants, the difficulty of identifying the dominant land to which the benefit of a covenant is attached, and the continuing contractual liability of the original parties to the covenant.[104]

The call for positive obligations to run is particularly acute where landowners enjoy common facilities and it is necessary to provide effective mechanisms for the use, maintenance, and repair of those facilities. In the next chapter, we will be examining the measures adopted to address this issue between flat-owners—through the use of leasehold covenants and the introduction of commonhold tenure—but there may still be instances when other positive obligations need to be enforced between adjoining freehold owners.

Reform recommendations have been put forward on a number of occasions.[105] The latest proposals are found in the Law Commission's Report, Making Land Work, Easements, Covenants and Profits à Prendre.[106] The suggestion is to phase out restrictive covenants and introduce a new proprietary interest for both unregistered and registered land; the land obligation.

Law Commission, Law Comm 327 (2011)

At [5.69]–[5.70]

We recommend that the owner of an estate in land shall be able to create positive and negative obligations that will be able to take effect (subject to the formal requirements for the creation of legal interests) as legal interests appurtenant to another estate in land, and therefore as registrable interests pursuant to the Land Registration Act 2002, provided that:

(1) the benefit of the obligation touches and concerns the benefited land;

(2) the obligation is either:

  (a) an obligation not to do something on the burdened land;

  (b) an obligation to do something on the burdened land or on the boundary (or any structure or feature that is treated as marking or lying on the boundary) of the burdened and benefited land; or

  (c) an obligation to make a payment in return for the performance of an obligation of the kind mentioned in paragraph (b); and

(3) the obligation is not made between lessor and lessee and relating to the demised premises.

104 Law Commission, Law Comm 327 (2011), [5.4].

105 See Report of the Committee on Positive Covenants Affecting Land (Cmnd 2710, 1965); Law Commission Report No 11, Transfer of Land: Report on Restrictive Covenants (1967); Law Commission Working Paper No 36, Transfer of Land: Appurtenant Rights (1971); Law Commission Report No 127, Transfer of Land: The Law of Positive and Restrictive Covenants (1984); Law Commission Report No 201, Transfer of Land: Obsolete Restrictive Covenants (1991). The history of these recommendations is summarized in the latest report Law Commission Consultation Paper 186 (2008), [7.1]–[7.8].

106 Law Comm 327 (2011), see Pts 5 and 6.

> 5.70 We recommend that for the future, covenants made by the owner of an estate in land and that satisfy the conditions set out above shall take effect, not as promises and not in accordance with the current law relating to restrictive covenants, but as legal interests in the burdened land, appurtenant to the benefited estate in land.

These recommendations provide a final acknowledgement that a covenant affecting land should be a 'genuine proprietary interests' rather than a 'a peculiar species of personal contract.'[107] A land obligation would give its holder a legal interest in land (rather than an equitable interest) with the benefit and burden of the obligation binding later parties acquiring all or any of the dominant land or servient land without the need either to rely on the rule in Tulk v Moxhay or to establish one of the three methods of passing the benefit of a covenant that we have examined.[108] The enforceability of land obligations would, thus, be brought into line with the enforceability of easements.

A land obligation could be either negative or positive, including a payment to support the expense of performing a reciprocal obligation; for instance to contribute to the repair costs of a shared facility. However, a land obligation must relate to land in the sense that it must 'touch and concern' the dominant land. It would be created by deed[109] and completed by registration. [110] Where land is registered, the benefit would be recorded in the property register of the dominant land and the burden in the charges register of the servient land. A plan would be required to identify the two pieces of land adequately. Where land is unregistered, it would only be possible for the burden to be registered as a land charge as there is no mechanism in the Land Charges Act 1972 to identify the dominant land.

The recommendation to introduce a new form of property right is a bold move. McFarlane has noted, in the context of the Numerus Clausus Principle which advocates a limited list of property rights that can bind third parties, that 'a strong case must be made before a new type of property right can be recognised, especially [...] to perform a positive act'.[111] The Law Commission have tried to make that case and to reinforce the argument by providing certain limitation to protect third parties against onerous obligations. Those limitations are, first, measures that operate up-front to confine the new form of land obligation to covenants that touch and concern the dominant land and, secondly, measures to promote public knowledge of land obligations through registration. In addition the s 84 jurisdiction to discharge and modify land obligations would provide a final escape route. Not all are convinced of the necessity of the proposed land obligation particularly in the light of the existing methods (in particular commonhold—see Chapter 27) by which positive obligations can be imposed upon third parties.

[107] Wade, 'Covenants: A Broad and Reasonable View' (1972) 31 CLJ 157, 170.

[108] It is contemplated, however, that certain third parties (e.g. those with short leases or a mortgagee who has not taken possession) will not be bound by a positive land obligation see Law Comm 327, [6.98], [6.101]–[6.104] and [6.115].

[109] It could not be created by implication see Law Comm 327, [6.62].

[110] An equitable land obligation could be created by the doctrine of anticipation (Chapter 9) see Law Comm 327, [6.52].

[111] B. McFarlane, 'The Numerus Clausus Principle and Covenants Relating to Land' in Modern Studies in Property Law Vol 6 (ed Bright, Oxford: Hart, 2011), p 328.

O'Connor, 'Careful what you wish for: positive freehold covenants'
[2011] Conv 191, [206]

Like other limiting rules in the law of covenants, the Austerberry rule serves to balance competing interests: "freedom of contract" versus "freedom from transaction" or intergenerational equity [. . .]

Many jurisdictions have arrived at a decision point. They can abolish the Austerberry rule and allow the developers to impose positive covenants. Or they can provide for the imposition of positive obligations on current and future landowners by legislation or by owner's corporation rules make under legislative authority [i.e. commonhold] [. . .]

To take the 'easy option' of abolishing the Austerberry rule would significantly expand the regulatory power of developers by allowing them to impose positive obligations as well as land use restrictions on present and future lot owners. Jurisdictions which already have CPD [e.g. commonhold] legislation may find that abolition of the Austerberry rule undermines the consumer protection elements of the legislation [. . .]

Jurisdictions which have abolished the Austerberry rule have generally imposed minimal ex ante controls, since the law still assigns covenants to the realm of choice rather than choicelessness. Instead, the reforming jurisdictions have relied on ex post removal of covenants by judicial order. This approach provides much less protection for burdened owners and significantly higher transactions costs [. . .]

The 'easy option' of opening the door to positive covenants may turn out to be the hard option in the long run. One person's onerous obligations is another person's valuable property right, the barriers to ex post relief are formidable. In an era of human rights, the need to provide compensation for extinguishment of property rights will significantly limit the ability of future legislators to protect purchasers and to relieve against onerous covenants. This may explain the reluctance of legislators in many jurisdictions to act upon recommendations to abolish the Austerberry rule.

QUESTIONS

1. Given the scope of public planning legislation, is there a continuing place for restrictive covenants in controlling land use?
2. How have the characteristics of restrictive covenants developed since Tulk v Moxhay?
3. Should the burden of a positive covenant run with the land as a general principle?
4. Restrictive covenants have been described as an equitable extension of either privity of estate or negative easements. How helpful are these analogies?
5. How does the courts' interpretation of ss 78 and 79 of the Law of Property Act 1925 differ? Is the difference justified?
6. Why is it important to identify the land to be benefited from a restrictive covenant?
7. Have the courts relaxed their approach to the proof of a building scheme?
8. Can the courts' approach to the enforcement of restrictive covenants be described as the compulsory purchase of the benefit of the covenant?

FURTHER READING

Gardner, 'The Proprietary Effect of Contractual Obligations Under Tulk v Moxhay and De Mattos v Gibson' (1982) LQR 279

Gardner, 'Two Maxims of Equity' (1995) 54 CLJ 60

Hurst, 'The Transmission of Restrictive Covenants' (1982) 2 LS 53

Law Commission Consultation Paper No 186, Easements, Covenants and Profits à Prendre (2008)

Law Commission Report, Making Land Work, Easements, Covenant and Profits à Prendre Law Comm 327 (2011)

McFarlane, 'The Numerous Claus Principle and Covenants Relating to Land' in Modern Studies in Property Law Vol 6 (ed Bright, Oxford: Hart, 2011, Ch 15)

O'Connor, Careful what you wish for: positive freehold covenants [2011] Conv 191

Snape, 'The Benefit and Burden of Covenants: now where are we?' (1994) 68 Nott LJ 68

Turano, 'Intention, Interpretation and the "Mystery" of Section 79 of the Law of Property Act 1925' [2000] Conv 377

Wade, 'Covenants: "A Broad and Reasonable View" ' (1972) 31 CLJ 157

27

FLAT OWNERSHIP: LONG LEASES AND COMMONHOLD

CENTRAL ISSUES

1. Communal living calls for the reciprocal enforcement of negative and positive rights and obligations between flat owners, and for mechanisms to facilitate the use, maintenance and repair of the common areas and facilities. To overcome the difficulty of enforcing positive obligations between freehold landowners, flat ownership has adopted the long lease.
2. The ownership of flats is achieved by granting the flat owner a long lease of his or her flat, with the freehold reversion being held either by an independent landlord or by a company owned collectively by the flat owners. The management and repair of the communal areas and facilities is conducted by the landlord, and funded by service charges paid by the flat owners.
3. The long lease structure of flat ownership has been open to abuse, particularly where an independent landlord holds the freehold, but legislative reform has addressed the worst abuses.
4. Long leaseholders may collectively enfranchise or obtain an extended lease, exercise a right to manage, or question the reasonableness of service charges, cure by variation a defective lease, and seek some protection from forfeiture.
5. The Commonhold and Leasehold Reform Act 2002 introduced commonhold to provide a new framework for flat ownership. The flat owners own the freehold of their flats and communally own the freehold of the common parts through a commonhold association, which is responsible for the management of the development funded through commonhold assessments paid by the flat owners. The relationship of the flat owners is governed by a commonhold community statement, which binds all flat owners within the commonhold.

1 INTRODUCTION

Owners of flats are the closest neighbours. They live one on top of each other, as well as side by side. The need to regulate the legal rights and obligations of flat owners within a block of flats is thus particularly significant. An acceptable living environment is important, and thus the user of individual flats and the block as a whole needs to be controlled: late night parties are occasional fun, but can be a nuisance if a nightly occurrence. Restrictive covenants (see Chapter 26) provide a convenient mechanism for control. It is also necessary for flat owners to enjoy limited rights over their neighbours' flats, as well as the common areas of the building (often referred to as the 'common', or 'communal' parts). Rights over the common parts will include rights of way to reach the flat, as well as rights of drainage and to services. There may be a right to use communal gardens, car parking space, and other common facilities. Rights over neighbouring flats will include rights of support for flats on the higher floors from the flats below and rights of protection for the flats on the lower floors from the flats above. The passage of services through the flats will also need to be accommodated. All of these rights can qualify as easements (see Chapter 24) attached to the dominant flats over the servient common parts or other flats over which the rights are exercised.

The missing link in this framework is the need for an effective mechanism for the maintenance and repair of the flat development. Here, there is a problem, because positive covenants (see Chapter 26) to repair or contribute to the costs of repair are not enforceable against subsequent freehold owners.

Clarke explains the problems.

Clarke, 'Occupying "Cheek by Jowl"' in Land Law: Themes and Perspectives
(eds Bright and Dewar, 1998, p 383)

> The common law was, however, unable to adequately cope with the demands of the horizontal division of property. In a simple example of a property on three floors with each floor comprising a flat or apartment with freehold title the person with title to the middle flat has only a freehold of a block of air space. The market value of such a title is dependent upon the support provided by the lower flat and the protection from the weather provided by the flat above. It is, therefore, essential that the freeholders of these flats are under an obligation to support, on the one hand, and maintain the roof, on the other. Indeed, there must be mutual enforceability of repairing obligations, with the middle flat-owner paying a fair proportion of the benefit by contributing to repair and maintenance. Such mutual enforceability is prevented by the common law principle that the burden of a freehold covenant does not run with the land. A subsequent owner cannot be forced to pay by virtue alone of title to the property.

Lawyers have tackled this problem by utilizing the lease, because, as we saw in Chapter 24, positive obligations can be made to run with the leasehold estate in land. Rather late in the day, Parliament has addressed the issue with the introduction of 'commonhold' under the Commonhold and Leasehold Reform Act 2002. In so doing, it has followed the lead of other common law jurisdictions, which have enacted similar statutory solutions, known variously as 'strata',[1] or 'condominium' title.[2]

[1] Strata title was introduced in New South Wales, but has spread throughout Australasia and to other common law jurisdictions, e.g. Singapore.

[2] Condominium title is found across North America.

We should emphasize at the outset that we are concerned with long-term ownership solutions to multi-unit occupation of a building and not short-term tenancy agreements that provide the framework for mostly temporary living arrangements or public housing provision (whether of flats or houses).[3] Again, Clarke explains the context.

Clarke, 'Occupying "Cheek by Jowl"' in Land Law: Themes and Perspectives
(eds Bright and Dewar, 1998, p 378)

> A more obvious scenario where land law issues ought to exist is the renting of space for a periodic or short term in a single building such as a block of flats [. . .] It is often the least affluent in society who find they have no choice but to find a home in such a way. Public housing is frequently provided in this manner [. . .] The communal occupation with which this chapter is concerned is different. It occurs whenever a person seeks to purchase a proprietary interest of significant value of part of a building which is realizable by sale or assignment and which gives an exclusive right to occupy a part only of that building. Typically for a long lease at a low rent, a substantial upfront payment of premium will be paid to a developer or property-owner. The new occupier is generally styled 'leaseholder' rather than tenant, for although the basic relationship may be the same as a tenant paying a market rent, the expectations are very different. The new resident has not only secured a home under a shared roof but has invested capital in part of the property by means of the price paid when the flat was purchased. Such a leaseholder expects the investment to be permanent and recouped by a sale of the property interest at any time of his choosing. However, the value of that property interest will be reduced if the legal arrangements with the other occupiers are inadequate and by the rights of the freeholder who retains an interest in the building as a whole if those rights are adverse to the leaseholder. The leaseholders will have collective self interest in issues of repair, maintenance and management of the buildings as a whole and a degree of united and coherent action is often appropriate.

In this chapter, we will initially consider the long lease framework that lawyers have developed for flat ownership, noting the remedial statutory measures that have been enacted to address the specific problems that this solution presents. We will then look at the essential features of commonhold as an alternative framework. This is a complex area of the law, although, given the increasing density of development and the prevalence of communal living, one that is vital to many homeowners. It is evident that flat owners understandably are often unclear of their respective rights and obligations and the legal structures employed.[4]

We will not, however, be delving too deeply into this complexity, but will concentrate on offering an overview.

2 LONG LEASES OF FLATS

Long leases are privately negotiated contracts, and, as such, they come in all shapes and sizes. Variety is the spice—and sometimes the bane—of life, and conveyancers spend long hours drafting and reading different forms of long leases. The common features are that they are originally granted for an extended term at a market price (commonly referred to as a 'premium'), but for a low annual rental (commonly referred to as a 'ground rent'). They are leases, but, in terms of the value of the interest that they confer, they are intended to replicate the timeless ownership of freehold.

[3] We cover short-term tenancy agreements in Chapter 23.

[4] See Cole and Robinson, 'Owners Yet Tenants: the Position of Leaseholders in Flats in England & Wales' (2000) 15 Housing Studies 595 and Blandy, Dixon & Dupuis, 'Theorising Power Relationships in Multi-owned Residential Developments: Unpacking the Bundle of Rights' (2006) 43 Urban Studies 2365.

2.1 WHO IS THE LANDLORD?

The use of the long lease inevitably results in the division of estates in the land. There are the leases of the individual flats granted for terms varying from 99 to 999 years, which are held by the flat owners, and the freehold reversion on those leases, which, together with the freehold of the common parts, is held by the landlord.

Originally, the developer of the flats, as the freehold owner of the development, will grant the leases. The developer then has a choice in its sale of the development. It can sell the whole development without retaining any interest by selling the leases of the individual flats to purchasers for their market value, together with a share in a management company to which the developer transfers the freehold of the whole development, subject to the flat leases. Thus whilst the flat lessees own their own flats individually, they also communally own the freehold of the whole block, including the freehold of the common parts and the freehold reversion of the flat leases.

Alternatively, the developer can retain the freehold either directly or by transferring it to a company that it owns. The developer will choose this latter option where it wishes to retain the investment and income-producing opportunities that the freehold reversion represents. The investment return lies not in the annual ground rent from the lease, which will be low, but in the capital value of the freehold reversion, which will increase as the leasehold terms run their course and fall to be renewed. Given the common length of leasehold terms, this is a very long-term investment. A more attractive commercial opportunity is the income returns to be made from the provision of management services.

Davey explains the position of the landlord and some of the problems associated with long leases that legislation has tried to address.

Davey, 'The Regulation of Long Residential Leases' in Modern Studies in Property Law: Vol 3 (ed Cooke, 2005, p 206)

Thus in the case of long leases of flats where there is an unrelated freeholder, there is a stark contrast between the interest of the landlord and the leaseholder. For the latter the property is his home in which he will have staked a considerable investment for a long-term interest. But what does ownership of the freehold mean to the landlord, especially where the flat leases have a long period to run? Its capital value is low, reflecting the low ground rent, so why would anyone want to be a landlord in these circumstances? The answer lies in the management of services. In other words the freehold is a source of income and as such has an investment value. But this suggests of course that, for the business to be profitable, leaseholders must be paying through their service charge for more than the cost of the services to the landlord including his management expenses; this is the profit element. Some landlords also make a profit through placing insurance of the building with an insurer who pays commission to the landlord or by placing contracts for repairs and other services with associated companies.

Thus the leasehold structure of flat ownership was ripe for exploitation and so it proved to be the case. The problems are legion and were first officially identified in a Report on the Management of Privately Owned Blocks of Flats published in 1985. They include:

- Delay in dealing with repairs;
- The levying of excessive charges;
- A lack of consultation and provision of information;
- A lack of sinking or contingency funds for infrequent but expensive major schemes of repair and renovation;
- The different levels of interest exhibited by absentee investor leaseholders and occupational leaseholders.

Other legal problems identified included uncertainties over enforcement of obligations, the need for cheap and convenient resolution of disputes, the unresolved question of ownership and taxation of sinking funds and the means of remedying defective leases.

Many of the problems associated with long leasehold are not so significant where the flat owners own the freehold collectively. They are their own landlords, and their leases are merely a convenient device to ensure that both the negative and positive covenants in their leases are enforceable by, and against, all of the flat owners in the block.

2.2 THE LEASEHOLD TERM, AND RIGHTS TO ENFRANCHISEMENT AND EXTENSION

Common long leasehold terms for flat developments are 99 or 125 years, and for specialist gated communities, 200 years is a common term. In times gone past, even longer terms of 999 years were sometimes granted. Time nevertheless ticks away and, where the residue of the term nudges the fifty or sixty-year mark, the lease starts to be considered a wasting asset that is declining in value year by year, and which will ultimately become unmortgageable and unmarketable. The only way in which the long lease can replicate the infinity of freehold ownership is thus for the leaseholder to negotiate with the landlord either to acquire the freehold (usually collectively with the other flat owners) or to extend his or her lease.

Rights to enfranchisement and to obtain an extended term were granted to leasehold flat owners by the Leasehold Reform Housing and Urban Development Act 1993.[5] The rights were notoriously complex to exercise,[6] but have been relaxed somewhat by the Commonhold and Leasehold Reform Act 2002.[7] A flat owner may obtain at a market premium an extended lease for a period equal to the unexpired residue of the lease plus ninety years. The right of an individual flat owner to obtain a longer lease of his or her flat, although easier to achieve than enfranchisement, is of limited value on its own. It is of more value for all of the flat owners to extend their leases and to acquire the freehold of the development. Collective enfranchisement may be achieved through a right to enfranchise company, in which all the flat owners

5 Enfranchisement of leasehold houses was earlier granted by the Leasehold Reform Act 1967.

6 See Clarke, 'Leasehold Enfranchisement: Leasehold Reform, Housing and Urban Development Act 1993' [1994] Conv 223.

7 For example, the right to enfranchise may be exercised by a simple majority, rather than a two-thirds majority, and there is no longer a residency condition: see Commonhold and Leasehold Reform Act 2002, ss 119 and 120.

are given an opportunity to become members, and through which they can participate in the enfranchisement claim. The company is able to acquire the freehold on behalf of the flat owners so that, collectively, the flat owners become their own landlords, with the freedom to extend their leases and take over the management of the block.

Taking over the management can, however, be a mixed blessing, as Davey explains.

Davey, 'The Regulation of Long Residential Leases' in Modern Studies in Property Law: Vol 3 (ed Cooke, 2005, p 221)

> [. . .] [O]n enfranchisement leaseholders may find that the management of a block of flats can be fraught, expensive and depressing business. They will become landlords of themselves and non-participating leaseholders as well as any non-long leaseholder tenants or commercial tenants, with all the responsibilities that entails. They will need to deal with contractors, comply with a host of regulatory requirements on health and safety employment etc. But this should not detract from the fact that leaseholders will now be in control and this often brings a high degree of satisfaction especially in smaller blocks. Furthermore the tribulations of management can be avoided to a considerable degree by the appointment of managing agents. However, this will not stop aggrieved leaseholders transferring their grievance from the freeholder to the new management company.

2.3 MAINTENANCE AND REPAIR

An effective machinery for the maintenance and repair of the block of flats is crucial. The most common structure is for the leaseholders of flats to be responsible for the repair maintenance of the interior of their individual flats, and for the landlord to take on responsibility for the repair and maintenance of the structure (including the roof and foundations), plus the common parts and facilities. The landlord's costs are then recovered from the individual flat owners through a periodic service charge, which may be supplemented by contributions to a sinking fund to meet major replacement expenditure or unexpected costs.

Two main problems can emerge: firstly, the flat leases may provide an inadequate repair and maintenance framework, because the division of responsibility is unsatisfactory; and secondly, the service charge provisions and their performance may be inadequate, and may operate unfairly. The first problem calls for a variation of the leases, to provide a more satisfactory repairing and maintenance framework, and will be considered below. The second has been the source of particular complaint, as Davey outlines in the above extract.[8] It has proved a challenging nut to crack. The solution is found in the flat owners gaining control over the management of their block and in the regulation of service charge levels.

2.3.1 The right to manage

The right of the flat owners to appoint a manager was first conferred by the Landlord and Tenant Act 1987, which was amended by the Housing Act 1996 and the Commonhold and Leasehold Reform Act 2002. The power was exercisable upon proof of some fault by the landlord or his or her managers: for example, the levying of unreasonable charges, or a failure to comply with the Code of Practice approved under the Leasehold Reform Housing and Urban Development Act 1993.[9] This limited power, unfortunately, did not solve the problem: proof of fault was not always easy to establish, thus a new right to manage, without having to establish fault, was introduced by the 2002 Act. The right is exercisable by application to the Leasehold Valuation Tribunal for the appointment of a new manager, which may be exercised through the establishment of a right to manage company formed by the flat owners.[10] This company takes over the management duties and powers under the flat leases, without the flat owners having to enfranchise.

[8] These problems were first reviewed in a Report on the Management of Privately Owned Flats ('the Nugee Report') (1985).

2.3.2 Levels of service charge

Excessive service charges have long been a source of complaint and have been the subject of regulation for all residential leases since 1972.[11] Control operates through ss 18–30 of the Landlord and Tenant Act 1985, and an extensive set of regulations. The controls relate to those variable charges that fall within the definition of 'service charge' being the variable sums payable by the flat owners for services, repairs, maintenance, improvements or insurance as well as the landlord's management costs. [12] The fixed charges sometimes found in short-term tenancies are excluded.

Service charges must satisfy three levels of reasonableness: firstly, the charge must be reasonably incurred; secondly, it must relate to works or services that are carried out to a reasonable standard; and finally, the amount payable should be reasonable.

Landlord and Tenant Act 1985, s 19

Limitation of service charges: reasonableness

(1) Relevant costs shall be taken into account in determining the amount of a service charge payable for a period—

(a) only to the extent that they are reasonably incurred, and

(b) where they are incurred on the provisions of services or the carrying out of works, only if the services or works are of a reasonable standard;

and the amount payable shall be limited accordingly.

(2) Where a service charge is payable before the relevant costs are incurred, no greater amount than is reasonable is so payable, and after the relevant costs have been incurred any necessary adjustment shall be made by repayment, reduction or subsequent charges or otherwise.

The Leasehold Valuation Tribunal determines reasonableness on the application of either the landlord or the leaseholder, with each party bearing its own costs. The Tribunal can also determine on whom the liability falls under the terms of the lease.[13] The test of reasonableness

[9] See s 87. [10] Commonhold and Leasehold Reform Act 2002, s 21.

[11] See the Housing Finance Act 1971, which was amended by the Housing Act 1974 and the Housing Act 1980, before being consolidated in the Landlord and Tenant Act 1985, which itself has been subject to amendment by the Landlord and Tenant Act 1987, the Housing Act 1996, and the Commonhold and Leasehold Reform Act 2002.

[12] Landlord and Tenant Act 1985, s 18. [13] Landlord and Tenant Act 1985, s 27A.

looks to the actual cost, excluding any element of profit to the landlord, and does not extend to the cost of managing agents employed by the landlord where that managing agent is an alter ego of the landlord.[14]

The Landlord and Tenant Act 1985 contains other useful protections for flat owners, including provisions giving tenants the right to challenge insurance effected by the landlord,[15] requiring consultation with flat owners before carrying out certain works,[16] requirements for statements of accounts,[17] and controls over the manner in which demands for service charges are made.[18] Other legislative controls call for service charges to be held in trust fund accounts[19] and enable the flat owners to effect their own insurance.[20]

2.4 COMMUNAL LIVING

Flat owners, as the closest neighbours, have to get along. The purpose of many of the negative user covenants in the flat leases is to provide a code of conduct for the flat development to maintain an acceptable, even attractive, living environment. The rules for the enforcement of leasehold covenants provide a route to legal redress where this code is breached, but there are a number of difficulties.

The enforcement of leasehold covenants is designed with a hierarchical structure in mind, thus landlord can sue leaseholder and vice versa. We have already seen that even enforcement against a subtenant falls outside the basic scheme and recourse to Tulk v Moxhay is required.[21] But problems of enforcement of user restrictions often lie between individual flat owners, presenting a need for horizontal control unless the landlord can be persuaded to become involved—a more realistic possibility where the flat owners own the freehold collectively through the corporate structure. Possible routes to horizontal enforcement may exist through proof of a building scheme, in which all of the flats are subject to common covenants, or where individual flat owners can otherwise claim the benefit of the covenants.[22] Even so, adversial court processes are ill equipped to resolve disputes between neighbours where continuing amicable relationships are so important.

2.5 VARIATION

The terms of a long lease are set in stone when it is first entered into. They are individually drafted documents, which vary from development to development, although all leases within a block should be in the same form to provide a coherent and common framework. If the leases are found to be defective, it can prove an insurmountable task to try to vary all of the leases. All of the flat owners, together with any lenders with mortgages secured against the leases, will need to agree and be involved in the process. Part IV of the Landlord and Tenant Act 1987 now provides a statutory power for the Leasehold Valuation Tribunal

[14] Finchbourne Ltd v Rodrigues [1976] 3 All ER 581; cf Embassy Court Residents Association v Lipman (1984) 271 EG 545, in which the landlord's administration charges were recoverable, and New Pinehurst Residents Association (Cambridge) v Silow [1988] 1 EGLR 227 and Skilleter v Charles [1992] 13 EG 113, in which the manager was not the alter ego of the landlord.

[15] Landlord and Tenant Act 1985, s 30A and Sch 1, para 9.

[16] Ibid, ss 20 and 20ZA.

[17] Ibid, ss 21, 21A, and 22.

[18] Ibid, s 21B.

[19] Landlord and Tenant Act 1987, ss 42, 42A, and 42B; Commonhold and Leasehold Reform Act 2002, s 156.

[20] Commonhold and Leasehold Reform Act 2002, s 162.

[21] Chapter 26, section 5.

[22] Chapter 26, section 3.3.

to vary defective leases—although, unfortunately, the statutory definition of a 'defective lease' is rather restrictive.[23]

2.6 FORFEITURE

Leases of flats will contain a right for the landlord to forfeit and re-enter the flat in the event of the leaseholder failing to pay the rent or service charge, or failing to perform the other covenants contained in the lease. We have seen that a right of forfeiture can only be exercised following service of notice on the leaseholder and is subject to the courts' discretion to grant relief from forfeiture.[24] Nevertheless, it remains a draconian remedy, which marks a long leasehold estate out from the security offered by a freehold tenure, and which has been abused by landlords wishing to intimidate flat owners.[25]

A number of protections have been enacted to assist long leaseholders facing forfeiture for non-payment of rent or service charge: in particular, the amount of a disputed service charge must be determined by a court or the Tribunal,[26] and must exceed a prescribed amount or have been outstanding for a prescribed period.[27]

In respect of a breach of a covenant other than a covenant to pay rent the landlord cannot serve a notice under s 146(1) of the Law of Property Act 1925, or otherwise re-enter, unless the breach is admitted by the tenant or has been determined by a court or tribunal.[28] In addition, if the breach is of a repairing covenant, s 1 of the Leasehold Property (Repairs) Act 1938[29] provides that the s 146(1) notice must inform the leaseholder of his or her right to serve a counter-notice, and, upon service of a counter-notice, forfeiture cannot follow unless the court orders otherwise.[30] Leave will not be granted unless immediate repair is necessary, or unless the court considers it just and equitable.[31]

Many feel that these measures do not go far enough, and that forfeiture in the case of long leases is 'simply inappropriate' and should be abolished.[32]

3 COMMONHOLD

Commonhold has been described as 'a vital and necessary new form of land holding for the twenty-first century'.[33] The Commonhold and Leasehold Reform Act 2002 introduced it to address the problems of flat ownership, although its application is not confined to flats, but can be used for the ownership of any residential or commercial development with shared facilities.

As its name suggests, commonhold is designed to facilitate communal living and working, by providing a structure for the ownership of individual units and the communal ownership, control, and management of common areas and facilities. It abandons the leasehold, [23] See Landlord and Tenant Act 1987, s 35. [24] See Chapter 24, section 6.4.

[25] See ODPM Consultation Paper, Restrictions on the Use of Forfeiture for Long Residential Leases (2002).

[26] Housing Act 1996, s 81. [27] Commonhold and Leasehold Reform Act 2002, s 167.

[28] Commonhold and Leasehold Reform Act 2002, s 168.

[29] The Act applies to leases of more than seven years that have at least three years to run. See Smith, 'A Review of the Operation of the Leasehold Property (Repairs) Act 1938' [1986] Conv 85.

[30] Law of Property Act 1925, s 1(3). [31] Ibid, s 1(5), and Sidnell v Wilson [1966] 2 QB 67.

[32] See Davey, 'The Regulation of Long Residential Leases' in Modern Studies in Property Law: Vol 3 (ed Cooke, 2005), p 222. See Chapter 24, section 6.4, for the Law Commission's proposals for reform to forfeiture.

[33] Clarke, Commonhold: The New Law (2002), p 2.

with, hopefully, the associated problems already considered, and instead provides a framework in which the freehold ownership of units, with communal areas and facilities, can be accommodated. As such, it does not introduce a new tenure or estate, but a new means of structuring freehold land ownership.[34]

3.1 THE STRUCTURE OF COMMONHOLD

A commonhold block of flats will be divided into individual freehold flats, held by each flat owner as a registered freehold proprietor, with the freehold of the common parts registered in the name of the commonhold association in which the flat owners are all members. As Van der Merwe and Smith point out, there are thus three elements to commonhold and a need to appreciate not only the property framework, but also company law, which governs the workings of the association.

Van Der Merwe and Smith, 'Commonhold—A Critical Appraisal' in Modern Studies in Property Law: Vol 3 (ed Cooke, 2003, p 229)

> [. . .] [C]ommonhold is structured as a threefold unity combining ownership in a unit with collective rights with regard to the common parts and membership of the commonhold association [. . .] From the threefold unity embodied in commonhold, the institution straddles both the law of property and that of association.

The structure is similar to the leasehold structure, in which flat owners hold leases of their individual flats, and collectively own the freehold reversion on their leases and the freehold of the common parts through their ownership of shares in a management company. The essential distinction is that the commonhold owners are freeholders and not leaseholders. There is thus no inherent limitation on the length of their ownership and no danger of early termination of their ownership through forfeiture. Nevertheless, commonhold has been described as a 'sub-species' of freehold that 'is better seen as a distinct form of land holding'.[35]

All flat owners must be members of the commonhold association and, on the sale of a commonhold flat, the seller ceases to be a member, with his or her place being taken by the purchaser—that is, the new owner of the flat. Every member of the association is bound by the commonhold community statement, which contains rights and obligations, both positive and negative, to generate a 'local law' for the development. The statement plays the same role as the easements and covenants contained in a standard flat lease, as well as helping to define the relationship between the individual flat owners and the association as owner of the common parts. There will be familiar easements of support and protection, rights of way over, and to use, the common areas and facilities, and for drainage and the passage of services. There will also be obligations similar to the restrictive user covenants found in leases to maintain the ambience and character of the development, and positive obligations to repair individual flats, and to contribute to the cost of repairing and maintaining the common [34] See Roberts, 'A New Property Term: But No Property in a Term!' [2002] Conv 341.

[35] See Clarke (2002), pp 16–17.

parts. The difference lies in the fact that these rights and obligations will be contained in a single document, rather than in the individual leases.

Wong explains the central significance of the commonhold association and the commonhold community statement, both of which must follow the form specified in the Commonhold and Leasehold Reform Act 2002 and its regulations.[36]

Wong, 'Potential Pitfalls in the Commonhold Community Statement and the Corporate Mechanisms of the Commonhold Association' [2006] Conv 14, 34

> Under the commonhold concept, the CCS [commonhold community statement] and the CA [commonhold association] are the fundamental organs which provide the statutory and corporate frameworks for the running of the commonhold. Good management in a commonhold would depend on the quality of the execution of these two frameworks in achieving a balance between uniform protection and local flexibility as well as balance between the rule of the majority and protection of minority members.

We now need to consider in a little more detail these essential features.

3.2 CREATION OF COMMONHOLD

Consistent with the drive towards registration, a commonhold development may only exist where the land is (or is to be) registered. There are two routes by which a commonhold may be established: firstly, a new development may be set up as a commonhold development;[37] and secondly, an existing development may be converted from long leasehold to commonhold.[38]

The conversion of an existing development requires the agreement of all of the flat owners within the development where the leases have more than twenty-one years to run.[39] There is a statutory process for the extinction (and the payment of compensation) of shorter-term leases and other interests.[40] Given this need for unanimity, it is unlikely that existing flat developments will be converted to commonhold. Commonhold is a more feasible option for new flat developments.

Where a new development is to be created as a commonhold, there are two stages to the process. Firstly, the developer will need to apply for its freehold estate to be registered as commonhold land, when it will need to submit to the Land Registry the commonhold association's constitutional documents, the commonhold community statement, any necessary consents (e.g. from an existing mortgagee), and the compliance certificate of the association's directors. Upon approval, the estate will be registered as commonhold land, although it is not yet operational as a commonhold community. The commonhold is only activated upon the registration of the first purchaser as the owner of his or her flat when the commonhold community statement comes into force and the commonhold association is registered as the proprietor of the common parts.[41]

[36] The commonhold association's constitutional documents are specified in Schs 1 and 2, and the commonhold community statement in Sch 2.

[37] Commonhold and Leasehold Reform Act 2002, s 7. [38] Ibid, s 9. [39] Ibid, s 3(1)(b).

[40] Ibid, ss 9(3)(f) and 10. [41] Ibid, ss 7(3) and 8.

3.3 COMMONHOLD LAND OWNERSHIP

Commonhold can only exist where there are at least two units: it is, after all, a form of communal land holding. The individual flats and the common parts are defined by the commonhold community statement, with the common parts defined in a negative fashion as those areas that are not comprised within the flat owners' individual titles.[42] The common parts may be further split between those areas over which all flat owners may exercise rights and those limited-use areas, the user of which may be confined to certain flat owners.[43] Any redefinition of these areas requires the agreement of those affected and the consequent amendment of the commonhold community statement.[44]

It is a fundamental principle that freehold is the only title that can exist within a commonhold development. Smith explains the consequences of what has been called the 'purity of commonhold'.[45]

Smith, 'The Purity of Commonholds' [2004] Conv 194

[. . .] No conversion of an existing long leasehold development is possible unless 100 per cent of registered lessees, with terms over 21 years of the whole or part of the land, consents. It is not possible to get around this bar, and there is draconian provision for the clearance of all shorter leases of commonhold land. A second aspect of the purity principle is the restriction on the ability of the holder of a residential commonhold unit to grant leases of that unit. Intertwined with this is the issue of diversion by the commonhold association of assessments, on default of the unit holder, from lessees and sub-lessees of rented units.

The second aspect referred to by Smith compromises the fundamental principle of the free alienability of freeholds—but such is the strength of the purity principle that the government was determined that leaseholds should not unduly contaminate a commonhold. Thus, although flat owners within a commonhold are free to sell, mortgage, and charge their flats, they are not able to grant a lease for a premium or for a term greater than seven years, nor are they able to dispose of part of their flat, other than by way of lease, without the consent of the commonhold association.[46]

Commonhold and Leasehold Reform Act 2002

s 15(2) Transfer

(2) A commonhold community statement may not prevent or restrict the transfer of a commonhold unit.

[42] Ibid, s 25. The importance of defining these areas is explained by Van der Merwe and Smith, 'Commonhold—A Critical Appraisal' in Modern Studies in Property Law: Vol 3 (ed Cooke, 2005), p 230.

[43] Commonhold and Leasehold Reform Act 2002, s 25(3).

[44] Ibid, ss 23, 24, and 30.

[45] Hansard, HC Vol 627, col 491 (16 October, 2001).

[46] Commonhold and Leasehold Reform Act 2002, ss 21 and 22 A more flexible approach is permitted for non-residential units where there is no statutory prohibition on leases, although control may be imposed through the commonhold community statement: ibid, s 17(5).

s 17(1) Leasing: residential

(1) It shall not be possible to create a term of years absolute in a residential commonhold unit unless the term satisfies prescribed conditions.

s 20(1) Other transactions

(1) A commonhold community statement may not prevent or restrict the creation, grant or transfer by a unit-holder of—

(a) an interest in the whole or part of his unit;

(b) a charge over his unit.

s 21 Part-unit: interests

(1) It shall not be possible to create an interest in part only of a commonhold unit.
(2) But subsection (1) shall not prevent—

(a) the creation of a term of years absolute in part only of a commonhold unit where the term satisfies the prescribed conditions, [. . .]

(b) the transfer of the freehold estate in part only of a commonhold unit where the commonhold association consents in writing to the transfer.

s 22(1) Part-unit: charging

(1) It shall not be possible to create a charge over part only of an interest in a commonhold unit.

The rationale behind the prohibition of longer leases is a determination to avoid replication of long-lease landholding within commonholds, as well as to discourage absentee landlords. The consequences, however, may be to discourage the choice of commonhold altogether, particularly given the popularity of the buy-to-let market.

The commonhold association, as freeholder of the common parts, is able to dispose of these areas without the consent of the flat owners, but with one important limitation:[47] it cannot charge the common parts except by way of a legal mortgage that has the prior unanimous approval of the flat owners as its members.[48] This freedom seems remarkable, given the crucial importance of the common parts, but may be explained as an attempt to give the commonhold association some freedom of action in the event of possible insolvency.

3.4 THE COMMONHOLD ASSOCIATION

The commonhold association is central to the commonhold scheme. It is simply not possible to have a commonhold without a commonhold association to hold the common parts, and to be responsible for the management of, and the enforcement of rights and obligations within, the commonhold.

Originally, it was envisaged that the association would be a purpose-built association, but the government opted for adapting an existing corporate form—the company limited by [47] Ibid, ss 27 and 28.

[48] Ibid, s 29.

guarantee, the members of which are the individual flat owners.[49] As such, the association has separate legal personality and limited liability. It is regulated through the Companies Act 2006, with obligations to hold annual general meetings, to file accounts, and to appoint corporate officers to run the association.[50] But the commonhold association is a distinct form of company limited by guarantee and the flat owners have no choice but to be members. Its constitutional documentation is central to the flat owners' relationship with the association, and must incorporate mandatory provisions to try to achieve a fair distribution of power.[51]

Wong, 'Potential Pitfalls in the Commonhold Community Statement and the Corporate Mechanisms of the Commonhold Association' [2006] Conv 14, 26

> The CA [commonhold association] must adopt all the provisions in the model articles – alterations are only permitted for a few articles and any additions must be clearly labelled. These strict rules help to ensure that the democratic nature of the general meeting and director's meeting, which is of particular importance in the context of commonhold, since unit-holders are "captive members" of the particular CA of their building. One underlying threat to democracy is the abuse of the resolutions mechanisms by the developer through his membership or directorship in the CA.

The association operates through two organs: the board of directors and the flat owners in general meeting.

Each flat owner is entitled to single membership in the commonhold association and is entitled to cast a single vote. Co-owners of a flat are required to nominate one of their number to be the association member for their flat and, as such, entitled to vote. There is a principle of equality of representation of each unit, regardless of the value or character of the units within the development. Accordingly, commonhold is more likely to suit those developments in which units are, by and large, uniform in value, size, and type.

The general meeting appoints the directors, who are responsible for the management of the commonhold through their duties to manage and to uphold compliance with the commonhold community statement. The directors need not be flat owners with an interest in the development. Thus professional property management may be achieved either by appointing professional managers as directors, or, alternatively, through the employment of professional managing agents by the directors.

The commonhold association as a corporate vehicle is governed by the rule of the majority. As such, fears have been expressed that a minority of flat owners may be subjected to the 'tyranny' of the majority in decisions that adversely affect their everyday lives within the commonhold community.[52] The vital question is thus whether the mandatory provisions of the association do achieve a fair balance. In particular, the power of the directors to appoint managing agents and to fix the level of service charge without the prior approval of the flat owners in general meeting has drawn criticism.[53]

49 All unit holders must be members and no person who does not own a unit may be a member.

50 Directors of the commonhold association may be either appointed by the flat owners from within their own number, or professionals appointed by the flat owners to run the association on their behalf.

51 See Schs 1 and 2.

52 See Kenny [2003] Conv 1.

53 See Wong, 'Potential Pitfalls in the Commonhold Community Statement and the Corporate Mechanisms of the Commonhold Association' [2006] Conv 14.

The association may be wound up following the standard procedures contained in the Insolvency Act 1986.[54] The flat owners, as members of the association, may initiate winding up voluntarily where it is solvent: for example, should the flat owners wish to redevelop. A compulsory winding-up by court order may occur where the association is insolvent: for example, upon the petition of one or more of its unpaid creditors. In this latter event, the court has power to make a succession order transferring the common parts to a new commonhold association, which will take over the management of the commonhold, unless such an order is 'inappropriate'.[55] A succession order may well be inappropriate unless there is in place some mechanism to clear the debts of the insolvent association.[56] For example, the liquidator of an insolvent commonhold association will be able to pursue defaulting flat owners for any unpaid commonhold assessments, as well as raise further assessments from the flat owners to meet the debts of the association. Thus the limited liability of the flat owners as members of the association could be more fictional than real.[57] It is anticipated that the insolvency of a commonhold association will be an unlikely event, given that it can raise additional funds from the flat owners by levying further assessments, but the possibility exists and has proved of sufficient concern to lenders that they have been hesitant to accept security over commonholds.

3.5 COMMONHOLD COMMUNITY STATEMENT

The commonhold community statement is a crucial document. It sets out 'details of how the community is to run',[58] in terms of what the flat owners and the commonhold association, respectively, must do, are able to do, or cannot do.

Commonhold and Leasehold Reform Act 2002, s 31

Form and content: general

(1) A commonhold community statement is a document which make provision in relation to specified land for—

(a) the rights and duties of the commonhold association; and

(b) the rights and duties of the unit-holders.

(2) A commonhold community statement must be in prescribed form.

(3) A commonhold community statement may—

(a) impose a duty on the commonhold association;

(b) impose a duty on a unit-holder;

(c) make provision about the taking of decisions in connection with management of the commonhold or any other matter concerning it.

The 2002 Act and its attendant regulations detail what the statement must include by way of mandatory terms and what it may include in optional provisions. The draftsman is provided 54 Insolvency Act 1986, ss 122 and 124. 55 Ibid, s 51.

56 See Crabb, 'The Commonhold and Leasehold Reform Act 2002: A Company Law Perspective' (2004) 25 Comp Law 213.

57 Ibid. 58 Clarke (2002), p 74.

with a model as a starting point and guide in preparing the statement, which will be a unique document for each development.[59]

Wong explains the format and content of the statement.

Wong, 'Potential Pitfalls in the Commonhold Community Statement and the Corporate Mechanisms of the Commonhold Association' [2006] Conv 14, 19

The CCS [commonhold community statement] is the central property document stipulating the rights and duties of the CA [commonhold association] and the unit-holders. To promote uniform protection, the overall format of the CCS and the contents of its main body are prescribed in the model form in Sch.3 to the Regulations. Part 4 of the main body of the CCS lays down the mandatory "rules" of the commonhold regarding general property rights and duties. These include duty to contribute to assessments and reserve funds (Part 4.2), duty to insure (Part 4.4), duty to maintain and repair (Part 4.5), as well as restrictions on use (Part 4.3), alteration (Part 4.6) and disposition (Part 4.7). In addition to these general provisions, more specific rules are needed to cater for the local needs of a given commonhold. This is achieved by Annex 4 where the developer can insert "local rules" to fine-tune the mandatory rules in Part 4, and by Annex 5 where "supplementary local rules" can be inserted to impose further restraints such as restrictions on keeping pets. In contrast to the mandatory "rules" which can never be amended, "local rules" and "supplementary local rules" can in general be amended by ordinary resolution, with a few exceptions requiring special resolution (and/or consent of the affected unit-holder). The combination of mandatory rules on general property rights and duties and self-prescriptive tailor-made local rules reflects the legislative intention of striking a balance between certainty of protection and local flexibility.

The balance between certainty and flexibility should vary according to the subject matter of the rights and duties. While an individualistic approach is suitable for certain subject matter such as restrictions on use and behaviour, other matters such as the duty to repair and maintain and the duty to insure would require a more prescriptive approach so as to achieve adequate protection for the unit-holders.

The statement is registered against all of the titles within the commonhold, being both the freehold titles to the individual flats and the common parts, and thus will bind the commonhold association and is capable of binding the individual flat owners. The mechanism by which subsequent flat owners are bound is found in s 16 of the 2002 Act.

Commonhold and Leasehold Reform Act 2002, s 16

Transfer: effect

(1) A right or duty conferred or imposed—

(a) by a commonhold community statement, or

(b) in accordance with section 20, shall affect a new unit-holder in the same way as it effected a former unit-holder.

(2) A former unit-holder shall not incur a liability or acquire a right—

(a) under or by virtue of the commonhold community statement, or

(b) by virtue of anything done in accordance with section 20.

[59] Commonhold and Leasehold Reform Act 2002, Sch 3.

(3) Subsection (2)—

(a) shall not be capable of being disapplied or varied by agreement, and

(b) is without prejudice to any liability or right incurred or acquired before the transfer takes effect.

Thus both the negative user and alienation provisions, and any positive obligations (including obligations to repair, maintain, insure, and to pay the service charge), are binding on purchasers acquiring a flat in the commonhold development.

3.6 THE MANAGEMENT OF COMMONHOLD

The commonhold community statement will set out the allocation of management responsibilities, and will usually provide that the flat owner will be responsible for the repair, maintenance, and insurance of the interior of his or her flat, while the commonhold association will be responsible for the repair, maintenance, and insurance of the common parts, including the structure of the building and the common facilities.

Commonhold and Leasehold Reform Act 2002, s 14

Use and maintenance [Commonhold Unit]

(1) A commonhold community statement must make provision regulating the use of commonhold units.

(2) A commonhold community statement must make provision imposing duties in respect of the insurance, repair and maintenance of each commonhold unit.

(3) A duty under subsection (2) may be imposed on the commonhold association or the unit-holder.

Commonhold and Leasehold Reform Act 2002, s 26

Use and maintenance [Common Parts]

A commonhold community statement must make provision—

(a) regulating the use of the common parts;

(b) requiring the commonhold association to insure the common parts;

(c) requiring the commonhold association to repair and maintain the common parts.

The cost of repairing, maintaining, and insuring the common parts will be recovered from flat owners by the commonhold association through services charges, which may be made up of three elements: first, the regular day-to-day expenses, which will be calculated according to prepared budgets made by the association; secondly, the levies to a reserve fund to budget over a period for the larger costs of occasional replacement and repair (for example, the painting of the block or the repair of the roof or lifts); and finally, emergency levies to recover unexpected expenditure. The reserve fund is held by the commonhold association and may be attached by certain unpaid judgment debtors of the association.[60]

Commonhold and Leasehold Reform Act 2002, ss 38 & 39

Commonhold assessment

38 (1) A commonhold community statement must make provision—

(a) requiring the directors of the commonhold association to make an annual estimate of the income required to be raised from unit-holders to meet the expenses of the association,

(b) enabling the directors of the commonhold association to make estimates from time to time of income required to be raised from unit-holders in addition to the annual estimate,

(c) specifying the percentage of any estimate made under paragraph (a) or (b) which is to be allocated to each unit,

(d) requiring each unit-holder to make payments in respect of the percentage of any estimate which is allocated to his unit, and

(e) requiring the directors of the commonhold association to serve notices on unit—holders specifying payments required to be made by them and the date on which each payment is due.

[....]

Reserve fund

39 (1) Regulations under section 32 may, in particular, require a commonhold community statement to make provision—

(a) requiring the directors of the commonhold association to establish and maintain one or more funds to finance the repair and maintenance of common parts;

(b) requiring the directors of the commonhold association to establish and maintain one or more funds to finance the repair and maintenance of commonhold units.

(2) Where a commonhold community statement provides for the establishment and maintenance of a fund in accordance with subsection (1) it must also make provision—

(a) requiring or enabling the directors of the commonhold association to set a levy from time to time,

(b) specifying the percentage of any levy set under paragraph (a) which is to be allocated to each unit,

(c) requiring each unit-holder to make payments in respect of the percentage of any levy set under paragraph (a) which is allocated to his unit, and

(d) requiring the directors of the commonhold association to serve notices on unit-holders specifying payments required to be made by them and the date on which each payment is due.

60 Ibid, s 39(4).

Each flat owner must contribute the percentage of these costs that is allocated to his or her flat by the commonhold community statement. The commonhold association has no special powers to recover unpaid service charges beyond the usual dispute resolution process to be considered shortly.

Proposals for the association to be given a right to secure unpaid assessments by charge were rejected by the government, which wished to avoid any suggestion that the freeholds within a commonhold scheme could be effectively forfeited by the process of charge and subsequent sale.[61] This has led to criticisms that the association has no effective means by which to ensure that the costs of management are met by all of the flat owners.[62] There is the danger that effective management will be compromised and that, to maintain the necessary flow of funds, compliant flat owners will have to pick up the shortfall.

The association is obliged to ensure that the flat owners observe the obligations imposed by the statement. As we have seen, these obligations are extensive and cover not only the payment of service charges, but also negative obligations relating to user of both individual flats and the common parts, as well as positive obligations regarding the repair and maintenance of individual flats. The 2002 Act does, however, recognize that living in a community requires give and take, so that it may not be to the overall benefit of that community for enforcement action to be taken against all breaches. The association is thus granted a right of inaction where it reasonably believes that doing nothing will promote harmonious relationships.

Commonhold and Leasehold Reform Act 2002, s 35

Duty to manage

(1) The Directors of a commonhold association shall exercise their powers so as to permit or facilitate so far as possible—

(a) the exercise by a unit-holder of his rights, and

(b) the enjoyment by each unit-holder of the freehold estate in his unit.

(2) The directors of a commonhold association shall, in particular, use any right, power or procedure conferred or created by virtue of section 37 for the purpose of preventing, remedying or curtailing a failure on the part of a unit-holder to comply with a requirement or duty imposed on him by virtue of the commonhold community statement or a provision of this Part.

(3) But in respect of a particular failure on the part of a unit-holder (the 'defaulter') the directors of a commonhold association—

(a) need not take action if they reasonably think that inaction is in the best interest of establishing or maintaining harmonious relationships between all unit-holders, and that it will not cause any unit-holder (other than the defaulter) significant loss or significant disadvantage, and

(b) shall have regard to the desirability of using arbitration, mediation or conciliation procedures (including referral to a scheme approved under section 42) instead of legal proceedings whenever possible.

[61] The association may enforce a judgment debt by way of charging order, but will rank behind other existing secured creditors: see Chapter 28, section 4.4.

[62] See Clarke (2002), p 143.

3.7 DISPUTE RESOLUTION

Traditional court processes are ill equipped to deal successfully with disputes between neighbours, in relation to whom the maintenance of a continuing working relationship is so important, and an economic and timely response is necessary. Although no distinct statutory dispute resolution system is introduced by the 2002 Act, it is envisaged that the court process will be used as a last resort or where decisive action is needed.[63]

Clarke explains the hope that disputes will be resolved through alternative means.

Clarke, Commonhold: The New Law (2002, p 151)

> There is [. . .] no statutory system for the resolution of disputes. Instead of such a statutory system, the CLRA [Commonhold and Leasehold Reform Act] 2002 envisages a staged response. Although much will depend on regulations and rules to be introduced later, it is envisaged that the [. . .] CCS [commonhold community statement] will set out an internal complaints procedure which members must first adopt. The dispute resolution procedures then involve an inter-relationship of three approaches after any such internal procedures have been exhausted. There is specific provision for regulations to provide that a commonhold association shall be a member of an approved Ombudsman scheme. There is a general statutory duty on the directors of a commonhold association to have regard to the desirability of using arbitration, mediation or conciliation procedures (including referral under approved Ombudsman schemes), instead of legal proceedings. Finally, the courts will have an overriding jurisdiction

4 CONCLUSION

Flat ownership presents a complex challenge to devise a legal framework that will effectively balance the freedom of individual ownership against the compromise necessary for communal living. The last two decades have seen considerable legislative activity: firstly, to provide an effective framework for the enforcement of leasehold covenants; secondly, to try to overcome the considerable shortcomings of the long-lease system of flat ownership; and thirdly, to introduce an alternative form of communal land holding—the commonhold. Areas of reform are still outstanding, with the enforcement of freehold positive obligations through the land obligations still awaiting the statute book.[64]

The question is whether commonhold will remain merely an alternative, or will it render the long lease system obsolete? Commentators have suggested that commonhold should be sufficiently attractive to sideline the long lease of flats—but only after the legislation has been refined to overcome deficiencies.[65] We have noted some of those deficiencies above, but particular cause for concern arises from the obstacles to converting existing long-lease

[63] See Commonhold and Leasehold Reform Act 2002, Sch 3, s 35(3)(b) extracted above, and s 42.

[64] See Chapter 26, section 5.

[65] See Clarke, 'The Enactment of Commonhold: Problems, Principles and Perspectives' [2002] Conv 349; Davey, 'The Regulation of Long Residential Leases' in Modern Studies in Property Law: Vol 3 (ed Cooke, 2005) ch 10; Van Der Merwe and Smith, 'Commonhold: A Critical Appraisal' in Modern Studies in Property Law: Vol 3 (ed Cooke, 2005, ch 11); Wong, 'Potential Pitfalls in the Commonhold Community Statement and the Corporate Mechanisms of the Commonhold Association' [2006] Conv 14.

developments, the difficulties of accommodating mixed developments given the inflexibility of equality of voting and service charge allocation, the constraints of adapting an existing corporate vehicle to the commonhold association—particularly, the provisions governing insolvency and the weak mechanisms for recovery of service charges. Last, but not least, are doubts that commonhold really is freehold, given the limitations of alienability and the inevitable constraints of the commonhold community statement, which bridges the 'threefold unity' between individual units, the common parts, and the association.

Clarke, writing in 2002,[66] shortly after the passing of the Commonhold and Leasehold Reform Act, foretold a 'bright future' for commonhold—but already he doubts his prediction.

Clarke, 'Long Residential Leases: Future Directions' in Landlord and Tenant Law: Past, Present and Future (ed Bright, 2006, p 181)

However Part I of the Commonhold and Leasehold Reform Act 2002, for all the assurances that it was a fine piece of legislation, contains some fundamental flaws that will prevent its widespread adoption for both large and mixed residential estates and developments. Indeed, these inadequacies are proving so fundamental to the key players (developers and lenders) that commonhold will possibly be consigned to the margins. There were, by 27 September 2005, only five commonholds registered a year after commonhold was brought into force, and they all are small homogeneous developments.

[. . .] [I]f nothing is done, at best commonhold will be peripheral, at worst it will be largely irrelevant, to the solution of developing homes for the future. For it to have a major role, there would need to be primary legislation to deal with lenders' concerns regarding liquidation of the commonhold association. Less than half the members of the Council of Mortgage Lenders are currently willing to lend on commonhold titles, and some of the big lenders are included in these numbers. Such primary legislation could also tackle the other shortcomings [. . .] Yet even if the major concerns were satisfactorily addressed by primary legislation, there is no certainty that commonhold would be widely adopted in preference to long leases [. . .] there is the preference for the familiar. Even if the factors governing the choice between commonhold and long leasehold for new developments were entirely neutral, it is likely that many developers would still opt for the familiar [. . .] Accordingly, there must be good reason positively to choose commonhold, even if the technical difficulties and statutory gremlins outlined are overcome. Primary legislation to encourage or even require the use of commonhold in preference to long leases is always a long term possibility [. . .] Yet it is hard to envisage any Government being willing to take any steps in such a direction, until it is satisfied that commonhold is fit for the purposes for which it was enacted.

Clarke mentions the reluctance of developers and lenders to embrace commonhold, but flat owners must not be forgotten: after all, developers and lenders will be more inclined to overcome, and government to address, those concerns if flat owners demand commonhold over long leases.

Both systems are complicated and difficult for flat owners to understand, and neither can solve the friction that communal living can bring. The bottom line is that most flat owners see little distinction between commonhold and long leases, where a management company owns the freehold that the flat owners control. Indeed, the differences are largely of legal detail. Commonhold may still win over the long lease held from an independent landlord, but, even here, enfranchisement and the right to manage has narrowed the score.

66 'The Enactment of Commonhold: Problems, Principles and Perspectives' [2002] Conv 349.

QUESTIONS

1. Why is it difficult to achieve the freehold ownership of flats?
2. How successful do you think the long leasehold system of flat ownership has been?
3. What are the current deficiencies in commonhold, as it has been enacted in the Commonhold and Leasehold Reform Act 2002?
4. Is there a pressing need for commonhold?

FURTHER READING

Blandy, Dupuis and Dixon, Multi-owned Housing: Law, Power and Practice (Aldershot: Ashgate, 2010)

Clarke, Commonhold: The New Law (Bristol: Jordans, 2002)

Clarke, 'Long Residential Leases: Future Directions' in Landlord and Tenant Law: Past, Present and Future (ed Bright, Oxford: Hart, 2006, ch 9)

Clarke, 'Occupying 'Cheek by Jowl': Property Issues Arising from Communal Living' in Land Law: Themes and Perspectives (eds Bright and Dewar, Oxford: OUP, 1998)

Clarke, 'The Enactment of Commonhold: Problems, Principles and Perspectives' [2002] Conv 349

Crabb, 'The Commonhold and Leasehold Reform Act 2002: A Company Law Perspective' (2004) 25 Comp Law 213

Davey, 'The Regulation of Long Residential Leases' in Modern Studies in Property Law: Vol 3 (ed Cooke, Oxford: Hart, 2005, ch 10)

Smith, 'The Purity of Commonholds' [2004] Conv 194

Van Der Merwe and Smith, 'Commonhold—A Critical Appraisal' in Modern Studies in Property Law: Vol 3 (ed Cooke, Oxford: Hart, 2005, ch 11)

Wong, 'Potential Pitfalls in the Commonhold Community Statement and the Corporate Mechanisms of the Commonhold Association' [2006] Conv 14

PART H

SECURITY RIGHTS

28

SECURITY INTERESTS IN LAND

CENTRAL ISSUES

1. Securing the repayment of money may be achieved by the grant of a legal or equitable interest in land, giving the creditor a right of recourse. For example, such a right may allow a lender to sell a borrower's freehold or lease if the debtor fails to repay the creditor.
2. There are four types of security interest: the pledge, the lien, the mortgage, and the charge. A lien, mortgage, or charge may be created over land.
3. The legal charge by way of mortgage of land is a hybrid form of security, being, in form, a charge, but granting the lender the rights associated with a mortgage.
4. If the borrower has a legal estate or equitable interest in land, a creditor can acquire an equitable security interest by means of a mortgage or a charge.
5. The equity of redemption represents the borrower's interest under a traditional mortgage of property. It has been of central importance to equity's protection of borrowers, but its continued utility, in a case in which the lender is granted a legal charge, is questionable.
6. The provision of secured credit is fundamental to modern living and commercial life, and lawyers have proved adept at creating different forms of security to cater for a wide variety of circumstances.

1 INTRODUCTION

In this chapter, we are concerned with the use of land (or legal and equitable property rights relating to land) as security for the repayment of money by a borrower to a lender. The lender acquires security by being granted a distinct legal or equitable property right in the land. This gives the lender a number of rights to which it can resort if the borrower fails to repay the loan. Crucially, because it has a legal or equitable property right in the land, the lender may also be able to assert its security right not only against the borrower, but also against third parties.

Sir Nicholas Browne Wilkinson VC accepted the following definition of security.

Bristol Airport plc v Powdrill
[1990] Ch 744, CA

Sir Nicolas Browne-Wilkinson VC

At 760

Security is created where a person ('the creditor') to whom an obligation is owed by another ('the debtor') by statute or contract, in addition to the personal promise of the debtor to discharge the obligation, obtains rights exercisable against some property in which the debtor has an interest in order to enforce the discharge of the debtor's obligation to the creditor.

There are, thus, two elements to a security transaction: firstly, the loan made by the lender to the borrower; and secondly, the creation of the proprietary interest by the borrower to the lender to secure the repayment of the loan. We commonly call that proprietary interest a 'mortgage', but, as we shall see, we need to be careful of our terminology when dealing with security interests. The loose use of terms can, and often has, caused confusion.

In this chapter, we will look first at why proprietary (or what are sometimes called 'real') security interests are so popular with lenders today; we will then explore the different types of proprietary security interest, before examining the development and particular nature of security interests over land. In Chapter 29, we will turn our attention to the loan contract and the controls that the law has imposed to protect the borrower. Finally, in Chapter 30, we will focus on the rights and powers conferred upon the lender to enforce its security over land.

2 THE ROLE AND IMPORTANCE OF SECURITY

Secured lending in both the domestic and commercial spheres is prolific and an important indicator of economic conditions. Bank of England Trends in Lending statistics revealed that the net average monthly flow of lending to UK businesses was £3.9 billion during 2008, but had fallen by 2010, in the light of poor economic conditions and reluctant bank lending, to a net average monthly flow of £2.1 billion.[1] Figure 26 shows that domestic mortgage lending has also fallen from 2008. Nevertheless the amount of lending remains in the billions.

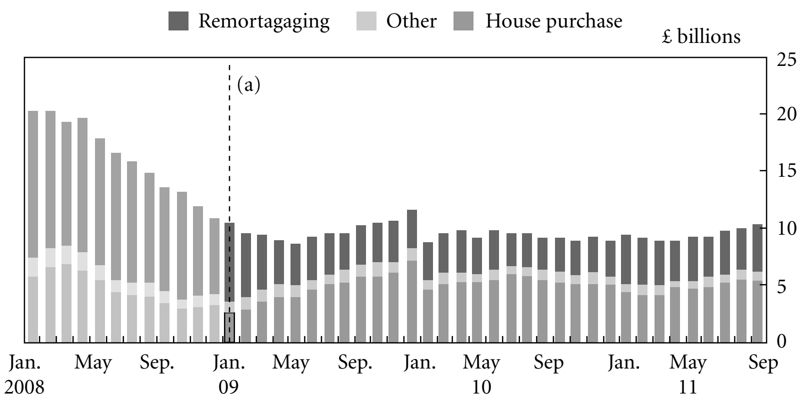

Figure 26 Mortgage lending by the major UK lenders[(a)]
Note: (a) the pre 2008 data is estimated

[1] Showing that businesses had repaid more than they had been able to borrow.

In the domestic market, policies by all political parties since the mid-twentieth century have promoted home ownership, through the ready availability of mortgage finance, to reduce public expenditure on housing, and to enhance social and political stability.[2]

Oldham, 'Mortgages' in Land Law: Issues, Debates Policy (ed Tee, 2002, p 172)

> [. . .] [P]roperty ownership effects a form of special inclusion or community bonding. The purchase of a house affiliates the mortgagor to a particular locality and to a particular social group. The purchaser acquires a sense of belonging not only to the neighbourhood in which the house is located, but also to a larger group of homeowners generally. Home ownership signals respectability, responsibility and, usually, also upward mobility. The particularly English ideology surrounding home-ownership has had the result that non-homeowners have become almost second-class citizens.

Most people aspire to the economic and social advantages that are associated with home ownership, but they can only attain those advantages by borrowing from a financial institution. Instead of paying rent for their accommodation, they repay their mortgage by instalments, in the expectation that they will not only enjoy the use of their home, but also be able to reap the benefits of an increase in its capital value as property prices increase—a bonus that is unavailable to a tenant.

The availability of credit is also vital to business and the economy, particularly to promote the growth of small and medium-sized businesses. Banks and other financial institutions are more ready to lend, and offer less onerous terms, where the risks associated with non-payment are reduced by the availability of security.

Oldham describes this economic significance.[3]

Oldham, 'Mortgages' in Land Law: Issues, Debates Policy (ed Tee, 2002, p 169)

> In terms of function, mortgages constitute a key economic institution—the means by which assets are mobilised, capital generated and productivity and the wider economy boosted. The mortgage is a mechanism that transforms 'passive 'land value into active value in that it allows the value of land to be released for other purposes while the freeholder or leaseholder is still able to enjoy the benefits of physical occupation or possession. It has even been argued that the ability to mortgage land is the key to the fundamental distinction between rich and poor countries. In poor countries, assets mobilisation is not possible because the capital invested in housing is incapable of being released because of inadequate underlying structures of property ownership and of social, political and legal control.

Clarke and Kohler have summarized the functions of secured credit as five-fold. As argued in the extract below, a security interest can give a lender: (i) a right of first recourse; (ii) priority; and (iii) the opportunity for non-judicial enforcement of the borrower's duties. Security interests can also serve: (iv) a hostage function; and (v) as a means of signalling the [2] See also Gray and Gray, Elements of Land Law (5th edn, 2009), [6.1.3]–[6.1.5] for some of the social and political effects of mortgage finance.

[3] See also the Law Commission Consultation Paper No 176, Company Security Interests (2004), [1.16]–[1.18].

creditworthiness of the borrower, and allowing the lender to monitor and control the borrower's behaviour.

Clarke and Kohler, Property Law: Commentary and Materials (2005, p 659)

18.1.2.1 Right of first recourse

First, security over an asset gives the security interest holder the right of first recourse to it. If there is default in repayment, the secured creditor can sell the asset and obtain repayment out of the proceeds of sale in priority to anyone else (except someone with a prior ranking security interest over the same asset). Most importantly, this applies even if the debtor goes bankrupt. A secured creditor is largely unaffected by the bankruptcy or liquidation of its debtor: its power to sell is generally not restricted in any way. If there is a surplus left after it has done so, that goes into the general pool of assets to be divided among the unsecured creditors. So, in any bankruptcy or liquidation, unsecured creditors are paid just a fraction of what they are owed (almost invariable a tiny fraction) whereas secured creditors are paid in full (assuming the secured asset was worth more than the total indebtedness).

This is not only a good thing in itself, as far as the secure creditor is concerned. It also dramatically reduces the risk in lending. Provided the lender ensures that there is a sufficient margin between the value of the asset it accepts as security and the amount it lends, its return of capital is more or less guaranteed.

18.1.2.2 Attachment to the asset

Since security interests are property interest in the secured asset, they are attached to the asset, in the sense that the asset owner cannot sell the asset free from the security interest unless he either pays off the debt or obtains the lender's consent. If he does neither, the security interest will be fully enforceable against the buyer (subject to the [appropriate] enforceability rules). This does not make the buyer personally liable for the debt, but it does entitle the security interest holder to sell the asset and recoup the debt out of the proceeds, handing back to the buyer only whatever is left after that.

18.1.2.3 Non-judicial enforcement

The security interest holder's primary remedy [...] is to sell the secured asset, and in most cases to do so without first obtaining a court order, or going through any other formal procedure. It does not even have to sell by auction: the sale will be an ordinary private sale. This ability to enforce security by a simple self-help process is uncommon in other jurisdictions. It has considerable attraction to lenders. It means that the lender does not have to satisfy anyone in advance that default has justified enforcement [...], there is no public scrutiny of the conduct of the sale or the price obtained, and no time-consuming, costly court process to go through [...]

18.1.2.4 The hostage function

[...] Security acts as a hostage, providing an incentive to the borrower to comply with the loan agreement. If the lender takes security over an asset that the borrower values highly, fear of losing the asset will induce the borrower to go to greater lengths than it might otherwise have done to keep up the payments. When money is short, it will make these repayments before paying other debts, and it will hesitate before engaging in risky behaviour which might > endanger its ability to repay [...] This helps to explain why lending money on the security of peoples' homes is such good business [...]

>
> #### 18.1.2.5 Signalling, monitoring and control
>
> A debtor who offers a valued asset as security can be said to be signalling his confidence that he will be able to repay, thus lessening the need for the lender to engage in expensive checks on his creditworthiness. If the asset has a predictable market value which is greater than the proposed loan, the creditor has even less need to check creditworthiness [...]
>
> [...] [S]ecurity can also be used as a means of enabling the lender to monitor the behaviour of the borrower. The terms of a security interest over assets will usually require the borrower to maintain the value of the secured asset by keeping it in good state of repair, to insure it [...] and notify the lender of any event threatening the value of the secured asset or the ability of the borrower to repay. In this country bank loans to businesses are usually secured by security interests taken over all the assets of the business. This not only gives the lender access to comprehensive information about the running of the business, but also gives the lender the opportunity to exercise a significant level of control over decision-making, as well as enabling the lender to take early action to safeguard its interests.

It is easy, however, to be beguiled into overvaluing security interests, as opposed to the underlying debt that they secure. Clarke makes the following point.

Clarke, 'Security Interest in Property' in Property Problems From Genes to Pension Funds (ed Harris, 1997, p 122)

> [...] [T]he value to the mortgagee of the mortgage fluctuates depending on the likelihood of the mortgagor repaying the debt in full and in time with—paradoxically—the value of the mortgage decreasing as the likelihood of default decreases.

She also notes that 'security interests start to look distinctly marginal as property interests'[4] when one recognizes that a security interest generally confers rights of recourse only if the debt is not repaid—an event that lies solely within the control of the borrower.

Nevertheless, the taking of security has considerable advantages for the lender, which may, in part, be passed onto the borrower (e.g. through lower interest rates), but if one party has a security interest, this is clearly disadvantageous to the borrower's other, unsecured creditors—particularly in the event of the borrower's insolvency. As a result, the probity and overall efficiency of secured credit has been questioned.[5]

Clarke and Kohler summarize some of these arguments.[6]

[4] Clarke, 'Security Interest in Property' in Property Problems From Genes to Pension Funds (ed Harris, 1997), p 123.

[5] See Finch (1992) 62 MLR 633 and Mokal (2002) 22 OJLS 686, who refer to the extensive US literature on this question, which considers the utility of security rights not only in relation to land, but also in relation to other rights held by a borrower or debtor. See also Getzler, 'The Role of Security Over Future and Circulating Capital: Evidence from the British Economy circa 1850–1920', Company Charges: Spectrum and Beyond (eds Getzler and Payne, 2006), ch 10.

[6] See also Clarke (1997), p 124.

Clarke and Kohler, Property Law: Commentary and Materials (2005, p 661)

> Intuitively, it seems likely that it is, because it has been so pervasive in market economies for such a long time [...] But efficient for whom? It seems fairly obvious that it is efficient for the secured creditor, in that the risk of not recovering the loan in full is decreased. This should result in lenders charging a lower rate of interest for secured loans, which suggests that secured credit is more advantageous for borrowers as well. However, whilst the risk of not being repaid in full is decreased for the secured creditor, it is correspondingly increased for all the unsecured creditors of the same debtor, because the secured assets are removed from the pool of assets out of which they can be repaid. So at best, unsecured creditors will increase the rate of interest they charge the debtor by an amount corresponding to the discounted rate charged by the secured creditor and secured credit then becomes a "zero sum game". Even in such a case, the outcome is likely to be inefficient rather than neutral because setting up security arrangements is costly, so the debtor's total credit bill [...] will be greater in a world where secured credit is permitted than it would be in a world where it is prohibited. At worst—and this is rather more in line with what actually happens in the real world—some unsecured creditors will be unable to respond to the granting of secured credit by raising their interest rates (because they are involuntary creditors, or are not in a position to negotiate or re-negotiate the terms on which they extend credit). This benefits the debtor, but it does mean that the advantages to the debtor and the sophisticated and relatively affluent creditor are bought at the expense of the relatively poor and unsophisticated creditor [...]
>
> However, there are other benefits that secured lending brings. We have already noted the monitoring and control functions that security enables the creditor to undertake can benefit everybody [...] Whether, these advantages outweigh the disadvantages remains a matter of debate.

The unsecured creditor is in a particularly vulnerable position where the secured asset represents all (or the mammoth share) of the debtor's wealth, because the creditor will be left with nothing (or little) against which he or she can seek recovery.

Clarke notes the impact of the secured creditor's privileged position on inhibiting the use and development of insolvency regimes.[7]

Clarke, 'Security Interest in Property' in Property Problems From Genes to Pension Funds (ed Harris, 1997, pp 122–3)

> This virtual isolation of the secured creditor from the bankruptcy process has a profound effect on the development of bankruptcy law in this country in at least two respects. First, it has significantly hampered the development of a workable business rescue procedure [...] Even more significantly, but less often publicly acknowledged, the secured creditor's aloofness from the bankruptcy process has made bankruptcy virtually unusable for individuals whose only significant asset is a mortgaged house.

7 Since Clarke was writing, administration has been promoted as a collective corporate rescue regime, but one in which the secured creditor continues to play a pre-eminent role: see Enterprise Act 2002, amending Insolvency Act 1986, Sch BI.

3 GENERAL FORMS OF SECURITY

Millett LJ identified the forms of security interest found in English law as follows.

Re Cosslett Contractors Ltd
[1998] Ch 495

Millett LJ

At 508

There are only four kinds of consensual security known to English law: (i) pledge; (ii) contractual lien; (iii) equitable charge and (iv) mortgage. A pledge and a contractual lien both depend on the delivery of possession to the creditor. The difference between them is that in the case of a pledge the owner delivers possession to the creditor as security, whereas in the case of a lien the creditor retains possession of goods previously delivered to him for some other purpose. Neither a mortgage nor a charge depends on the delivery of possession. The difference between them is that a mortgage involves a transfer of legal or equitable ownership to the creditor, whereas an equitable charge does not.

In this extract, Millett LJ sets out the general forms of security right that can apply even where no land is involved. In the remainder of this section, we will consider these four forms of security right. In section 4 below, we will focus on the security interests that are particularly important where land is concerned.

3.1 THE PLEDGE

The pledge is the most traditional form of security. It is dependent upon the borrower delivering possession or control of property to the lender. Ownership in the property is retained by the borrower and the lender obtains its own property right (a 'special interest' in the property), entitling it to sell if the loan is not repaid, accounting to the borrower for the proceeds of sale over and above that required to repay the loan.[8]

A pledge is found in a wide variety of situations, from pawn-broking, to international finance and trade. Its strength lies in the protection that it can afford the lender: by taking control of the property, the lender can assert its priority against the claims of other creditors. The disadvantage of a pledge lies in the fact that physical possession or control of the property must be delivered to the lender so that the borrower is deprived of the use of the property. Chattels, being moveable assets, lend themselves to the essential possessory nature of the pledge. Documents that constitute the title to goods, money, and other investments may also be pledged.[9] Given its immovable nature, land does not form the natural subject matter of a pledge—although the original forms of security over land tried to replicate the nature of a pledge.[10]

[8] The Odessa [1916] 1 AC 145; Matthew v TH Sutton [1949] 4 All ER 793.

[9] For example, bills of lading, negotiable instruments such as cheques, promissory notes, treasury bills, and bills of exchange.

[10] The name 'mortgage' is derived from the medieval word for pledge: the 'gage'.

3.2 THE LIEN

As Millett LJ points out, a consensual lien operates as a legal form of security: for example, a borrower can agree with a lender that the lender has a right to retain possession of property until the borrower's outstanding debt is paid. In addition, the common law has also implied liens into certain contracts: for example, a repairer of property is entitled to a lien to secure the costs of repair.[11]

An equitable lien gives a lender an equitable property right, rather than a legal property right. The rules relating to the content and acquisition of an equitable lien therefore differ from those applying to a common law lien. As to its content, an equitable lien is in the nature of a charge: it does not require the lender to have possession. As to its acquisition, an equitable lien can only arise by operation of law, rather than as a result of the agreement of the parties.

The most significant equitable lien for our purposes arises upon the sale of land and is called the 'unpaid vendor's lien'. A vendor who has transferred his or her freehold or lease to the purchaser, but has not received the full purchase price, is entitled to claim an equitable lien (over the freehold or lease now held by the purchaser) to secure the unpaid portion. Likewise, a purchaser who has paid, or partly paid, the purchase price for land, but has not yet received the vendor's freehold or lease, may have a power (for example, because of a breach of the contract of sale by the vendor) to pull out of the contract and claim back any payment that he or she has made. In such a case, the purchaser has an equitable lien over the vendor's freehold or lease in order to secure the vendor's duty to repay that money.

3.3 THE MORTGAGE

Buckley LJ has described the form of a mortgage as follows.[12]

Swiss Bank Group v Lloyds Bank Ltd
[1982] AC 584, HL

Buckley LJ

At 594

The essence of any transaction by way of mortgage is that a debtor confers upon his creditor a proprietary interest in property of the debtor, or undertakes in a binding manner to do so, by the realisation or appropriation of which the creditor can procure the discharge of the debtor's liability to him, and that the proprietary interest is redeemable, or the obligation to create it is defeasible, in the event of the debtor discharging his liability. If there has been no legal transfer of a proprietary interest but merely a binding undertaking to confer such an interest, that obligation, if specifically enforceable, will confer a proprietary interest in the subject matter in equity. The obligation will be specifically enforceable if it is an obligation for the breach of which damages would be an inadequate remedy. A contract to mortgage property, real or [11] Other common law liens include an innkeeper's (or hotelier's) and carrier's lien. Liens may also arise from the general usage of a particular trade or business: e.g. solicitors, factors, bankers, stockbrokers, and insurance brokers.

[12] Buckley misuses the term 'an equitable charge' in the last line of this extract. He should have referred to 'an equitable mortgage'.

> personal, will, normally at least, be specifically enforceable, for a mere claim to damages or repayment is obviously less valuable than a security in the event of the debtor's insolvency. If it is specifically enforceable, the obligation to confer the proprietary interest will give rise to an equitable charge upon the subject matter by way of mortgage.

A mortgage thus transfers the borrower's interest in the property to the lender, subject to an obligation on the lender to return that interest to the borrower once the debt is repaid—an obligation that confers upon the borrower what is known as 'a right to redeem'. The borrower's legal right to redeem is governed by the need for strict compliance with the repayment terms set out in the loan agreement. But equity will recognize the borrower's continuing equitable right to redeem even if he or she has failed to repay the loan in accordance with the contractual terms. This equitable right to redeem is of such import that it is recognized as giving the borrower an equitable property right: a right that is capable of binding third parties. In Chapter 5, section 1, it was suggested that equitable property rights depend on one party being under a duty to another; the equitable right to redeem is based on the lender's duty to transfer a mortgaged right back to the borrower if the underlying debt is repaid. Thus, although the mortgagee has the legal title to the property, a mortgage differs from an outright sale, because the lender's title is subject to the borrower's equity of redemption, the economic value of which is represented by the value of the property less the amount required to repay the lender. In this rather roundabout fashion, the security nature of the mortgage is achieved. We will have more to say about the borrower's equity of redemption in section 5 below.

The lender's inherent rights under a legal mortgage are defined, firstly, by their ownership of the legal title, which confers a right to possession, and secondly, by their right to apply to bar the borrower's equitable right to redeem, and thus extinguish the equity of redemption, by a process known as 'foreclosure'.

As Buckley LJ indicates, mortgages may take a legal or equitable form. A mortgage will be equitable where the borrower has only an equitable interest in the property and transfers that interest to the lender, or where the formalities used to create the mortgage fall short of the requirements to convey the legal title,[13] but nevertheless are recognized as an agreement to create a mortgage, and so give the lender an equitable property right under the doctrine of anticipation (see Chapter 9 and section 4.3 below).

3.4 THE CHARGE

Millett LJ, again in Re Cosslett Contractors, defined a charge as follows.

Re Cosslett Contractors Ltd
[1998] Ch 495, CA

Millett LJ

At 508

> It is of the essence of a charge that a particular asset or class of assets is appropriated to the satisfaction of a debt or other obligation of the chargor or a third party, so that the chargee is entitled to look to the asset and its proceeds for the discharge of the liability. This right creates a transmissible interest in the asset. A mere right to retain possession of an asset and to make use of it for a particular purpose does not create such an interest and does not constitute a charge.

[13] See Chapter 7.

A charge creates a new proprietary interest that encumbers or burdens the borrower's ownership of the property. In contrast to a mortgage, there is no transfer of an existing ownership interest. The charge entitles the lender to look to the charged property to satisfy the debt. In the absence of any express or implied powers contained in the charge, the lender does so by applying to court for an order for the sale of the property, or for the appointment of a receiver to apply the capital or income from the property (as appropriate) in repayment of the debt. Upon satisfaction of the debt, the charge is automatically discharged, because there is simply no continuing debt to be met out of the property. The charge resembles the Roman law hypothec; indeed, it is sometimes described as a 'hypothecation'.

The charge is a creature of equity, although the Law of Property Act 1925 (LPA 1925) also uses the term 'charge' to describe a special form of legal interest that can be used to give a lender a security right in land.[14] It is important to distinguish the equitable charge (which can apply even where land is not involved) from the legal charge created by the 1925 Act (which can apply only to land). An equitable charge may be taken over existing and future property, and may be fixed over specific property or taken in floating form over a changing fund of assets. For example, one of the most common forms of commercial security is the floating charge over all of the rights, whether present or future, of a company. The floating charge affects the assets for the time being owned by the company, yet permits the company to deal with those assets in the ordinary course of the company's business without the consent of the lender. A floating charge may be converted to a fixed charge, by a process known as 'crystallization', which will occur either where the company is no longer able to deal with its assets in the ordinary course of its business—because, for example, it has entered one of the corporate insolvency regimes—or where the parties have agreed that crystallization should be triggered by certain events.

The categorization of fixed and floating charges has been the source of much litigation, but has been finally settled by the House of Lords, which identified the defining factor as the degree of control that the lender exercises over the charged asset.[15]

Re Spectrum Plus Ltd
[2005] 2 AC 680, HL

Lord Walker

At [138]–[139]

Under a fixed charge the assets charged as security are permanently appropriated to the payment of the sum charged, in such a way as to give the chargee a proprietary interest in the assets. So long as the charge remains unredeemed, the assets can be released from the charge only with the active concurrence of the chargee. The chargee may have good commercial reasons for agreeing to a partial release. If for instance a bank has a fixed charge over a large area of land which is being developed in phases as a housing estate (another example of a fixed charge on what might be regarded as trading stock) it might be short-sighted of the bank not to agree to take only a fraction of the proceeds of sale of houses in the first phase, so enabling the remainder of the development to be funded. But under a fixed charge that will be a matter for the chargee to decide for itself.

[14] See section 4.2 below.

[15] See also Worthington, 'Floating Charges: The Use and Abuse of Doctrinal Analysis' in Company Charges: Spectrum and Beyond (eds Getzler and Payne, 2006), ch 3. The analysis of the House of Lords in Re Spectrum Plus [2005] 2 AC 680, HL, essentially matches that of Worthington in Proprietary Interests in Commercial Transactions (1996), pp 78–86.

Under a floating charge, by contrast, the chargee does not have the same power to control the security for its own benefit. The chargee has a proprietary interest, but its interest is in a fund of circulating capital, and unless and until the chargee intervenes (on crystallisation of the charge) it is for the trader, and not the bank, to decide how to run its business.

4 FORMS OF SECURITY OVER LAND: MORTGAGES AND CHARGES

The English mortgage has been described as 'a work of fiction' and 'a confusion of things'.[16] To understand that fiction, we must look to the development of the form of English mortgage, bearing in mind the general forms of security interest examined in section 3 above.

4.1 DEVELOPMENT OF MORTGAGES OF LAND

Mortgages have a long history, which was much influenced by the laws against usury that prohibited the charging of interest.[17]

Baker, An Introduction to English Legal History (4th edn, 2002, p 311)

From the earliest times, debtors have used property as security—or 'gage'—for loans of money. Whether the gage was a chattel or land, possession had to be handed over to the lender, to be returned on payment. In some early forms of gage no term was fixed: the gagee held the property until he was satisfied. Another early form, [. . .], was a lease of years to the gagee, the term being the period of the loan. If the gagee took the profits in reduction of the loan, this was known in early times as a living gage (vivum vadium) apparently because the property continued to work for the borrower; but if the lender took the principal as well as the profits, it was a dead gage ('mortgage') and the arrangement, though sinful as giving the lender a usurious return, was legally valid. By the fifteenth century, however, the name 'mortgage' has apparently come to be used for any arrangement whereby a loan was secured by a conveyance of real property. The self redeeming living gage had long since gone into disuse: it cast on the lender the responsibility of refunding himself, perhaps without profit, and it was less attractive than a passive security in the form of land which would become the lender's absolutely if the borrower failed to pay on time. Two new ways of effecting such a security were developed in the thirteenth century: either the mortgagor leased the land for years to 16 Watt, 'Mortgage Law as Legal Fiction' in Modern Studies in Property Law: Vol 3 (ed Cooke, 2007), pp 73 and 76.

17 The laws against usury were not finally abolished until the Usury Laws Repeal Act 1854.

the mortgagee, with a proviso that if the debt was not paid by a certain date the mortgagee would have the fee, or the mortgagor conveyed the fee to the mortgagee forthwith, on condition that he might re-enter (and regain the fee) if he paid by a certain date [. . .] The second form gave the mortgagee a fee simple defeasible by condition subsequent (that is, payment). One advantage of this fee simple mortgage was that it was arguably non-usurious [. . .] In the seventeenth century a further alternative device came into almost universal use, the long term of years with clause for defeasance [. . .] and it later became a common practice under the common law forms of mortgage [. . .] to allow the mortgagor to remain in possession as a tenant at will or at sufferance of the mortgagee. After 1600 the mortgage deed might contain express provision for this, but the practice is probably older.

We can, thus, see that the lawyers of old utilized both the pledge and the mortgage as security devices, although it was the classic mortgage by conveyance or demise that prevailed. The 'fiction' referred to lies in the fact that, at common law, the lender was the owner of the property and so entitled to the incidents of ownership—in particular, possession—while the borrower held only a right to insist on reconveyance of the legal title upon repayment of the debt. This was despite the fact that, as the laws against usury relaxed and the charging of interest was permitted, the lender had no wish to take possession unless and until the borrower failed to repay the loan. Despite the position at common law, the borrower generally kept possession of the property and both parties saw him or her as its true owner. It was the borrower's equity of redemption that redressed the balance somewhat: equity's protection of the borrower's right to repay the debt and redeem the property resulted in the borrower (in effect) being regarded as the owner in equity, with the lender's legal title being held only by way of security.

The LPA 1925 introduced the current incarnation of the legal charge by way of mortgage. This special security interest, existing only in relation to land, allows a borrower with a freehold or lease to give the lender a legal interest by way of security without needing to transfer his or her freehold or lease to the lender. Unfortunately, however, the legal charge has not been able to escape the fiction that lies at the heart of the mortgage.

4.2 THE LEGAL CHARGE BY WAY OF MORTGAGE

The LPA 1925 contemplated only two methods of creating a legal mortgage: the mortgage by sub-demise, and the legal charge by way of mortgage. Section 85(1) and (2) provides as follows.[18]

Law of Property Act 1925, s 85(1) and (2)

Mode of mortgaging freeholds

1. A mortgage of an estate in fee simple shall only be capable of being effected at law either by a demise for a term of years absolute, subject to a provision for cesser on redemption, or by a charge by deed expressed to be by way of legal mortgage.

Provided that a first mortgagee shall have the same right to the possession of documents as if his security included the fee simple.

[18] Law of Property Act 1925, s 86, contains similar provisions governing the mode of mortgaging leaseholds.

2. Any purported conveyance of an estate in fee simple by way of mortgage made after the commencement of this Act shall (to the extent of the estate of the mortgagor) operate as a demise of the land to the mortgagee for a term of years absolute, without impeachment for waste, but subject to cesser on redemption, in manner following, namely:—

(a) A first or only mortgagee shall take a term of three thousand years from the date of the mortgage;

(b) A second or subsequent mortgagee shall take a term (commencing from the date of the mortgage) one day longer than the term vested in the first or other mortgagee whose security ranks immediately before that of such second or subsequent mortgagee;

and, in this subsection, any such purported conveyance as aforesaid includes an absolute conveyance with a deed of defeasance and any other assurance which, but for this subsection, would operate in effect to vest the fee simple in a mortgagee subject to redemption.

The mortgage by sub-demise creates a proprietary estate in the lender, although, rather than a fee simple, it is a leasehold estate for 3,000 years. The mortgage by sub-demise has, however, fallen into disuse as the legal charge by way of mortgage has gained in popularity.

The Land Registration Act 2002 (LRA 2002) reflects this trend by effectively rendering obsolete the mortgage by sub-demise. A legal mortgage of unregistered land will trigger first registration[19] and, whatever the form of mortgage, s 51 provides that it will have effect as a charge by deed by way of mortgage.

Land Registration Act 2002, s 51

Effect of completion by registration

On completion of the relevant registration requirements, a charge created by means of a registrable disposition of a registered estate has effect, if it would not otherwise do so, as a charge by deed by way of legal mortgage

Section 23 then provides that a registered owner is only capable of entering into a mortgage of a registered estate by way of charge.

Land Registration Act 2002, s 23

Owner's powers

1. Owner's powers in relation to a registered estate consist of—

(a) power to make a disposition of any kind permitted by the general law in relation to an interest of that description, other than a mortgage by demise or sub-demise, and

(b) power to charge the estate at law with the payment of money.

[19] Land Registration Act 2002, s 4(1)g.

Thus it is the legal charge by way of mortgage that provides the pre-eminent form of legal mortgage and on which we will focus. But the effect of the mortgage by sub-demise has not been laid to rest, because s 87(1) of the LPA 1925 provides as follows.

Law of Property Act 1925, s 87(1)

Charges by way of legal mortgage

1. Where a legal mortgage of land is created by a charge by deed expressed to be by way of legal mortgage, the mortgagee shall have the same protection, powers and remedies (including the right to take proceedings to obtain possession from the occupiers and the persons in receipt of rents and profits, or any of them) as if—

(a) where the mortgage is a mortgage of an estate in fee simple, a mortgage term for three thousand years without impeachment of waste had been thereby created in favour of the mortgagee; and

(b) where the mortgage is a mortgage of a term of years absolute, a sub-term less by one day than the term vested in the mortgagor had been thereby created in favour of the mortgagee.

The result is a hybrid security interest: the lender gains a legal charge (not a lease),[20] but enjoys the same protections, powers, and remedies as if it held a lease for a term of 3,000 years. Certainly, there is no transfer to the lender of the borrower's freehold or lease: the borrower retains that estate, but holds it subject to the lender's legal charge.[21]

So the old fiction continues in a different, but just as complicated, form. The inappropriateness of this form has been highlighted by the Law Commission, which has long advocated reform by the adoption of a statutory form of security interest with defined rights and powers.

Law Commission Report No 204, Land Mortgages (1991, [2.14], [2.17]–[2.18], [3.1]–[3.2])

Removal of the distinction between mortgage and charge

A mortgage is conceptually different from a charge [. . .] However in English law the distinction is blurred and the terms are often used interchangeably, sometimes as if they were synonymous and sometimes as if one was a generic term including the other. The confusion is exacerbated by uncertainty over the correct classification of the mortgage by demise and the charge by way of legal mortgage. The mortgage by demise is technically a mortgage, in that it involves the grant of a substantial legal estate to the mortgagee. However, equitable restriction of the mortgagee's ownership-type rights has resulted in it acquiring a close resemblance to a charge. The charge by way of legal mortgage is in name and form a charge, but in substance it is the same as the mortgage by demise.

[20] Grand Junction Co Ltd v Bates [1954] 2 QB 160, 166; Weg Motors Ltd v Hales [1962] Ch 49, 74; Cumberland Court (Brighton) Ltd v Taylor [1964] Ch 29, 36; Regent Oil Co Ltd v JA Gregory (Hatch End) Ltd [1966] Ch 402.

[21] The section fails to articulate the position of the borrower—a position that has been criticized in the equivalent provision in the Australian State of Victoria: see Figgins Holdings Pty Ltd v SEAA Enterpises Ltd (1999) 196 CLR 245, [65], per McHugh J.

[...]

Inappropriateness of form

The second root cause of the artificiality and complexity of mortgage law is the methods used to create security interest in land give rise to inappropriate relationships between the parties. This is particularly apparent in the mortgage by demise [...]

The problem here is of central importance because it affects not only the mortgage by demise, but also the charge by way of legal mortgage which is treated by statute as if it were a mortgage by demise and the equitable mortgage of a legal estate which is treated in equity as if it were a legal mortgage, hence a mortgage by demise. The problem is that it creates a relationship of landlord and tenant between the parties. There is nothing unusual about using the leasehold relationship as an investment device: institutional lenders are probably more likely to use leases rather than mortgages as a means of financing property developments or investing in non-residential land. However, in the case of the mortgage by demise the leasehold relationship is the wrong way round: as tenant, the mortgagee has an inherent right to possession which would more appropriately lie with the mortgagor (subject to whatever restrictions may be necessary to protect and enforce the security). Similarly, it is necessary for the preservation of the security that the mortgagor should be under a duty more usually imposed by a landlord on a tenant, rather than a tenant on a landlord. Even if reversed, the landlord-tenant relationship is fundamentally different from that created by a mortgage: investors under a leased-based arrangement buy outright a share in the property, and the value of the share fluctuates in direct proportion to the value of the retained property; mortgagee-investors, on the other hand, have an interest in the property only for the temporary purpose of safeguarding the repayment of a loan or the value of the obligation secured. Historically the mortgage by demise was a useful device to bridge the gap between abolition of the mortgage by assignment and the general acceptance of the legal charge. Now that it has fulfilled that purpose, it seems an unnecessary impoverishment of the system to blur the distinction between the lease and mortgage by continuing to define one device in terms of the other.

[...]

Nature of the new mortgage

It is central to our proposal for the creation of a new kind of mortgage that the attributes of the mortgage should be expressly defined by statute, rather than defined by reference to pre-existing forms of mortgage or by analogy to any other legal relationship. It is therefore necessary to consider what interest in the mortgaged property a mortgagee ought to have under the new mortgage, whether formal or informal [...]

The guiding principle we have adopted in defining the nature of the new mortgage is that the only function of the mortgaged property is to provide security for the performance of the mortgagor's payment obligations. It follows from this that the nature and extent of the mortgagee's interest ought to be dictated by the need to preserve the value of the security and, where necessary, to enforce it.

4.3 EQUITABLE MORTGAGES AND EQUITABLE CHARGES OF LAND

The legal charge by way of mortgage now monopolizes the creation of legal security over land. In equity, there remains a number of ways in which an equitable security right can arise. To see the differences between legal and equitable security rights, we again need to focus on the content and acquisition questions (see Chapter 1, section 3).

4.3.1 Equitable charge of a legal estate: the acquisition question

A borrower with a legal estate in land may attempt to give a lender a legal charge by way of security—but to acquire such a legal interest, the lender needs to show that the borrower granted that right by means of a deed, and also that the lender has now registered its charge.[22] If those steps have not been taken, the lender may nonetheless acquire an equitable charge (under the doctrine of anticipation—see Chapter 9) by showing that the borrower is under a duty to grant the lender a legal charge. So, the lender will acquire an equitable charge if the borrower has made a contractual promise to grant a legal charge.[23] In addition, even if the borrower has made no contractual promise, a court can impose a duty to grant a charge if, in return for the loan provided by the lender, the borrower has attempted to grant a legal charge, but has failed to do so (e.g. because of a failure to comply with formality rules). In such cases, there can be said to have been an 'equitable charge' of the borrower's legal estate in the land.

Under this form of equitable security of a legal estate, the parties' relationship is treated in equity as if the agreement had been performed and a legal charge had been created. Thus, the lender is treated as if it had a legal charge by way of mortgage, with the benefit of the remedies and powers of a mortgage by sub-demise so far as they are consistent with the equitable nature of the lender's rights.[24]

To constitute this type of equitable charge of a legal estate, an agreement to create a legal mortgage must be valid. It should thus comply with the terms of s 2(1) of the Law of Property (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1989 (LP(MP)A 1989) (see Chapter 7, section 3). Prior to this enactment, it was common practice for lenders to take a deposit of the borrower's title deeds. This deposit of the deeds would create an equitable security: the loan supported by the act of deposit was interpreted both as evidence of the parties' agreement to create a legal charge, and as an act of part-performance to support the enforcement of that agreement. It is now clear that, given the formalities required under the LP(MP)A 1989, the practice of creating an equitable security by deposit is no longer possible.

United Bank of Kuwait plc v Sahib
[1997] Ch 107, CA

Peter Gibson LJ

At 137

I would emphasise the essential contractual foundation of the rule as demonstrated in the authorities. The deposit by way of security is treated both as prima facie evidence of a contract to mortgage, and as part performance of that contract. It is sufficient to refer briefly to 22 See Chapter 7 for the general formality rules applying to the creation of a legal interest in land.

23 It seems that the lender should also acquire an equitable charge if the borrower is under a non-contractual duty to grant a legal charge: see Chapter 10, section 2.2. For example, in Kinane v Mackie-Conteh [2005] EWCA Civ 45, the Court of Appeal found that proprietary estoppel imposed a duty on the borrower to grant a legal charge. As a result, the lender acquired an equitable interest in the land—although the Court held that the lender's interest arose under a constructive trust, not by means of an equitable charge.

24 For example, an equitable chargee or mortgagee cannot sell the legal estate: Law of Property Act 1925, s 88(6) but see Swift 1st Ltd v Colin [2011] EWHC 2410.

the more recent of the multitude of authorities. In Re Wallis & Simmonds (Builders) Ltd [1974] 1 All ER 561, [1974] 1 WLR 391 Templeman J held that the equitable charge resulting from a deposit of title deeds was contractual in nature and specifically rejected an argument that the charge arose by operation of law. In Re Alton Corp [1985] BCLC 27 at 33 Megarry V-C said, in relation to a loan accompanied by the deposit of title deeds:

> '[. . .] I have to remember that the basis of an equitable mortgage is the making of an agreement to create a mortgage, with the deposit of the land certificate and, since Steadman v Steadman [1974] 2 All ER 977, [1976] AC 536, probably the paying of the money as well, ranking as sufficient acts of part performance to support even the purely oral transaction. But some contract there must be.'

I accept that there need not be an express contract between the depositor of the title deeds and the person with whom they are deposited for an equitable mortgage to arise (subject to s 2). But I have already stated why it is clear from the authorities that the deposit is treated as rebuttable evidence of a contract to mortgage. Oral evidence is admissible to establish whether or not a deposit was intended to create a mortgage security [. . .],To allow inquiries of this sort after the 1989 Act in order to determine whether an equitable mortgage has been created and on what terms seems to me to be wholly inconsistent with the philosophy of s 2, requiring as it does that the contract be made by a single document containing all the terms of the agreement if it is to be valid [. . .]

To the extent that part performance is an essential part of the rationale of the creation of an equitable mortgage by the deposit of title deeds, that too is inconsistent with the new philosophy of the 1989 Act. As the Law Commission said in its report (para 4.13):

> 'Inherent in the recommendation that contracts should be made in writing is the consequence that part performance would no longer have a role to play in contracts concerning land.'

In the present case, for the reasons already given, it seems to me clear that the deposit of title deeds takes effect as a contract to mortgage and as such falls within s 2.

The judge said [at first instance] [1995] 2 All ER 973 at 990, [1995] 2 WLR 94 at 111:

> 'The recommendation [of the Law Commission] that contracts relating to land should be incorporated in a signed document which contains all the terms was, clearly, intended to promote certainty. There is no reason why certainty should be any less desirable in relation to arrangements for security over land than in relation to any other arrangements in respect of land. The present case itself illustrates the need to be able to identify the obligation which is to be secured. I do not find it surprising that Parliament decided to enact legislation which would be likely to have the effect of avoiding disputes on oral evidence as to the obligation which the parties intended to secure.'

I agree. Indeed, it seems to me that the whole of the judge's reasoning, to which I would pay tribute, on the s 2 point cannot be faulted. Like him, I am fortified by the support for the same conclusion given in Emmet on Title para 25.116. I therefore conclude that by reason of s 2, the mere deposit of title deeds by way of security cannot any longer create a mortgage or charge.

In Chapter 11 we examined how arrangements that fail to comply with s 2(1) may nevertheless continue to have effect through the doctrines of proprietary estoppel or constructive trusts. In Sahib, Peter Gibson LJ rejected the lender's arguments that it had acquired an equitable charge on the grounds of proprietary estoppel or a constructive trust—but in Kinane v Mackie- Conteh,[25] in which the lender advanced £50,000 in reliance upon the parties' understanding that the loan would be secured, a similar argument succeeded and the lender did acquire an equitable charge.[26]

[25] [2005] EWCA Civ 45, noted Dixon [2005] Conv 247 and McFarlane [2005] Conv 501.

It does seem correct that the lender should acquire an equitable charge if the borrower is under a non-contractual duty to grant a legal charge, however, in light of the House of Lords' decisions in Cobbe v Yeoman's Row Management Ltd[27] and Thorner v Major[28] the role of proprietary estoppel in the creation of equitable interests (particularly in the commercial context) must now be re-examined.

4.3.2 Equitable mortgage of an equitable estate: the content question

If the borrower has no legal estate in land, but only an equitable interest, then it is impossible for the lender to acquire a legal charge: the content of the borrower's property right prevents it. In such a case, any security interest acquired by the lender must take an equitable form. Such a right can arise by means of an equitable mortgage: if, for example, the borrower transfers his or her equitable interest to the lender. Such equitable mortgages are not as common as mortgages of the legal estate, but they may arise where a purchaser mortgages his or her equitable interest under a sale and purchase agreement of land, or where a beneficiary under a trust of land has mortgaged his or her interest. Where an equitable mortgage is created intentionally, it is created in the classic form by assigning the borrower's equitable interest to the lender, subject to the lender's covenant to reassign upon repayment of the loan. But an equitable mortgage of an equitable interest may arise unintentionally: for example, consider a case in which a freehold or lease is held jointly by two co-owners under a trust of land.[29] One of the co-owners then purports to mortgage the legal estate by forging the other co-owner's signature. The purported legal charge by way of mortgage cannot be valid—but the lender will acquire an equitable security right, taking effect only against the equitable share of the co-owner who purported to grant the legal charge.[30] A similar result can apply where the other co-owner does consent to the legal charge, but does so as a result of undue influence or misrepresentation (see Chapter 29, section 3.1).

4.3.3 Equitable charge: the content question

Finally a charge may be created in equity, whether over a legal estate or an equitable interest in the land, where the parties demonstrate an intention that the lender's right is to make available, or appropriated, for the discharge of a debt or other obligation. That intention must be evinced in writing, but no particular form of words is required.[31] In such a case, the lender acquires an equitable property right due to the content of the borrower's duty to the lender: a duty to allow the lender to use the borrower's right to meet the debt, should the borrower fail to repay. This form of security right is not special to land: as we saw in section 3.4 above, it arises whenever a borrower comes under such a duty to a lender.

[26] Although it has been suggested that estoppel is an inadequate replacement for part-performance: see Griffiths [2002] Conv 216.

[27] [2008] UKHL 55, [2008] 1 WLR 1752.

[28] [2009] UKHL 18, [2009] 1 WLR 776.

[29] See Chapters 16 and 17.

[30] See Ahmed v Kendrick [1988] 2 FLR 22; First National Securities Ltd v Hegerty [1985] QB 850; Thames Guaranty Ltd v Campbell [1985] QB 210.

[31] See Law of Property Act 1925, s 53(1)a.

It must be remembered that this form of equitable charge is conceptually different from the equitable charge that we examined in section 4.3.1 above, when looking at equitable charge of the legal estate. Where there is such an equitable charge, the borrower is under a duty to grant the lender a legal interest: a legal charge. The lender can thus call for that right, and, with it, will acquire all of the powers and remedies associated with a legal charge. In the case of the equitable charge examined in this section, however, the lender enjoys none of these rights. Its implied rights are confined to a right to apply to court for an order for sale or the appointment of a receiver.

In the following extract, McFarlane emphasizes this distinction by giving different names to the form of equitable charge that we examined in section 4.3.1 above and that which we have examined in this section. In the passage, a legal charge by way of mortgage is referred to as a 'charge'. The first type of equitable charge is then called an 'equitable charge' and the second a 'purely equitable charge'. This underlines the fact that, in the second case, the borrower is under no duty to give the lender a legal interest in land.

McFarlane, The Structure of Property Law (2008, p 818)

It is important to distinguish between (i) an Equitable Charge; and (ii) a Purely Equitable Charge. First, an Equitable Charge, unlike a Purely Equitable Charge, can exist only in relation to land. Second, even where land is concerned, there is a difference between the two rights. An Equitable Charge arises where [the borrower] is under a duty to grant [the lender] a Charge. A Purely Equitable Charge arises where [the borrower] is under a duty to hold his Freehold or Lease as security for a duty owed to [the lender]. Third, formality rules can apply differently to each right:

Equitable Charge: Where [the borrower] has a Freehold or Lease, his power to come under a contractual duty to give [the lender] a Charge is regulated by s.2 of the 1989 Act [. . .] However, [the lender] can acquire an Equitable Charge in the absence of writing if [the borrower] is under a non-contractual duty to give [the lender] a Charge.

Purely Equitable Charge: Where [the borrower] has a Freehold or Lease, his power to make a contractual promise to hold his right as security is regulated by s.53(1)(a) of the LPA 1925. That rule requires only writing signed by A.

4.3.4 Equitable security rights in land: reform?

We have distinguished between three different ways in which a lender can acquire an equitable security interest in land. The Law Commission recommended the rationalization of this confusing multiplicity of forms.

Law Commission Report No 204, Land Mortgages (1991, [2.13])

Reduction in the number of types of security

Whilst this proliferation of types of security interest in land is historically explicable, we are satisfied that it no longer serves any useful purpose. As far as legal mortgages are concerned, it is difficult to justify the continued existence of the mortgage by demise, given that it is no longer used in practice and has the same effect in law as the charge by way of legal mortgage [the mortgage by sub demise is effectively obsolete—see 4.2 above]. The problem of equitable security in a legal estate is rather different. The principle underlying equitable mortgages of the legal estate is the rule in Walsh v Lonsdale, a general property law principle which applies to mortgages in precisely the same way as it applies to fee simples, leases and easements. Nevertheless, if the equitable charge is included it does mean that there are at least three, and possibly four, ways of taking informal security over the legal estate. Whilst there are small differences in the effect between these different types of equitable security, there is no apparent difference in function: none seems to fulfill a function that could not be fulfilled by any one of the others. The same can be said of the different ways of taking security over equitable interests in land: responses to the Working Paper confirmed that the differences in form and effect between equitable mortgages and equitable charges are regarded as no practical significance. Finally, there is the question of whether it remains necessary for the method of creating a security interest over an equitable interest to be different from the method for creating a security interest over a legal estate. In the Working Group we put forward the view that there was no reason in principle why the same type of security should not be used for both legal and equitable interests in land [. . .]

4.4 CHARGING ORDERS

A charging order provides a means by which a judgment creditor can enforce his or her judgment, by providing some of the advantages conferred by security. Charging orders are governed by the Charging Orders Act 1979. In theory, a judgment creditor can apply for a charging order over any property of the debtor; in practice, however, a judgment creditor is likely to ask for a charging order in relation to valuable, immovable property—the debtor's land.

Charging Orders Act 1979, s 1(1)

Charging orders

(1) Where, under a judgment or order of the High Court or a county court, a person (the "debtor") is required to pay a sum of money to another person (the "creditor") then, for the purpose of enforcing that judgment or order, the appropriate court may make an order in accordance with the provisions of this Act imposing on any such property of the debtor as may be specified in the order a charge for securing the payment of any money due or to become due under the judgment or order.

The judgment creditor must thus apply to court for the grant of a charging order.[32] If a charging order is granted, a charge is created over the judgment debtor's interest in land as specified in the order to secure the payment of the judgment debt,[33] and should accordingly be registered to preserve its priority.[34] This charge has 'the like effect and shall be [32] The making of the order is a two-stage process. Initially, the charging order nisi is granted usually ex parte. If the judgment debtor fails to meet the judgment as required by the order nisi, the charging order is made absolute.

[33] Including a beneficial interest held under a trust of land: see Charging Orders Act 1979, s 2(1)(a)(i).

[34] In respect of a registered estate by a notice, see Land Registration Act 2002, ss 32–4, or by a restriction where the judgment debtor's interest is a beneficial interest under a trust, see Land Registration Act 2002, s 42(1)(c) and (4). Where land is unregistered, a charging order against the judgment debtor's legal title is enforceable [...] in the same manner as an equitable charge created by the debtor under his hand'.[35] The judgment creditor becomes a secured creditor and will be able to claim priority against unsecured creditors if the debtor becomes insolvent. The charging order may be enforced by application to court for an order for sale, or for the appointment of a receiver.

A judgment creditor thus must submit to the court's discretion at two points: firstly, when the court decides whether or not to make the order; and secondly, when the court decides whether or not the charging order should be enforced.

The court in exercising its initial discretion whether or not to grant a charging order must consider all of the circumstances of the case, including the personal circumstances of the debtor and whether any other creditor would be prejudiced by the order.[36] Where relevant circumstances subsequently come to light, the court may vary or discharge the charging order.[37]

Charging Orders Act 1979, s 1(5)

Charging orders

(5) In deciding whether to make a charging order the court shall consider all the circumstances of the case and, in particular, any evidence before it as to—

(a) the personal circumstances of the debtor, and

(b) whether any other creditor of the debtor would be likely to be unduly prejudiced by the making of the order.

A creditor, although not entitled to a charging order, can expect an order to be granted in its favour unless there are circumstances that would persuade a court that an order should not be made. For example, a charging order will not be granted if it is likely that the debtor will become bankrupt or go into liquidation; in such a case, a charging order would give the judgment debtor an undue advantage over other unsecured creditors.[38]

Where the judgment debtor's interest is an interest in his or her home, which he or she holds jointly with his or her spouse or partner, the court will also consider the position of that spouse or partner and any children. The situation may be complicated by the possibility that divorce proceedings are contemplated, or pending, in which the judgment debtor's spouse is entitled to claim ancillary relief. In these circumstances, there is a balance to be struck between the exercise of the court's family jurisdiction, in which the welfare of any registrable as an order affecting land: see Land Charges Act 1972, s 6(1)(a); but where the judgment debtor holds a beneficial interest under a trust of unregistered land, there is no provision for registration.

[35] Charging Orders Act 1979, s 3(4).

[36] The charging order process has been criticized as deficient to draw out the relevant circumstances, see Capper, Conway and Glennon, 'From Obligation to Proprietary Interest: A Critique of the Charging Order System in England and Wales' in Modern Studies in Property Law Vol 6 (ed Bright, Oxford: Hart, 2011), ch 4.

[37] The application can be made by the debtor or any other person with an interest in the property: see s 3(5).

[38] Roberts Petroleum Ltd v Bernard Kenny Ltd [1983] 2 AC 192; Nationwide Building Society v Wright [2009] EWCA Civ 811, [2010] Ch 318.

children are a primary consideration, and the court's commercial jurisdiction, in which contracts must be honoured and judgment debts paid.

The Court of Appeal, when considering this balancing exercise, has made clear that its approach will depend upon the timing of the creditor's and wife's applications.

Harman v Glencross
[1986] Fam 81, CA

Balcombe LJ

At 98

[. . .] I think it right to set out how I conceive the court should deal with a similar problem when next it occurs.

1. Where a judgment creditor has obtained a charging order nisi on the husband's share in the matrimonial home and his application to have that order made absolute is heard before the wife has started divorce proceedings, there is, of course, no other court to which the application for the charging order absolute can be transferred, the wife having no competing claim to the husband's share. In those circumstances it is difficult to see why the court should refuse to make the charging order absolute, and the wife's right of occupation should be adequately protected under [now s 14 of the Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees 1996].
2. Where the charging order nisi has been made after the wife's petition, then on the application for a charging order absolute the court should consider whether the circumstances are such that it is proper to make the charging order absolute, even before the wife's application for ancillary relief has been heard by the Family Division. There will, of course, be cases (such as Llewellin v. Llewellin (unreported), 30 October 1985, Court of Appeal (Civil Division) Transcript No. 640 of 1985, which we heard immediately after this appeal) where the figures are such that even if the charging order is made absolute, and then the charge is realised by a sale of the house, the resultant proceeds of sale (including any balance of the husband's share after the judgment debt has been paid) will be clearly sufficient to provide adequate alternative accommodation for the wife and children.
3. Unless it appears to the court hearing the application for the charging order absolute that the circumstances are so clear that it is proper to make the order there and then, the usual practice should be to transfer the application to the Family Division so that it may come on with the wife's application for ancillary relief, and one court can then be in a position to consider all the circumstances of the case. When considering the circumstances, the approach of the court should be to recall the statement of Sir Denys Buckley in the Hegerty case [1985] Q.B. 850, 866, that a judgment creditor is justified in expecting that a charging order over the husband's beneficial interest in the matrimonial home will be made in his favour. The court should first consider whether the value of the equity in the house is sufficient to enable the charging order to be made absolute and realised at once, as in Llewellin v. Llewellin (unreported), even though that may result in the wife and children being housed at a lower standard than they might reasonably have expected had only the husband's interests been taken into account against them. Failing that, the court should make only such order as may be necessary to protect the wife's right to occupy (with the children where appropriate) the matrimonial home. The normal > course should then be to postpone the sale of the house for such period only as may be requisite to protect the right of occupation—a Mesher type of order—again bearing in mind that the court is holding the balance, not between the wife and the husband, but between the wife and the judgment creditor. If the judgment creditor asks, even in the alternative to his claim to an immediate order, for a Mesher type of order, then it seems to me that it would require exceptional circumstances before the court should make an order for the outright transfer of the husband's share in the house to the wife, thereby leaving nothing on which the judgment creditor's charging order can bite, even in the future. Finally, the court should consider whether there is any point in denying the judgment creditor his charging order, if the wife's rights of occupation could in any event be defeated by the judgment creditor making the husband bankrupt.

>
> 4. Once the charging order absolute has been made, it would normally require some special circumstances—e.g., where (as here) the wife had no proper opportunity to put her case before the court—for the court to set the charging order aside under section 3(5) of the Charging Orders Act 1979, and thereby deprive the judgment creditor of his vested right.

A creditor holding the benefit of a charging order cannot sell the charged property out of court. They must once again apply to the court to enforce the charging order by applying for an order for sale. Where the debtor's interest is an interest under a trust of land held in co-ownership with others, the creditor will need to apply for an order for sale under s 14 of the Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996, when the court will be guided by the criteria found in s 15 when deciding whether or not to order sale. This jurisdiction has already been considered in Chapter 18. In Close Invoice Finance Ltd v Pile[39] the court indicated that similar considerations will also influence their discretion to order sale where the debtor is the sole owner of the charged property.

There has been an alarming increase in the use of charging orders in recent years as unsecured creditors have become more aggressive in the recovery of their debts.[40] This increase has triggered proposals to curb their use in the recovery of smaller consumer debts.[41]

5 EQUITY OF REDEMPTION

We have seen that, under a classic mortgage by conveyance or sub-demise, the borrower holds the equity of redemption—an equitable property right that represents the value of the land less the amount owed to the lender under the mortgage. We now need to examine this influential concept and, in particular, its continuing place (if any) in the modern law, given that the classic mortgage has essentially been replaced by the device of the legal charge by way of mortgage.

[39] [2008] EWHC 1580, [2009] 1 FLR 873.

[40] See Capper, Conway and Glennon, 'From Obligation to Proprietary Interest: A Critique of the Charging Order System in England and Wales' in Modern Studies in Property Law Vol 6 (ed Bright, Oxford: Hart, 2011), ch 4.

[41] Ministry of Justice, Orders for Sale Consultation CP2/10 (February 2010).

5.1 DEVELOPMENT OF THE EQUITY OF REDEMPTION

The exact time at which the equity of redemption was first recognized is difficult to trace, but what is clear is that it emerged as an equitable response of the Chancery courts to the harsh terms of the common law mortgage by conveyance. The form of the mortgage by conveyance transferred the borrower's entire estate in the land to the lender, subject only to a covenant by the lender to reconvey the land to the borrower upon the borrower repaying the loan at the time and in the manner agreed. The agreement of the parties thus gave the borrower a contractual or legal right to redeem. If the borrower failed to repay as required, the lender was not obliged to perform the covenant to reconvey. The lender was instead entitled to retain the land as its legal owner, free from the covenant, and so the borrower lost (or forfeited) his or her land, even though it might be worth considerably more than the mortgage debt.

The common law rule was clear, but harsh, and from the seventeenth century, courts of equity were routinely coming to the aid of the borrower by allowing repayment after the legal date for redemption had passed and thus allowing the borrower to recover his or her land.[42] The means by which equity upheld the borrower's equitable right to redeem is not entirely clear. The possibilities, as Watt explains, were an award of specific performance of the lender's covenant to reconvey, or the grant of relief to the borrower against forfeiture.

Watt, 'Mortgage Law as Legal Fiction' in Modern Studies in Property Law: Vol 4 (ed Cooke, 2007, p 81)

The next challenge is to identify the doctrines by which it was developed, for this will determine whether it is realistic to remove the fiction. There are two main candidates for the doctrinal source of equity's refusal to follow the law in the mortgage context. On the one hand, there is the equity's doctrinal commitment to relieve against penalties and closely related to it, the equitable doctrine of relief from forfeiture. On the other hand, there is equity's willingness to issue injunctions (decrees) requiring specific performance of the mortgagee's covenant to reconvey the mortgage land to the mortgagor. The two bases are compatible but distinct. The former is concerned to set aside the conveyance to the mortgagee, whereas the latter is concerned to enforce the reconveyance to the mortgagor. Both bases were united in permitting the mortgagor to bring a bill to redeem even though it was considered at law to breach the mortgagor's covenant to grant the mortgagee quiet enjoyment of the estate conveyed.

This right became known as the 'equitable right to redeem', which would only be lost if the Chancery courts could be persuaded that there was little or no hope of the borrower being able to repay. In such a case, the lender would be granted a decree of foreclosure. The equitable right to redeem came to be recognized as no mere personal right, but a proprietary right, which could itself be sold or mortgaged, representing, as it did, the borrower's equitable 'ownership' of the land.[43] What is more, to retain the essential security nature of the classic 42 See Emmanuel College v Evans (1625) 1 Ch Rep 18. There is some earlier evidence, from the reign of Elizabeth I onwards, that Chancery would assist a borrower in certain circumstances, but it seems that assistance became routine from the early seventeenth century.

43 Casborne v Scarfe (1738) 1 Atk 603, 26 ER 377.

mortgage by conveyance, courts of equity were at pains to protect the borrower's equity of redemption. This aim was accomplished by the principle that there should be no 'clogs and fetters' on the equity of redemption. We will examine the continued significance of this principle in the next chapter.

In the face of the borrower's equitable right to redeem, the legal date for redemption lost its import. It is now regarded as a merely nominal date and is often set to occur shortly after the mortgage is entered into. It is the equitable right to redeem upon which borrowers rely to insist upon their right to repay their mortgage and to clear their property of its mortgaged status.

The evolution of the equity of redemption provides an interesting insight into the emergence of equitable doctrine, and the relationship between the courts of common law and equity. It emerged at a time when a number of influential Lord Chancellors were shaping the Chancery jurisdiction from an ad hoc jurisdiction based upon individual petitions, to a coherent body of fundamental rules and principles.[44] Inevitably, at times, this set Chancery at odds with the position at common law. This was certainly the case with the development of the equity of redemption: it amounted to a 'barefaced disavowal of the legal form'[45] of the mortgage by conveyance. But then the mortgage by conveyance was, itself, a mere form developed originally to overcome restrictions on charging interest imposed by the laws against usury. Thus it may well have been that the courts of common law were not wholly opposed to these developments, achieving as they did a degree of fairness to protect the vulnerable borrower. The emergence of the equity of redemption may also have been accommodated by judges, drawn largely from the nobility, to the threat presented by lenders to the forfeiture of their fellow noble landowners' estates.[46]

5.2 EQUITY OF REDEMPTION AND THE LEGAL CHARGE

The equity of redemption is a key component of the classic form of mortgage by conveyance. It thus retains its import in the equitable mortgage by conveyance (see section 4.3.2 above)—but what of the predominant form of legal mortgage: the legal charge?

Under a legal charge, the borrower retains his or her freehold or lease, but his or her land is encumbered (or burdened) by the legal charge.[47] We have already seen that, as a result of s 87(1) of the LPA 1925, the lender enjoys the rights powers and remedies of a mortgagee by sub-demise, although the section does not actually confer a lease upon the lender. The lender's interest in the borrower's land is merely that of a legal charge. The problem is that the section does not clarify the borrower's position.

McHugh J made this observation, giving judgment in the following case (referring to the Torrens system registered charge under the Australian State of Victoria's equivalent legislation).

[44] Including, in particular, Lords Bacon, Nottingham, and Hardwick.

[45] Watt, 'Mortgage Law as Legal Fiction' in Modern Studies in Property Law: Vol 4 (ed Cooke, 2007) p 80.

[46] Sugarman and Warrington, 'Telling Stories: Rights and Wrongs of the Equity of Redemption' in Property Problems: From Genes to Pension Funds (ed Harris, 1997), p 207.

[47] But see Horsham Properties Group Ltd v Clark [2008] EWHC 2327, [22], in which Briggs J said 'whilst it is true that the mortgagor of registered land remains the registered proprietor [...], it is wrong in substance to describe the rights of such a mortgagor as tantamount to freehold ownership'.

Figgins Holdings Pty Ltd v SEAA Enterprises Ltd
(1999) 196 CLR 245, High Court of Australia

McHugh J

At [65]

The great difficulty of the cases arises from the attempt by s81 [Transfer of Land Act 1958 (Vic)] to confer on the mortgagee the rights and remedies of a mortgage at common law when the nature of the Torrens system mortgage is fundamentally different from that of the common law mortgage. The difficulty is increased by the section's failure to define the liabilities of, and the consequences for, the mortgagor as a result of conferring these common law rights and remedies on the mortgagee.

Thus, for example, under a mortgage by conveyance or sub-demise, the lender has an immediate right to possession arising by virtue of the legal estate that is preserved by s 87(1). Under a classical mortgage by conveyance or sub-demise, the borrower's right to possession was cast as that of a mere tenant at will, occupying by the permission of the lender, but under a legal charge, the borrower retains the legal estate and thus equally has a right to possession by reason of that estate, subject only to the lender's ability to assert its own right to possession should it wish to do so.[48]

Likewise, whilst, under a classic mortgage by conveyance, the borrower needed to recover or redeem legal title to the land when the debt was repaid, under a legal charge, there is nothing to recover. There is a charge to remove, but the act of repayment extinguishes the charge. Once there is no debt, there can be no effective appropriation of property to its repayment to constitute the charge. The formality rules governing land do call for documentary evidence of the discharge of a legal charge, either through a deed or a written receipt,[49] which, in the case of a registered charge, will also have to be recorded at the Land Registry. These documents also provide convenient evidence that the debt has been repaid.

Nield has questioned the utility of the equity of redemption as a distinct proprietary interest in cases in which the lender has a legal charge.

Nield, 'Charges, Possession and Human Rights: A Reappraisal of Section 87(1) Law of Property Act 1925' in Modern Studies in Property Law: Vol 3 (ed Cooke, 2005, p 159)

Redemption in the sense of obtaining a reconveyance or cesser of the mortgaged estate is inconsistent with a legal charge for there is simply no transfer of the borrower's estate or the creation of demise by way of security. The borrower retains the legal estate, so there is neither any property of the borrower to redeem or recover from the lender nor any proviso for redemption from which relief can be granted. What is necessary is a continuing right to require the lender to accept repayment of the debt and effect a discharge, despite default in the borrower's repayment obligations. Thus whilst it is appropriate to speak of an equitable 48 Figgins Holdings Pty Ltd v SEAA Enterprises Ltd (1999) 196 CLR 245, High Court of Australia, at [82]–[83], [87]–[88].

49 See Law of Property Act 1925, ss 52 and 115.

> right to repay, or of discharge, it is questionable whether it is still accurate to refer to the borrower's equity of redemption in the sense of a distinct proprietary interest.
>
> If the borrower's continued right to repay the debt and obtain a discharge represents a separate equitable interest which does not merge with his legal estate, it is appropriate to speak of a distinct equity of redemption. However, if the continuing right of the borrower to obtain a discharge upon repayment, regardless of default, is characterised as an incident of the borrower's estate then the use of the term equity of redemption, as distinct from an equitable right of repayment, is strained. The borrower continues to hold the legal and beneficial ownership of the mortgaged land, subject only to the burden of the charge, thus it could be argued that there is no room or need for a separate proprietary interest in the form of an equity of redemption.

Watt goes further and suggests that it is time to kill off the equity of redemption.

Watt, 'Mortgage Law as Legal Fiction' in Modern Studies in Property Law: Vol 4 (ed Cooke, 2007, p 87)

> Parliament has killed off the mortgage by conveyance and reconveyance of a fee simple, yet the courts have so far failed to acknowledge that the notion of the equity of redemption should have died with it. They have failed to acknowledge that land subject to a registered charge is not 'redeemed' as was land conveyed under the classic form of mortgage rather the charge is simply discharged from the land upon repayment of the debt.

Killing the equity of redemption would breathe reality into the position of the parties under a legal charge and cement the legal charge as a pure security interest. It would also provide the opportunity to remove, or at least recast, a number of doctrines that were associated with redemption. These are the doctrines of consolidation, the entitlement of the lender to costs on redemption, and the clogs and fetters doctrine. We will examine this latter doctrine and its continued utility in the next chapter.

Consolidation entitles a lender holding two or more mortgages over different pieces of land owned by the borrower to insist upon the redemption of all of these mortgages, should the borrower seek to repay any one of them. Consolidation thus gives the lender an equitable right, developed in response to the borrower's equitable right to redeem. If the borrower was seeking the indulgence of equity to redeem after the legal date for redemption, he or she was required to meet certain conditions: namely, to pay the costs of redemption, and to redeem all mortgages granted to the lender, if the lender so required. Consolidation is controversial and s 93 of the LPA 1925 excludes the right unless it is expressly preserved, which lenders usually insist it is. The Law Commission has recommended the abolition of consolidation.[50] The Australian courts have taken that step, by rejecting the lender's rights to redemption costs and to consolidate on the grounds that it is inconsistent with the concept of a charge.[51]

50 Law Commission Report No 204 (1991), [6.44].
51 Greig v Watson (1881) 7 VR 79; Perry v Rolfe [1848] VLR 297.

6 MODERN DEVELOPMENTS IN MORTGAGE FORMS

Changing social and economic trends means that there is always pressure to develop alternative means of unlocking the security potential of land. The domestic lending market has seen the development of Islamic mortgages, the emergence of shared-ownership schemes to assist low-income borrowers—particularly first-time buyers—mount the first step of the home-ownership ladder, and equity release schemes to enable the elderly to use the investment value of their home to fund their living expenses. Further, the onward march of the European single market has seen proposals to developing a European form of mortgage, or Eurohypothec.

6.1 ISLAMIC MORTGAGES OR HOME PURCHASE PLANS

Islam prohibits the charging of interest (riba).[52] Making a profit from trade is permitted, but the charging of interest is unacceptable, because it reduces the risk that is inherent in trade. Traders share the risk that market movements (whether up or down) may adversely affect them, but the charging of interest cushions only the lender against the risk that the borrower is unable to repay the loan.[53] The charging of interest, which is an inherent part of conventional mortgage lending, thus presents a problem to followers of Islam, particularly those who wish to purchase their own home. A number of financial institutions have thus developed mortgage products that are thought to comply with Islamic principles.[54]

There are three main products available to assist with the purchase of a house, as follows:

- The murabaha utilizes the concept of deferred purchase. The bank purchases the property from the seller, but then agrees to sell on to the borrower at a price that reflects the original price plus an agreed profit. The purchase price is then paid by the borrower by periodic payments over a fixed period of time. Title is usually transferred to the borrower immediately, with the outstanding purchase price being secured by a mortgage.
- The ijarah is based upon a lease. The lender purchases the property that the borrower wishes to buy and then leases it to the borrower for a fixed period. The lease is coupled with an agreement by the lender to sell the property to the borrower at the end of the term.[55] The rent is periodically assessed to reflect the capital value of the property, prevailing market rentals, and a contribution to the final resale price (being the original sale price minus the deposit already paid). Thus, at the end of the term, the borrower will have paid the lender the full purchase costs plus a return to the lender, by making the rental payments.
- The diminishing musharakah involves shared ownership. Again, the lender purchases the property and leases it to the borrower—but part of the monthly payment made by the borrower goes toward increasing his or her ownership share in the property, so that the rental element of the periodic payment diminishes as the borrower's ownership share increases.

52 The Qur'an, [30.39], [4.161], [3.130]–[3.132], and [2.275]–[2.281].
53 See further Watt (2007), p 94.
54 See Latif, 'Islamic Finance' (2006) 1 JIBFL 10.
55 Technically, this is known as ijarah wa iqtinah.

All of these methods utilize different vehicles, but, like a conventional mortgage, the borrower makes periodic payments to the lender to reflect repayment of the original capital cost, together with a financial return to the lender. There is continuing debate amongst Islamic scholars as to whether these schemes do, indeed, comply with Islamic principles, the payments being made by the borrower reflecting profit to the lender, rather than a genuine sharing of commercial risk. The diminishing musharakah is seen as the most in tune with sharia law.

6.2 LOW COST HOME OWNERSHIP

Property prices in many parts of the country are now so high that many cannot afford to buy a home, even with the aid of a mortgage, and the credit crunch has reduced the availability of mortgage finance. One response of the government has been to develop schemes to help those with insufficient income to fund a purchase from their own resources and mortgage from a private sector lender. A myriad of different schemes are clustered around two legal models. First, in shared ownership or 'part-buy, part-rent' schemes a buyer purchases a share in a property—usually from a housing association—using mortgage finance and pays rent on the unpurchased share. Here, therefore, the mortgage is combined with rent and the purchaser is granted a 'shared ownership lease'. Secondly, in shared equity schemes a government-backed loan, combined with a loan from a house builder, is used to provide top-up finance to enable the purchase of a home. The top-up loans are secured as second charges on the property. Typically, the purchaser will pay no interest on the second charges for an initial number of years and will pay a low rate of interest thereafter. However, the amount repayable to discharge the loans is not necessarily based on repayment of the capital sum plus interest as is the case with commercial finance. Instead, the purchaser repays the loan as a proportionate percentage of the value of the property. Hence, for example a 25 per cent shared equity loan is repaid at 25 per cent of the value of the property at the time the debt is discharged. Under both models, as the buyer's financial situation permits he or she can increase his or her share of ownership until he or she fully owns the property—a process known as 'staircasing'.

Assistance is also provided to local authority and housing association tenants to purchase their home at a discounted price, through a Right to Buy/Acquire,[56] Although the Right to Buy appeared to have run its course, the Government has recently announced plans to reinvigorate the scheme.[57]

6.3 EQUITY RELEASE OR HOME REVERSION PLANS

As homeowners get on in years, they may find that they own a valuable home (having paid off their mortgage), but that they have little income. They could, of course, move and buy a less valuable home, invest the balance, and live off that investment income. But if they do not want to move, they may consider using the value of their home through an 'equity release', or 'home reversion', plan, to provide either a lump sum or a regular income (or both). These plans can take a number of forms, but the key features are that the homeowner 56 See Housing Act 2004, Pt 6.

57 HM Government, Laying the Foundations: A Housing Strategy for England (2011).

grants either a mortgage or a share of the ownership of his or her home to the lender, in return for regular periodic payments or a lump sum, which can be invested in an annuity or other investment vehicle to provide a regular income.

6.3.1 Lifetime mortgage

The idea of a lifetime mortgage is that it is not repayable until the borrower dies. Some schemes also provide that the lender will share in any increase in value of the home. There are various ways in which interest can be paid under these schemes. It may be paid on the usual interest-only basis, but, if the borrower is already short of income and cannot meet regular interest payments, the interest may be 'rolled up' and added to the capital secured by the mortgage. In that case, the interest is only repayable when the borrower dies or sells his or her home. Alternatively, an annuity may be purchased with the advance and part of the income from the annuity used to meet the interest due.

6.3.2 Home reversion plans

Under a home reversion plan, the borrower sells all of, or a share in, the house to a specialist company, which thus benefits from any further increase in the value of the home. Where the whole house is sold, it is leased back to the borrower—usually only for a nominal rent—for a term that may be brought to an end when the borrower dies. The sale price for the house is less than its market value with vacant possession, to reflect the fact that the borrower remains in occupation.

These plans have proved controversial. They are often quite complicated in their terms, with technicalities that it can be challenging for an elderly borrower to understand. They also play on the desire of the borrower to stay in his or her own home.

6.4 THE EUROHYPOTHEC

The idea of developing a common form of mortgage for Europe was first mooted by the European Commission over forty years ago.[58] This idea has moved a little nearer reality, with the European Commission Green Paper on Mortgage Credit in the European Union,[59] which reports that serious consideration is being given to 'the feasibility and desirability' of a Euromortgage. In response, a European Union research group has put forward proposals for a European mortgage, or Eurohypothec.[60] Their proposal is not to replace the numerous security devices used in the member States, but to provide an alternative common form, to be governed by the laws of the country in which the land is situated, and which can operate alongside national forms. It will thus be vital that the national laws of the member States are able to accommodate the proposed Eurohypothec.

The form of proposed Eurohypothec is intended to be very flexible. The proposal is for a non-accessory form of charge, which, although it would secure repayment of a debt, 58 European Commission, The Development of a European Capital Market (1966) [153]–[158].

59 (2005) [48].

60 See http://www.eurohypothec.com and Mortgage Credit Foundation, Mortgage Bulletin 21: Basic Guidelines for a Eurohypothec (2005); Nassarre-Aznar, 'The Eurohypothec: A Common Mortgage for Europe' (2005) 69 Conv 32; Watt, 'The Eurohypothec and the English Mortgage' (2006) 13(2) MJECL 173.

may exist independently of that debt.[61] It is envisaged that the Eurohypothec would be registered in a public registry by an entry that would show (amongst other details) the amount of money secured. Even though the borrower can repay the loan and insist upon the Eurohypothec being discharged from the land, it will remain registered until the entry is removed with the consent of both the borrower and the lender. The benefit of a registered Eurohypothec can thus be transferred to another lender. The gap between the loan and the Eurohypothec would be bridged by a security agreement, governed also by the law of the member State in which the land is situated. The security agreement would form a contract between the lender and borrower, and would provide for such matters as the terms upon which the Eurohypothec is held and enforced. If the benefit of a Eurohypothec were to be transferred to another lender, there would need to be a new security agreement to govern the relationship between the borrower and the new lender. A failure to enter into a new security agreement would entitle the borrower to insist upon the discharge of the Eurohypothec.

All existing forms of security in England are accessory to a debt. Once the debt is repaid, the borrower can insist that the security interest over his or her land is extinguished. We will see in the next chapter that equity has carefully guarded the borrower's right of redemption; thus the notion that a security interest may continue to affect the borrower's land even though the debt has been repaid presents somewhat of a problem for English law.[62]

There are other points of tension between the proposed Eurohypothec and English law.[63] For example, it is proposed that the borrower may hold the benefit of a Eurohypothec over his or her own land, but English law has always refused to accept such a proposition, because of the corollary impossibility of owing a duty to oneself. Furthermore, the priority provided by the LRA 2002 for overriding interests does not accord with the priority that is envisaged for a registered Eurohypothec. Even if these doctrinal issues could be overcome, the most significant stumbling block, both for English law and for the law of other member States, is likely to be compatibility of enforcement of the Eurohypothec with existing consumer protection—particularly over domestic property.[64]

Whether or not these issues can be overcome across all of the member States will hinge upon whether the economic advantages of a Eurohypothec are sufficiently attractive. The impetus for a Euromortgage comes from a belief that a common mortgage form would promote an integrated mortgage credit market across the European Union, enabling lenders to secure a number of loans, which could be made in different member States, against land assets that are held in more than one jurisdiction. Such developments may be very attractive to large institutional lenders and to investors in mortgaged-backed securities, but they do not provide immediate advantages to many borrowers—particularly consumers—unless the benefit to lenders is passed on through the greater competition and flexibility that an integrated market is expected to produce.[65]

61 Mortgage Credit Foundation (2005).

62 Although Watt argues that this obstacle can be overcome: see 'The Eurohypothec and the English Mortgage' (2006) 13 MJECL 173, 185–8.

63 Ibid, at 188–91.

64 Ibid, at 191–2. We will explore this protection in the next chapter.

65 Ibid, at 179–81.

QUESTIONS

1. What is the difference between a 'mortgage' and a 'charge'? Why is the legal charge by way of mortgage described as a hybrid security?
2. In what circumstances may an equitable form of security interest be created?
3. What advantages would there be if the Law Commission's recommended changes to the form of land mortgages were enacted?
4. Do you agree that the concept of an equity of redemption has outlived its usefulness?

FURTHER READING

Clarke, 'Security Interests in Property' in Property Problems: From Genes to Pension Funds (ed Harris, London: Kluwer, 1997)

Law Commission Report No 204, Land Mortgages (1991)

Nield, 'Charges, Possession and Human Rights: A Reappraisal of Section 87(1) Law of Property Act 1925' in Modern Studies in Property Law: Vol 3 (ed Cooke, Oxford: Hart, 2005)

Oldham, 'Mortgages' in Land Law: Issues, Debates, Policy (ed Tee, Devon: Willan, 2002)

Sugarman and Warrington, 'Telling Stories: Rights and Wrongs of the Equity of Redemption' in Property Problems: From Genes to Pension Funds (ed Harris, London: Kluwer, 1997)

Watt, 'Mortgage Law as a Legal Fiction' in Modern Studies in Property Law: Vol 3 (ed Cooke, Oxford: Hart, 2007)

Watt, 'The Eurohypothec and the English Mortgage' (2006) 13(2) MJECL 173

29

PROTECTION OF THE BORROWER

CENTRAL ISSUES

1. Protection of borrowers operates through a number of mechanisms. Regulation of the credit market seeks to ensure that lenders treat borrowers fairly. In addition, direct duties operate to try and protect borrowers against unfairness in the creation and operation of the mortgage transaction and substantive unfairness of the mortgage terms. The level of protection differs according to the nature of the borrower and the type of security transaction.
2. The home mortgage market is regulated through the Financial Services and Markets Act 2000 and the Consumer Credit Act 1974, following principles of decentred regulation to encourage responsible lending and responsible borrowing.
3. A mortgage may be set aside because of procedural unfairness. There are a number of doctrines that underpin procedural fairness, including duress, undue influence, misrepresentation, and unconscionable bargain. In recent years, undue influence has been employed to try to ensure the procedural fairness of collateral mortgages over the family home to fund a business loan.
4. The control of mortgage terms seeks to balance the freedom of the parties to contract against a concern that borrowers' financial situation makes them vulnerable to exploitation.
5. Equitable protection has been provided by controls against penalties, and oppressive and unconscionable terms, as well as by protection of the borrower's equity of redemption.
6. Statutory consumer protection now provides additional protection to domestic borrowers.

1 INTRODUCTION

In this chapter, we will be concentrating on the position of the borrower, who is often considered to be the more vulnerable party. In modern commercial lending, that is not always the case where the borrower is a profitable company, the liquidity of which is maintained with the assistance of an overdraft facility from its bankers, or which requires finance to fund the expansion of its flourishing business. Such companies can not only source the most competitive terms from financiers, but can also afford the services of lawyers and other advisers to ensure that their position is protected. Other companies may not be so fortunate if they are small and struggling to start a business, or to maintain profitability in a competitive marketplace. They may have few assets to offer as security and may be only able to secure finance if their directors or shareholders are prepared to offer their personal assets as security, or are willing to expose themselves to personal liability through the grant of a personal guarantee.

In the domestic lending market, a distinction needs to be drawn between those who wish to use their earning power to buy a home, and the individual who is in financial difficulties and needs to raise money or consolidate his or her immediate liabilities. The former will be able to choose from a number of mainstream banks and building societies, which are prepared to offer competitive terms because the risk of default is low. The borrower's earnings will meet the instalment repayments and the loan, in any event, will be secured against a property. This type of borrower is only likely to be exposed either from an unanticipated rise in interest rates, or from an unforeseen decline in his or her earnings or the housing market. It is the borrower who is in urgent need of funds that is the most vulnerable. He or she is unlikely to be attractive to high street lenders and will have to resort to the secondary mortgage lenders, which charge higher rates of interest and demand more onerous terms to meet the higher risk that is inherent in this type of lending. These borrowers are also unlikely to have the luxury of choice or to have the strength of bargaining position to negotiate terms.

This diversity in types of borrower and the circumstances in which they require funds leads to a need to draw distinctions in the appropriate controls. Whitehouse has noted that mortgage law itself has changed little over the decades but has managed to accommodate changes in the socio-economic context in which it operates by looking to other methods of control.

Whitehouse, 'A Longitudinal Analysis of the Mortgage Repossession Process 1995-2010: Stability, Regulation and Reform' in Modern Studies in Property Law Vol 6 (ed Bright, 2011, p 151)

> The English law of mortgage is remarkable [. . .] Its stubborn retention of archaic terms and concepts operate in sharp contrast to the ever changing world of finance which it inhabits. Most impressive of all, however, is its capacity for stability in the face of fundamental shifts in the socio-economic context, to put the legal device of the mortgage to new uses without the need to alter its fundamental doctrinal characteristics. The stability apparent within the law of mortgage [. . .] derives from a concern to establish requirements as to formality and procedure, leaving much of substance of the mortgage relationship to be 'regulated' through more malleable processes such as contractual 'negotiation', 'discretion' and 'soft law.'

The measures that we will need to examine in this chapter fall into a number of categories. We will first consider the legal regulation of the consumer lending market, which has grown considerably in recent years with the Consumer Credit Act 1974 (CCA 1974), which was subject to major amendment in 2006, and the Financial Services and Markets Act 2000 (FSMA 2000). We will then consider the protection afforded to the borrower in the creation of the mortgage. We will briefly consider the common vitiating factors that may lead to the avoidance of a mortgage, before examining the application of undue influence to collateral mortgages of the family home to secure a business loan. Finally, controls over the terms of the mortgage itself must be considered. We will look initially at the common law, equitable, and statutory sources of these controls. Here, equity has long shown a concern to ensure that the mortgage is redeemable by the borrower and that the mortgage terms themselves are not oppressive or unconscionable. Control over mortgage terms and the mortgage relationship may also be exerted as a result of regulatory and statutory measures, although this intervention is largely confined to the consumer lending.

We will leave until the following chapter the protection afforded to a borrower where the lender enforces its rights and remedies under the mortgage itself.

2 MARKET REGULATION

Recent decades have seen significant changes in the domestic mortgage market and its regulation. Building societies, once the predominate source of home finance, were deregulated during the 1990s triggering a wave of building society demutualizations and mergers. In this process larger building societies converted to become banks. Other high street banks and lenders also entered into the lucrative home mortgage market. This increased competition saw a dramatic rise in the availability of credit to fund home ownership and other consumer expenditure, which suffered an equally dramatic decline with the global credit crunch of 2007/2008—one of the causes of which was the expansion of credit through irresponsible lending. Lending and borrowing levels are yet to recover in the face of slow domestic growth and the threat of recession.

In the context of the promotion of private home ownership, Whitehouse has noted the rise in regulation of mortgages through market forces.

Whitehouse, 'The Homeowner: Citizen or Consumer?' in Land Law: Themes and Perspectives (eds Bright and Dewar, 1998, p 189)

> [. . .] [T]he promotion of home-ownership has allowed central government to replace direct state intervention with the regulation offered by the market system. The private contractual basis of mortgage finance makes it eminently suitable for regulation by the market. Because of the varied types of accommodation available within the owner-occupied sector and the wide range of mortgagees willing to offer different types of mortgage products, the state could reduce its intervention within the housing system and allow market forces to regulate the activities of mortgagors and mortgagees.
>
> The justification for the reduction in direct state intervention within the housing system is based upon an 'idealistic' view of consumerism which extols the benefits of market forces as the guardians of choice, competition, and accountability. The shift in emphasis away from citizenship and towards consumerism may seem uncontroversial, particular as the term consumer is often combined with concepts of 'rights', 'protection', and 'legislation'. The rhetoric of consumerism implies that, where the market fails to provide a sufficient degree of choice and accountability, the state will intervene, on the consumer's behalf, by implementing legislation which corrects the failings in the market. The 'protection' afforded to homeowners, therefore is claimed to derive from a combination of market regulation and direct legal intervention [. . .]
>
> Choice is a fundamental aspect of the 'idealistic' view of market regulation promoted by the rhetoric of consumerism, if consumers can exercise choice, then they can also determine which suppliers survive within the market. This provides consumers with a degree of influence which ensures that suppliers of goods and services operate according to the demands of consumers. In order for there to be choice, however, there must be a range of goods and services offered by different suppliers. In other words, competition is essential to the effective operation of a free market. In order to ensure competition, the former Conservative government sought to 'deregulate' the mortgage market, thereby encouraging financial institutions other than building societies to offer mortgage finance.

At the time that Whitehouse was writing, the market was largely self-regulated. The Council of Mortgage Lenders, the influential trade organization of lending institutions within the residential mortgage market, had a Statement of Practice to which its members were expected to adhere. The government did intervene through the CCA 1974, but only where the loan did not exceed £25,000—a limit that became increasingly irrelevant as property prices increased. The picture has now changed, with what has been termed a 'decentred regulatory approach' of the mortgage market, through the enactment of the FSMA 2000 and major revisions to the 1974 Act.[1]

Decentred regulation is founded upon premise of rational and self-interested players. For instance, it is assumed that in credit markets lenders will make responsible lending decisions that minimize the risk of bad debts and that borrowers will choose credit terms best suited to their needs. Regulation of the credit market seeks to promote this rational decision making by creating market conditions in which borrowers receive standardized information upon which to base responsible borrowing choices and lenders are expected to adhere to benchmarks of good practice including an expectation that they will make responsible lending decisions to minimize the risk of default.

Ramsay, 'Consumer Law, Regulatory Capitalism and the "New Learning" in Regulation' (2006) 28 Sydney LR 9, 12–13

A decentred regulatory approach might include initiatives that aim to 'responsibilise' both the supply and demand side of consumer markets, such as the current reforms to consumer credit law in the UK and Europe that are based on the twin pillars of 'responsible lending' and 'responsible borrowing'. Corporate social responsibility normally may contribute to the responsibilisation of suppliers. Responsibilisation of consumers seeks to reconstruct the consumer as a regulatory subject, a project that is both innovative and complicated. Within the traditional market model, consumer sovereignty was the goal of consumer policy. However, there was little concern for how consumers exercised their sovereignty. By contrast, the new learning on regulation positions the consumer as an important regulatory subject perceived as crucial to achieving national goals such as greater competitiveness. The 'responsibilisation' of the consumer is being pursued in areas such as credit and financial services, where governments are investing heavily in such projects to ensure that individuals become responsible consumers through the use of information, the development of financial capability, and financial literacy programs. These programs often make heroic assumptions about the ability of consumers to use and process information on market choices and their ultimate results remain uncertain and difficult to measure.

[1] There is a considerable literature on the role and impact of this new approach to regulation: see Black, 'Decentring Regulation: Understanding the Role of Regulation and Self-regulation in the "Post-Regulatory" World' (2001) 54 CLP 103; Black, 'Tensions in The Regulatory State' (2007) PL 58; Baldwin, 'Is Better Regulation Smarter Regulation?' (2005) PL 485.

The twin goals of responsible lending and responsible borrowing are evident in both the CCA 1974 and FSMA 2000, the salient provisions of which we examine below. Whilst based upon similar regulatory principles, these two pieces of legislation do mark a division in the regulation of the domestic mortgage market. To some extent, this division can be attributed to different areas of the consumer mortgage market. Even so, it has attracted criticism for resulting in consumer confusion, differing levels of borrower protection and unnecessary additional compliance costs for lenders.[2] There are proposals to realign this regulatory divide to bring all consumer credit under one regulatory body.[3] Other proposals have recommended that at least credit secured by a mortgage should be supervised by a single regulator operating a regime following the FSMA 2000 model.[4]These proposals flow from frenetic government and regulatory activity to stabilize credit markets after the debacle of the credit crunch, which was blamed largely upon the ineffective regulation of the financial markets including the banks and other domestic lenders.[5]

Before we look in more detail at the CCA 1974 and the FSMA 2000, we need to say a word about the European dimension. We saw in the previous chapter European proposals for a European wide form of mortgage. There have also been developments in the regulation of credit in the European single market. The European Directive on Consumer Credit was adopted in April 2008 to promote the integration of consumer credit and provide for common levels of consumer protection.[6] The Directive has been incorporated into domestic law with effect from the beginning of February 2011; however, it does not extend to secured credit over land. [7]In relation to security interests over land the European Commission in March 2011 made recommendations for a Mortgage Credit Directive,[8] which proposes to extend the need for standard information disclosure, adequate explanations to borrowers and measures to enhance responsible lending to all residential mortgages within the European Union. As we will see, these consumer protection principles are already evident in the domestic regulation of mortgage credit, although their detailed implementation would inevitably be effected should the Directive be enacted.

2.1 FINANCIAL SERVICES AND MARKETS ACT 2000, AND REGULATED MORTGAGE CONTRACTS

The FSMA 2000 established the Financial Services Authority (FSA) as the single regulatory authority for the banking, credit securities, and insurance industry. With effect from 31 October 2004, the FSA took over responsibility for regulated mortgage contracts, and from 6 April 2007, the FSA become responsible for home purchase plans[9] and home reversion plans.[10] The regulation of sale and leaseback transaction also became the responsibility of [2] Oldham, 'Mortgages' in Land Law: Issues, Debates, Policy (ed Tee, 2002) p 207 and Nield, 'Responsible Lending and Borrowing: Whereto Low Cost Homeownership' (2010) 30 LS 610.

[3] Current Government proposals are for the creation of a new Consumer Protection and Markets Authority; see HM Treasury, A new approach to financial regulation: judgment, focus and stability (July 2010) and HM Treasury and Department for Business Innovation & Skill, A Consultation on Reforming the Consumer Credit Regime (December 2010).

[4] See HM Treasury, A Consultation on Mortgage Regulation (December 2009).

[5] See for instance FSA, The Turner Review (March 2009).

[6] Directive 2008/48/EC.

[7] The Consumer Credit (EU Directive) Regulations 2010 SI 2010/1010 as amended by SI 2010/1969.

[8] IP/11/383.

[9] That is, Islamic mortgages: see Chapter 28, section 6.1.

[10] That is, equity release schemes: see Chapter 28, section 6.3.

the FSA in 2009. FSA supervision extends both to mortgage lenders and mortgage brokers who provide advice and arrange mortgages.

2.1.1 Regulated mortgage contracts

Regulated mortgage contracts are defined by the Financial Services and Markets Act 2000 (Regulated Activities) Order 2001.[11]

Financial Services and Markets Act 2000 (Regulated Activities) Order 2001, art 61 (as amended)

[. . .]

(a) a contract is a "regulated mortgage contract" if, at the time it is entered into, the following conditions are met—

 (i) the contract is one under which a person ("the lender") provides credit to an individual or to trustees ("the borrower");

 (ii) the contract provides for the obligation of the borrower to repay to be secured by a first legal mortgage on land (other than timeshare accommodation) in the United Kingdom;

 (iii) at least 40% of that land is used, or is intended to be used, as or in connection with a dwelling by the borrower or (in the case of credit provided to trustees) by an individual who is a beneficiary of the trust, or by a related person;

[. . .]

The FSA's remit thus covers most home purchase loans that are secured by a first legal charge over the borrower's home.[12] It will also cover first legal mortgages of second homes and may also extend to loans made to small businesses, where the loan is secured by a first charge over the business proprietor's home.[13] Buy-to-let mortgages are not within the definition; they fail to satisfy para (a)(iii). The reference to land held on trust and occupied by beneficiaries reflects the co-ownership and successive ownership structures that we considered in Chapters 16 and 20.

2.1.2 The Financial Services and Markets Act 2000 regulatory framework

One of the FSA's statutory objectives is 'the protection of consumers'.[14] In pursuing that objective, the FSA's role reflects decentred regulation. The aspiration is that borrowers will be 'treated fairly' by requiring lenders to follow published standards of practice, which (inter alia) oblige lenders to make responsible lending decisions and to provide borrowers with accurate information, in the hope that borrowers are better placed to make responsible borrowing decisions.

The means by which the FSA is to achieve that objective is, firstly, by controlling those who can conduct regulated mortgage business (known as prudential control), and, secondly, 11 SI 2001/544.

12 Equitable mortgages are not regulated under the Financial Services and Markets Act 2000: see Oldham, 'Mortgages' in Land Law: Issues, Debates, Policy (ed Tee, 2002) p 191.

13 The business gross annual turnover must not exceed £1m.

14 Financial Services and Markets Act 2000, s 2(2)(c).

by influencing the way in which mortgage business is conducted by requiring compliance, through a range of disciplinary and enforcement powers, with published statements of principles exemplified through supporting codes of conduct and detailed rules (known as conduct of business control).

A financial institution may not carry out regulated mortgage business unless it is authorized by the FSA, or is specifically exempt.[15] If it does so, it is guilty of a criminal offence[16] and the transaction itself is unenforceable, except to the extent that the court is satisfied that it is just and equitable to order enforcement.[17]

Any permission to carry out regulated mortgage business is subject to the statements of principle, codes of practice,[18] and rules that the FSA may make.[19] The statements, codes, and rules represent a three-tier strata of regulatory guidance. The statements of principle set out the overarching ethos governing the conduct of regulated mortgage business; the codes of practice provide examples of the types of activity that, on the one hand, comply with and, on the other, breach the relevant principles; but it is the rules that set out the detailed regulations that govern the conduct of mortgage business itself. The interrelationship between the principles and the rules was described in R. (on the application of British Bankers Association) v FSA[20] in the following terms:

Ouseley J

At 162

The Principles are best understood as the ever present substrata to which the specific rules are added. The Principles always have to be complied with. The specific rules do not supplant them and cannot be used to contradict them. They are but specific applications of them to the particular requirements they cover. The general notion that the specific rules can exhaust the application of the Principles is inappropriate. It cannot be an error of law for the Principles to augment specific rules.

In preparing the principles, codes, and rules, the FSA is required to consult with both the mortgage industry (e.g. the Council of Mortgage Lenders) and with bodies representing the interests of borrowers (e.g. the National Consumer Council).[21] The principles,[22] codes, and rules[23] are contained in the FSA Handbook.

The FSA may take disciplinary action for a breach of a statement of principle, a code of conduct, or a breach of the rules.[24] In addition, although the enforceability of the transaction [15] Ibid, s 19. The FSA may also prohibit an employee or agent, who carries out regulated mortgage business on behalf of an authorized person, from so acting where that individual is not a 'fit or proper' person: see ibid, s 56. Acting in breach of a prohibition does not affect the enforceability of the transaction (s 20(1)), but is a criminal offence (s 56(4)), and a breach of statutory duty (s 71).

[16] Ibid, s 23.

[17] See ibid, ss 26 and 28. For example, Helden v Strathmore Ltd [2011] EWCA Civ 542.

[18] Ibid, s 64. [19] Ibid, s 138. [20] [2011] EWHC 999. [21] Ibid, ss 8–10.

[22] See FSA Handbook, Principles for Business (PRIN), available online at http://fsahandbook.info/FSA/html/handbook/PRIN; FSA Handbook, The Statement of Principles for Approved Persons (APER 2), available online at http://fsahandbook.info/FSA/html/handbook/APER/2.

[23] FSA Handbook, Code of Practice for Approved Persons: General (APER 3), available online at http://fsahandbook.info/FSA/html/handbook/APER/3.

[24] Financial Services and Markets Act 2000, ss 64(8) and 66. The FSA has taken enforcement action against several lenders for irresponsible lending and unfair treatment of customers in arrears see Kensington Mortgage Co Ltd (Final Notice: 12 April, 2010), J Cummings (Final Notice: 20 October, 2010) and DB UK Bank Ltd (Final Notice: 15 December, 2010).

is unaffected, a borrower may take direct action for a breach of statutory duty where his or her lender has breached the rules but there is no individual course of action for breach of a statement of principle or a code of conduct.[25]

2.1.3 Mortgage and home finance: the Mortgage Conduct of Business Sourcebook (MCOB)

The rules regulating mortgage business are set out in that part of the Handbook entitled the Mortgage Conduct of Business Sourcebook (MCOB).[26] The MCOB regime adopts a 'cradle to grave' approach, which governs the whole course of the borrower's relationship with his or her lender. There are rules governing the marketing of mortgage products[27] and the provision of information through all stages from the first visit of a potential borrower to a mortgage provider, through to the pre-application illustration of the available loan terms[28] and the mortgage offer itself,[29] with continuing requirements for information to be provided on the actual grant of the loan and periodically during the course of the mortgage term.[30] Further rules call upon the lender to lend responsibly in the light of a prospective borrower's ability to pay.[31] If the borrower should fall into arrears, there are rules that regulate how the mortgage provider should respond, which we will consider in the next chapter.[32] The rules are intended to meet the overarching statement of principles that call upon lenders 'to pay due regard to the interests of its customers and treat them fairly',[33] 'to pay due regard to the information needs of its clients, and communicate information to them in a way which is clear, fair and not misleading',[34] and to 'take reasonable care to ensure the suitability of its advice and discretionary decisions for any customer who is entitled to rely upon its judgment'.[35]

The twin principles of responsible lending and responsible borrowing are enshrined within a lender's duty to provide information to the borrower in an intelligible and prescribed form, which is intended to enable borrowers to compare different mortgage products and make informed choices about which particular mortgage terms will best suit their circumstances. Perhaps the most significant piece of information is the pre-application illustration, known as the 'Key Facts illustration', which must be updated when the mortgage offer is made. This illustration must be in the prescribed form, to facilitate comparison between different mortgage products, which includes details of (inter alia) the type of mortgage, the overall

[25] Ibid, s 150. See, for example, cases against investment advisers who are also regulated by the FSA—Zaki v Credit Suisse (UK) Ltd [2011] EWHC 2422, Rubenstein v HSBC Bank Plc [2011] EWHC 2304 and Bank Leumi (UK) Plc v Wachner [2011] EWHC 656.

[26] FSA Handbook, Mortgages and Home Finance: Conduct of Business Sourcebook (MCOB), available online at http://fsahandbook.info/FSA/html/handbook/MCOB.

[27] FSA Handbook, Financial Promotion of Qualifying Credit and of Home Reversion Plans (MCOB 3), available online at http://fsahandbook.info/FSA/html/handbook/MCOB/3.

[28] FSA Handbook, Pre-application Disclosure (MCOB 5), available online at http://fsahandbook.info/FSA/html/handbook/MCOB/5.

[29] FSA Handbook, Disclosure at the Offer Stage (MCOB 6), available online at http://fsahandbook.info/FSA/html/handbook/MCOB/6.

[30] FSA Handbook, Disclosure at Start of Contract and After Sale (MCOB 7), available online at http://fsahandbook.info/FSA/html/handbook/MCOB/7.

[31] FSA Handbook, Responsible Lending, and Responsible Financing of Home Purchase Plans (MCOB 11), available online at http://fsahandbook.info/FSA/html/handbook/MCOB/11.

[32] FSA Handbook, Arrears and Repossessions: Regulated Mortgage Contracts and Home Purchase Plans (MCOB 13), available online at http://fsahandbook.info/FSA/html/handbook/MCOB/13.

[33] Principle 6. [34] Principle 7. [35] Principle 9.

cost of the mortgage, the monthly repayments, any arrangement fee, and any charges made for early repayment.[36]

Further rules detail how the annual percentage rate (APR) of interest is to be calculated,[37] and provide that a borrower must be given time to consider the Key Facts illustration and the mortgage offer.[38] The rules also stipulate that any charges imposed—for example, rates of interest or in the event of default or early repayment—must not be excessive.[39] This need for clear and consistent information is laudable but the experience of the credit crunch has demonstrated its deficiencies in protecting borrowers.

Nield, 'Responsible Lending and Borrowing: whereto low cost home ownership?'
(2010) 30 LS 610 (footnotes omitted)

> Under the FSMA, the pre-application key facts illustration [. . .] has been described by the FSA as the 'cornerstone' of mortgage regulation. However, even before the credit crunch, there was evidence from both the FSA and Citizens Advice that suggested weakness in disclosure. Their research found that certain mortgagors, particularly within the sub-prime market, did not compare different mortgage products or even understand some of the fundamental features of mortgage borrowing and thus could not play their part as a rational consumer [. . .]
>
> There is growing recognition that a mortgagor's decision to borrow may not be made on solely rational grounds but is a more complex process that is also influenced by factors that have inspired the development of behavioural economics. For instance, individuals can tend to be over optimistic and even when warned, for instance, that they may lose their house if they do not keep up their mortgage payments, do not believe that they will default and face repossession. Individuals' assessment of risk also may not be rational, with dramatic events which attract high media attention being overestimated as more likely to happen as against less vivid risks that excite only muted attention. Hyberbolic discounting suggests that a mortgagor's ability to value discounted mortgage rates, arrangements fees, pre-payment penalties and the like may not be rationally consistent over the time frames in which these charges operate [. . .]
>
> The FSA Review notes that mortgagors' (as opposed to other consumers') decisions are subject to particular behaviours which can reduce mortgagors' caution and entice them into borrowing decisions which are not best suited to their interests. Mortgages can appear deceptively cheap products. Considerable sums are received for relatively small periodic repayments which, being repaid over an extended term, contribute to the apparent affordability of the borrowing.
>
> Mortgagors are motivated to borrow by immediate want or need which will lead them to focus on the end result. In contrast to other financial products, the mortgage (like other credit) is not always seen as the product being bought and sold but as a means to an end. The focus is then on the asset purchased. In relation to first legal charges, this will often be [36] FSA Handbook (MCOB 5).

[37] FSA Handbook, Annual Percentage Rate (MCOB 10), available online at http://fsahandbook.info/FSA/html/handbook/MCOB/10.

[38] FSA Handbook, '2.4 High pressure sales: regulated mortgage contracts and home reversion plans', Conduct of Business Standards: General (MCOB 2), available online at http://fsahandbook.info/FSA/html/handbook/MCOB/2/4.

[39] FSA Handbook, Arrear and Repossessions: Regulated Mortgage Contracts and Home Purchase Plans (MCOB 12), available online at http://fsahandbook.info/FSA/html/handbook/MCOB/12.

> the mortgagor's prospective home. Second-charge borrowing might fund a home improvement or other substantial expenditure or it might be utilised to avoid default when existing unsecured loans are consolidated.

Thus, although the borrowers are provided with information, they may find it difficult, if not impossible, to adequately assess the implications of that information to their particular circumstances and so fail to make responsible choices. The financial education of borrowers is a policy aim with the Consumer Financial Education Body (now known by the catchier title of The Money Advice Service) established by the Financial Services Act 2010. There is a host of leaflets from various organizations to provide guidance, but these are loose measures that depend upon the willingness and ability of vulnerable borrowers to use them effectively.

The FSA's reaction to the credit crunch has seen a stricter approach towards prudential regulation of licenced lenders and a shift towards greater paternalism in setting conduct of business standards. There is an expectation that lenders should take greater responsibility with talk of product regulation, affordability checks and a clearer approach to the provision by lenders and their brokers of information and advice to borrowers.[40]

MCOB 11 requires lenders 'to show that before deciding to enter into, or making a further advance on, a regulated mortgage contract, or home purchase plan, account was taken of the customer's ability to repay'.[41] This assessment is to be made against the lender's written policy, which is to look primarily to the level of borrower's actual or reasonably anticipated income. It is clear that before the credit crunch some lenders failed to lend responsibly.[42] They were prepared to offer mortgages with high loan to value [of the security] ratios and used higher and higher multiplies of borrowers' income to set lending ceilings. Lenders were also lax in checking the borrowers' ability to pay and too keen to offer mortgages without verifying the individual borrower's income. The credit crunch has brought some sanity back into the market with falls in loan to value and loan to income ratios as well as more stringent checks upon the borrower's income. These moves foreshadow recommendations from the FSA to amend MCOB 11.[43] However, this restriction in mortgage finance has excluded many, particularly first time buyers, from the housing market and left the aspiration of home ownership out of reach for many first time buyers and lower income families.[44]

2.1.4 Financial Service Ombudsman

Redress through the courts is not the only route for an aggrieved borrower. The FSA Handbook requires an authorized lender to have in place a complaints-handling process that complies with the requirements set out in the Handbook.[45] A borrower's first step is thus to resolve his or her complaint directly with the lender. His or her next step may then be to approach the Financial Services Ombudsman (FSO), which is established under Part XVI

[40] FSA, The Turner Review (March 2009); FSA, Mortgage Market Reviews DP09/3, CP10/16; FSA, Responsible Lending (July 2010) and FSA, CP10/28 Distribution and Disclosure (November 2010). See also Nield, 'Responsible Lending and Borrowing: whereto low cost home ownership?' (2010) 30 LS 610

[41] FSA Handbook, '11.3.1 Customer's ability to pay' (MCOB 11).

[42] FSA, The Turner Review (March 2009).

[43] Ibid.

[44] Nield, 'Responsible Lending and Borrowing: whereto low cost home ownership?' [2010] LS 610.

[45] FSA Handbook, Dispute Resolution: Complaints (DISP), available online at http://fsahandbook.info/FSA/html/handbook/DISP.

of the FSMA 2000 as a body that is independent of the FSA, to provide an alternative means of resolving disputes.[46]

The FSO may consider complaints made by borrowers and may call upon the lender to provide the requisite information to enable them to do so.[47] The FSO may make an award based upon what is fair, just, and reasonable, rather than being bound to apply the strict legal rules,[48] with any compensation subject to a statutory cap of £100,000.[49] That award is binding upon the lender and enforceable as such in the same way as a court judgment. The borrower, however, may decline the FSO's award and continue to pursue his or her claim through the courts. [50]

The FSO provides a practical route through which to resolve relatively small and straightforward disputes. It has the advantage of being free at the point of entry and, with speedier and less formal methods of working, more accessible to many borrowers. [51] The mis-selling of endowment mortgages and, more recently, payment protection insurance have been major sources of complaints to the FSO.[52] Complaints on the mis-selling of endowment mortgages arose either because this type of mortgage was an inappropriate product for the particular borrower or because the lender inaccurately projected the sum payable on maturity of the endowment policy; which was intended to meet the capital sum repayable at the end of the mortgage term. As a result the borrower faced a shortfall and had to try and find the balance from his or her own resources. Payment protection insurance[53] complaints arose because borrowers were sometimes unaware that they had a choice whether to take out such insurance; which purports to cover the risk of loss if the borrower is unable to meet their repayments because of illness or unemployment. Furthermore, the premiums and associated commission, which lenders' affiliated insurance companies could earn on selling these policies, were often substantial.

2.2 CONSUMER CREDIT ACT 1974 (AS AMENDED)

The CCA 1974 was passed following the recommendations of the Crowther Committee, which, in 1971, undertook a comprehensive review of consumer credit.[54] The Act brought the regulation of most different forms of credit available to individuals (including credit cards, hire purchase, and unsecured and secured loans) under one legislative umbrella. Mortgages were not the primary target, because they were thought to be already adequately 46 See generally Morris and James, 'The Financial Ombudsman Service: A Brave New World in "Ombudsmanry"' [2002] PL 640; Ferran, 'Dispute Resolution Mechanisms in the UK Financial Sector' (2002) 21 CJQ 135.

47 Financial Services and Markets Act 2000, s 232.

48 Ibid, s 229 and R (on the application of IFG Financial Services Ltd v FSO [2005] EWHC 1153. See also R (on the application of the British Bankers Association) v FSA [2011] EWHC 999 for the inter-relation between the FSA principles, codes and rules and the FSO jurisdiction.

49 Bunney v Burns Andersen Plc [2007] EWHC 1240.

50 Andrews v SBJ Benefit Consultants [2010] EWHC 2875.

51 This dispute resolution process has been held compliant with Art 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights see Heather Moor & Edgecomb Ltd v UK (2011) 53 EHRR SE18.

52 Mortgage endowment complaints accounted for 49 per cent of complaints in 2006/07 and payment protection insurance accounted for 51 per cent of complaints in 2010/11; see FSO, Annual Reviews available online at http://www.financial-ombudsman.org.uk.

53 Often taken out with unsecured loans but also sometimes with mortgages.

54 Cmnd 4596, 1971.

protected. However, mortgages could fall subject to the CCA 1974 if they did not exceed the £25,000 ceiling.

The rapid growth and changing face of the consumer credit market in the following years led to a review of consumer credit and, in 2003, the government issued a White Paper, Fair, Clear and Competitive: the Consumer Credit Market in the 21st Century,[55] which resulted in the Consumer Credit Act 2006 (CCA 2006). This Act substantially amends the 1974 Act, so as to bring more mortgages over land within its control.

2.2.1 Mortgages within the Consumer Credit Act 1974 (as amended)

The CCA 1974 (as amended) only protects individual borrowers.[56] It does not apply to companies, although loans for business purposes are subject to regulation where the business is carried on by a sole trader, or where a partnership comprises less than three partners, and the loan does not exceed £25,000.[57] The £25,000 limit no longer applies to other loans entered into after April 2008.[58]

Regulated mortgage contracts, which, as we have seen, are regulated by the FSA, are excluded from dual regulation under the 1974 Act.[59] It is thus the secondary mortgage market that is largely the subject of regulation, unless the mortgage is made to a lender that is expressly exempt from control: for example, local authorities, building societies regulated by the Building Societies Act 1986, or lenders licensed under the Banking Act 1987.[60]

It is possible for a borrower who qualifies as a 'high net worth debtor' to opt out of protection under the 1974 Act.[61] The mortgage must contain a statement to that effect made by the borrower and must be accompanied by a statement of high net worth—that is, that the debtor had an income in the previous year of not less than £150,000 and/or net assets of not less than £500,000.[62] The reasoning behind this provision is the belief that such borrowers should be able to look after themselves.

Even so, the controls over unfair terms and practices contained in ss 140A–140C (see below) apply to loans to exempt lenders, high net worth borrowers and business loans over £25,000. Sections 140A–140C also apply where sums are outstanding under a consumer credit agreement entered into before 6 April 2007, when the provisions came into force. But regulated mortgage contracts that are subject to separate regulation under the FSMA 2000 are not caught by ss 140A–140C.[63]

Brown has created a useful flow diagram (Figure 27) to demonstrate how to ascertain whether or not a particular mortgage falls within the 1974 Act.[64]

55 Cm 6040, 2003.

56 Consumer Credit Act 1974 (as amended), s 8.

57 Ibid, s 16B. It was intended that buy-to-let mortgages would be excluded from regulation under the 1974 Act because of this limitation, but such mortgages may not escape regulation where the borrower is not conducting a business.

58 Second or equitable mortgages in excess of £25,000 were unregulated prior to April 2008.

59 Consumer Credit Act 1974 (as amended), s 16(6C). First mortgages entered into before 31 October 2004 are not regulated mortgage contracts, but will be exempt from regulation under the 1974 Act where they are made by a building society regulated by the Building Societies Act 1986 or where the lender is licensed under the Banking Act 1987.

60 Ibid, s 16(1).

61 Ibid, s 16A.

62 Consumer Credit (Exempt Agreements) Order 2007, SI 2007/1168.

63 Consumer Credit Act 1974 (as amended), s 140A(5).

64 Brown, 'The Consumer Credit Act 2006: Real Additional Mortgagor Protection?' [2007] Conv 325.

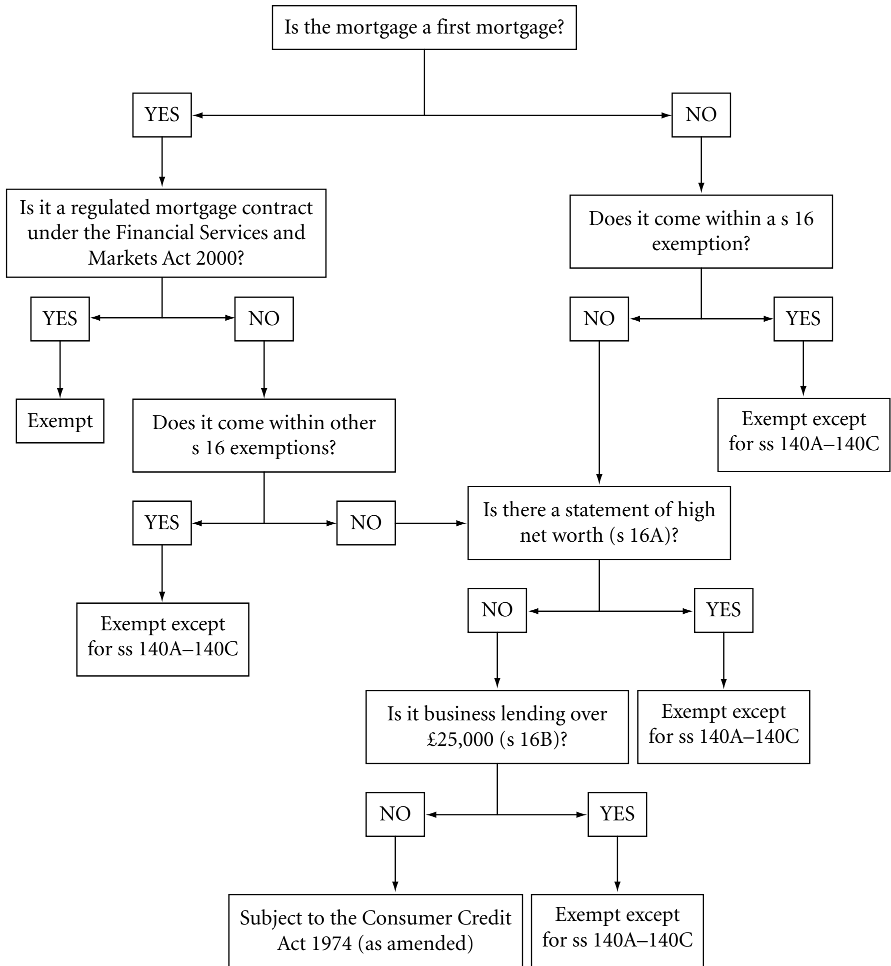

Figure 27 Brown's flow diagram

The target for control under the 1974 Act over the mortgage market is generally secondary lenders who are prepared to lend to borrowers on the security of a subsequent mortgage—sometimes known as equity release funding because the loan is secured on the unencumbered value of the borrower's property. The purpose of the loan is generally not to fund a house purchase, which is likely to be secured by a first legal mortgage and thus subject to regulation under the FSMA 2000; the purpose of the loan is more likely to be to consolidate the borrower's debts—for example, on credit cards, an overdraft, and hire purchase agreements—by repaying these debts with a single loan secured by a subsequent mortgage over the borrower's home. Alternatively, the loan may be to fund other expenditure that is of such magnitude that the lender is not prepared to lend on an unsecured basis. Such borrowing is often unattractive to high street banks and building societies, and is made instead by secondary lenders, which charge higher rates of interest with more onerous default charges often with repayment over a short term.

2.2.2 The Consumer Credit Act 1974 (as amended) regulatory framework

The government's White Paper, Fair Clear and Competitive, set out its hope to 'encourage an open and fair credit market where consumers can make fully informed decisions and business can compete aggressively on a fair and even basis'.[65] Here, again, we see the rhetoric of decentred regulation, and responsible lending and responsible borrowing. This responsibility is to be encouraged by a transparent market in which borrowers are provided with clear and consistent information upon which they can exercise choice and can make sensible financial decisions. Fairness in the market is to be achieved by the control of those who can lend through a licensing and regulatory system operated by the Office of Fair Trading (OFT), and through legislation that controls market practices and the transaction itself, under the supervision of both the OFT and the court.

Lenders must be licensed by the OFT in order to make a regulated consumer credit agreement and to take a mortgage to secure any such agreement.[66] An unlicensed lender commits a criminal offence[67] and any mortgage entered into by an unlicensed lender is only enforceable by order of the OFT.[68] The OFT also has power to suspend or revoke a licence,[69] and to impose conditions upon a licensee as to the conduct of its business.[70] To that end, the OFT is granted investigative powers so that it can monitor the business of licensed lenders.[71]

There is no equivalent to the MBOC Sourcebook to govern mortgages under the CCA 1974, but the OFT may issue regulations and guidance to its licensed lenders.[72] The OFT is also empowered to produce codes of conduct to promote 'good practice in the carrying out of activities which may affect the economic interests of consumers in the United Kingdom'.[73] It has been accused of failing to provide adequate, comprehensive and current guidance, and to put in place an effective monitoring and compliance strategy.[74] The OFT is taking steps to rectify this omission. Its General Guidance on Fitness of Licensed Lenders was updated in January 2008.[75] In this guidance, the OFT announced that, in assessing a lender's fitness, it will require a credit risk profile, where the lender is engaged in sub-prime lending, and will take into consideration any breach of the FSA rules and principles. The OFT has also issued guidance on Second Charges[76] and Irresponsible Lending[77] and is consulting on providing guidance on Debt Management[78] and Collection.[79]

Loan agreements and supporting mortgages falling within the terms of the CCA 1974 are regulated by detailed and comprehensive rules covering the whole process, from advertisement, through creation of the agreement and mortgage, to their enforcement in the event of default. This cradle-to-grave approach is similar to, but more prescriptive than, the requirements governing regulated mortgage contracts under the FSMA 2000. Furthermore, the consequences of non-compliance are more far-reaching.

The CCA 1974 prescribes the information that must be provided to the borrower prior to the entry into the agreement and mortgage,[80] during the term,[81] and in the event of any default.[82] The form and execution of the agreement,[83] and the supporting mortgage,[84] must also comply with the requirements of the Act. In addition, the process of completing the [65] Cm 6040, 2003, [1.69]. [66] Consumer Credit Act 1974 (as amended), Pt III. [67] Ibid, s 396.

[68] Ibid, s 40. [69] Ibid, s 32. [70] Ibid, ss 33A–33E.
[71] See ibid, ss 36B–36F and Part XI generally. [72] Ibid, ss 26, 33A–33E.
[73] Enterpise Act 2002, s 8. [74] Citizens Advice (2007). [75] OFT 969 (2008).
[76] OFT 1105 (July 2009). [77] OFT 1107 (March 2010 updated February 2011).
[78] OFT 1138con (June 2011). [79] OFT 664con (March 2011).
[80] Consumer Credit Act 1974 (as amended), s 55. [81] Ibid, ss 77–78A.
[82] Ibid, ss 76, 86B–86E, 87, and 88. [83] Ibid, s 60. [84] Ibid, s 105.

loan agreement and supporting mortgage is regulated: in particular, the borrower must be supplied with a copy of the mortgage and given a cooling-off period of not less than seven days in which to consider his or her position before he or she can be asked to execute the mortgage, unless the mortgage is to secure bridging finance or a loan for the purchase of land.[85]

The consequence of a failure to provide the requisite information, or to comply with the rules governing the form and execution of this documentation, is that the agreement and mortgage are deemed incorrectly executed, and cannot be enforced except by order of the court.[86] The court is given a wide discretion, in the light of the prejudice caused to the borrower and the culpability of the lender, whether or not to enforce the agreement or mortgage, and, if enforcement is ordered, to impose conditions and amend or vary the terms of the agreement or mortgage.[87] If any order is refused the security becomes invalid.[88]

A lender also cannot enforce a compliant mortgage, save by court order[89] and not before notice of default has been given.[90] Where the default is a failure to pay the sums due under the mortgage, the lender must give notice of those arrears.[91] The lender also has no right to charge interest or any default sum until the requisite notices have been given.[92]

The CCA 2006 has also opened up the FSO complaints procedure to borrowers in dispute with their lenders under a mortgage regulated by the CCA 1974.[93]

2.2.3 The unfair credit relationship

Sections 137–140 of the CCA 1974 empowered the court to reopen consumer credit agreements where they found that the payment terms were 'grossly exorbitant', or where the agreement 'otherwise grossly contravene[d] ordinary principles of fair dealing'. These tests were notoriously difficult to satisfy[94] and the court's interpretation of them was criticized in the government's White Paper as being unduly restrictive. It came as no surprise, therefore, that ss 137–140 have been repealed by the CCA 2006, and new provisions enacted in their place that are far wider in their approach. The revised provisions look to the unfairness of the relationship between the creditor and debtor and allow the court to consider not only the terms of the agreement, but also the lender's behaviour and practices throughout the term of the mortgage. The appropriate time to consider that question is, thus, the time of the trial or the time the relationship came to an end. It is not the date of the agreement.[95]

[85] Ibid, ss 58 and 61. See also ss 62, 64, 67, and 68, in relation to the execution of the credit agreement.

[86] Ibid, ss 65, 92, 105, and 126. See also OFT 1272 (October 2010).

[87] Ibid, ss 127, 135, and 136. See for instance London North Securities Ltd v Meadows [2005] EWCA Civ 956; Wilson v Hurstanger Ltd [2007] EWCA Civ 299; McGuffick v Royal Bank of Scotland [2009] EWHC 2386; Carey v HSBC Plc [2009] EWHC 3417; Phoenix Recoveries (UK) Ltd v Kotecha [2011] EWCA Civ 105.

[88] Ibid, ss 106, 113(3)c but see the saving for certain transferees of registered charges in s 177.

[89] Ibid, s 126.

[90] Ibid, s 87.

[91] Ibid, ss 88B or 88C, and 86D(3).

[92] Ibid, s 86D(4).

[93] Consumer Credit Act 2006, ss 59–61. See above.

[94] See A Ketley Ltd v Scott [1980] CCLR 37; Davies v Direct Loans [1986] 1 WLR 823; Paragon Finance plc v Nash [2002] 1 WLR 685.

[95] Patel v Patel [2009] EWHC 3264.

Consumer Credit Act 1974 (as amended), s 140A

Unfair relationships between creditors and debtors

1. The court may make an order under section 140B in connection with a credit agreement if it determines that the relationship between the creditor and the debtor arising out of the agreement (or the agreement taken with any related agreement) is unfair to the debtor because of one or more of the following—

   (a) any of the terms of the agreement or of any related agreement;

   (b) the way in which the creditor has exercised or enforced any of his rights under the agreement or any related agreement;

   (c) any other thing done (or not done) by, or on behalf of, the creditor (either before or after the making of the agreement or any related agreement).

2. In deciding whether to make a determination under this section the court shall have regard to all matters it thinks relevant (including matters relating to the creditor and matters relating to the debtor).

The redress that the court can order is also far-ranging and may extend to ordering the repayment of any sums paid by the debtor, the alteration of the terms of the mortgage, or the setting aside, either in whole or in part, of any duty imposed upon the borrower by the terms of the loan or mortgage.[96] The provisions, thus, have the potential to provide a powerful mechanism of judicial control of CCA mortgages.

However, the difficulty with the s 140A test is that there is little guidance on how it will operate. The government refused to include any guidelines in the legislation, preferring instead to give the courts a free rein. The OFT have issued guidance on how they perceive the test may operate when they seek to take enforcement action as a 'consumer champion' under Part 8 of the Enterprise Act 2002.[97]

Brown suggests that some guidance may be obtained from the Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999 (which we consider in section 4.1.3 below) and she also suggests that unexpected costs—for example, default charges—or the taking advantage of a borrower's disadvantageous position, or irresponsible lending, could be particular targets.[98]

To date, guidance from case law is limited although they do underline the width of judicial discretion.

Harrison v Black Horse Ltd
[2011] EWCA Civ 1128

Tomlinson LJ

At [37]

Three points should be noted at the outset. First, it is the relationship between the parties which must be determined to be unfair, not their agreement, although it is envisaged that the [96] Consumer Credit Act 1974 (as amended), s 140B(1).

[97] OFT 859 Rev (May 2008 updated August 2011). The OFT have powers under Part 8 of the Enterprise Act 2002 to take enforcement action as a 'consumer champion' where they believe market practice to be detrimental to consumers.

[98] Brown, 'The Consumer Credit Act 2006: Real Additional Mortgagor Protection?' [2007] Conv 316,

terms of the agreement may themselves give rise to an unfair relationship. Second, although s.140A is directed at determining unfairness to the debtor, in reaching that determination the court must have regard to matters relating to the creditor as well as matters relating to the debtor. Third, unlike provisions such as the Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977, which offers in Schedule 2 "Guidelines for Application of Reasonableness Test" or The Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999 (SI 1999 No 2083), Schedule 2 of which is an "Indicative and Non-Exhaustive List of Terms which may be regarded as unfair", s.140A of the Act offers no guidance in respect of factors which either may or must be regarded as rendering a relationship unfair to the debtor.

The mis-selling of Payment Protection Insurance[99] has resulted in a number of cases.[100]An important theme that emerges from these cases is the significance the courts attach to statutory standards and other regulatory guidance. For instance, early cases took a dim view of lenders who took an undisclosed commission on the sale but the Court of Appeal in Harrison v Black Horse Ltd looked to regulatory guidance to dismiss suggestions that an undisclosed commission of 87 per cent of the insurance premium led to an unfair relationship.

Tomlinson LJ

At [58]

[...] the commission here is on any view quite startling and there will be many who regard it as unacceptable conduct on the part of lending institutions to have profited in this way. I struggle however to spell out of the mere size of the undisclosed commission an unfairness in the relationship between lender and borrower. Moreover the touchstone must in my view be the standard imposed by the regulatory authorities pursuant to their statutory duties, not resort to a visceral instinct that the relevant conduct is beyond the Pale. In that regard it is clear that the ICOB regime after due consultation and consideration does not require the disclosure of the receipt of commission. It would be an anomalous result if a lender was obliged to disclose receipt of a commission in order to escape a finding of unfairness under s.140A of the Act but yet not obliged to disclose it pursuant to the statutorily imposed regulatory framework under which it operates.

The main problems associated with the mis-selling of payment protection insurance have since been addressed by the regulatory authorities with lenders being required to pay out millions in compensation.[101]

99 This insurance purports to cover the risk of non-payment of unsecured loans and also mortgages (MPPI) if the borrower suffers a loss of income from ill-health or unemployment. It was commonly sold by an insurer associated with the lender at the same time as the loan often by the payment of a single substantial premium.

100 See for example MBNA Europe Ltd v Thorius [2010] ECC 8, Wollerton v Black Horse Ltd unreported 26th March 2010 Yates v Nemo Personal Finance unreported 14 May 2010, Black Horse Ltd v Speak [2010] EWHC 1866 but see Harrison v Black Horse Ltd [2011] EWCA Civ 1128. See also Patel v Patel [2009] EWHC 3264 and Barons Finance Ltd v Olubisi unreported 26 April 2010 for other instances where the courts have found an unfair relationship.

101 See Competition Commissions Market Investigation into Payment Protection Insurance (January 2009) which led to certain policies being prohibited and the FSA's Policy Statement 10/12 (July 2010) on handling mis-selling complaints.

3 CREATION OF THE MORTGAGE

Freedom of contract is a fundamental principle governing loan contracts as much as any other contract. We will see, in the next section, the legal controls over the parties' freedom to agree the substantive content of their loan terms and any mortgage taken to secure repayment of that loan. In this section, we are concerned with the process by which those terms are agreed. The focus here is with the quality of the parties' consent to contractual terms: in particular, the borrower's ability to enter freely into the loan without the lender abusing a dominant position.

We will concentrate in section 3.3 on the role that the doctrine of undue influence has played in collateral mortgages of the family home to secure a business loan. There are, however, other factors that can affect the procedural fairness of a loan, which we will briefly survey in section 3.1, before considering the conceptual basis that underlies these controls in section 3.2.

3.1 FACTORS GOVERNING PROCEDURAL FAIRNESS

The principal factors that may affect the procedural fairness of a mortgage will be familiar to any student of contract law and thus it is proposed to outline their essential features only briefly. The factors are:

- non est factum;
- duress;
- undue influence;
- misrepresentation;
- unconscionable bargain.

Non est factum and duress find their roots in the common law, and, accordingly, render the contract void from the outset. Undue influence and unconscionable bargain are equitable doctrines that entitle the wronged party to elect to rescind the transaction. The court may also award equitable compensation or set aside a transaction on terms where full restitution is not possible, because, for example, some benefit has been received by the victim. The remedies for misrepresentation will depend upon the intention with which the misrepresentation is formulated, and may result in a claim to rescind the transaction or to damages, either in the tort of deceit, where the misrepresentation is fraudulent, or in negligence or under statute, where the misrepresentation is negligent or innocent.

3.1.1 Non est factum

Where a party has made a fundamental mistake as to the character and effect of the obligations imposed by the mortgage, he or she may plead non est factum, provided that the mistake was no fault of his or her own.[102] The doctrine does not require any proof of fraud or wrongdoing, because its basis lies in the absence of the victim's consent. It was originally applied where a party could not read, because he or she was blind or illiterate, but has since been extended to wider circumstances in which a party's lack of comprehension is due to other reasons (e.g. age, illness, limited education or understanding). Nevertheless, the doctrine has very limited application, because the victim must prove that he or she took due care in understanding the nature and effect of the mortgage, for example by asking for an explanation of its effect. A failure to read the mortgage is plainly insufficient.

[102] See Saunders v Anglia Building Society, sub nom Gallie v Lee [1971] AC 1004.

3.1.2 Duress

A party may claim duress where he or she has been coerced or pressurized into a transaction. Originally, the coercion had to take the form of physical threats to the victim[103] or to his or her property,[104] but the doctrine has been expanded to admit more subtle means of pressure, including the illegitimate use of economic pressure: for example, threats to breach a contractual obligation.[105] The difficulty is to distinguish the use of sharp, but legitimate, negotiating tactics in the cut and thrust of commercial life from the illegitimate threats that may constitute economic duress.[106] Again, the rationale for intervention on the grounds of duress is that the victim has not freely consented to the transaction.

The Universe Sentinel
[1983] 1 AC 366, HL

Lord Scarman

At 400

There must be pressure, the practical effect of which is compulsion or absence of choice. Compulsion is variously described in the authorities as coercion or the vitiation of consent. The classic case of duress is, however, not the lack of will to submit but the victim's intentional submission arising from the realisation that there is no other practical choice open to him.

3.1.3 Undue influence

A comprehensive definition of undue influence is elusive.[107] Lord Clyde observed in Royal Bank of Scotland v Etridge[108] that '[i]t is something which can be more easily recognised when found than exhaustively analysed in the abstract'. At its core is the use of improper pressure or influence, which effectively deprives a party of his or her free and independent will. The victim may perfectly understand his or her actions, but, nevertheless, his or her judgment may have been overborne by the improper influence of another. In Daniel v Drew[109] Ward LJ gave the following guidance:

103 Barton v Armstrong [1976] AC 104.

104 Astley v Reynolds (1731) 2 Str 915.

105 See Pao On v Lau Yiu Long [1980] AC 614; DSDN Subsea Ltd v Petroleum Geo-services ASA [2000] BLR 530; Huyton SA v Peter Cremer & Co [1999] CLC 230; or, in the context of a mortgage, Jones v Morgan [2001] EWCA Civ 995.

106 Economic duress is distinguishable from other forms of duress in that: firstly, it renders the contract voidable not void; and secondly, to be actionable, the duress must be the main reason that the victim acted as he or she did.

107 In Allcard v Skinner (1887) 36 Ch D 145, 183, Lindley LJ commented that 'no court had ever attempted to define undue influence'.

108 [2002] 2 AC 773, [92].

109 [2005] EWCA Civ 507.

Ward LJ

At [36]

[...] in all cases of undue influence the critical question is whether or not the persuasion or the advice, in other words the influence, has invaded the free volition of the donor to accept or reject the persuasion or advice or withstand the influence. The donor may be led but she must not be driven and her will must be the offspring of her own volition, not a record of someone else's. There is no undue influence unless the donor if she were free and informed could say "This is not my wish but I must do it".

Undue influence takes one of two broad forms: firstly, actual undue influence arises where overt acts exert improper pressure in a similar manner to duress, to which the concept has been compared; secondly, undue influence may be presumed to exist from the relationship between two parties, where one has used his or her dominant position to exploit the weaker party. Certain types of relationship are accepted, in themselves, as giving rise to a presumption of undue influence without any further evidence that the trust inherent in these relationships has been abused. These relationships include solicitor and client, doctor and patient, religious leader and follower, parent and child. This list is not exhaustive and a presumption of undue influence may also arise where trust and confidence is established in the context of a particular relationship.

Lord Nicholls in Etridge sought to pin down the nature of this relational form of undue influence.

Royal Bank of Scotland v Etridge
[2002] 2 AC 773, HL

Lord Nicholls

At [10]–[11]

The law has long recognised the need to prevent abuse of influence in these "relationship" cases despite the absence of evidence of overt acts of persuasive conduct. The types of relationship, such as parent and child, in which this principle falls to be applied cannot be listed exhaustively. Relationships are infinitely various. Sir Guenter Treitel QC has rightly noted that the question is whether one party has reposed sufficient trust and confidence in the other, rather than whether the relationship between the parties belongs to a particular type: see Treitel, The Law of Contract, 10th ed (1999), pp 380–381. For example, the relation of banker and customer will not normally meet this criterion, but exceptionally it may: see National Westminster Bank plc v Morgan [1985] AC 686, 707–709.

Even this test is not comprehensive. The principle is not confined to cases of abuse of trust and confidence. It also includes, for instance, cases where a vulnerable person has been exploited. Indeed, there is no single touchstone for determining whether the principle is applicable. Several expressions have been used in an endeavour to encapsulate the essence: trust and confidence, reliance, dependence or vulnerability on the one hand and ascendancy, domination or control on the other. None of these descriptions is perfect. None is all embracing. Each has its proper place.

As a result of this relationship of trust and confidence between the parties, the dominant party is said to owe a special duty to deal fairly with the other—a duty that has been described as 'fiduciary'.[110]

Actual undue influence is actionable as a legal wrong.[111] The relational form of undue influence may give rise, in the light of the nature of the transaction that is being impugned, to a factual presumption of undue influence, which shifts the burden of proof to the dominant party to demonstrate that he or she dealt fairly with the weaker party, who was thus able to exercise his or her own judgment.

3.1.4 Misrepresentation

It is not uncommon for a party to try to persuade another party to contract by misrepresenting the facts surrounding the transaction. For example, in Barclays Bank plc v O'Brien,[112] Mr O'Brien persuaded his wife to mortgage her interest in the family home to secure a loan made to his business by misrepresenting the amount of the debt that was secured by the mortgage. An actionable misrepresentation is a material misrepresentation of existing fact, rather than of opinion or future intention, which induces a party to enter into the contract. Misrepresentation is often linked with undue influence in the common scenario that occurred in O'Brien, which we will be examining in more detail in section 3.3 below. However, there are particular necessary distinctions to show that the misrepresentation caused the victim to enter into the impugned transaction, whereas proof of undue influence is by itself an equitable wrong upon which the transaction can be set aside. Proof that the victim would not have entered into the transaction if they had known the truth is not required.[113]

3.1.5 Unconsionable bargain

Equity will provide redress where one party has abused the strength of his or her relative position to impose unacceptable terms upon the other party, who is in a position of relative weakness or disadvantage. The doctrine seeks to protect the weak or disadvantaged from those who would use their superior position unscrupulously.

In the context of a security transaction, this principle may be established by proof that:

- the borrower is at a serious disadvantage because of some particular weakness or disability;
- the borrower has been unconscionably exploited by the lender because of that disadvantage; and
- a mortgage has resulted on terms that are oppressive.

The doctrine is based upon the relative strengths of the parties to the mortgage and the fact that the dominant party has acted reprehensibly in taking advantage of that imbalance. The weaker party must establish that he or she was in a position of special disadvantage vis-à-vis the dominant party, and that his or her vulnerability was evident to the dominant party, so that the court is able to infer that the resulting transaction was procured by the abuse of that superior position. The balance of proof then shifts to the dominant party to establish, if he [110] Ibid at [104], per Lord Hobhouse. [111] CIBC v Pitt [1994] 1 AC 200.

[112] [1994] 1 AC 180. See also Royal Bank of Scotland Plc v Chandra [2011] EWCA Civ 192.

[113] See for instance Hewett v First Plus Financial Group Plc [2010] 2 P&CR 22.

or she can, that he or she did not take advantage of that superior position and that the resulting mortgage, although onerous, did not result from any abuse.[114] The relative positions of the parties, the conduct of their negotiations, the improper use of influence or power, and the lack of information or absence of real choice are all relevant factors. The focus is upon the procedural, rather than the substantive, nature of the transaction, although oppressive terms may provide evidence that demonstrates the unconscionability of the process.[115]

The Court of Appeal considered the operation of the doctrine in the following case.

Alec Lobb Garages Ltd v Total Oil (GB) Ltd
[1885] 1 WLR 173, CA

Lord Dhillon

At 182

The whole emphasis is on extortion, or undue advantage taken of weakness, an unconscientious use of the power arising out of the inequality of the parties' circumstances, and on unconscientious use of power which the Court might in certain circumstances be entitled to infer from a particular—and in these days notorious—relationship unless the contract is proved to have been in fact fair, just and reasonable. Nothing leads me to suppose that the course of the development of the law over the last 100 years has been such that the emphasis on unconscionable conduct or unconscientious use of power has gone and relief will now be granted in equity in a case such as the present if there has been unequal bargaining power, even if the stronger has not used his strength unconscionably. I agree with the judgment of Browne-Wilkinson J. in Multiservice Bookbinding Ltd. v. Marden (1979) Ch. 84 which sets out that to establish that a term is unfair and unconscionable it is not enough to show that it is, objectively, unreasonable [. . .] Inequality of bargaining power must anyhow be a relative concept. It is seldom in any negotiation that the bargaining powers of the parties are absolutely equal. Any individual wanting to borrow money from a bank, building society or other financial institution in order to pay his liabilities or buy some property he urgently wants to acquire will have virtually no bargaining power; he will have to take or leave the terms offered to him. [. . .]

The Courts would only interfere in exceptional cases where as a matter of common fairness it was not right that the strong should be allowed to push the weak to the wall. The concepts of unconscionable conduct and of the exercise by the stronger of coercive power are thus brought in [. . .]

There are close links between relational undue influence and unconscionable bargains, and the same facts can give rise to an action based upon both doctrines. Indeed, some have argued that undue influence should be subsumed within a wider doctrine of unconscionability.[116] The English courts have preferred the undue influence route, but in other jurisdictions, the courts have applied unconscionable bargains. For example, in the Australian case of Commonwealth Bank of Australia Ltd v Amadio,[117] the doctrine was employed to set aside a mortgage granted by elderly Italian immigrants, with little command of English or experience of business, to secure a loan to their son's business. They believed that the business was flourishing: a belief based upon their son's misrepresentations and the bank's practice of dishonouring only some of the son's cheques to create an appearance of solvency. They also [114] Louth v Diprose (1992) 175 CLR 621. [115] Hart v O'Connor [1985] AC 1000, 1018.

[116] Capper (1998) 14 LQR 479. [117] (1983) 151 CLR 447.

believed that their liability was limited and they received no independent advice to cast a more realistic light on the transaction. In England, these facts would produce a clear claim of undue influence, but the case was pleaded and decided by the High Court of Australia on the grounds of unconscionable bargain—although the High Court criticized the pleadings and expressed a hope that such cases would, in future, be approached from the perspective of undue influence.[118]

There remain distinctions between undue influence and unconscionable bargains. Undue influence focuses upon the quality of consent of the weaker party, which is called into question by the nature of the relationship between the parties, whereas unconscionable bargain concentrates its attention upon the conduct of the dominant party. It is the exploitation of the relative weakness of one party, which is derived from some social or transactional disability, which merits the court's intervention.

3.2 THE CONCEPTUAL UNDERPINNINGS

There has been considerable debate surrounding the conceptual basis of these various vitiating factors: in particular, duress, undue influence, and unconscionable bargains. The main features of this debate are twofold: firstly, whether they are claimant-based, looking to the impaired consent of the victim, or defendant-based, looking to the exploitative nature of the defendant's conduct; secondly, there have been growing calls to assimilate the three grounds by looking to the underlying unconscionability of the defendant's use of their relative power.

Birks and Chin[119] have advocated a claimant-sided approach to undue influence that leads to a distinction between undue influence and unconscionable bargains. Undue influence looks to the vulnerability of the claimant's consent as a result of his or her dependence on the defendant, whilst unconscionable bargains is concerned with the defendant's exploitation of the claimant's weakness. We have already noted that, despite the obviously reprehensible conduct of duress and actual undue influence, the traditional conceptual foundations of these doctrines have been found in the suspect nature of the victim's apparent consent. Birks and Chin point out that presumed undue influence does not depend upon any conscious wrongdoing on behalf of the defendant, and that the presumption of influence may be rebutted by proof that the claimant did exercise his or her free and independent will.

Others have rejected this approach and have refocused the spotlight on the exploitative nature of the defendant's behaviour, thus drawing closer parallels with both duress and unconscionable bargains, which have resulted in calls for the assimilation of the three doctrines.[120] The common features of the doctrines have been identified as relational inequality (e.g. of bargaining power), transactional imbalance, and the defendant's unconscionable conduct, which, in the case of presumed undue influence, may be more passively imposed [118] See ibid, at 464, per Mason J.

[119] Birks and Chin, 'On the Nature of Undue Influence' in Good Faith and Fault in Contract Law (eds Beatson and Friedman, 1995, ch 3). See also Birks, 'Undue Influence as Wrongful Exploitation' (2004) 120 LQR 34.

[120] Bigwood, 'Undue Influence: Impaired Consent or Wicked Exploitation' (1996) 16 OJLS 503; Chen-Wishart, 'The O'Brien Principle and Substantive Unfairness' (1997) 56 CLJ 60; Chen-Wishart, 'Undue Influence: Beyond Impaired Consent and Wrongdoing Towards a Relational Analysis' in Mapping the Law (eds Burrows and Rogers, 2006), ch 11; Capper, 'Undue Influence and Unconscionability: A Rationalisation' (1998) 114 LQR 479; Deveney and Chandler, 'Unconscionability and the Taxonomy of Undue Influence' [2007] JBL 541.

than overtly or intentionally exerted.[121] These features do not necessarily contribute equally, but rather form an evidentiary mix that combine in different measure according to the circumstances of the particular case.

Intriguing though these arguments are, the more practical policy imperatives that underpin the exercise of 'state-assisted rescission' of apparently binding obligations should not be overlooked.[122] This policy is particularly evident in the series of decisions on undue influence that have occupied the House of Lords, which seeks to balance the protection of the vulnerable surety against modern business lending practices. The House of Lords first expressed its opinion in Barclays Bank plc v O'Brien,[123] but some years later, developed and refined its views in Royal Bank of Scotland v Etridge.[124] These two decisions will dominate our consideration of the operation of undue influence in mortgage transactions.

3.3 UNDUE INFLUENCE AND MORTGAGES

Undue influence has been raised as a defence to enforcement proceedings where a collateral mortgage has been granted over the family home to secure a loan made for the benefit of the husband's business. The loan is made to the husband, as borrower, but the wife's participation to create the mortgage is required where she is a legal or beneficial joint owner of the family home. The danger is that the wife's consent to the mortgage is questionable, because, in the husband's desire to finance his business, he may have misrepresented the amount of the secured liability or the risks of enforcement, or have unduly influenced his wife to mortgage her interest.

The trend was noted in O'Brien.[125]

Barclays Bank plc v O'Brien
[1994] 1 AC 180, HL

Lord Browne-Wilkinson

At 188

The large number of cases of this type coming before the courts in recent years reflects the rapid changes in social attitudes and the distribution of wealth which have recently occurred. Wealth is now more widely spread. Moreover a high proportion of privately owned wealth is invested in the matrimonial home. Because of the recognition by society of the equality of the sexes, the majority of matrimonial homes are now in the joint names of both spouses. Therefore in order to raise finance for the business enterprises of one or other of the spouses, the jointly owned home has become a main source of security. The provision of such security requires the consent of both spouses.

In parallel with these financial developments, society's recognition of the equality of the sexes has led to a rejection of the concept that the wife is subservient to the husband in the [121] See Capper (1998) and Chen-Wishart (1997).

[122] Bigwood, 'Contracts by Unfair Advantage: From Exploitation to Transactional Neglect' (2005) 25 OJLS 65; Ferris; 'Why is the Law of Undue Influence So Hard to Understand and Apply?' in Modern Studies in Property Law: Vol 4 (ed Cooke, 2007).

[123] [1994] 1 AC 180.

[124] [2002] 2 AC 773.

[125] See also Royal Bank of Scotland v Etridge, ibid at 800–1, per Lord Nicholls.

> management of the family's finances. A number of the authorities reflect an unwillingness in the court to perpetuate law based on this outmoded concept. Yet [. . .] although the concept of the ignorant wife leaving all financial decisions to the husband is outmoded, the practice does not yet coincide with the ideal. In a substantial proportion of marriages it is still the husband who has the business experience and the wife is willing to follow his advice without bringing a truly independent mind and will to bear on financial decisions. The number of recent cases in this field shows that in practice many wives are still subjected to, and yield to, undue influence by their husbands. Such wives can reasonably look to the law for some protection when their husbands have abused the trust and confidence reposed in them.
>
> On the other hand, it is important to keep a sense of balance in approaching these cases. It is easy to allow sympathy for the wife who is threatened with the loss of her home at the suit of a rich bank to obscure an important public interest viz., the need to ensure that the wealth currently tied up in the matrimonial home does not become economically sterile. If the rights secured to wives by the law renders vulnerable loans granted on the security of matrimonial homes, institutions will be unwilling to accept such security, thereby reducing the flow of loan capital to business enterprises. It is therefore essential that a law designed to protect the vulnerable does not render the matrimonial home unacceptable as security to financial institutions.

The context is rather different from that commonly associated with undue influence where a donee has obtained a gift that the donor subsequently seeks to set aside, because his or her consent was obtained by undue influence. Here, it is the husband who, it is alleged, exerted undue influence to persuade his wife to grant a mortgage to the lender. There is no suggestion that the lender is guilty of undue influence, but, in O'Brien, the House of Lords decided that a lender who has actual or constructive notice of the risk of undue influence or misrepresentation by the husband will be bound by any right of the wife to set aside the mortgage against her interest in the home.

Barclays Bank plc v O'Brien
[1994] 1 AC 180, HL

Lord Browne-Wilkinson

At 191

> But in surety cases the decisive question is whether the claimant wife can set aside the transaction, not against the wrongdoing husband, but against the creditor bank. Of course, if the wrongdoing husband is acting as agent for the creditor bank in obtaining the surety from the wife, the creditor will be fixed with the wrongdoing of its own agent and the surety contract can be set aside as against the creditor. Apart from this, if the creditor bank has notice, actual or constructive, of the undue influence exercised by the husband (and consequentially of the wife's equity to set aside the transaction) the creditor will take subject to that equity and the wife can set aside the transaction against the creditor (albeit a purchaser for value) as well as against the husband: see Bainbrigge v. Browne (1881) 18 Ch.D. 188 and Bank of Credit and Commerce International S.A. v. Aboody [1990] 1 Q.B. 923, 973. Similarly, in cases such as the present where the wife has been induced to enter into the transaction by the husband's misrepresentation, her equity to set aside the transaction will be enforceable against the creditor if either the husband was acting as the creditor's agent or the creditor had actual or constructive notice.

It is unlikely that the husband is an agent of the lender and so it is the application of the concept of notice that has attracted the greatest attention. This application of notice must be contrasted with the doctrine of notice that we have considered in relation to the priority of proprietary interests in Chapter 13. Instead, what is in issue is the notice of a party to the mortgage (i.e. the lender) to the possibility that the wife's consent to the mortgage may have been obtained by improper means.

The distinction was highlighted in Royal Bank of Scotland v Etridge.[126]

Royal Bank of Scotland v Etridge
[2002] 2 AC 773, HL

Lord Scott

At [144]

The doctrine of notice is a doctrine that relates primarily and traditionally to the priority of competing property rights. [. . .] Banks and other lenders who take charges from surety wives are certainly purchasers of property rights. But they acquire their rights by grant from the surety wives themselves. The issue between the banks and the surety wives is not one of priority of competing interests. The issue is whether or not the surety wife is to be bound by her apparent consent to the grant of the security to the bank. If contractual consent has been procured by undue influence or misrepresentation for which a party to the contract is responsible, the other party, the victim, is entitled, subject to the usual defences of change of position, affirmation, delay etc, to avoid the contract. But the case is much more difficult if the undue influence has been exerted or the misrepresentation has been made not by the party with whom the victim has contracted, but by a third party. It is, in general, the objective manifestation of contractual consent that is critical. Deficiencies in the quality of consent to a contract by a contracting party, brought about by undue influence or misrepresentation by a third party, do not, in general, allow the victim to avoid the contract. But if the other contracting party had had actual knowledge of the undue influence or misrepresentation the victim would not, in my opinion, be held to the contract (see Commission for the New Towns v Cooper (Great Britain) Ltd [1995] Ch 259, 277–280 and Banco Exterior Internacional SA v Thomas [1997] 1 WLR 221, 229). But what if there had been no actual knowledge of the third party's undue influence or misrepresentation but merely knowledge of facts or circumstances that, if investigated, might have led to actual knowledge? In what circumstances does the law expect a contracting party to inquire into the reasons why the other party is entering into the contract or to go behind the other party's apparent agreement, objectively ascertained, to enter into the contract? These are the questions that Lord Browne-Wilkinson had to answer in O'Brien. They are contractual questions, not questions relating to competing property interests [. . .]

At [146]–[148]

In particular, it must be recognised that in the "bank v surety wife" cases the constructive notice that is sought to be attributed to the bank is not constructive notice of any pre-existing prior right or prior equity of the wife. The husband's impropriety, whether undue influence or misrepresentation, in procuring his wife to enter into a suretyship transaction with the bank would not entitle her to set it aside unless the bank had had notice of the impropriety. It is notice of the husband's impropriety that the bank must have, not notice of any prior rights of the wife. It is the notice that the bank has of the impropriety that creates the wife's right to set aside the transaction. The wife does not have any prior right or prior equity.

[126] See also [38]–[43], per Lord Nicholls.

In a case where the financial arrangements with the bank had been negotiated by the husband, no part in the negotiations having been played by the wife, and where the arrangements required the wife to become surety for her husband's debts, the bank would, or should, have been aware of the vulnerability of the wife and of the risk that her agreement might be procured by undue influence or misrepresentation by the husband. In these circumstances the bank would be "put on inquiry", as Lord Browne-Wilkinson put it. But "on inquiry" about what? Not about the existence of undue influence, for how could any inquiry reasonably to be expected of a bank satisfy the bank that there was no undue influence? "On inquiry", in my opinion, as to whether the wife understood the nature and effect of the transaction she was entering into. This is not an "inquiry" in the traditional constructive notice sense. The bank would not have to carry out any investigation or to ask any questions about the reasons why the wife was agreeing to the transaction or about her relationship with her husband. The bank would not, unless it had notice of additional facts pointing to undue influence or misrepresentation, be on notice that undue influence or misrepresentation was to be presumed. It would simply be on notice of a risk of some such impropriety. What Lord Browne-Wilkinson had in mind was that the bank should be expected to take reasonable steps to satisfy itself that she understood the transaction she was entering into. If the bank did so, no longer could constructive notice of any impropriety by the husband in procuring his wife's consent be imputed to it. The original constructive notice would have been shed. If, on the other hand, a bank with notice of the risk of some such impropriety, failed to take the requisite reasonable steps, then, if it transpired that the wife's consent had been procured by the husband's undue influence or misrepresentation, constructive knowledge that that was so would be imputed to the bank and the wife would have the same remedies as she would have had if the bank had had actual knowledge of the impropriety.

Under Lord Browne-Wilkinson's scheme for the protection of vulnerable wives it is the bank's perception of the risk that the wife's consent may have been procured by the husband's misrepresentation or undue influence that is central. The risk must be viewed through the eyes of the bank. Some degree of risk can, usually, never be wholly eliminated. But it can be reduced to a point at which it becomes reasonable for the bank to rely on the apparent consent of the wife to enter into the transaction and to take no further steps to satisfy itself that she understood the transaction she was entering into.

To avoid notice of the risk that the wife's consent to the mortgage has not been freely given, the lender must take reasonable and adequate steps to satisfy itself that the wife understood the nature of the mortgage into which she was entering, and that she was doing so of her independent will.

Three distinct stages were identified in Etridge to determine whether or not a mortgage may be set aside on the ground of undue influence.

Royal Bank of Scotland v Etridge
[2002] 2 AC 773, HL

Lord Hobhouse

At 819

It can be expressed by answering three questions: (1) Has the wife proved what is necessary for the court to be satisfied that the transaction was affected by the undue influence of the husband? (2) Was the lender put on inquiry? (3) If so, did the lender take reasonable steps to satisfy itself that there was no undue influence? It will be appreciated that unless the first question is answered in favour of the wife neither of the later questions arise. The wife has no defence and is liable. It will likewise be appreciated that the second and third questions arise from the fact that the wife is seeking to use the undue influence of her husband as a defence against the lender and therefore has to show that the lender should be affected by the equity—that it is unconscionable that the lender should enforce the secured contractual right against her.

3.3.1 The first stage: proof of undue influence

The wife must prove that she was unduly influenced by her husband: if there is no undue influence, there is no basis upon which she can set aside the mortgage against her interest in the home. Undue influence may be established either by proof of facts that demonstrate actual undue influence (e.g. threats of physical violence or psychological pressure), which left the wife unable to exercise her own judgment, or by producing evidence that will enable the court to infer that the wife's entry into the mortgage was obtained by the undue influence that her husband was presumed to have exerted. It is for the wife to prove either actual or presumed undue influence; upon establishing facts that raise a presumption of undue influence, however, the burden of proof shifts to the dominant party (i.e. the husband or the bank) to demonstrate that, in fact, the wife's participation was an exercise of her independent will.

These alternative ways of proving undue influence were characterized in BCCI v Aboody[127] as 'Class 1 actual undue influence' and 'Class 2 presumed undue influence', which could be inferred either through proof of a Class 2A relationship, when certain limited types of relationship (see above) were themselves sufficient to found the presumption, or in Class 2B, upon proof that the particular relationship was one of trust and confidence. Although the House of Lords in O'Brien adopted this classification, in Etridge, the House observed that the classification had led to an overly formulaic approach that had obscured the evidentiary role of presumed undue influence. Instead, the Lords reiterated that proof of undue influence was a question of fact, and articulated in more detailed and stringent terms when undue influence would be proved.[128]

Royal Bank of Scotland v Etridge
[2002] 2 AC 773, HL

Lord Nicholls

At [13]–[14]

Whether a transaction was brought about by the exercise of undue influence is a question of fact. Here, as elsewhere, the general principle is that he who asserts a wrong has been committed must prove it. The burden of proving an allegation of undue influence rests upon the person who claims to have been wronged. This is the general rule. The evidence required to discharge the burden of proof depends on the nature of the alleged undue influence, the [127] [1991] 1 QB 923.

[128] See also [2002] 2 AC 773, [882], per Lord Hobhouse.

personality of the parties, their relationship, the extent to which the transaction cannot readily be accounted for by the ordinary motives of ordinary persons in that relationship, and all the circumstances of the case.

Proof that the complainant placed trust and confidence in the other party in relation to the management of the complainant's financial affairs, coupled with a transaction which calls for explanation, will normally be sufficient, failing satisfactory evidence to the contrary, to discharge the burden of proof. On proof of these two matters the stage is set for the court to infer that, in the absence of a satisfactory explanation, the transaction can only have been procured by undue influence. In other words, proof of these two facts is prima facie evidence that the defendant abused the influence he acquired in the parties' relationship. He preferred his own interests. He did not behave fairly to the other. So the evidential burden then shifts to him. It is for him to produce evidence to counter the inference which otherwise should be drawn [. . .]

At [16]–[19]

Generations of equity lawyers have conventionally described this situation as one in which a presumption of undue influence arises. This use of the term "presumption" is descriptive of a shift in the evidential onus on a question of fact. When a plaintiff succeeds by this route he does so because he has succeeded in establishing a case of undue influence. The court has drawn appropriate inferences of fact upon a balanced consideration of the whole of the evidence at the end of a trial in which the burden of proof rested upon the plaintiff. The use, in the course of the trial, of the forensic tool of a shift in the evidential burden of proof should not be permitted to obscure the overall position. These cases are the equitable counterpart of common law cases where the principle of res ipsa loquitur is invoked. There is a rebuttable evidential presumption of undue influence.

The availability of this forensic tool in cases founded on abuse of influence arising from the parties' relationship has led to this type of case sometimes being labelled "presumed undue influence". This is by way of contrast with cases involving actual pressure or the like, which are labelled "actual undue influence": [. . .]

The evidential presumption discussed above is to be distinguished sharply from a different form of presumption which arises in some cases. The law has adopted a sternly protective attitude towards certain types of relationship in which one party acquires influence over another who is vulnerable and dependent and where, moreover, substantial gifts by the influenced or vulnerable person are not normally to be expected. Examples of relationships within this special class are parent and child, guardian and ward, trustee and beneficiary, solicitor and client, and medical adviser and patient. In these cases the law presumes, irrebuttably, that one party had influence over the other. The complainant need not prove he actually reposed trust and confidence in the other party. It is sufficient for him to prove the existence of the type of relationship.

It is now well established that husband and wife is not one of the relationships to which this latter principle applies.

Thus, a wife wishing to raise a presumption of undue influence will need to provide evidence to the court: firstly, that the relationship she enjoyed with her husband in respect of financial decisions was one in which she reposed trust and confidence, rather than exercised her own judgment; and secondly, that the nature of the mortgage itself leads to an inference that there was a risk that her husband persuaded her to enter into the mortgage by questionable means. The burden of proof will then shift to establish that the wife did, in fact, give her consent freely.

As we have already observed, a relationship of trust and confidence is easier to recognize than to define. Lord Scott in Etridge went so far as to suggest that, in the normal course, a husband and wife's relationship was one of trust and confidence, and what was required was proof that this inherent trust and confidence had been abused.

Royal Bank of Scotland v Etridge

[2002] 2 AC 773, HL

Lord Scott

At [159]–[160]

For my part, I would assume in every case in which a wife and husband are living together that there is a reciprocal trust and confidence between them. In the fairly common circumstance that the financial and business decisions of the family are primarily taken by the husband, I would assume that the wife would have trust and confidence in his ability to do so and would support his decisions. I would not expect evidence to be necessary to establish the existence of that trust and confidence. I would expect evidence to be necessary to demonstrate its absence. In cases where experience, probably bitter, had led a wife to doubt the wisdom of her husband's financial or business decisions, I still would not regard her willingness to support those decisions with her own assets as an indication that he had exerted undue influence over her to persuade her to do so. Rather I would regard her support as a natural and admirable consequence of the relationship of a mutually loyal married couple. The proposition that if a wife, who generally reposes trust and confidence in her husband, agrees to become surety to support his debts or his business enterprises a presumption of undue influence arises is one that I am unable to accept. To regard the husband in such a case as a presumed "wrongdoer" does not seem to me consistent with the relationship of trust and confidence that is a part of every healthy marriage.

There are, of course, cases where a husband does abuse that trust and confidence. He may do so by expressions of quite unjustified over-optimistic enthusiasm about the prospects of success of his business enterprises. He may do so by positive misrepresentation of his business intentions, or of the nature of the security he is asking his wife to grant his creditors, or of some other material matter. He may do so by subjecting her to excessive pressure, emotional blackmail or bullying in order to persuade her to sign. But none of these things should, in my opinion, be presumed merely from the fact of the relationship of general trust and confidence. More is needed before the stage is reached at which, in the absence of any other evidence, an inference of undue influence can properly be drawn or a presumption of the existence of undue influence can be said to arise.

Relevant factors in determining the strength of a spousal relationship of trust and confidence include: the relative ages, education, and experience of the husband and wife; as well as the nature of their relationship, including its length; their respective characters; and the roles that they have assumed in their joint lives. Cultural factors may also have a part of play where particular religious or social norms dictate that a wife plays a subservient role in financial matters.[129] Feminist legal scholars have highlighted the gender imbalance inherent in the spousal relationship and have dubbed the phenomenon 'sexual transmitted debt'.[130]

[129] See Barclays Bank v Coleman [2002] 2 AC 773.
[130] See Kaye, 'Equity's Treatment of Sexually Transmitted Debt' (1997) 5 Feminist LS 35.

The House of Lords have underlined that a relationship of trust and confidence may exist between cohabiting heterosexual and homosexual couples, as well as between husband and wife. Nevertheless, trust and confidence is not dependent on a sexual relationship, but may arise in other close relationships—for example, between other family members[131]—and may even exceptionally exist in relationships that are apparently commercial—for example, that between employer and employee.[132]

Proof of a relationship of trust and confidence is not in itself sufficient; the wife must also prove that her entry into the mortgage is not readily explicable as an exercise of her independent will. In National Westminster Bank v Morgan,[133] the House of Lords had initially called for proof of a transaction that was 'manifestly disadvantageous' to the wife because, for example, she did not benefit from the loan. The courts often inclined to the view that a collateral mortgage over the family home to secure a loan to the husband's business was manifestly disadvantageous, in that the wife was placing the residential security of the home at risk for no direct financial benefit. A flood of undue influence cases followed. The House of Lords in Etridge abandoned the manifest disadvantage label and reverted instead to the test laid down in Allcard v Skinner,[134] which looks to whether or not the transaction is explicable by the relationship of the parties or calls for some further explanation.[135] The House also observed that a collateral mortgage of the family home to secure a husband's business debts will often be explicable by the nature of the parties' relationship and will not require any further explanation.[136]

Royal Bank of Scotland v Etridge
[2002] 2 AC 773, HL

Lord Nicholls

At [30]–[33] and [36]

[. . .] I do not think that, in the ordinary course, a guarantee of the character I have mentioned is to be regarded as a transaction which, failing proof to the contrary, is explicable only on the basis that it has been procured by the exercise of undue influence by the husband. Wives frequently enter into such transactions. There are good and sufficient reasons why they are willing to do so, despite the risks involved for them and their families. They may be enthusiastic. They may not. They may be less optimistic than their husbands about the prospects of the husbands' businesses. They may be anxious, perhaps exceedingly so. But this is a far cry from saying that such transactions as a class are to be regarded as prima facie evidence of the exercise of undue influence by husbands.

I have emphasised the phrase "in the ordinary course". There will be cases where a wife's signature of a guarantee or a charge of her share in the matrimonial home does call for explanation.

131 See Abbey National Bank plc v Stringer [2006] EWCA Civ 338.

132 See Credit Lyonnais v Burch [1997] 1 All ER 144.

133 [1985] AC 686.

134 (1885) 26 Ch D 145.

135 See Chater v Mortgage Services Agency Number Two Ltd [2003] EWCA Civ 490; National Commercial Bank (Jamaica) Ltd v Hew [2003] UKPC 51; Maklin v Dowsett [2004] EWCA Civ 904; Turkey v Awadh [2005] 2 FCR 7; Abbey National v Stringer [2006] EWCA Civ 338.

136 Lord Hobhouse suggested that a mortgage to secure the unlimited debts of the husband's business called for an explanation: [2002] 2 AC 733, [112].

> I add a cautionary note [. . .] It concerns the general approach to be adopted by a court when considering whether a wife's guarantee of her husband's bank overdraft was procured by her husband's undue influence. Undue influence has a connotation of impropriety. In the eye of the law, undue influence means that influence has been misused. Statements or conduct by a husband which do not pass beyond the bounds of what may be expected of a reasonable husband in the circumstances should not, without more, be castigated as undue influence. Similarly, when a husband is forecasting the future of his business, and expressing his hopes or fears, a degree of hyperbole may be only natural. Courts should not too readily treat such exaggerations as misstatements.
>
> Inaccurate explanations of a proposed transaction are a different matter. So are cases where a husband, in whom a wife has reposed trust and confidence for the management of their financial affairs, prefers his interests to hers and makes a choice for both of them on that footing. Such a husband abuses the influence he has. He fails to discharge the obligation of candour and fairness he owes a wife who is looking to him to make the major financial decisions [. . .]
>
> At the same time, the high degree of trust and confidence and emotional interdependence which normally characterises a marriage relationship provides scope for abuse. One party may take advantage of the other's vulnerability. Unhappily, such abuse does occur. Further, it is all too easy for a husband, anxious or even desperate for bank finance, to misstate the position in some particular or to mislead the wife, wittingly or unwittingly, in some other way. The law would be seriously defective if it did not recognise these realities.

In the latter part of the above extract Lord Nicholls refers to the need for 'candour and fairness' in a relationship of trust and confidence and the connotations of impropriety upon which undue influence is founded. He makes these observations in the context of the (mis-) statements that may be made to encourage the wife to act as surety but candour and fairness may equally call for openness by the husband, which requires disclosure of facts that would affect the wife's decision. For instance, in Hewett v First Plus Financial Group Plc[137] a husband, who hid the fact that he was having an affair when persuading his wife to mortgage their family home to avoid his bankruptcy, was found to have unduly influenced his wife.

A presumption of undue influence may be rebutted by proof (provided by the husband or lender) that the wife did, in fact, enter into the mortgage of her own free and independent will. The most usual way of demonstrating that this is so, is to show that the wife decided to enter into the mortgage after receiving independent advice, thus breaking the influence that previously controlled her actions. The courts have been at pains to point out, however, that independent advice is no assurance that the presumption is rebutted; that is a question of fact, in the light of all of the circumstances.[138]

The House of Lords in Etridge provided guidance to solicitors when called upon to advise a wife.[139] The solicitors must be suitably qualified, both in terms of their professional capability to provide advice and their impartiality. There must be no conflict with the interests of their other clients: for example, the husband or the lender. The advice must be given in an environment that is free from the husband's influence and at a time before the transaction that provides sufficient opportunity for the wife to consider the import of the advice before she decides whether or not to proceed. The advice itself must not only explain the terms of 137 [2010] 2 P&CR 22. See also Royal Bank of Scotland v Chandra [2010] 1 Lloyds Rep 677.

138 BCCI v Aboody [1990] 1 QB 923, 971; UBC Corporate Services Ltd v Williams [2002] EWCA Civ 555.

139 [2002] 2 AC 733, [64]–[69], per Lord Nicholls, and [169]–[170], per Lord Scott.

the mortgage, but must also explain the implications and consequences of the mortgage for the wife—in particular, that she could lose her home or become bankrupt if the loan is not repaid. The more difficult issue is the extent to which the solicitor should weigh and advise on the risks of enforcement, in the light of the wife's liabilities under the mortgage. The solicitor can make observations on the legal extent of these liabilities, but may not be qualified, or may not have sufficient information, to provide guidance on the commercial risks of the business generating the projected profit to meet those liabilities. What is clear is that the solicitor should press home that 'the wife has a choice. The decision is hers and hers alone'.[140]

3.3.2 The second stage: notice of the bank

We have already observed that a lender, although not itself guilty of undue influence, may become subject to a wife's equity to set aside a mortgage entered into as result of the husband's actual or presumed undue influence, where it has notice of the risk that a wife may not have exercised her own independent judgment.

The House of Lords in O'Brien had set a test of notice that required proof of a relationship carrying a heightened risk of equitable wrong (whether of duress, undue influence, or misrepresentation) and a transaction that was disadvantageous to the weaker party—a test that tended to converge with that of presumed undue influence under O'Brien. In Etridge, however, the Lords clearly differentiated the two stages. Whilst they expressed proof of presumed undue influence in more stringent terms, they set a simple and relatively low-level threshold of notice, which would be straightforward for lenders to identify. The Etridge test provides that a lender should be put on notice whenever a wife stood as a surety for her husband's debts. The difficulty is that it is not always easy to identify whether it is the husband's business or a family business in which the wife is also interested.

Royal Bank of Scotland v Etridge
[2002] 2 AC 773, HL

Lord Nicholls

At [48]–[49]

As to the type of transactions where a bank is put on inquiry, the case where a wife becomes surety for her husband's debts is, in this context, a straightforward case. The bank is put on inquiry. On the other side of the line is the case where money is being advanced, or has been advanced, to husband and wife jointly. In such a case the bank is not put on inquiry, unless the bank is aware the loan is being made for the husband's purposes, as distinct from their joint purposes. That was decided in CIBC Mortgages plc v Pitt [1994] 1 AC 200.

Less clear cut is the case where the wife becomes surety for the debts of a company whose shares are held by her and her husband. Her shareholding may be nominal, or she may have a minority shareholding or an equal shareholding with her husband. In my view the bank is put on inquiry in such cases, even when the wife is a director or secretary of the company. Such cases cannot be equated with joint loans. The shareholding interests, and the identity of the directors, are not a reliable guide to the identity of the persons who actually have the conduct of the company's business.

[140] Ibid, [65]. Solicitors were found negligent in Burbank Securities Ltd v Wong [2008] EWHC 552.

The House of Lords in Etridge set a similar low threshold where there is a risk of presumed undue influence between other parties, who enjoy a relationship of trust and confidence, and who enter into a mortgage that calls for an explanation. In these circumstances, a bank is 'put on inquiry' of the risk of presumed undue influence whenever the relationship between the surety and the debtor is non-commercial.[141]

A bank will, thus, not be put on inquiry where the loan is to the husband and wife (or other parties) as joint borrowers unless the bank is aware that the loan is solely for the use of just one of the parties.[142] Where the loan is made to a sole borrower the lender will be put on inquiry if they were aware that the loan was for the benefit of another with whom the borrower enjoyed a relationship of trust and confidence.[143]

3.3.3 The third stage: the steps that the bank should take

Where the bank has notice of the risk that the surety's consent may have been procured by undue influence, it is required to 'take reasonable steps to bring home to the individual guarantor the risks he is running by standing as surety'.[144] In both O'Brien and Etridge, the House of Lords was at pains to outline what those steps should be. In O'Brien, Lord Brown-Wilkinson suggested that the bank should arrange a private interview with the wife to explain to her those risks and advise her to take independent advice. But this practice did not find favour with lenders; they were reluctant to take direct responsibility for advising the wife; instead, they preferred to look to solicitors to shoulder that task. As a result, the House of Lords in Etridge reformulated the steps that a lender should take, emphasizing that the situation should be examined from the point of view of the lender. Those steps are not directed at 'discovering whether the wife has been wronged by her husband', but are 'concerned to minimise the risk that such a wrong may have been committed'.[145]

Royal Bank of Scotland v Etridge
[2002] 2 AC 773, HL

Lord Nicholls

At [54]

The furthest a bank can be expected to go is to take reasonable steps to satisfy itself that the wife has had brought home to her, in a meaningful way, the practical implications of the proposed transaction. This does not wholly eliminate the risk of undue influence or misrepresentation. But it does mean that a wife enters into a transaction with her eyes open so far as the basic elements of the transaction are concerned

[. . .]

At [79]

I now return to the steps a bank should take when it has been put on inquiry and for its protection is looking to the fact that the wife has been advised independently by a solicitor.

141 Ibid, [87], per Lord Nicholls.
142 Ibid, [48] per Lord Nicholls. See also CIBC v Pitt [1994] 1 AC 200 and Chater v Mortgage Services Agency Number Two Ltd [2003] EWCA Civ 490.
143 See, e.g. Burbank Securities Ltd v Wong [2008] EWHC 552
144 156 Royal Bank of Scotland v Etridge [2002] 2 AC 773, [87], per Lord Nicholls.
145 Ibid, [41], per Lord Nicholls. See also [164]–[165], per Lord Scott.

1. One of the unsatisfactory features in some of the cases is the late stage at which the wife first became involved in the transaction. In practice she had no opportunity to express a view on the identity of the solicitor who advised her. She did not even know that the purpose for which the solicitor was giving her advice was to enable him to send, on her behalf, the protective confirmation sought by the bank. Usually the solicitor acted for both husband and wife.

Since the bank is looking for its protection to legal advice given to the wife by a solicitor who, in this respect, is acting solely for her, I consider the bank should take steps to check directly with the wife the name of the solicitor she wishes to act for her. To this end, in future the bank should communicate directly with the wife, informing her that for its own protection it will require written confirmation from a solicitor, acting for her, to the effect that the solicitor has fully explained to her the nature of the documents and the practical implications they will have for her. She should be told that the purpose of this requirement is that thereafter she should not be able to dispute she is legally bound by the documents once she has signed them. She should be asked to nominate a solicitor whom she is willing to instruct to advise her, separately from her husband, and act for her in giving the necessary confirmation to the bank. She should be told that, if she wishes, the solicitor may be the same solicitor as is acting for her husband in the transaction. If a solicitor is already acting for the husband and the wife, she should be asked whether she would prefer that a different solicitor should act for her regarding the bank's requirement for confirmation from a solicitor.

The bank should not proceed with the transaction until it has received an appropriate response directly from the wife.

2. Representatives of the bank are likely to have a much better picture of the husband's financial affairs than the solicitor. If the bank is not willing to undertake the task of explanation itself, the bank must provide the solicitor with the financial information he needs for this purpose. Accordingly it should become routine practice for banks, if relying on confirmation from a solicitor for their protection, to send to the solicitor the necessary financial information. What is required must depend on the facts of the case. Ordinarily this will include information on the purpose for which the proposed new facility has been requested, the current amount of the husband's indebtedness, the amount of his current overdraft facility, and the amount and terms of any new facility. If the bank's request for security arose from a written application by the husband for a facility, a copy of the application should be sent to the solicitor. The bank will, of course, need first to obtain the consent of its customer to this circulation of confidential information. If this consent is not forthcoming the transaction will not be able to proceed.

3. Exceptionally there may be a case where the bank believes or suspects that the wife has been misled by her husband or is not entering into the transaction of her own free will. If such a case occurs the bank must inform the wife's solicitors of the facts giving rise to its belief or suspicion.

4. The bank should in every case obtain from the wife's solicitor a written confirmation to the effect mentioned above.

The focus of these steps is thus to ensure that the wife is legally represented and that the lender receives confirmation from the solicitor acting for her that she has received advice.[146]

[146] Lloyds TSB Bank Plc v Holdgate [2002] EWCA Civ 1543 [2003] HLR 25 Bank of Scotland v Hill [2002] EWCA Civ 1081.

To ensure that the wife's solicitor is in a position to give meaningful advice, the lender must disclose relevant financial information and any information that gives rise to any particular suspicions that the wife may have been improperly influenced by her husband. Given that the situation is viewed from the position of the lender, the lender is not required to be privy to the advice that the wife actually receives; it merely needs to receive confirmation that she has received advice, even if that advice is inadequate. The wife's right of action in these circumstances is against her solicitor for his or her negligent advice; she cannot challenge the mortgage itself unless the lender actually learns that she did not received advice or that the advice was inadequate.[147]

A further difficult question is the independence of the wife's solicitor: can a solicitor who acts also for the bank and/or the husband provide adequate independent advice to the wife? Clearly, it is preferable that the wife receives advice from a solicitor who can take a wholly impartial view of the prudence of the mortgage, but to add the fees of another professional adviser may be unwarranted in a situation in which finances are already stretched. The House of Lords in Etridge addressed this issue in a pragmatic fashion by leaving it to the solicitor's professional judgment to decide if there was an unacceptable conflict of interest.

Royal Bank of Scotland v Etridge
[2002] 2 AC 773, HL

Lord Nicholls

At [74]

The advantages attendant upon the employment of a solicitor acting solely for the wife do not justify the additional expense this would involve for the husband. When accepting instructions to advise the wife the solicitor assumes responsibilities directly to her, both at law and professionally. These duties, and this is central to the reasoning on this point, are owed to the wife alone. In advising the wife the solicitor is acting for the wife alone. He is concerned only with her interests. I emphasise, therefore, that in every case the solicitor must consider carefully whether there is any conflict of duty or interest and, more widely, whether it would be in the best interests of the wife for him to accept instructions from her. If he decides to accept instructions, his assumption of legal and professional responsibilities to her ought, in the ordinary course of things, to provide sufficient assurance that he will give the requisite advice fully, carefully and conscientiously. Especially so, now that the nature of the advice called for has been clarified. If at any stage the solicitor becomes concerned that there is a real risk that other interests or duties may inhibit his advice to the wife he must cease to act for her.

These steps lay down straightforward practical guidance for the normal case, but where the lender is aware of particular circumstances that increase the risk of impropriety, it needs to take additional precautions: for example, by making sure that the wife is advised by a solicitor who is not also representing the husband.[148]

[147] Per Lord Scott at [175]. [148] Per Lord Scott at [174].

4 CONTROL OF MORTGAGE TERMS

The underlying principle is freedom of contract: the parties should be free to determine the terms of their loan and any mortgage to secure its repayment. But throughout the history of money lending, there has been a recognition that 'necessitous men are not, truly speaking, free men'[149] and thus borrowers may require a level of protection against the often stronger bargaining power of lenders. The focus of this protection has changed as social and economic conditions have altered the nature of borrowers and their borrowing.

In early times, the laws against usury initially prohibited, and then controlled, interest rates to protect the souls of all. We have seen that, under the traditional mortgage by conveyance, the Chancery courts from the seventeenth century onwards would protect the borrower's right to redeem, so that the mortgage took effect only by way of security. Borrowers during this period were often landowners who needed relatively short-term financial relief, but, with the growing impact of the Industrial Revolution, the expansion of the Empire, and the importance of trade, the nineteenth century saw a growth in commercial borrowers. More often than not, they were astute businessmen who were able to wield sufficient negotiating power to look after themselves. Accordingly, protection of the equity of redemption on mortgages taken out to finance the business exploits of these borrowers became less of a priority.

We have also noted that equity would frustrate the exploitation of particularly vulnerable borrowers by setting aside unconscionable bargains. This equitable jurisdiction was originally intended to protect heirs mortgaging their prospective interests in their family's landed estates, but it developed into a general jurisdiction to protect all vulnerable borrowers. It has been employed to vary mortgage terms that are demonstrably oppressive or unconscionable—a contribution that remains of significance today where borrowing is not subject to statutory control.

In more recent times, it is the cash-strapped individual consumer who is more often in need of protection from institutional lenders. Government has come to his or her relief through legislation that, as we have already examined, operates initially through market regulation, but may also intervene to control mortgage terms.

The primary targets of control have been terms that inhibited redemption, terms that determine the level or fluctuation of interest rates, whether as a result of market conditions or upon the borrower's default, and terms that provide for some collateral advantage to the lender. In our survey of the legal control of mortgage terms, we will look first at the common law, equitable, and statutory control mechanisms, before examining how these mechanisms operate to control these different types of term.

4.1 SOURCES OF CONTROL

4.1.1 The common law

Common law controls are few, but the restraint of trade doctrine has been pressed into service to control collateral advantages that require the borrower to purchase products solely from the lender. Nowadays, extensive competition laws and market regulation provide a more effective and comprehensive framework to promote a free market domestically, globally, and within the European context.

[149] Vernon v Bethell (1761) 2 Eden 113, per Lord Nottingham.

Implied terms have provided some limited control over the power of lenders to vary interest rates where an appeal to control on grounds of public policy has failed.

4.1.2 Equitable control

Equitable control of mortgage terms is derived from two sources.[150] First, equity's protection against unconscionable bargains has been applied to vary oppressive and unconscionable mortgage terms, where both substantive and procedural unconscionability is established, and now underpins equity's most effective intervention.

Secondly, using the clogs and fetters doctrine, equity has struck down terms that bar or inhibit the borrower's equitable right to redeem. The origin of this jurisdiction was described by Lord Haldane in the following leading case.

G&K Kreglinger v New Patagonia Meat and Cold Storage Co Ltd
[1914] AC 25, HL

Lord Haldane

At 35

The reason for which a Court of Equity will set aside the legal title of a mortgagee and compel him to reconvey the land on being paid principal, interest, and costs is a very old one. It appears to owe its origin to the influence of the Church in the Courts of the early Chancellors. As early as the Council of Lateran in 1179, we find, according to Matthew Paris (Historia Major, 1684 ed. at pp. 114–115), that famous assembly of ecclesiastics condemning usurers and laying down that when a creditor had been paid his debt he should restore his pledge. It was therefore not surprising that the Court of Chancery should at an early date have begun to exercise jurisdiction in personam over mortgagees. This jurisdiction was merely a special application of a more general power to relieve against penalties and to mould them into mere securities. The case of the common law mortgage of land was indeed a gross one. The land was conveyed to the creditor upon the condition that if the money he had advanced to the feoffor was repaid on a date and at a place named, the fee simple should revest in the latter, but that if the condition was not strictly and literally fulfilled he should lose the land for ever. What made the hardship on the debtor a glaring one was that the debt still remained unpaid and could be recovered from the feoffor notwithstanding that he had actually forfeited the land to his mortgagee. Equity, therefore, at an early date began to relieve against what was virtually a penalty by compelling the creditor to use his legal title as a mere security.

My Lords, this was the origin of the jurisdiction which we are now considering, and it is important to bear that origin in mind. For the end to accomplish which the jurisdiction has been evolved ought to govern and limit its exercise by equity judges. That end has always been to ascertain, by parol evidence if need be, the real nature and substance of the transaction, and if it turned out to be in truth one of mortgage simply, to place it on that footing. It was, in ordinary cases, only where there was conduct which the Court of Chancery regarded as unconscientious that it interfered with freedom of contract. The lending of money, on mortgage or otherwise, was looked on with suspicion, and the Court was on the alert to discover > want of conscience in the terms imposed by lenders. But whatever else may have been the intention of those judges who laid the foundations of the modern doctrines with which we are concerned in this appeal, they certainly do not appear to have contemplated that their principle should develop consequences which would go far beyond the necessities of the case with which they were dealing and interfere with transactions which were not really of the nature of a mortgage, and which were free from objection on moral grounds. Moreover, the principle on which the Court of Chancery interfered with contracts of the class under consideration was not a rigid one. The equity judges looked, not at what was technically the form, but at what was really the substance of transactions, and confined the application of their rules to cases in which they thought that in its substance the transaction was oppressive [...] The principle was thus in early days limited in its application to the accomplishment of the end which was held to justify interference of equity with freedom of contract. It did not go further. As established it was expressed in three ways. The most general of these was that if the transaction was once found to be a mortgage, it must be treated as always remaining a mortgage and nothing but a mortgage. That the substance of the transaction must be looked to in applying this doctrine and that it did not apply to cases which were only apparently or technically within it but were in reality something more than cases of mortgage, Howard v. Harris (1683) 1 Vern 33 2 Ch Cas 147 and other authorities shew.

150 Bamford, 'Lord Macnaghten's Puzzle: The Mortgage of Real Property in English Law' [1996] CLP 207.

Equity's protection of the equitable right to redeem has been gradually eroded away since its heyday, when any clog or fetter on the borrower's right to recover his or her property was struck down. It does continue to be of significance where a device bars the right to redeem. This remaining intervention has been the subject of criticism by both judges and commentators.[151] In Jones v Morgan,[152] the Master of the Rolls, Lord Phillips, suggested that '[the] doctrine of a clog on the equity of redemption is [...] an appendix to our law which no longer serves a useful purpose and would be better excised'. The Law Commission has made such a recommendation, but the doctrine continues to limp along, causing more problems than it solves.[153]

We should add one further equitable contribution to the regulation of mortgage terms: the prohibition on penalties. Equity will strike down a provision that provides for a payment to be made by a party in default that is not a genuine pre-estimation of the loss that the innocent party may suffer.[154]

4.1.3 Statutory consumer control

We have already noted the extensive regulation of the domestic credit market both through the FSMA 2000, which regulates most first mortgages over dwelling houses, and the CCA

151 See Devonshire, 'The Modern Application of the Rule Against Clogs in The Equity of Redemption' (1997) 5 APLJ 1; Thompson, 'Do We Really Need Clogs?' [2001] Conv 502; Duncan and Wilmott, 'Clogging the Equity of Redemption: An Outmoded Concept' (2002) 2 QUTLJJ 35; Berg, 'Clogs on the Equity of Redemption: Or Chaining an Unruly Dog' [2002] JBL 335; Devenney, 'A Pack of Unruly Dogs: Unconscionable Bargains, Lawful Act (Economic) Duress and Clogs on the Equity of Redemption' (2002) JBL 539; Watt, 'Mortgage Law as Fiction' in Modern Studies in Property Law: Vol 4 (ed Cooke, 2007, p 89).

152 [2001] EWCA Civ 995, [72].

153 Law Commission Report No 204, Land Mortgages (2001, Part VIII).

154 Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Ltd v New Garage and Motor Co Ltd [1915] AC 79; Philips Hong Kong Ltd v AG of Hong Kong (1993) 61 BLR 41.

1974 (as amended), which governs much of the secondary secured lending market.[155] Inevitably, these regulatory controls impact upon mortgage terms.

Another source of protection arises from the treatment of borrowers as consumers and entitled to general consumer protection. This consumer protection is to be found in the Unfair Terms in Consumer Contract Regulations 1999[156] and the Unfair Practices Regulations 2008.[157] After some initial hesitation, it is clear that these regulations do apply to contracts affecting land, including mortgages.[158] They apply to individual borrowers, but not companies. Thus they may be used to control the fairness of terms and practices governing many non-commercial mortgages, whether regulated under the FSMA 2000 or the CCA 1974.

An unfair term is not binding on the borrower.[159] The OFT also acts at a regulatory level as a consumer watchdog by considering and taking action on complaints made both by consumers and consumer organizations, by investigating and providing guidance on potentially unfair terms and practices in consumer contracts, and by issuing proceedings by way of injunction to restrain the use of unfair terms.[160] The OFT rarely has to resort to judicial proceedings, but, instead, will extract an undertaking from an offending lender to alter its loan terms or practices. The OFT's tactics appear to work, with its bulletins full of reports of terms that have been altered, so triggering a ripple effect on other lenders with similar terms and conditions.[161]

The OFT issued its initial guidance on the 1999 Regulations in 2001 and updated this guidance in 2008.[162] It has also issued joint guidance, with the Department of Business Enterprise and Regulatory Reform (BERR) upon the 2008 Regulations.[163] Further specific guidance has been issued on Calculating Fair Default Charges on Credit Card Contracts, which has wider implications for similar default charges found in mortgages.[164]

The definition of an unfair term is found in regs 5 and 6 of the 1999 Regulations.

Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999, regs 5 and 6

Unfair terms

5.—(1) A contractual term which has not been individually negotiated shall be regarded as unfair if, contrary to the requirement of good faith, it causes a significant imbalance in the parties' rights and obligations arising under the contract, to the detriment of the consumer.

(2) A term shall always be regarded as not having been individually negotiated where it has been drafted in advance and the consumer has therefore not been able to influence the substance of the term.

155 See section 2 above.

156 SI 1999/2083, which amends and replaces the original regulations in SI 1994/3159. The OFT has issued a guidance note on the Regulations: see OFT 143 (2005). These Regulations were enacted in pursuance of Council Directive 93/13/EEC of 5 April 1993 on unfair terms in consumer contracts.

157 SI 2008/1277, enacted in pursuance of Council Directive 2005/29/EC of 11 May 2005 on unfair business-to-consumer commercial practices in the internal market (the Unfair Commercial Practices Directive).

158 Newham LBC v Khatun [2004] EWCA Civ 55, [2005] QB 37.

159 Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999, reg 8.

160 Ibid, regs 10–15. Certain other bodies are also granted supervisory powers.

161 Bright, 'Winning the Battle Against Unfair Contract Terms' (2000) 20 Legal Studies 331.

162 OFT 311 (January 2008).

163 See OFT, Guidance on the UK Regulations: Implementing the Unfair Commercial Practices Directive (2008).

164 OFT 842 (2006).

(3) Notwithstanding that a specific term or certain aspects of it in a contract has been individually negotiated, these Regulations shall apply to the rest of a contract if an overall assessment of it indicates that it is a pre-formulated standard contract.

(4) It shall be for any seller or supplier who claims that a term was individually negotiated to show that it was.

(5) Schedule 2 to these Regulations contains an indicative and non-exhaustive list of the terms which may be regarded as unfair.

Assessment of unfair terms

6.—(1) Without prejudice to regulation 12, the unfairness of a contractual term shall be assessed, taking into account the nature of the goods or services for which the contract was concluded and by referring, at the time of conclusion of the contract, to all the circumstances attending the conclusion of the contract and to all the other terms of the contract or of another contract on which it is dependent.

(2) In so far as it is in plain intelligible language, the assessment of fairness of a term shall not relate—

(a) to the definition of the main subject matter of the contract, or

(b) to the adequacy of the price or remuneration, as against the goods or services supplied in exchange.

The focus of the requirement of fairness is upon standard terms and conditions, which are not individually negotiated by the lender and the borrower.[165] The core terms of the contract are excluded from the requirement for fairness, but must be expressed in plain intelligible language.[166] Core terms are those terms that relate to the main subject matter of the contract or the adequacy of the consideration.[167]

It is suggested that the core terms of a mortgage should be restricted to the amount of the loan and the level of interest chargeable. In this regard the Supreme Court in Abbey National v OFT[168] held that not only the 'essential' price but also an 'ancillary' price constituted the core term so that the fairness of unauthorized overdraft charges could not be scrutinized under the 1999 Regulations since they formed part of the price for the overall package of banking services provided by the bank to its current account customers. Nevertheless, the House of Lords, in Director General of Fair Trading v First National Bank plc,[169] has made clear that the interpretation of 'core terms' is to be restrictively construed and, thus, did not extend to additional charges payable as a result of the borrower's default. The case concerned the right of the bank, under a contractual term, to continue to claim interest at the contractual rate (rather than at the statutory rate applicable to judgment debts) until the total amount of any judgment debt obtained after the borrower's default had been discharged. Lord Steyn (referring to the earlier form of the Regulations) made the following observation.

165 Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999, reg 5(2). See UK Housing Alliance (North West) Ltd v Francis [2010] EWCA Civ 117.

166 Ibid, reg 6(2). 167 Ibid.

168 [2010] 1 AC 696. 169 [2001] UKHL 52.

Director General of Fair Trading v First National Bank plc
[2002] 1 AC 481, HL

Lord Steyn

At [34]

Clause 8 of the contract, the only provision in dispute, is a default provision. It prescribes remedies which only become available to the lender upon the default of the consumer. For this reason the escape route of regulation 3(2) is not available to the bank. So far as the description of terms covered by regulation 3(2) as core terms is helpful at all, I would say that clause 8 of the contract is a subsidiary term. In any event, article 3(2) must be given a restrictive interpretation. Unless that is done article 3(2)(a) will enable the main purpose of the scheme to be frustrated by endless formalistic arguments as to whether a provision is a definitional or an exclusionary provision. Similarly, article 3(2)(b) dealing with "the adequacy of the price of remuneration" must be given a restrictive interpretation. After all, in a broad sense all terms of the contract are in some way related to the price or remuneration. That is not what is intended. Even price escalation clauses have been treated by the Director as subject to the fairness provision [. . .] It would be a gaping hole in the system if such clauses were not subject to the fairness requirement.

The test of unfairness found in reg 5(1) encompasses both a lack of good faith, and a significant imbalance in the rights and liabilities of the parties, which operates to the detriment of the borrower. Schedule 2 of the 1999 Regulations illustrates the test by setting out a non-exhaustive 'grey list' of terms, which potentially may be regarded as unfair: for example, para (e) provides that a term 'requiring any consumer who fails to fulfill his obligation to pay a disproportionately high sum in compensation' is potentially unfair. The grey list's focus is upon the substantive rights and obligations of the parties, but it has been suggested that the good faith requirement also adds an element of procedural fairness.[170]

Lord Bingham, giving the leading judgment in Director General of Fair Trading v First National Bank, clearly contemplated that good faith called for procedural fairness in how the loan is entered into.

Director General of Fair Trading v First National Bank plc
[2002] 1 AC 481, HL

Lord Bingham

At [17]

[Referring to the earlier form of the Regulations] [. . .] [T]he language used in expressing the test, so far as applicable in this case, is in my opinion clear and not reasonably capable of differing interpretations. A term falling within the scope of the regulations is unfair if it causes a significant imbalance in the parties' rights and obligations under the contract to the detriment of the consumer in a manner or to an extent which is contrary to the requirement of good faith. The requirement of significant imbalance is met if a term is so weighted in favour of the supplier as to tilt the parties' rights and obligations under the contract significantly in his favour. This may be by the granting to the supplier of a beneficial option or discretion or power, or by the imposing on the consumer of a disadvantageous burden or risk or duty. The illustrative terms set out in Schedule 3 to the regulations provide very good examples of terms which may be regarded as unfair; whether a given term is or is not to be so regarded depends on whether it causes a significant imbalance in the parties' rights and obligations under the contract. This involves looking at the contract as a whole. But the imbalance must be to the detriment of the consumer; a significant imbalance to the detriment of the supplier, assumed to be the stronger party, is not a mischief which the regulations seek to address. The requirement of good faith in this context is one of fair and open dealing. Openness requires that the terms should be expressed fully, clearly and legibly, containing no concealed pitfalls or traps. Appropriate prominence should be given to terms which might operate disadvantageously to the customer. Fair dealing requires that a supplier should not, whether deliberately or unconsciously, take advantage of the consumer's necessity, indigence, lack of experience, unfamiliarity with the subject matter of the contract, weak bargaining position or any other factor listed in or analogous to those listed in Schedule 2 of the regulations. Good faith in this context is not an artificial or technical concept; nor, since Lord Mansfield was its champion, is it a concept wholly unfamiliar to British lawyers. It looks to good standards of commercial morality and practice. Regulation 4(1) lays down a composite test, covering both the making and the substance of the contract, and must be applied bearing clearly in mind the objective which the regulations are designed to promote.

[170] Collins, 'Good Faith in European Contract Law' (1994) 14 OJLS 229; Beale, 'Legislative Control of Fairness: The Directive on Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts' in Good Faith and Fault in Contract Law (eds Beatson and Friedman, 1995), p 231.

Furthermore, the 1999 regulations require terms to be expressed in plain and intelligible language.

Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999, reg 7

Written contracts

1. A seller or supplier shall ensure that any written term of a contract is expressed in plain, intelligible language.
2. If there is doubt about the meaning of a written term, the interpretation which is most favourable to the consumer shall prevail but this rule shall not apply in proceedings brought under regulation 12.

The terms must be capable of being understood by ordinary members of the public and not only lawyers or other experts.[171] If there is any doubt in meaning, a term is to be construed in favour of the borrower.[172] These requirements present a challenge where the subject matter is inherently complex—yet in Office of Fair Trading v Abbey National plc,[173] the court was unimpressed by arguments that complexity should affect the standard. It is the comprehensibility of the result that was important. It was no excuse that a reasonable attempt to explain complex subject matter had been made, if a layman would still fail to grasp its meaning. The aim of comprehensibility is supported by prohibition on terms that a borrower has no real opportunity to consider before the mortgage is completed.[174]

The message is clear: lenders must make sure that their standard terms and conditions meet the standards of fairness required by the legislation, and illustrated by the OFT's

171 'Cleared funds' was considered by the OFT to be unclear to consumers: see OFT Bulletin 16.
172 Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations, reg 7(2).
173 [2008] EWHC 875.
174 See Consumer Credit Act 1974 (as amended), Sch 1, para 1(i).

guidance.[175] Furthermore, lenders must ensure that the import of those terms and conditions are brought home to the borrower, both because they can be understood by any layman, and also because there is a process that ensures that borrowers are given an opportunity to read and consider these terms before they are bound. The indications are that certain, but not all, lenders have received and understood that message.[176]

The 2008 Regulations,[177] in contrast to the 1999 Regulations, are enforceable only by the OFT as part of its regulatory armory.[178] They introduce a general duty upon traders not to trade unfairly,[179] and seek to ensure that they act honestly and fairly towards customers by prohibiting misleading actions,[180] omissions,[181] and aggressive commercial practices.[182] Certain specific practices contained in the Schedule to the 2008 Regulations are always considered unfair. It is anticipated that these Regulations, like the 1999 Regulations, will apply to the practices of lenders when dealing with individual borrowers.

4.2 PARTICULAR MORTGAGE TERMS: REDEMPTION

At the heart of the clogs and fetters doctrine is the protection of the borrower's equity of redemption, and the attendant right of the borrower to repay the loan and redeem, or recover, the land free of the lender's mortgage. Any device that could prevent the borrower from exercising his or her right to redeem will be struck down.

4.2.1 Options to purchase

The most common example of a device falling foul of this principle is the grant to the lender of an option to purchase the mortgaged property, although the courts have become increasingly frustrated with this assault on the parties' freedom to agree commercial terms.

Lord Halsbury expressed such sentiments in the following case.

Samuel v Jarrah Timber & Wood Paving Corporation Ltd
[1904] AC 323, HL

Lord Halsbury

At 323

A perfectly fair bargain made between two parties to it, each of whom was quite sensible of what they were doing, is not to be performed because at the same time a mortgage arrangement was made between them. If a day had intervened between the two parts of the arrangement, the part of the bargain which the appellant claims to be performed would have been perfectly good and capable of being enforced; but a line of authorities going back for 175 See generally Simmonds, 'Bankers' Documents and the Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999' (2002) 17 JIBL 205.

176 The FSA's Report on Fairness of Terms in Consumer Contracts (2008, available online at http://www.fsa.gov.uk) found that some lenders, particularly smaller lenders, are unaware of the need to comply with the 1999 Regulations.

177 SI 2008/1277. They came into force on 26 May 2008.

178 McGuffick v Royal Bank of Scotland [2009] EWHC 2386.

179 Unfair Practices Regulations 2008, reg 3.

180 Ibid, reg 5. 181 Ibid, reg 6. 182 Ibid, reg 7.

> more than a century has decided that such an arrangement as that which was here arrived at is contrary to a principle of equity, the sense or reason of which I am not able to appreciate, and very reluctantly I am compelled to acquiesce in the judgments appealed from.

Lord Halsbury refers to the fact that if a day had intervened between the mortgage and the option, the transactions would have been upheld.

The principle is not quite as easily avoided. It must be evident that the mortgage and the option are separate transactions in substance, and not merely in form.[183] For example, in Jones v Morgan,[184] an option granted some three years after the date of the original mortgage was struck down because the Court took the view that the option formed part of a variation of the original mortgage. It was of no matter that the Court also found that the option was neither an unconscionable bargain, nor extracted as a result of economic duress.[185]

Echoing the words of Lord Haldane in Krelinger (extract at 4.1.2 above), the transaction must also be, in substance, a mortgage—an issue that was central to the following case.[186]

Warnborough Ltd v Garmite Ltd
[2003] EWCA Civ 1544, CA

Facts: Warnborough sold land to Garmite, leaving the purchase money outstanding, but secured by a mortgage to Warnborough. At the same time, Garmite granted Warnborough an option to repurchase the land for the original sale price as a further protection against the risk that the purchase price would not be paid. The option was not a fetter on the equity of redemption, because the transaction was, in substance, a sale and purchase, not a mortgage.

Jonathan Parker LJ

At [72]–73]

In the light of the authorities to which I have referred, it has to be accepted that the "unruly dog" is still alive (although one might perhaps reasonably expect its venerable age to inhibit it from straying too far or too often from its kennel); and that however desirable an appendectomy might be thought to be, no such relieving operation has as yet been carried out. Indeed, Mr Teverson did not seek to contend otherwise.

That said, it is in my judgment glaringly clear from the authorities that the mere fact that, contemporaneously with the grant of a mortgage over his property, the mortgagor grants the mortgagee an option to purchase the property does no more than raise the question whether the rule against 'clogs' applies: it does not begin to answer that question. As has been said over and over again in the authorities, in order to answer that question the court has to look at the 'substance' of the transaction in question: in other words, to inquire as to the true nature of the bargain which the parties have made. To do that, the court examines all the circumstances, with the assistance of oral evidence if necessary.

[183] See Reeve v Lisle [1902] AC 461; Lewis v Frank Love [1961] 1 WLR 261.
[184] [2001] EWCA Civ 995.
[185] Devenney, 'A Pack of Unruly Dogs: Unconscionable Bargain, Lawful Act (Economic) Duress and Clogs on the Equity of Redemption' [2002] JBL 539.
[186] See also Brighton & Hove CC v Audus [2009] EWHC 340.

4.2.2 Postponement of the right to redeem

The postponement of the right to redeem is not, per se, an unacceptable clog on the equity of redemption. A postponement will be struck down if it renders the right to redeem illusory. For example, in Fairclough v Swan Brewery Co,[187] the right to redeem was held to be illusory where the borrower could not repay the loan until just six weeks prior to the expiry of the mortgaged leasehold term.

A postponement will also be struck down if it is oppressive or unconscionable; unreasonableness is insufficient. This conclusion was reached in the following case, in a judgment that illustrates the courts' reluctance to interfere with the freedom of contract of commercial parties.

Knightsbridge Estates Trust Ltd v Byrne
[1939] Ch 441, CA

Facts: Knightsbridge mortgaged a number of freehold properties to secure a loan of £300,000, with interest payable at 6.5 per cent. In 1931, the company renegotiated the loan on more favourable terms. It was to be repayable by eighty half-yearly instalments (i.e. over forty years), with interest at 5.25 per cent, and the lender agreed not to call in the loan, provided that the borrower performed the loan terms. Interest rates fell further and Knightsbridge wished to repay the loan to obtain still more favourable terms.

Greene MR

At 453

The first argument was that the postponement of the contractual right to redeem for forty years was void in itself, in other words, that the making of such an agreement between mortgagor and mortgagee was prohibited by a rule of equity. It was not contended that a provision in a mortgage deed making the mortgage irredeemable for a period of years is necessarily void. The argument was that such a period must be a "reasonable " one, and it was said that the period in the present case was an unreasonable one by reason merely of its length. This argument was not the one accepted by the learned judge.

Now an argument such as this requires the closest scrutiny, for, if it is correct, it means that an agreement made between two competent parties, acting under expert advice and presumably knowing their own business best, is one which the law forbids them to make upon the ground that it is not "reasonable." If we were satisfied that the rule of equity was what it is said to be, we should be bound to give effect to it. But in the absence of compelling authority we are not prepared to say that such an agreement cannot lawfully be made. A decision to that effect would, in our view, involve an unjustified interference with the freedom of business men to enter into agreements best suited to their interests and would impose upon them a test of "reasonableness" laid down by the Courts without reference to the business realities of the case.

It is important to remember what those realities were. The respondents are a private company and do not enjoy the facilities for raising money by a public issue possessed by public companies. They were the owners of a large and valuable block of property, and so far as we know they had no other assets. The property was subject to a mortgage at a high rate of interest and this mortgage was liable to be called in at any time. In these circumstances the respondents were, when the negotiations began, desirous of obtaining for themselves two advantages: (1.) a reduction in the rate of interest, (2.) the right to repay the mortgage moneys by instalments spread over a long period of years. The desirability of obtaining these terms from a business point of view is manifest, and it is not to be assumed that these respondents were actuated by anything but pure considerations of business in seeking to obtain them. The sum involved was a very large one, and the length of the period over which the instalments were spread is to be considered with reference to this fact. In the circumstances it was the most natural thing in the world that the respondents should address themselves to a body desirous of obtaining a long term investment for its money. The resulting agreement was a commercial agreement between two important corporations experienced in such matters, and has none of the features of an oppressive bargain where the borrower is at the mercy of an unscrupulous lender. In transactions of this kind it is notorious that there is competition among the large insurance companies and other bodies having large funds to invest, and we are not prepared to view the agreement made as anything but a proper business transaction.

[187] [1912] AC 565.

But it is said not only that the period of postponement must be a reasonable one, but that in judging the "reasonableness" of the period the considerations which we have mentioned cannot be regarded; that the Court is bound to judge "reasonableness" by a consideration of the terms of the mortgage deed itself and without regard to extraneous matters. In the absence of clear authority we emphatically decline to consider a question of "reasonableness" from a standpoint so unreal. To hold that the law is to tell business men what is reasonable in such circumstances and to refuse to take into account the business considerations involved, would bring the law into disrepute. Fortunately, we do not find ourselves forced to come to any such conclusion [...]

But in our opinion the proposition that a postponement of the contractual right of redemption is only permissible for a "reasonable" time is not well-founded. Such a postponement is not properly described as a clog on the equity of redemption, since it is concerned with the contractual right to redeem. It is indisputable that any provision which hampers redemption after the contractual date for redemption has passed will not be permitted. Further, it is undoubtedly true to say that a right of redemption is a necessary element in a mortgage transaction, and consequently that, where the contractual right of redemption is illusory, equity will grant relief by allowing redemption [...]

Moreover, equity may give relief against contractual terms in a mortgage transaction if they are oppressive or unconscionable, and in deciding whether or not a particular transaction falls within this category the length of time for which the contractual right to redeem is postponed may well be an important consideration. In the present case no question of this kind was or could have been raised.

But equity does not reform mortgage transactions because they are unreasonable. It is concerned to see two things—one that the essential requirements of a mortgage transaction are observed, and the other that oppressive or unconscionable terms are not enforced. Subject to this, it does not, in our opinion, interfere. The question therefore arises whether, in a case where the right of redemption is real and not illusory and there is nothing oppressive or unconscionable in the transaction, there is something in a postponement of the contractual right to redeem, such as we have in the present case, that is inconsistent with the essential requirements of a mortgage transaction? Apart from authority the answer to this question would, in our opinion, be clearly in the negative. Any other answer would place an unfortunate restriction on the liberty of contract of competent parties who are at arm's length—in the present case it would have operated to prevent the respondents obtaining financial terms which for obvious reasons they themselves considered to be most desirable. It would, moreover, lead to highly inequitable results. The remedy sought by the > respondents and the only remedy which is said to be open to them is the establishment of a right to redeem at any time on the ground that the postponement of the contractual right to redeem is void. They do not and could not suggest that the contract as a contract is affected, and the result would accordingly be that whereas the respondents would have had from the first the right to redeem at any time, the appellants would have had no right to require payment otherwise than by the specified instalments. Such an outcome to a bargain entered into by business people negotiating at arm's length would indeed be unfortunate, and we should require clear authority before coming to such a conclusion.

4.2.3 Charges for early redemption

It is common practice for lenders to offer advantageous rates of interest to domestic borrowers who agree that they will not redeem for a fixed period. Lenders benefit from the certainty of receiving a known return on their investment for the fixed term. The price to be paid for these advantageous rates of interest is payment of an agreed sum should the borrower wish to redeem before the fixed period has expired. Such charges are a frequent cause of complaint by borrowers, although regulations under both the FSMA 2000 and the CCA 1974 require such charges to be explained to the borrower, and to be calculated as a genuine pre-estimation of the lender's loss. A redemption charge that fails to do so also runs the risk of being unfair, under s 140A of the 1974 Act or under the 1999 Regulations,[188] or exorbitant under the MCOB rules. It is also conceivable that a redemption charge could be held to be an oppressive and unconscionable term or a penalty.

4.3 PARTICULAR MORTGAGE TERMS COLLATERAL ADVANTAGES

A collateral advantage is an added benefit that the lender negotiates as a condition of the mortgage. The most common examples are the tied and solus agreements that a brewery or petrol company requires of its retailers. These agreements are often associated with a mortgage, which, together, operate to require the borrower to purchase their supplies solely from the lender as a condition of the lender providing loan facilities to purchase, improve, or support the borrower's business. They thus occur most commonly in the commercial lending environment,[189] where regulation operates through equitable controls or the common law, and statutory controls on competition. A collateral advantage encountered in the domestic lending market will be subject to the regulatory controls of the FSMA 2000 and CCA 1974, as well as the fairness test demanded by s 140A of the 1974 Act and the 1999 Regulations.[190]

4.3.1 Equitable controls

Historically, equity would strike down any collateral advantage. When the usury laws limited interest rates, a collateral advantage was considered an illegal means of avoiding these 188 Falco Finance Ltd v Gough [1999] CCLR 16; Evans v Cherry Tree Finance Ltd [2008] EWCA Civ 331.

189 Although see Cityland and Property Holdings Ltd v Dabrah [1968] Ch 166, in which a premium on the amount repayable over the amount lent was characterized as a collateral advantage.

190 For instance, the way in which payment protection insurance was sold by lenders, or their associated companies, began to look suspiciously like a collateral advantage.

limits. With the abolition of the usury laws and the surge in economic activity of the nineteenth century, equity's abhorrence of collateral advantages waned. Initial relaxation was exemplified in the cases of Biggs v Hodinott[191] and Bradley v Carritt,[192] in which collateral advantages limited to the life of the mortgage were accepted. A collateral advantage that could extend beyond the life of the mortgage was seen as an unacceptable clog on the equity of redemption, because the borrower would not be able to redeem his or her property free of this burden.[193]

Further relaxation flowed from the following landmark decision.

G&K Kreglinger v New Patagonia Meat and Cold Storage Co Ltd
[1914] AC 25, HL

Facts: Kreglinger advanced the meat company funds that were secured by a floating charge. In addition to the loan, Kreglinger negotiated a right of pre-emption to purchase any sheepskins produced by the meat company over a five-year period, for the best market price, and to be paid a commission on any sheepskins that the meat company sold to third parties. The meat company redeemed the loan within the five-year option period and unsuccessfully claimed that it should be free of its obligations regarding the sale of the sheepskins.

Lord Haldane LC

At 37

The Legislature during a long period placed restrictions on the rate of interest which could legally be exacted. But equity went beyond the limits of the statutes which limited the interest, and was ready to interfere with any usurious stipulation in a mortgage. In so doing it was influenced by the public policy of the time. That policy has now changed, and the Acts which limited the rate of interest have been repealed. The result is that a collateral advantage may now be stipulated for by the mortgagee provided that he has not acted unfairly or oppressively, and provided that the bargain does not conflict with the third form of the principle. This is that a mortgage [...] cannot be made irredeemable, and that any stipulation which restricts or clogs the equity of redemption is void. It is obvious that the reason for the doctrine in this form is the same as that which gave rise to the other forms. It is simply an assertion in a different way of the principle that once a mortgage always a mortgage and nothing else.

My Lords, the rules I have stated have now been applied by Courts of Equity for nearly three centuries, and the books are full of illustrations of their application. But what I have pointed out shews that it is inconsistent with the objects for which they were established that these rules should crystallize into technical language so rigid that the letter can defeat the underlying spirit and purpose. Their application must correspond with the practical necessities of the time. The rule as to collateral advantages, for example, has been much modified by the repeal of the usury laws and by the recognition of modern varieties of commercial bargaining. In Biggs v. Hoddinott [1898] 2 Ch. 307 it was held that a brewer might stipulate in a mortgage made to him of an hotel that during the five years for which the loan was to continue the mortgagors would deal with him exclusively for malt liquor. In the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries a Court of Equity could hardly have so decided, and the judgment illustrates the elastic character of equity jurisdiction and the power of equity judges to mould > the rules which they apply in accordance with the exigencies of the time. The decision proceeded on the ground that a mortgagee may stipulate for a collateral advantage at the time and as a term of the advance, provided, first, that no unfairness is shewn, and, secondly, that the right to redeem is not thereby clogged. It is no longer true that, as was said in Jennings v. Ward 2 Vern. 520, "a man shall not have interest for his money and a collateral advantage besides for the loan of it." Unless such a bargain is unconscionable it is now good. But none the less the other and wider principle remains unshaken, that it is the essence of a mortgage that in the eye of a Court of Equity it should be a mere security for money, and that no bargain can be validly made which will prevent the mortgagor from redeeming on payment of what is due, including principal, interest, and costs. He may stipulate that he will not pay off his debt, and so redeem the mortgage, for a fixed period. But whenever a right to redeem arises out of the doctrine of equity, he is precluded from fettering it. This principle has become an integral part of our system of jurisprudence and must be faithfully adhered to.

[191] [1898] 2 Ch 307. [192] [1903] AC 25. [193] Noakes v Rice [1902] AC 24.

>
> My Lords, the question in the present case is whether the right to redeem has been interfered with. And this must, for the reasons to which I have adverted in considering the history of the doctrine of equity, depend on the answer to a question which is primarily one of fact. What was the true character of the transaction? Did the appellants make a bargain such that the right to redeem was cut down, or did they simply stipulate for a collateral undertaking, outside and clear of the mortgage, which would give them an exclusive option of purchase of the sheepskins of the respondents? The question is in my opinion not whether the two contracts were made at the same moment and evidenced by the same instrument, but whether they were in substance a single and undivided contract or two distinct contracts. Putting aside for the moment considerations turning on the character of the floating charge, such an option no doubt affects the freedom of the respondents in carrying on their business even after the mortgage has been paid off. But so might other arrangements which would be plainly collateral, an agreement, for example, to take permanently into the firm a new partner as a condition of obtaining fresh capital in the form of a loan. The question is one not of form but of substance, and it can be answered in each case only by looking at all the circumstances, and not by mere reliance on some abstract principle, or upon the dicta which have fallen obiter from judges in other and different cases. Some, at least, of the authorities on the subject disclose an embarrassment which has, in my opinion, arisen from neglect to bear this in mind. In applying a principle the ambit and validity of which depend on confining it steadily to the end for which it was established, the analogies of previous instances where it has been applied are apt to be misleading. For each case forms a real precedent only in so far as it affirms a principle, the relevancy of which in other cases turns on the true character of the particular transaction, and to that extent on circumstances.
>
> My Lords, if in the case before the House your Lordships arrive at the conclusion that the agreement for an option to purchase the respondents' sheepskins was not in substance a fetter on the exercise of their right to redeem, but was in the nature of a collateral bargain the entering into which was a preliminary and separable condition of the loan, the decided cases cease to present any great difficulty.

It is thus necessary to consider initially the substance of the transaction, and whether the advantage is part and parcel of the mortgage consideration or independent of it, despite being part of the parties' overall bargain—an enquiry that it is not always easy to conduct. One may then move on to consider whether the advantage is repugnant to the equitable grounds identified by Lord Parker in his judgment in Kreglinger.

G&K Kreglinger v New Patagonia Meat and Cold Storage Co Ltd
[1914] AC 25, HL

Lord Parker

At 56

[...] [E]ither (1.) because it was unconscionable, or (2.) because it was in the nature of a penal clause clogging the equity arising on failure to exercise a contractual right to redeem, or (3.) because it was in the nature of a condition repugnant as well to the contractual as to the equitable right.

4.3.2 Restraint of trade

The ability of the law to strike down terms in restraint of trade has a long history, dating at least from Elizabethan times. A party's freedom to contract must be balanced against the wide public interest of the freedom of all to trade. The doctrine has been pressed into service on a number of occasions to attack collateral advantages in mortgages—not always with success. The doctrine has no application to a collateral advantage in a mortgage used to acquire the borrower's business premises,[194] in which there is no restraint of an existing trade, but may be applied to a collateral advantage in a mortgage taken over business premises that a borrower already owns. In these circumstances, the question of whether an attendant collateral advantage is in restraint of trade looks to the reasonableness of the protection it affords. In Esso Petroleum Co Ltd v Harpers Garage (Stourport) Ltd,[195] a mortgage that postponed the borrower's right to redeem for twenty-one years, and a connected solus agreement that required the borrower to purchase all of its petroleum products from Esso for a similar period, were struck down as unreasonable restraints on trade. Similar agreements for shorter terms of five years or so have been upheld.[196]

The utility of the doctrine is overshadowed by the extensive competition laws that now govern commercial activity.[197]

4.4 PARTICULAR MORTGAGE TERMS: INTEREST RATES

The rate of interest and other costs associated with borrowing is, of course, of central importance to both the borrower and the lender.

4.4.1 Fluctuating and index-linked interest rates

Gray and Gray[198] have observed the surprising acceptance of the uncertainty inherent in the market norm of fluctuating or index-linked interest rates, which withstood attack on the basis of public policy in Mutliservice Bookbinding Ltd v Marden[199] (extracted below), and [194] Cleveland Petroleum Ltd v Dartstone Ltd [1969] 1 WLR 116; Alec Lobb (Garages) Ltd v Total Oil Great Britain Ltd [1985] 1 WLR 173.

[195] [1968] AC 269.

[196] Ibid; Texaco v Mulberry Filling Station [1972] 1 WLR 814.

[197] Hopkins (1998) 49 NILQ 202.

[198] Gray and Gray, Elements of Land Law (5th edn, 2009), [6.2.40].

[199] [1978] Ch 84.

has not been questioned as being oppressive or unconscionable. The 1999 Regulations also accept that an interest rate in a mortgage will not be unfair because it is fluctuating or index-linked, provided (in the case of a fluctuating rate) that the lender gives notice to the borrower of any change and the borrower is able to redeem if he or she so wishes.[200]

The lender's discretion to alter a fluctuating interest rate is not, however, completely unfettered. The Court of Appeal, in the conjoined appeals of Paragon Finance v Nash and Paragon Finance v Staunton,[201] accepted two grounds upon which a term should be implied to define the manner in which a discretion should be exercised. The first implies a term that rates will not be altered improperly, arbitrarily, or capriciously, and the second, that, in exercising a discretion, the lender will not do so unreasonably—in the sense that no lender acting reasonably would act similarly.

Paragon Finance plc v Nash
[2002] 1 WLR 685, CA

Dyson LJ

At [30]–[32]

I cannot accept the submission of Mr Malek that the power given to the claimant by these loan agreements to set the interest rates from time to time is completely unfettered. If that were so, it would mean that the claimant would be completely free, in theory at least, to specify interest rates at the most exorbitant level. It is true that in the case of the Nash agreement clause 3.3 provides that the rate charged is that which applies to the category of business to which the claimant considers the mortgage belongs. That prevents the claimant from treating the Nashes differently from other borrowers in the same category. But it does not protect borrowers in that category from being treated in a capricious manner, or, for example, being subjected to very high rates of interest in order to force them into arrears with a view to obtaining possession of their properties.

The Stauntons do not even have the limited protection that is afforded by clause 3.3 of the Nash agreement. In the absence of an implied term, there would be nothing to prevent the claimant from raising the rate demanded of the Stauntons to exorbitant levels, or raising the rate to a level higher than that required of other similar borrowers for some improper purpose or capricious reason. An example of an improper purpose would be where the lender decided that the borrower was a nuisance (but had not been in breach of the terms of the agreement) and, wishing to get rid of him, raised the rate of interest to a level that it knew he could not afford to pay. An example of a capricious reason would be where the lender decided to raise the rate of interest because its manager did not like the colour of the borrower's hair.

It seems to me that the commercial considerations relied on by Mr Malek are not sufficient to exclude an implied term that the discretion to vary interest rates should not be exercised dishonestly, for an improper purpose, capriciously or arbitrarily. I shall come shortly to the question whether the discretion should also not be exercised unreasonably [. . .]

At [37]

I come, therefore, to the question whether the implied term should also extend to "unreasonably". The first difficulty is to define what one means by "unreasonably". Mr Bannister was 200 See Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999, Sch 2, para 2(b) and (d).

201 See also Paragon Finance v Pender [2005] EWCA Civ 760.

at pains to emphasise that he was not saying that the rates of interest had to be reasonable rates in the sense of closely and consistently tracking LIBOR or the rates charged by the Halifax Building Society. He said that what he meant by the unreasonable exercise of the discretionary power to set the rate of interest was something very close to the capricious or arbitrary exercise of that power [...]

At [41]–[42]

So here, too, we find a somewhat reluctant extension of the implied term to include unreasonableness that is analogous to Wednesbury unreasonableness. I entirely accept that the scope of an implied term will depend on the circumstances of the particular contract. But I find the analogy of the Gan Insurance case [2001] EWCA Civ 1047 and the cases considered in the judgment of Mance LJ helpful. It is one thing to imply a term that a lender will not exercise his discretion in a way that no reasonable lender, acting reasonably, would do. It is unlikely that a lender who was acting in that way would not also be acting either dishonestly, for an improper purpose, capriciously or arbitrarily. It is quite another matter to imply a term that the lender would not impose unreasonable rates. It could be said that as soon as the difference between the claimant's standard rates and the Halifax rates started to exceed about two percentage points the claimant was charging unreasonable rates. From the defendant's point of view, that was undoubtedly true. But, from the claimant's point of view, it charged these rates because it was commercially necessary, and therefore reasonable, for it to do so.

I conclude therefore that there was an implied term of both agreements that the claimant would not set rates of interest unreasonably in the limited sense that I have described. Such an implied term is necessary in order to give effect to the reasonable expectations of the parties.

4.4.2 Excessive interest rates

The laws against usury set limits on the level of interest rates and, since their abolition, there have, from time to time, been monetary levels imposed upon interest rates for certain types of borrowing.[202] The modern thinking is against setting interest rate ceilings,[203] but to consider other mechanisms by which interest rates can be kept within acceptable bounds.

In the consumer market, these mechanisms are to be found both in the market regulation provisions of the FSMA 2000 and CCA 1974 and the controls over mortgage terms in the MCOB rules and s 140A of the 1974 Act (as amended).[204] For example, the MCOB rules prohibit excessive charges and the charging of compound interest—a mechanism of capitalizing interest that can lead to a sharp increase in the amount of the debt.[205] Compound

202 See the Moneylenders Act 1900.

203 See Department of Trade and Industry, Fair, Clear and Competitive: The Consumer Credit Market in the 21st Century (Cm 6040, 2003), [3.49]–[3.55].

204 See Barons Finance Ltd v Olubisi (unreported 26 April 2010) where an interest rate of 3.5 per cent per month contributed to the unfairness of the relationship between the parties. Other factors included the urgency of the loan and breaches of the CCA 1974. High rates of interest has been found fair in high risk short terms loans secured on personal property eg cars often known as log book loans see Nine Regions v Sadeer (unreported 14 November 2008) and Nine Regions v Singh (unreported 14 January 2009).

205 Compound interest is acceptable and common practice in commercial lending The Maira [1990] 1 AC 637; Guardian Ocean Cargors Ltd v Banco Brasil SA (No 3) [1992] 2 Lloyds Rep 193; Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington BC [1996] AC 669.

interest also contributed to the unfairness of the relationship under s 140A in Patel v Patel.[206] In respect of the 1999 Regulations, it should be noted that the interest rate will escape the requirement for fairness if it is a core term, although subsidiary provisions that deal with the calculation or variation of interest—for example, on default—will be caught.[207] Equity's jurisdiction over oppressive and unconscionable terms is also available, but presents a stricter test than the appropriate statutory controls.[208]

Where these statutory controls do not apply, for instance in the commercial context, equity's control of oppressive and unconscionable terms provides a final, although rather fragile, safety net.

The test of an oppressive and unconscionable term is strict, looking not only at the substantive fairness of the terms themselves, but also at the procedural fairness with which they were agreed, when the financial expertise and bargaining position of the parties is of central concern.

Multiservice Bookbinding Ltd v Marden
[1979] Ch 84, HC

Facts: Multiservice borrowed £36,000 from Marden to fund the purchase of new premises. The loan could not be redeemed for ten years; interest was calculated at 2 per cent above the bank rate on the entire amount of the loan, regardless of capital repayments, with arrears of interest being compounded after twenty-one days. In addition, any repayments of capital and interest were linked to the Swiss franc to protect the lender against sterling exchange rate fluctuations. Sterling did, indeed, decline in value against the Swiss franc, leaving the amount payable by Multiservice when it tried to redeem in excess of £133,000. Mutliservice unsuccessfully claimed that this result was oppressive and unconscionable.

Browne-Wilkinson J

At 104

[On public policy and indexation] [A]fter considering the arguments I do not feel that in 1977 I can declare that an index-linked money obligation is contrary to public policy. The reasons which lead me to this view are as follows: (1) If, as Denning L.J. said, the evil to be guarded against is that sterling will become discredited, this evil will flow not only from indexing by reference to the price of gold or Swiss franc, but equally from any other form of indexing, for example an obligation quantified by reference to the cost of living index. The evil lies in the revalorisation of the pound sterling by reference to any other yardstick, not in the nature of the yardstick itself. (2) Today a large number of obligations originally expressed in pounds sterling are varied by reference to an external yardstick. Long-term commercial contracts frequently include index linked obligations: so do many contracts of employment. The rent payable under certain leases has for centuries been made variable dependent upon the price of corn. More important, Parliament itself has authorised the linking of public service pensions to the 206 [2009] EWHC 3264. Another aspect of unfairness was the manner in which the lender had acted including his poor record keeping.

207 Falco Finance Ltd v Gough [1999] CCLR 16; Director General of Fair Trading v First National Bank plc [2001] UKHL 52.

208 See Cityland & Property (Holdings) Ltd v Dabrah [1968] Ch 166.

cost of living and the issue of Savings Bonds similarly linked. It would be strange if Parliament had authorised transactions contrary to public policy. (3) Denning L.J. treated the process of index-linking as being a cause, not a symptom, of inflation. I know nothing of economics but it has been demonstrated to me that economists are not agreed that indexing has a deleterious effect in promoting inflation. It would, in my judgment, be wrong for the courts to declare that a particular class of transaction is against the public interest even though there is a body of better-informed opinion that takes the view that no harm is caused. It is for Parliament, with all its facilities for weighing the complex issues involved, to make a policy decision of this kind. (4) It seems to me that, even if there are good grounds for saying that indexing causes inflation, there may well be counter-availing considerations which would have to be weighed. In any economy where there is inflation there are few inducements to make long-term loans expressed in a currency the value of which is being eroded. It is at least possible that, unless lenders can ensure that they are repaid the real value of the money they advanced, and not merely a sum of the same nominal amount but in devalued currency, the availability of loan capital will be much diminished. This would surely not be in the public interest. (5) Shortly after 1956, the Cour de Cassation in France reversed its Policy referred to by Denning L.J. and allowed index-linked obligations even in domestic contracts. Index-linked obligations were held valid by the High Court of Australia in Stanwell Park Hotel Co. Ltd. v. Leslie (1952) 85 C.L.R. 189. Therefore I feel unable to follow the obiter dictum of Denning L.J. I need hardly say that I do so with considerable diffidence; but I receive some comfort from the fact that since he expressed his views, we have experienced 20 years of inflation and, on the somewhat analogous question whether a judgment of an English court can be expressed otherwise than in pounds sterling, he has departed from the nominalist principle which underlies his remarks in the Treseder-Griffin case [1956] 2 Q.B. 127. In my judgment, clause 6 of the mortgage is not contrary to public policy.

At 110

[On oppressive and unconscionable terms] I therefore approach the second point on the basis that, in order to be freed from the necessity to comply with all the terms of the mortgage, the plaintiffs must show that the bargain, or some of its terms, was unfair and unconscionable: it is not enough to show that, in the eyes of the court, it was unreasonable. In my judgment a bargain cannot be unfair and unconscionable unless one of the parties to it has imposed the objectionable terms in a morally reprehensible manner, that is to say, in a way which affects his conscience.

The classic example of an unconscionable bargain is where advantage has been taken of a young, inexperienced or ignorant person to introduce a term which no sensible well-advised person or party would have accepted. But I do not think the categories of unconscionable bargains are limited: the court can and should intervene where a bargain has been procured by unfair means.

Mr. Nugee submitted that a borrower was, in the normal case, in an unequal bargaining position vis-à-vis the lender and that the care taken by the courts of equity to protect borrowers—to which Lord Parker referred in the passage I have quoted—was reflected in a general rule that, except in the case of two large equally powerful institutions, any unreasonable term would be "unconscionable" within Lord Parker's test. I cannot accept this. In my judgment there is no such special rule applicable to contracts of loan which requires one to treat a bargain as having been unfairly made even where it is demonstrated that no unfair advantage has been taken of the borrower. No decision illustrating Mr. Nugee's principle was cited. However, if, as in the Cityland case [1968] Ch. 166, there is an unusual or unreasonable stipulation the reason for which is not explained, it may well be that in the absence of any explanation, the court will assume that unfair advantage has been taken of the borrower. In considering all the facts, it will often be the case that the borrower's need for the money was far more pressing than the lenders need to lend: if this proves to be the case, then circumstances exist in which an unfair advantage could have been taken. It does not necessarily follow that what could have been done has been done: whether or not an unfair advantage has in fact been taken depends on the facts of each case.

Applying those principles to this case, first I do not think it is right to treat the "Swiss franc uplift" element in the capital-repayments as being in any sense a premium or collateral advantage. In my judgment a lender of money is entitled to insure that he is repaid the real value of his loan and if he introduces a term which so provides, he is not stipulating for anything beyond the repayment of principal [...] Secondly, considering the mortgage bargain as a whole, in my judgment there was no great inequality of bargaining power as between the plaintiffs and the defendant. The plaintiff company was a small but prosperous company in need of cash to enable it to expand: if it did not like the terms offered it could have refused them without being made insolvent or, as in the Cityland case, losing its home. The defendant had £40,000 to lend, but only, as he explained to the plaintiffs, if its real value was preserved. The defendant is not a professional moneylender and there is no evidence of any sharp practice of any kind by him. The borrowers were represented by independent solicitors of repute. Therefore the background does not give rise to any pre-supposition that the defendant took an unfair advantage of the plaintiffs [...] However, Mr. Nugee's other points amount to a formidable list and if it were relevant I would be of the view that the terms were unreasonable judged by the standards which the court would adopt if it had to settle the terms of a mortgage. In particular I consider that it was unreasonable both for the debt to be inflation proofed by reference to the Swiss franc and at the same time to provide for a rate of interest two per cent. above bank rate—a rate which reflects at least in part the unstable state of the pound sterling. On top of this interest on the whole sum advanced was to be paid throughout the term. The defendant made a hard bargain. But the test is not reasonableness. The parties made a bargain which the plaintiffs, who are businessmen, went into with their eyes open, with the benefit of independent advice, without any compelling necessity to accept a loan on these terms and without any sharp practice by the defendant. I cannot see that there was anything unfair or oppressive or morally reprehensible in such a bargain entered into in such circumstances.

4.4.3 Penalties and other onerous terms

In assessing the fairness of a consumer loan or the unconscionability of a commercial loan, it is significant to look not only at the interest rate, but also at the other terms of the agreement. Of particular import are terms that operate upon default and which may operate as a penalty, rather than a genuine pre-estimation of the lender's loss, or which may attract particular scrutiny under the MCOB rules, or against the test of fairness under s 140A of the CCA 1974 (as amended) or the 1999 Regulations.[209]

An increase in the rate of interest payable on arrears following default runs the risk of being a penalty, although a modest uplift in the interest rate payable on future interest payments following default may be acceptable, particularly in the commercial context.[210] A

[209] County Leasing Ltd v East [2007] EWHC 2907.

[210] Although see Lordsvale Finance Ltd v Bank of Zambia [1996] QB 752, in which an interest uplift of 1 per cent on future interest payments to be made following default was held not to be a penalty in a commercial loan.

lower concessionary interest rate paid upon prompt payment is not generally regarded as a penalty,[211] although, in a consumer contract, it may still fall foul of the fairness test.

The case of Falco Finance Ltd v Gough[212] serves as an example. Mr Gough obtained a third mortgage over his home from Falco for £30,000 in the hope of clearing the arrears on his prior mortgages. The loan was repayable over a term of twenty-five years at a flat interest rate of 13.99 per cent, with an APR of 19.4 per cent. A concessionary rate of 8.99 per cent was, however, payable unless the mortgage went into arrears, when all future payments would not qualify for the discount. Mr Gough missed the first payment and thus the standard rate become immediately payable. The enforceability of these terms became an issue when Falco applied for possession. The court held that the disparity in the dual interest rate mechanism was unfair under the 1999 Regulations, failing within one of the grey-listed terms.[213] The fact that interest was paid at a flat rate on the whole of the capital, irrespective of any amounts repaid, was also found to be unfair.

QUESTIONS

1. Compare the regulatory regimes established by the Financial Services and Markets Act 2002 and Consumer Credit Act 1974. Which regime do you think is most effective in protecting borrowers?
2. How does a wife prove that her husband has unduly influenced her?
3. When will a bank be 'on notice' that a wife may have been unduly influenced by her husband and what steps should a bank take to minimize this risk?
4. In Barclays Bank v O'Brien and Royal Bank of Scotland v Etridge, the House of Lords tried to ensure that 'a law designed to protect the vulnerable does not render the matrimonial home unacceptable security to financial institutions'. Has it succeeded?
5. What is the relationship between undue influence and unconscionable bargains? Would it be helpful to assimilate the two doctrines?
6. Does the clogs and fetters doctrine continue to have any utility?
7. When is a mortgage term 'unfair' within the meaning of the Unfair Terms in Consumer Contract Regulations 1999?
8. What legal controls can a borrower use to challenge the interest that he or she has agreed to pay the lender?

FURTHER READING

Bamford, 'Lord Macnaghten's Puzzle: The Mortgage of Real Property in English Law' [1996] CLP 207

Berg, 'Clogs on the Equity of Redemption: Or Chaining an Unruly Dog' [2002] JBL 335

Bigwood, 'Undue Influence: Impaired Consent or Wicked Exploitation' (1996) 16 OJLS 503

211 Wallingford v Mutual Society (1880) 5 App Cas 685.

212 [1999] CCLR 16.

213 See Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999, Sch 2, para 1(e).

Birks and Chin, 'On the Nature of Undue Influence' in Good Faith and Fault in Contract Law (eds Beatson and Friedmann, Oxford: Clarendon, 1995, ch 3)

Brown, 'The Consumer Credit Act 2006: Real Additional Mortgagor Protection?' [2007] Conv 325

Citizens Advice, Set Up to Fail: CAB Clients' Experience and Secured Loan Arrears Problems (2007, available online at http://www.citizensadvice.org.uk)

Devenney, 'A Pack of Unruly Dogs: Unconscionable Bargains, Lawful Act (Economic) Duress and Clogs on the Equity of Redemption' (2002) JBL 539

Deveney and Chandler, 'Unconscionability and the Taxonomy of Undue Influence' [2007] JBL 541

Ferris, 'Why is the Law of Undue Influence So Hard to Understand and Apply?' in Modern Studies in Property Law: Vol 4 (ed Cooke, Oxford: Hart, 2007)

Nield, 'Borrower as Consumers: New Notions of Unconscionability for the Domestic Borrowers' in Unconscionability in European Commercial Transactions: Protecting the Vulnerable (eds Fox, Kenny and Devenney, Cambridge, UK: CUP, 2010).

Nield, 'Responsible Lending and Borrowing: Whereto Low Cost Home Ownership' (2010) 30 LS 610

Whitehouse, A Longitudinal Analysis of the Mortgage Repossession Process 1995–2010: Stability, Regulation and Reform in Modern Studies in Property Law Vol 6 (ed Bright, Oxford: Hart, 2011)

30

LENDER'S RIGHTS AND REMEDIES

CENTRAL ISSUES

1. A lender's rights and remedies arise from the nature of its security, the powers implied by the Law of Property Act 1925, and any express powers. The most important powers are the right to take possession, the power to sell, and the power to appoint a receiver.
2. The lender has an immediate right to take possession, but this right is carefully controlled by equitable duties, procedural safeguards, and, in the case of dwelling houses, legislation.
3. Section 36 of the Administration of Justice Act 1970 enables the court to delay execution of a possession order of a dwelling house if the borrower is able to clear any sums due within a reasonable period either from income or from a sale of the house. This is an important jurisdiction for many homeowners in mortgage arrears.
4. The lender's power of sale is implied by s 101(1)(i) of the 1925 Act and can only be exercised if the borrower has defaulted.
5. The lender is able to sell out of court, but is subject to twin equitable duties: to act in good faith and to take reasonable steps to obtain a proper market price.
6. A lender also has an implied power conferred by s 101(1)(iii) of the 1925 Act to appoint a receiver to collect the income from the property. This power is important in the commercial context, when a receiver may also be granted power to manage and sell the property.

1 INTRODUCTION

We now need to turn our attention to the whole point of the lender taking security—namely, the rights and remedies that security provides if the debt is not repaid. We will concentrate our attention on the most common security over the land: the legal charge by way of mortgage. The most attractive remedy for a lender is the power to sell the land and repay the debt from the sale proceeds—but to sell the land most advantageously, the lender will usually wish to sell with vacant possession. Thus, where the land is the borrower's home, the lender will need to evict the borrower and take possession as a prelude to sale. Where the lending is for commercial purposes and the legal charge is over premises that form part of the assets of the business, the lender may prefer to appoint a receiver. A receiver, who is usually a professional insolvency practitioner, has power to collect the income from the premises—for example, the rents from the property portfolio of a business—and to apply that income in the repayment of the debt. A receiver is also usually granted power to manage and sell the land, and any business conducted upon it.

At one time, the ability of a mortgagee to foreclose was an important right. Under a classic mortgage by conveyance, foreclosure operated by barring the borrower's equitable right to redeem to extinguish his or her equity of redemption, so that the lender became the full legal and equitable owner of the property. Under a legal charge by way of mortgage, statutory machinery is required to achieve the same result.[1] But the prospect that the lender could reap a windfall profit where the debt was considerably less than the value of the land led to careful regulation of foreclosure. The lender has to apply to court, which will, as a matter of course, give the borrower a generous time to clear the debt before confirming the foreclosure order.[2] The court also has power to order the sale of the property in preference to foreclosure.[3] Even if a foreclosure order is made, the court may be persuaded to set it aside in certain circumstances.[4]

Given the time, expense, and uncertainty of foreclosure, it is not surprising that it became unpopular and is now effectively obsolete.[5] In this chapter, we will thus concentrate on the right to take possession, and the powers of sale and appointment of a receiver.

1.1 SOURCE OF THE LENDER'S RIGHTS AND REMEDIES

1.1.1 The nature of the security

The lender's rights and remedies will be defined, initially, by the nature of the security itself. A classical mortgage by conveyance or sub-demise gave rise to a right to possession by reason of the legal estate that it conferred upon the lender, whether that was a freehold or a leasehold term. Foreclosure was also an inherent right of a mortgagee by conveyance or sub-demise. A charge, in contrast, gives no inherent right to possession or to foreclose: the chargee at common law must go to court to enforce the charge by obtaining a court order for sale or for the appointment by the court of a receiver. The legal charge by way of mortgage, however, whilst creating a security by way of charge, confers upon the legal chargee the rights and remedies enjoyed by a mortgagee by way of sub-demise for a term of 3,000 years. This is the import of

1 See Law of Property Act 1925, ss 88(2) and 89(2).

2 The process involves two stages: the grant of a foreclosure order nisi, requiring accounts to be drawn up detailing exactly what the borrower owes and giving him or her time to repay; and the foreclosure order absolute, which will be made if the borrower has failed to repay as directed.

3 Law of Property Act 1925, s 91(2).

4 See Campbell v Holyland (1877) 7 Ch D 166. See also the Hong Kong cases of Hang Seng Bank v Mee Ching Development Ltd [1970] HKLR 94 and Frencher Ltd (In liq) v Bank of East Asia [1995] 2 HKC 263.

5 The Law Commission has recommended its abolition: Law Commission Report No 204, Land Mortgages (1991), [7.27].

s 87(1) of the Law of Property Act 1925 (LPA 1925).[6] The legal charge by way of mortgage, as a hybrid form of security, thus confers upon the legal chargee the rights and powers enjoyed by a legal mortgagee, including the right to take possession and to foreclose, although its proprietary form is merely a charge.

1.1.2 Powers implied by statute

Section 101 of the LPA 1925 provides another source of the lender's rights and remedies. The section implies into a mortgage made by deed a number of powers, the most important of which are the power to sell and the power to appoint a receiver without, in either case, having to obtain a court order.

Law of Property Act 1925, s 101(1)

Powers incident to estate or interest of mortgagee

(1) A mortgagee, where the mortgage is made by deed, shall by virtue of this Act, have the following powers, to the like extent as if they had been in the terms conferred by the mortgage deed, but not further (namely):

(i) A power, when the mortgage money has become due, to sell, or to concur with any person in selling, the mortgaged property, or any part thereof, either subject to prior charges or not, and either together or in lots, by public auction or by private contract, subject to such conditions respecting title, or evidence of title, or other matter, as the mortgagee thinks fit, with power to vary any contract for sale, and to buy in at an auction, or to rescind any contract for sale, and to re-sell, without being answerable for any loss occasioned thereby;

(ii) [. . .]

(iii) A power, when the mortgage money has become due, to appoint a receiver of the income of the mortgaged property, or any part thereof; or, if the mortgaged property consists of an interest in income, or of a rentcharge or an annual or other periodic sum, a receiver of that property or any part thereof;

[. . .]

A legal charge by way of mortgage, being a legal interest, must be created by deed and will thus enjoy the powers implied by s 101. The powers are implied into second or subsequent legal charges created by deed, although by reason of the rules of priority, a second chargee will only be able to sell subject to the first charge. Alternatively, a second chargee may decide that it is in its interests to take control of any sale of the property, which it can do by paying off the first charge and thus improving its priority position.

Whether or not an equitable mortgagee or chargee will enjoy the statutory powers under s 101 is a little more complicated and turns on the acquisition and content questions relating to equitable security rights that we examined in section 4.3 of Chapter 28. First, the equitable mortgage or charge must be created by deed for s 101 to apply. Secondly, one must look to the property that is expressed to be subject to the security. In Swift 1st Ltd v Colin,[7] the

6 See Chapter 28, section 4.2.

7 [2011] EWHC 2410 relying on Re White Rose Cottage [1965] Ch 940.

High Court held that a purported legal charge over the whole of the borrower's interest in the property, which took effect only as an equitable charge of the legal estate because it was unregistered,[8] nevertheless conferred power under s 101 to sell the legal and equitable estate. By contrast, an equitable mortgage or a purely equitable charge of a borrower's equitable estate[9] will entitle the equitable mortgagee or chargee to sell only the equitable estate that is the subject of the security. Some further authority, for instance a power of attorney, will be required to sell the borrower's legal estate (if any) in the land.

1.1.3 Express powers

The implied powers of a legal chargee to take possession, to sell, to appoint a receiver, and of foreclose may be excluded, varied, or supplemented by the terms of the security itself.[10] Institutional lenders, like banks and building societies, pay their lawyers to draft a standard set of terms and conditions to be incorporated into their legal charges, which will invariably affect the operation of their implied powers and may grant additional express powers, such as a power to lease. It is thus always important to read the legal charge itself to see how the implied powers may have been altered and what additional express powers have been granted.

1.2 REGULATION OF THE LENDER'S RIGHTS AND REMEDIES

In the last chapter, we saw how the borrower's position can be protected. The borrower is particularly vulnerable where the lender is exercising its rights and remedies—after all, he or she stands to lose his or her home or business.

Equity has long cast a watchful eye over the exercise of the lender's powers to ensure that they are employed only to facilitate recovery of the lender's debt, and then only with due probity and care. A modern expression of this duty is found in the following case.

Palk v Mortgage Service Funding plc
[1993] Ch 330, CA

Sir Donald Nicholls V–C

At 337–8

[. . .] [A] mortgagee can sit back and do nothing. He is not obliged to take steps to realise his security. But if he does take steps to exercise his rights over his security, common law and equity alike have set bounds to the extent to which he can look after himself and ignore the mortgagor's interests. In the exercise of his rights over his security the mortgagee must act fairly towards the mortgagor. His interest in the property has priority over the interest of the mortgagor, and he is entitled to proceed on that footing. He can protect his own interest, but he is not entitled to conduct himself in a way which unfairly prejudices the mortgagor. If he takes possession he might prefer to do nothing and bide his time, waiting indefinitely for an improvement in the market, with the property empty meanwhile. That he cannot do. He is accountable for his actual receipts from the property. He is also accountable to the mortgagor for what he would have received but for his default. So he must take reasonable care to

8 See Chapter 28, section 4.3.1.

9 See Chapter 28, sections 4.3.2 and 4.3.3.

10 See, in relation to the s 101 powers, s 101(3)–(4). As to the relationship between the expressed and implied powers, see Horsham Properties Group Ltd v Clark [2008] EWHC 2327.

maximise his return from the property. He must also take reasonable care of the property. Similarly if he sells the property: he cannot sell hastily at a knock-down price sufficient to pay off his debt. The mortgagor also has an interest in the property and is under a personal liability for the shortfall. The mortgagee must keep that in mind. He must exercise reasonable care to sell only at the proper market value. As Lord Moulton said in McHugh v. Union Bank of Canada [1913] A.C. 299, 311: "It is well settled law that it is the duty of a mortgagee when realising the mortgaged property by sale to behave in conducting such realisation as a reasonable man would behave in the realisation of his own property, so that the mortgagor may receive credit for the fair value of the property sold."

Parliament has also intervened, but only where the lender is seeking possession of a dwelling house by obtaining a court order for possession.[11] The county court has primary jurisdiction, which provides a more informal venue for such intimidating proceedings. More significantly, the court is given discretion to halt the progress of the proceedings to allow the borrower time to try to pay any arrears or remedy any other default.

Market regulation, through the Financial Services and Market Act 2000 (FSMA 2000) and the Consumer Credit Act 1974 as amended (CCA 1974), also plays its part in trying to ensure that lenders treat borrowers in default fairly. We considered the impact of this legislation in Chapter 29 (see section 3). Most first legal mortgages, secured upon an individual borrower's home, are regulated under the FSMA 2000, with rules in the Mortgage Conduct of Business Sourcebook (MCOB)[12] setting standards on the handling of arrears.

FSA Handbook, Arrears and repossessions: regulated mortgage contracts and home purchase plans (MCOB 13)

MCOB 13.3 Dealing fairly with customers in arrears: policy and procedures

MCOB 13.3.1

1. A firm must deal fairly with any customer who:
   (a) is in arrears on a regulated mortgage contract or home purchase plan;
   (b) has a sale shortfall; or
   (c) is otherwise in breach of a home purchase plan.
2. A firm must put in place, and operate in accordance with, a written policy (agreed by its respective governing body) and procedures for complying with (1). Such policy and procedures must reflect the requirements of MCOB 13.3.2AR and MCOB 13.3.4AR.

MCOB 13.3.2A

A firm must when dealing with any customer in payment difficulties:

1. make reasonable efforts to reach an agreement with a customer over the method of repaying any payment shortfall or sale shortfall, in the case of the former having regard to the desirability of agreeing with the customer an alternative to taking possession of the property;

[11] See Administration of Justice Act 1970 (as amended), s 36, see section 2.5 below.
[12] Part of the Financial Services Authority (FSA) Handbook.

2. liaise, if the customer makes arrangements for this, with a third party source of advice regarding the payment shortfall or sale shortfall;
3. allow a reasonable time over which the payment shortfall or sale shortfall should be repaid, having particular regard to the need to establish, where feasible, a payment plan which is practical in terms of the circumstances of the customer;
4. grant, unless it has good reason not to do so, a customer's request for a change to:
   (a) the date on which the payment is due (providing it is within the same payment period); or
   (b) the method by which payment is made;
   and give the customer a written explanation of its reasons if it refuses the request;
5. where no reasonable payment arrangement can be made, allow the customer to remain in possession for a reasonable period to effect a sale; and
6. not repossess the property unless all other reasonable attempts to resolve the position have failed.

MCOB 13.3.3A

In complying with MCOB 13.3.2A a firm must give a customer a reasonable period of time to consider any proposals for dealing with the payment difficulties.

MCOB 13.3.4A

1. a firm must consider whether, given the individual circumstances of the customer, it is appropriate to do one or more of the following in relation to the regulated mortgage contract or home purchase plan with the agreement of the customer:
   (a) extend its term; or
   (b) change its type; or
   (c) defer payment of interest due on the regulated mortgage contract or of sums due under the home purchase plan (including, in either case, on any sale shortfall); or
   (d) treat the payment shortfall as if it was part of the original amount provided (but a firm must not automatically capitalise a payment shortfall); or;
   (e) make use of any Government forbearance initiatives in which the firm chooses to participate.
2. a firm must give customers adequate information to understand the implications of any proposed arrangement; one approach may be to provide information on the new terms in line with the annual statement provisions.

MCOB 13.3.4B

A firm must make customers aware of the existence of any applicable Government schemes to assist borrowers in payment difficulties in relation to regulated mortgage contracts.

Similar calls for forbearance and to seek repossession as a last resort are found in the OFT Guidance to Creditors on Irresponsible Lending[13] and Second Charge Lending, when the mortgage or charge is subject to the CCA 1974.[14] Furthermore, enforcement practices by [13] OFT 1107 (March 2010).

[14] OFT1105 (July 2009). See also OFT, Consultation on Debt Collection OFT 664con (March 2011) .

lenders governed by the CCA 1974 may also be scrutinized under the unfair relationship test found in s 140A–C.[15]

A Pre-action Protocol on Possession Actions based upon Mortgage Arrears has been introduced by the Civil Justice Council.[16] This protocol reflects MCOB 13 but affects all court sanctioned repossessions of dwelling houses whether or not regulated by FSMA 2000 or the CCA 1974. It operates by requiring scrutiny at court level to try and ensure that lenders do not resort to immediate repossession before having taken steps (where appropriate) to reschedule the borrower's indebtedness or otherwise resolve the borrower's repayment difficulties.[17]

The guiding principle is thus for lenders to try to agree with their defaulting borrowers a way of clearing arrears by rescheduling repayments, rather than resorting to immediate legal redress. A rise in the rate of repossessions, following the credit crunch led to the early implementation of the Pre-action Protocol and increased pressure on lenders to comply with these regulatory standards and show forbearance. These measures appeared to be having some effect with repossessions falling short of predicted levels. [18]

The fears of a surge in repossessions triggered by the credit crunch also led the Government to introduce a Mortgage Rescue Scheme and a Mortgage Support Scheme. The Mortgage Rescue Scheme provides a last resort for particularly vulnerable homeowners to stay in their home even though their mortgage commitments have become unsustainable. It does so by facilitating the sale of the borrower's home to a registered social landlord who then leases back the home to the borrower on a secure tenancy. The Mortgage Support Scheme provided a limited Government guarantee to those lenders who agreed to reschedule the borrower's debt, but the scheme proved unpopular and was short lived.[19]

The private sector has also seen a growth in sale and leaseback schemes which can appear attractive to financially distressed borrowers wishing to stay in their homes. A privately negotiated sale of the mortgaged home is agreed at a discount of its market price. The purchaser pays off the mortgage and arrears and then leases the home back to the borrower/tenant under a short-term tenancy, which offers little security of tenure. The inequality between the purchaser/landlord and the borrower/tenant is obvious and after calls by the OFT these schemes became subject to FSA regulation from 1 July 2009 with tighter rules introduced with effect from 30 June 2010.[20] Certain sale and leaseback arrangements have also been subject to legal challenge.[21]

[15] OFT, Unfair Relationships and Enforcement Action under Part 8 Enterprise Act OFT 859Rev (May 2008 updated August 2011). See Chapter 29, section 3.2.3.

[16] Available online at http://www.civiljusticecouncil.gov.uk. The Protocol was implemented earlier than planned on 19 November 2008.

[17] Whitehouse, 'The mortgage arrears pre-action protocol: an opportunity missed' (2009) 72 MLR 793.

[18] Ford and Wallace, Uncharted Territory? Managing arrears and possessions, (Shelter, 2009); Wallace and Ford, 'Limiting possessions? Managing mortgage arrears in a new era' (2010) 10 JIHP 133; Whitehouse, 'Longitudinal Analysis of the Mortgage Repossession Process 1995–2010: Stability, Regulation and Reform' in Modern Studies in Property Law Vol 6 (ed Bright, Oxford: Hart, 2010) ch 7. Previous research had shown variable compliance with MCOB 13 see Citizens Advice, Set Up To Fail: CAB Client's Experience of Mortgage and Secured Loan Arrears Problems (2002); FSA, Mortgage Effectiveness Review Arrears Findings (2008).

[19] Ford and Wallace, Unchartered Territory: Managing mortgage arrears and possessions (Shelter, 2009) p 33 and Wilcox, Wallace, Bramley, Morgan, Sosenko, and Ford, An Evaluation of Mortgage Rescue Scheme and Homeowners Mortgage Support Interim Report DCLG (July 2010).

[20] For example, independent sales valuations, affordability and benefit checks, minimum lease terms and cooling off periods. See Marston and Wilding, 'Credit crunch, housing benefit and sale and rent back agreements' [2009] Conv 413.

[21] See UK Housing Alliance (North West) Ltd v Francis [2010] EWCA Civ 117 where, although subject to UTCCR, the terms were found fair and Re North East Property Buyers Litigation [2012] EWCA Civ 17 where the borrower/tenants failed to establish that their interests were overriding.

2 POSSESSION

2.1 THE STARTING POINT: AN IMMEDIATE RIGHT TO POSSESSION

A legal chargee of land is entitled to take possession of the charged property. This right arises because a legal chargee is entitled to the rights of a mortgagee by way of sub-demise who enjoys a right to immediate possession by reason of the leasehold term.[22] This right to possession is thus not dependent upon default.

Harman J made the point forcibly in a number of decisions—most infamously, in the following case.[23]

Four-Maids Ltd v Dudley Marshall (Properties) Ltd
[1957] Ch 317, HC

Harman J

At 320

I repeat now, that the right of the mortgagee to possession in the absence of some contract has nothing to do with default on the part of the mortgagor. The mortgagee may go into possession before the ink is dry on the mortgage unless there is something in the contract, express or by implication, whereby he has contracted himself out of that right. He has the right because he has a legal term of years in the property or its statutory equivalent [. . .] If there is a provision that, so long as certain payments are made, he will not go into possession, then he has contracted himself out of his rights. Apart from that, possession is a matter of course.

Even equity will not intervene, beyond granting a short adjournment to allow the borrower to redeem the whole loan. Arguments suggesting that there was such an equitable jurisdiction were soundly rejected in the following case.

Birmingham Citizens Permanent Building Society v Caunt
[1962] Ch 883, HC

Russell J

At 896

For the building society it was contended that the argument based on the equity of redemption and the tenor of the mortgage was novel and fundamentally unsound. Equity had always interfered with legal rights in order to ensure that the mortgage should not operate otherwise than as it was intended to operate—namely, as security for repayment of money. But there was no principle upon which equity had ever attempted or could ever rightly attempt to interfere with the security as a security, or to destroy or suspend or nullify any rights of the [22] See Law of Property Act 1925, s 87(1). The right is unaffected by the grant of a subcharge: see Credit and Mercantile plc v Marks [2004] EWCA Civ 568, [2005] Ch 81.

[23] See also Alliance Perpetual Building Society v Belrum Investments Ltd [1957] 1 WLR 720; Hughes v Waite [1957] 1 WLR 713.

> mortgagee which were part and parcel of that security. The whole purpose of equity was, by insisting that the transaction was a security for the repayment of money, thereby to shield the mortgagor from attempts in reliance on strict legal rights to turn it into something more. Equity was never and should never be in the hands of the judges a sword to attack any part of the security itself, and the right to possession was an important part of that security, more particularly in the association with the ability to give vacant possession on the exercise of the power of sale. These appear to me to be sound answers to an attempt to give reasons for the existence of a jurisdiction such as is suggested. I think there was and is no such jurisdiction.

This fundamental principle also leads to the conclusion that the existence of a counterclaim or equitable right of set-off—by which the borrower might be able to argue that, at the end of the day, he or she owes no money to the lender—does not detract from the lender's immediate right to possession.[24]

2.2 THE EQUITABLE DUTY TO ACCOUNT

Equity will not interfere with the lender's right to take possession, but it will control the exercise of that right. Where the property is let and the lender goes into possession by collecting the rents, it must apply the rent in the discharge of the debt. Furthermore, it is under a duty to account not only for the income received, but also the income that should have been received but for the lender's wilful default.[25]

Frisby has examined a mortgagee's duty to account following its application to receivers in Medforth v Blake.[26]

Frisby, 'Making a Silk Purse Out of a Pig's Ear: Medforth v Blake & Ors' (2000) 63 MLR 413, 416

> Liability to account for wilful default is of ancient origin arising out of the account jurisdiction of the Courts of Equity. On a suit for redemption a Chancery Master took an account, whereby the mortgagee's principal, interest and costs were set against the amount received from the mortgaged property. Where the mortgagee had previously taken possession, this last item included not only what had been received but what might have been received but for his wilful default. Thus equity's traditional protective stance towards the mortgagor's equity of redemption was manifest by the imposition of 'almost penal liabilities.'
>
> Whilst the basic principle of wilful default liability is easily stated, its content is less readily identifiable. Some cases ascribe liability to stated misconduct without further comment. These 'factual instances' of wilful default include refusal to accept tenants and the disadvantageous letting of property. Permitting a mortgagor to intercept 'profits' or failing to receive the purchase price on a sale of the mortgaged property similarly attracted liability. The courts showed varying degrees of strictness in this regard.

24 See Samuel Keller Holdings Ltd v Martins Bank Ltd [1971] 1 WLR 43; Mobil Oil Co Ltd v Rawlinson (1982) 43 P & CR 221; Citibank Trust Ltd v Ayivor [1987] 1 WLR 1157; National Westminster Bank Plc v Skelton [1993] 1 WLR 72; Ashley Guarantee v Zacaria [1993] 1 WLR 62.

25 White v City of London Brewery (1889) 42 Ch D 237. For a consideration for 'wilful default', see Stannard (1979) Conv 345.

26 [1999] 3 All ER 97, considered further at section 4.3 below.

These illustrations of liability give little guidance as to whether wilful default requires deliberate, reckless or simply unthinking conduct, the brevity of the reports making it difficult to discern whether the penalised behaviour was collusive or careless. Attempts to extract a governing principle that might predict liability for wilful default exhibit a subtle shift in emphasis from liability to duty. For example, the notion that a mortgagor owes a duty of diligence was propounded by Turner LJ in Sherwin v Shakspear.

Other authorities treat wilful default as established by a particular degree of dereliction. In ex parte Mure Thurlow LC contemplated that involuntary conduct might suffice to ground liability, although on the facts the negligence was 'gross'. Later cases tend to support the proposition that the carelessness in question may be less than fraud but more than mere negligence. If gross negligence and ordinary diligence exact differing standards of conduct, which is to be preferred? It is not immediately obvious that any of the above cases is conclusively authoritative, especially since many judicial statements in this regard appear to be mere dicta, and Stannard concludes that 'wilful default' is purely a relative term, meaning no more than a failure to perform a duty.

Whilst the older authorities may be unclear as to the degree of default, more recent authorities tend to support the view that a mortgagee's conduct should be tested according to standards of reasonableness. This was the test applied to receivers in Medforth v Blake, which also finds expression in the passage from Palk extracted at section 1.2 above.

Whatever the exact standard may be, these duties are usually perceived as sufficiently onerous to deter a lender from taking possession, except for a short time as a prelude to sale. As we shall see, a lender can avoid personal liability where it appoints a receiver, which is the preferred course of action where the lender anticipates taking possession for an extended period.

2.3 THE PURPOSE OF TAKING POSSESSION

In the following case, a house had been let to students whom the landlord wanted to evict—but he could not do so, because their tenancy was protected by legislation. The mortgage of the house prohibited letting without the consent of the bank, which the landlord had failed to obtain. The landlord was thus in breach of the mortgage, but the bank refused the landlord's request to exercise its right to take possession and evict the students. As an alternative ploy, the landlord arranged for his wife to take a transfer of the mortgage, so that she could exercise the right of the mortgagee to evict the students. The Court of Appeal refused to grant an order for possession, although the judges differed in their reasoning.

Quennell v Maltby
[1979] 1 WLR 318, CA

Lord Denning MR

At 322

So here in modern times equity can step in so as to prevent a mortgagee, or a transferee from him, from getting possession of a house contrary to the justice of the case. A mortgagee will be restrained from getting possession except when it is sought bona fide and reasonably for the purpose of enforcing the security and then only subject to such conditions as the court thinks fit to impose. When the bank itself or a building society lends the money, then it may > well be right to allow the mortgagee to obtain possession when the borrower is in default. But so long as the interest is paid and there is nothing outstanding, equity has ample power to restrain any unjust use of the right to possession.

The other members of the Court of Appeal agreed with the result, but based their reasoning upon a narrower premise. Lord Templeman stated:[27] 'The estate, rights and powers of a mortgagee [...] are only vested in a mortgagee to protect his position as a mortgagee and to enable him to obtain repayment.'

The width of Lord Denning's views was criticized at the time,[28] but has subsequently been cited with approval.[29] The decision does give expression to equity's underlying concern that lenders exercise their rights bona fide for the purpose of recovering the debt due to them and not for some other purpose—a proposition that was repeated by Lord Templeman as a member of the Privy Council in Downsview Nominees Ltd v First City Corporation Ltd.[30]

2.4 PROCEDURAL SAFEGUARDS

Those who take it upon themselves to evict occupiers from their property face criminal sanctions and this legislation applies to lenders as to anyone else. By s 6 of the Criminal Law Act 1977, it is an offence to use violence to gain possession of occupied premises, whilst by s 1(3) of the Protection from Eviction Act 1977, it is an offence to harass an occupier of residential premises to 'persuade' him or her to give up occupation. Invariably, therefore, lenders will seek the assistance of the court to gain entry to premises that are occupied. It is only where premises are empty, or where the borrower voluntarily gives up possession, that the lender will risk entering otherwise than by executing an order for possession.

Taking possession of a borrower's home is a particularly sensitive issue, and mortgages regulated by the FSMA 2000 and CCA 1974 are subject to additional safeguards. The CCA 1974 requires notice of arrears to be served upon the borrower,[31] and for possession to be obtained by court order.[32] We have already considered the regulatory pressures upon CCA and FSMA lenders to come to some arrangement with the borrower to clear any arrears and to only seek repossession as a last resort. The Pre-action Protocol on Repossessions based upon Mortgage Arrears reinforces these standards.[33]

2.5 DWELLING HOUSES AND S 36 OF THE ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE ACT 1970 (AS AMENDED)

The decision in Caunt (see section 2.1 above) led to a need to rethink the exercise of the lender's immediate right to possession in respect of residential property.[34] The result is s 36 of the Administration of Justice Act 1970.

[27] At 324. [28] Smith [1979] Conv 266; Pearce [1979] CLJ 257.

[29] See Albany Home Loans Ltd v Massey (1997) 37 P & CR 509, 513, in which the court refused an order for possession against a husband when to do so would have been futile, because his wife, who was not bound by the mortgage, was entitled to remain in possession as a joint tenant.

[30] [1993] AC 295, 312. [31] Consumer Credit Act 1974 (as amended), ss 76, 86B–86E, 87, and 88.

[32] Ibid, s 126. [33] See section 1.2 above.

[34] See the Payne Committee Report (Cmnd 3909, 1969); Haley, 'Mortgage Default: Possession, Relief and Judicial Discretion' (1997) 17 LS 483.

Administration of Justice Act 1970, s 36

Additional powers of court in action by mortgagee for possession of dwelling-house

1. Where the mortgagee under a mortgage of land which consists of or includes a dwelling-house brings an action in which he claims possession of the mortgaged property, not being an action for foreclosure in which a claim for possession of the mortgaged property is also made, the court may exercise any of the powers conferred on it by subsection (2) below if it appears to the court that in the event of its exercising the power the mortgagor is likely to be able within a reasonable period to pay any sums due under the mortgage or to remedy a default consisting of a breach of any other obligation arising under or by virtue of the mortgage.
2. The court—
   (a) may adjourn the proceedings, or
   (b) on giving judgment, or making an order, for delivery of possession of the mortgaged property, or at any time before the execution of such judgment or order, may—
      (i) stay or suspend execution of the judgment or order, or
      (ii) postpone the date for delivery of possession, for such period or periods as the court thinks reasonable.

3. Any such adjournment, stay, suspension or postponement as is referred to in subsection (2) above may be made subject to such conditions with regard to payment by the mortgagor of any sum secured by the mortgage or the remedying of any default as the court thinks fit.
4. The court may from time to time vary or revoke any condition imposed by virtue of this section.

The section does not limit the lender's inherent right to take possession, but it does control its exercise by conferring upon the court power to adjourn proceedings, or to stay or postpone execution of the order for possession. The court cannot give an indefinite period of suspension, but it can extend the stay upon the borrower making a further application.[35] The court will thus grant the order for possession, but may not allow the lender to ask the bailiff to execute the order. The motive is to allow the borrower time to repay the sums owing, or at least any arrears. Unfortunately for such a significant jurisdiction, s 36 is not the most happily worded and has raised a number of problems of interpretation, as well as calls for reform.[36]

It should also be noted that, where a mortgage is regulated by the CCA 1974, the court enjoys an additional discretion to grant a time order to extend the time for enforcement of the lender's right to possession,[37] and, in such circumstances, to amend and vary the mortgage terms as it see fit.[38] Because consumer credit regulation affects second mortgagees, who are unlikely to be able to exercise their right to possession in priority to the first chargee, this jurisdiction is less significant than s 36.

[35] Royal Trust Co of Canada v Markham [1975] 1 WLR 1416, 1424.

[36] See Smith [1979] Conv 266; Haley, 'Mortgage Default: Possession, Relief and Judicial Discretion' (1997) 17 LS 483.

[37] Consumer Credit Act 1974 (as amended), ss 129 and 130.

[38] Ibid, s 136. See McMurtry, 'Consumer Credit Act Mortgages: unfair terms, time orders and judicial discretion' [2010] JBL 107.

2.5.1 'Dwelling-house'

Needless to say there have been questions over what constitutes a 'dwelling-house'. It does not matter if only part of the property is a dwelling, or that the dwelling house is not the borrower's home.[39] The protection is thus not restricted to the residential lending market, but can catch commercial lending where the security includes a dwelling house. The time for determining whether or not the security is over, or includes, a dwelling house is the time of the order for possession, rather than the time of the mortgage itself.[40]

2.5.2 Court proceedings for possession

The more difficult question is whether the court's jurisdiction is only available where the lender has applied for an order for possession. We have noted that the lender will invariably do so where the borrower is in residence, but what about when the borrower, for one reason or another, is not?

Just such a situation arose in the following case, in which the Court of Appeal—taking a literal, rather than a purposive, approach to interpretation of s 36—held that it had no application where a lender was not seeking an order for possession.

Ropaigealach v Barclays Bank plc
[2000] QB 263, CA

Facts: The Ropaigealachs fell into mortgage arrears and their lender, Barclays, wrote to them, making a final demand for payment and warning them that their property would be sold. The Ropaigealachs did not receive the letter, because they were not living at the property whilst it was being renovated, and did not hear of the sale until told by a neighbour. The Court declined to grant a declaration that Barclays was not entitled to take possession and sell without obtaining a court order.

Clarke LJ

At 283

It is true to say that neither this court in Caunt's case nor the Payne Committee was considering whether the court should have similar powers in cases in which the mortgagee chooses not to take proceedings for possession but simply takes possession or perhaps sells the property under his power of sale and the purchaser takes possession. In these circumstances I agree that it cannot readily be inferred that Parliament intended to give protection to mortgagors in such a case. It does however strike me as very curious that mortgagors should only have protection in the case where the mortgagee chooses to take legal proceedings and not in the case where he chooses simply to enter the property. As Alison Clarke put it in her illuminating article "Further implications of section 36 of the Administration of Justice Act 1970" in The Conveyancer & Property Lawyer (1983), p. 293, [. . .] it is anomalous and undesirable to protect mortgagors against eviction by court process yet leave them open to eviction by self-help.

39 See Bank of Scotland v Miller [2001] EWCA Civ 344, [2002] QB 255, in which the property was a nightclub with an unoccupied flat above.
40 Ibid.

The second case which seems to me to highlight the potential problems is the decision of this court in National & Provincial Building Society v. Ahmed [1995] 2 E.G.L.R. 127, where it was held that the mortgagor's equity of redemption is extinguished when the mortgagee, in the exercise of his power of sale, enters into a contract of sale of the mortgaged property [...]

In a Law Commission Working Paper No. 99 on Land Mortgages (1986), which was produced before the report and was expressly stated not to represent the final views of the Commission, the position was put thus with regard to the court's discretion under section 36, at p. 103, para. 3.69:

> "(b) The discretion is to delay or withhold the possession order only, not any other remedy. In practice this usually prevents enforcement, but in theory it is still open to the mortgagee to proceed to exercise its power of sale notwithstanding the court's refusal to make a possession order. Since such a sale terminates the mortgagor's interest in the property, the purchaser presumably would have no difficulty in obtaining a possession order against the mortgagor after completion."

In a written note sent to us after the conclusion of the hearing Miss Gloster says that the bank would not go so far as to submit that that view is correct. Miss Gloster correctly adds that this kind of issue does not to fall for determination on this appeal, and I express no view upon the solution to such problems, but such considerations do highlight the potential problems. Such problems would not arise (or would be much reduced) if it were held that the effect of section 36 were [...] to give the court the same power to inhibit the exercise by the mortgagee of its right to possession at common law whether it were exercised by simply entering possession or by doing so pursuant to an order of the court [...]

It seems to me that if a mortgagor needs that relief he needs it whether the mortgagee chooses to exercise his right of possession by entering into possession with or without an order of the court. Indeed he also needs it if instead of doing either the mortgagee sells the property to a purchaser leaving the purchaser to take possession.

I recognise that Miss Gloster says that responsible mortgagees do not in practice take possession of property in which the mortgagor and his family are living without an order of the court, and I accept that that is so, but in my judgment the problem should be approached by reference to the legal rights of the mortgagee and to the legitimate interests of the mortgagor in the light of the purpose of the Act. In these circumstances, if it were possible to construe section 36 by affording mortgagors protection whether or not the mortgagee chose to obtain possession by self-help or legal action, I for my part would do so. I have however been persuaded that it is not possible.

Clarke LJ refers also to the situation in which a lender exercises its power of sale without having first obtained possession. In these circumstances, the sale will overreach the borrower's equity of redemption and pass an unencumbered title to the purchaser.[41] But if the property is occupied (e.g. by the borrower or his or her tenant), the suggestion made by Millett LJ in National & Provincial Building Society v Ahmed[42] is that s 36 will again come into play if the purchaser seeks an order for possession, although, given that the borrower's interests will have been overreached, it is difficult to see how he or she could resist a purchaser's application for possession. Indeed, this was the approach taken by the High Court in Horsham Properties Group Ltd v Clark.[43] If a purchaser can be found to purchase the property whilst the borrower is still in occupation, there is thus a worrying route by which s 36 can be avoided.

[41] Law of Property Act 1925, ss 88(1) and s 89(1).
[42] [1995] 2 EGLR 127; Duke v Robson [1973] 1 WLR 267.
[43] [2008] EWHC 2327.

2.5.3 Who needs to be told of possession proceedings and who can apply under s 36?

Possession proceedings will be issued against the borrower(s), as mortgagor(s), who can apply for relief under s 36.[44] The Civil Procedure Rules now require the lender to send notice of possession proceedings to the property so that a tenant or other occupier should hopefully also be aware of the proceedings.[45]

Two common situations need to be considered further. First, a borrower as mortgagor may hold the dwelling house on trust for themselves and their spouse or partner as equitable co-owners, or that spouse or partner may have a statutory right of occupation. We considered how these situations may arise in Chapter 16. Such a spouse or partner may not be a party to the mortgage and possession proceedings may not be directly issued against them. However, where they do learn of the possession proceedings, he or she may apply to court to be joined as a party and seek the relief afforded by s 36.[46]

Secondly, is the position of a tenant of the borrower. Where the tenancy is authorized by the lender it will be binding upon him and the lender cannot obtain possession unless entitled to do so under the terms of the tenancy. Although, as we will see in section 4 below, he or she may appoint a receiver to collect the rental income or sell the property subject to the tenancy. Where the tenancy is unauthorized by the lender the tenancy is not binding on the lender and the unauthorized tenant may be evicted by the lender. The unauthorized tenant may not apply under s 36[47] but limited protection against immediate eviction is now available under Mortgage Repossession (Protection of Tenant etc) Act 2010.[48] An unauthorized tenant may apply, either on the application for the possession order or its execution, for a stay of delivery of possession for a period for two months in order to give a breathing space to find alternative accommodation. The court in exercising its discretion whether or not to accede to the tenant's application must have regard to his or her circumstances and whether or not there is an outstanding breach of the tenancy agreement. The court may also order the tenant to pay their rent directly to the lender.

2.5.4 The court's discretion

The court may exercise its jurisdiction where it is satisfied that the borrower is likely to be able, within a reasonable period, to pay any sums due under the mortgage or to remedy any other default.[49] The vast majority of cases are concerned with mortgage arrears, when the court is solely concerned with how and when the borrower is able to meet his or her financial commitments.[50]

44 A purchaser from the borrower who takes subject to the mortgage may also apply AJA, s 39(1).

45 Civil Procedure Rules Pt 55 Rule 10(2). See also s 56 Family law Act 1996 which requires a lender to serve notice of proceedings upon a spouse who has registered his or her statutory right of occupation.

46 In the case of an equitable co-owner because they fall within the definition of a mortgagor under s 36 see Cheval Bridging Finance Ltd v Bhasin [2008] EWCA Civ 1613 and in the case a spouse with a statutory right of occupation see Family Law Act 1996, s 55(2).

47 Britannia Building Society v Earl [1990] 1 WLR 422, 430.

48 See O'Neill, 'The Mortgage Repossession (Protection of Tenants etc) Act 2010—Sufficient protection for tenants?' [2011] Conv 380.

49 For example, in the case of breach of a covenant against letting by removing the tenants: see Britannia Building Society v Earl [1990] 1 WLR 422, 430. It should be noted that the jurisdiction is available even though there has been no default see Western Bank Ltd v Schindler [1977] Ch 1.

50 Compare Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996, ss 14 and 15 (see Chapter 18, section 5.5), where a mortgagee is applying for the sale of co-owner's interest in land.

What sums are due under the mortgage?

Initially, there is the question of what sums are due under the mortgage where an acceleration provision in the mortgage operates on default to trigger repayment of all sums secured under the mortgage, including the full capital value of the loan and any outstanding interest. In Halifax Building Society v Clark,[51] the court held that it was, indeed, the total of these sums that the borrower was required to clear. The purpose of s 36 was accordingly placed in jeopardy: if the borrower was already unable to meet his or her periodic repayments, he or she was hardly likely to be able to repay the whole loan.

Parliament was swift to react to restrict the meaning of 'sums due' to any arrears.

Administration of Justice Act 1973, s 8

1. Where by a mortgage of land which consists of or includes a dwelling-house, or by any agreement between the mortgagee under such a mortgage and the mortgagor, the mortgagor is entitled or is to be permitted to pay the principal sum secured by instalments or otherwise to defer payment of it in whole or in part, but provision is also made for earlier payment in the event of any default by the mortgagor or of a demand by the mortgagee or otherwise, then for purposes of section 36 of the Administration of Justice Act 1970 (under which a court has power to delay giving a mortgagee possession of the mortgaged property so as to allow the mortgagor a reasonable time to pay any sums due under the mortgage) a court may treat as due under the mortgage on account of the principal sum secured and of interest on it only such amounts as the mortgagor would have expected to be required to pay if there had been no such provision for earlier payment.
2. A court shall not exercise by virtue of subsection (1) above the powers conferred by section 36 of the Administration of Justice Act 1970 unless it appears to the court not only that the mortgagor is likely to be able within a reasonable period to pay any amounts regarded (in accordance with subsection (1) above) as due on account of the principal sum secured, together with the interest on those amounts, but also that he is likely to be able by the end of that period to pay any further amounts that he would have expected to be required to pay by then on account of that sum and of interest on it if there had been no such provision as is referred to in subsection (1) above for earlier payment.

Section 8 brought its own problems of interpretation, in the shape of what type of loan repayment scheme fell within its terms. Clearly, the standard repayment mortgage, whereby instalments of capital and interest are repaid over a fixed term, are covered.[52] The court has held that endowment mortgages are similarly included,[53] but mortgages repayable on demand, which are common to secure an overdraft facility granted to provide funds to the borrower's business, do not fall within s 8.[54]

[51] [1973] Ch 307.

[52] Centrax Trustees v Ross [1979] 2 All ER 952.

[53] Bank of Scotland v Grimes [1986] QB1179. Under an endowment mortgage, the borrower's instalment payments meet only the interest payable. The borrower also pays periodic insurance premiums to maintain an endowment policy that, at the end of the mortgage term, will mature to produce a lump sum, which should be sufficient to repay the capital advanced.

[54] Habib Bank Ltd v Tailor [1982] 1 WLR 1218; Rees Investment Ltd v Groves [2002] 1 P & CR DG 9.

What is a 'reasonable period'?

The significance of s 8 has diminished somewhat as a result of the interpretation that the courts have accorded to what is a 'reasonable period' in which repayment is to be made. It is clear that the Payne Committee and Parliament envisaged a relatively short period, of a year or two, to provide the borrower with relief, so that he or she could overcome a temporary financial setback, such as the loss of a job, or an illness. The Court of Appeal, in the light of the property slump of the early 1990s during which mortgage repossessions soared, adopted a different approach.

Cheltenham & Gloucester Building Society v Norgan
[1996] 1 WLR 343, CA

Facts: Mrs Norgan had borrowed £90,000, repayable by monthly instalments over twenty-two years, with the loan being secured upon her farmhouse. She fell into arrears, and the Cheltenham & Gloucester obtained a possession order, which was stayed on several occasions. The arrears remained substantial, and the Cheltenham & Gloucester applied again to execute the possession order.

Waite LJ

At 353

In the present plight of the housing market possession cases play a major part in the caseload for the county courts. That is particularly true of the district judges, who deal with those cases in such numbers that they develop a "feel" for them and have achieved an excellent disposal record. It is not surprising that they have found it convenient to adopt a relatively short period of years as the rough rule of thumb which aids a just determination of the "reasonable period" for the purposes of section 36 of the Act of 1970 and section 8 of the Act of 1973. Nevertheless, although I would not go quite so far with Mr. Croally as to say it should be an "assumption," it does seem to me that the logic and spirit of the legislation require, especially in cases where the parties are proceeding under arrangements such as those reflected in the C.M.L. statement, that the court should take as its starting point the full term of the mortgage and pose at the outset the question: "Would it be possible for the mortgagor to maintain payment-off of the arrears by instalments over that period?"

I accept all the grounds urged on us by Mr. Waters for saying that the dicta relied on in First Middlesbrough Trading and Mortgage Co. Ltd. v. Cunningham (1974) 28 P. & C.R. 69 and Western Bank Ltd. v. Schindler [1977] Ch.1 were directed to situations different from the circumstances of this case and most other cases of its kind, but they nevertheless in my judgment provide confirmation of the view that such is the right approach. I would acknowledge, also, that this approach will be liable to demand a more detailed analysis of present figures and future projections than it may have been customary for the courts to undertake until now. There is likely to be a greater need to require of mortgagors that they should furnish the court with a detailed "budget" of the kind that has been supplied by the mortgagor in her affidavit in the present case. But analysis of such budgets is part of the expertise in which the district judges have already become adept in their family jurisdiction and I would not expect that to present too great a difficulty. There will be instances, too, in which preliminary adjudication will be necessary to determine, when calculating the amount of arrears and assessing the future instalments for their payment-off, which items are to be attributed to the mortgagor's current payment obligations and which to his ultimate liability on capital account. The present case has shown—through the disparity introduced by the disputed items—how problematic that may sometimes prove to be. They are nevertheless disputes that it will be essential to resolve—in this case and others where they arise—before the court can undertake an accurate estimate of the amount which the mortgagor would be required to meet if the arrears were to be made repayable over the full remainder of the mortgage term. There may also be cases, as Mr. Waters points out, in which it is less obvious than in this case that the mortgagee is adequately secured—and detailed evidence, if necessary by experts, may be required to see if and when the lender's security will become liable to be put at risk as a result of imposing postponement of payments in arrear. Problems such as these—which I suspect will arise only rarely in practice although they will undeniably be daunting when they do arise—should not however be allowed, in my judgment, to stand in the way of giving effect to the clearly intended scheme of the legislation.

There is another factor which, to my mind, weighs strongly in favour of adopting the full term of the mortgage as the starting point for calculating a "reasonable period" for payment of arrears. It is prompted by experience in this very case. The parties have been before the court with depressing frequency over the years on applications to enforce, or further to suspend, the warrant of possession, while Mrs. Norgan and her husband have struggled, sometimes with success and sometimes without, to meet whatever commitment was currently approved by the court. Cheltenham has (in exercise of its power to do so under the terms of the mortgage) added to its security the costs it has incurred in connection with all these attendances. One of the disputed items turns upon the question whether such costs fall to be allocated to capital or to interest account. What is not in dispute, however, is that one day, be it sooner or later, those costs will have to be borne by the mortgagor, and if the day comes when she decides—or is compelled by circumstances—to move to more readily affordable accommodation, her resources for rehousing will be correspondingly reduced. It is an experience which brings home the disadvantages which both lender and borrower are liable to suffer if frequent attendance before the court becomes necessary as a result of multiple applications under section 36 of the Act of 1970—to say nothing of the heavy inroads made upon court hearing time. One advantage of taking the period most favourable to the mortgagor at the outset is that, if his or her hopes of repayment prove to be ill-founded and the new instalments initially ordered as a condition of suspension are not maintained but themselves fall into arrear, the mortgagee can be heard with justice to say that the mortgagor has had his chance, and that the section 36 powers (although of course capable in theory of being exercised again and again) should not be employed repeatedly to compel a lending institution which has already suffered interruption of the regular flow of interest to which it was entitled under the express terms of the mortgage to accept assurances of future payment from a borrower in whom it has lost confidence.

Evans LJ

At 356

In conclusion, a practical summary of our judgments may be helpful in future cases. Drawing on the above and on the judgment of Waite L.J., the following considerations are likely to be relevant when a "reasonable period" has to be established for the purposes of section 36 of the Act of 1970. (a) How much can the borrower reasonably afford to pay, both now and in the future? (b) If the borrower has a temporary difficulty in meeting his obligations, how long is the difficulty likely to last? (c) What was the reason for the arrears which have accumulated? (d) How much remains of the original term? (e) What are relevant contractual terms, and what type of mortgage is it, i.e. when is the principal due to be repaid? (f) Is it a case where the court should exercise its power to disregard accelerated payment provisions (section 8 of the Act of 1973)? (g) Is it reasonable to expect the lender, in the circumstances of the particular case, to recoup the arrears of interest (1) over the whole of the original term, or (2) within a shorter period, or even (3) within a longer period, i.e. by extending the repayment period? Is it reasonable to expect the lender to capitalise the interest or not? (h) Are there any reasons affecting the security which should influence the length of the period for payment? In the light of the answers to the above, the court can proceed to exercise its overall discretion, taking account also of any further factors which may arise in the particular case.

Thus, the question to be considered by the court is whether, taking into account the whole of the term of the mortgage, it is likely that the borrower will be able to repay all that he or she owes the lender.[55] In coming to that decision, the court will need to consider the matters listed by Evans LJ, which, in turn, will require the parties to present to the court the necessary evidence, including detailed financial statements and projections of the borrower's likely income and outgoings, as well as evidence—for example, as to the spare equity in the property—which will enable the court to evaluate the exposure of the lender to a continuing risk of default. These guidelines reflect those contained in the MCOB 13 and the Pre-action Protocol (see section 1.2 above); namely that the lender should try to agree a reasonable rescheduling of the borrower's debt repayments before seeking repossession. Thus it may well be that the feasibility of the borrower being able to repay within a reasonable period has already been explored.

Another factor that may assist a borrower is the possibility of state assistance to meet mortgage interest repayments. For example, Support for Mortgage Interest may provide some help, although such assistance is limited and not immediately available.[56] The government have deliberately tried to restrict assistance to encourage borrowers to seek protection against the risk of a loss income as a result of sickness or redundancy, by taking out mortgage payment protection insurance[57] However, in the face of the credit crunch there has been a temporary relaxation of entitlement criteria.

The courts' approach to the interpretation of 'a reasonable period' is somewhat different where the borrower is proposing to clear his or her debt from a sale of property. In such circumstances, the total amount owed to the lender will be repayable, because the borrower will need to discharge the mortgage to sell the property. There must be some firm evidence that a sale is likely within the foreseeable future; a mere hope or an estate agent's optimistic projections are not enough.

55 Although there is evidence that the courts in practice look to shorter periods, see Whitehouse, 'Longitudinal Analysis of the Mortgage Repossession Process 1995–2010: Stability, Regulation and Reform' in Modern Studies in Property Law Vol 6 (ed Bright, Oxford: Hart, 2011) pp 163–4.

56 See Lundy, 'State Assistance with House Purchases: Mortgage Interest and Social Security' [1997] Conv 36; Morgan, 'Mortgages and a Flexible Workforce' in Contemporary Property Law (eds Jackson and Wilde, 1999); Citizens Advice (2007). The period before payments are made has been reduced for most claimants from thirty-nine weeks to thirteen weeks, and the house value ceiling for eligibility has been increased from £100,000 to £175,000.

57 Although there has been considerable concern expressed over the marketing of this insurance (see Chapter 29, section 2.2.3), and such insurance provides protection for the lender's and not the borrower's loss: see Woolwich Building Society v Brown [1996] CLC 625; Banfield v Leeds Building Society [2007] EWCA Civ 1369.

Bristol & West Building Society v Ellis
(1997) 73 P & CR 158, CA

Facts: Mrs Ellis had fallen into mortgage arrears after her husband left her. She unsuccessfully applied for suspension of a warrant for possession, on the basis that she would sell the property in three–five years' time, when her children had finished their full-time education. In support of her application, she provided estate agents' opinions showing that the likely sale price for the property should be sufficient to discharge the mortgage.

Auld LJ

At 161

The prospect of settling the mortgage debt, including arrears of principal and/or interest, by sale of the property raises a number of questions on the reasonableness of any period which a court may consider allowing for the purpose.

The critical matters are, of course, the adequacy of the property as a security for the debt and the length of the period necessary to achieve a sale. There should be evidence, or at least some informal material (see Cheltenham & Gloucester Building Society v. Grant (1994) 26 H.L.R. 703), before the court of the likelihood of a sale the proceeds of which will discharge the debt and of the period within which such a sale is likely to be achieved. If the court is satisfied on both counts and that the necessary period for sale is reasonable, it should, if it decides to suspend the order for possession, identify the period in its order [. . .]

It all depends on the individual circumstances of each case, though the important factors in most are likely to be the extent to which the mortgage debt and arrears are secured by the value of the property and the effect of time on that security.

Where the property is already on the market and there is some indication of delay on the part of the mortgagor, it may be that a short period of suspension of only a few months would be reasonable [. . .] Where there is likely to be considerable delay in selling the property and/or its value is close to the total of the mortgage debt and arrears so that the mortgagee is at risk as to the adequacy of the security, immediate possession or only a short period of suspension may be reasonable. Where there has already been considerable delay in realising a sale of the property and/or the likely sale proceeds are unlikely to cover the mortgage debt and arrears or there is simply no sufficient evidence as to sale value, the normal order would be for immediate possession. See, e.g. Abbey National Mortgages plc v. Rochelle Bernard (July 4, 1995, C.A. unreported) and National Provincial Bank v Lloyd [1996] 1 All ER 630.

Mr Duggan submitted that, here, the material, formal or informal (see Grant) before the district judge and judge was insufficient to satisfy them that Mrs Ellis would or could sell the property within three to five years or that its sale proceeds when sold would be sufficient to discharge the mortgage debt and arrears. As to the time of sale, all that the district judge had was her statement in her affidavit that she anticipated selling within three to five years when her children completed their education. As to value, the evidence was not compelling: two estate agents' estimates of between £80,000 and £85,000 as against the redemption figure at the time of just over £77,000 plus costs. As a result of Mrs Ellis's payment of the lump sum ordered by the district judge and subsequent payments, the total figure of indebtedness is now about £70,000, including about £10,000 arrears of interest. Given the inevitable uncertainty as to the movement of property values over the next few years and the reserve with which the courts should approach estate agents' estimates of sale prices (see Clothier) no court could be sanguine about the adequacy, now or continuing over that period, of the property as a security for the mortgage debt and arrears. In my view, the evidence was simply insufficient to entitle the district judge to contemplate, behind the order he made, a likelihood that the house would or could be sold at a price sufficient to discharge Mrs Ellis's overall debt to Bristol & West within any reasonable period, and certainly not one of up to three to five years.

There may be a distinct marketing advantage in the borrower selling the property rather than the lender doing so after entering into possession: a home will often look more attractive to a purchaser if it is occupied, and the knowledge that a sale is being forced by a mortgagee can depress the price. The borrower may, however, be slow to cooperate. In limited circumstances, a court may be persuaded that the benefits of allowing the borrower to conduct the sale outweigh the disadvantages and will suspend execution of a possession order accordingly. But it is clear that such a jurisdiction will not be exercised if the lender objects.

Cheltenham & Gloucester Plc v Booker
(1997) 73 P & CR 412, CA

Facts: The Bookers were in substantial arrears with their mortgage repayments and the Cheltenham & Gloucester had obtained an order for possession, the execution of which had been stayed on a number of occasions. The Bookers made an unsuccessful final application for stay, on the basis that they intended to sell, and requested that they be allowed to remain in possession pending the sale.

Millett LJ

At 415

[. . .] [I]t appears to me in principle difficult to deny the existence, at least in theory, of a similar jurisdiction to defer the giving of possession for a short time in order to enable the property to be sold by the mortgagee. If the court is satisfied (a) that possession will not be required by the mortgagee pending completion of the sale but only by the purchasers on completion; (b) that the presence of the mortgagor pending completion will enhance, or at least not depress, the sale price; (c) that the mortgagor will so cooperate in the sale by showing prospective purchasers round the property and so forth; and (d) that he will give possession to the purchaser on completion, it seems to me that there is no reason in principle why the court should accede to a mortgagee's insistence that immediate possession prior to the sale should be given to him.

However, while the jurisdiction exists, experience shows that these conditions are seldom likely to be satisfied. Accordingly, in my judgment, the jurisdiction should be sparingly exercised, and then exercised only with great caution. If the conditions which I have mentioned exist, the court is likely to entrust the conduct of the sale to the mortgagor. There is an inherent illogicality in entrusting conduct of the sale to the mortgagee and yet leaving the mortgagor in possession pending completion unless the mortgagee has agreed to this course. The obtaining of possession with a view to giving it to the purchaser is part of the necessary arrangements for sale. In my opinion the party having conduct of the sale ought normally to have the right to decide when it is desirable for him to obtain possession from those in occupation in order to enable the sale to be effectively carried through.

As the plaintiffs observe, in what I would wish to describe as a most impressive skeleton argument, if the contractual obligation to give vacant possession, which the mortgagee will wish to assume in order to obtain the best price reasonably obtainable, is separated from the ability to give immediate vacant possession, the mortgagee is put at risk of being in breach of contract through circumstances beyond his control. Moreover, if the conduct of the sale is given to the mortgagee, any prospective purchaser will become aware prior to exchange of contracts that the property is being sold by a mortgagee who has not yet obtained vacant possession. The risk that the borrower will not vacate the property on completion will become apparent and the purchaser may be deterred from proceeding. He will also be aware that the sale is a forced sale, the advantage of achieving a better price through continued owner occupation is unlikely to be realised.

Accordingly, while I would not wish to hold that the court has no jurisdiction in an appropriate case to make an order such as the judge made in the present case, it is hard to see the advantages of such an order and easy to see the disadvantages. I find it difficult to envisage circumstances in which such a course would be appropriate unless the mortgagee consented. It ought to be a rarity and taken only if the necessary conditions are satisfied.

2.5.5 Section 36 and court orders for sale under s 91

Section 91 of the LPA 1925 provides that a borrower may apply to the court for an order for sale.

Law of Property Act 1925, s 91

Sale of mortgaged property in action for redemption or foreclosure

1. Any person entitled to redeem mortgaged property may have a judgment or order for sale instead of for redemption in an action brought by him either for redemption alone or for sale alone, or for sale or redemption in the alternative.

2. In any action, whether for foreclosure, or for redemption, or for sale or for raising and payment in any manner of mortgage money, the court, on the request of the mortgagee, or any person interested either in the mortgage money or in the right of redemption, and, notwithstanding that—

(a) any other person dissents; or

(b) the mortgagee or any person so interested does not appear in the action;

and without allowing any time for redemption or for payment of any mortgage money, may direct a sale of the mortgaged property, on such terms as it thinks fit, including the deposit in court of a reasonable sum fixed by the court to meet the expenses of sale and to secure performance of the terms

The jurisdiction provides an alternative option for a borrower who wishes to solve his or her debt repayment problems through sale, although its application is limited. Traditionally, the jurisdiction was exercised only where there was a surplus between the value of the property and the outstanding mortgage, when it was not unusual to give the borrower the conduct of the sale. In Palk v Mortgage Services Funding plc,[58] the court was persuaded to use s 91

[58] [1993] Ch 330.

to order sale on the application of the borrower where there was negative equity. The lender had wanted to delay sale until the market improved, and proposed, in the meantime, to take possession and let the property, applying the rental in partial discharge of the mortgage repayments—but this strategy would have resulted in mounting arrears. The Palks preferred an immediate sale to clear a good portion of their debt, leaving the balance unsecured.

The application of s 91 to instances in which there is negative equity can, however, be problematic: for example, where the borrower resorts to the jurisdiction as a delaying tactic or to try to gain control of the sale. Accordingly, the court will not usurp the lender's right to seek possession with a view to sale by suspending proceedings under s 36 to allow an application for sale under s 91.

Cheltenham & Gloucester plc v Krausz
[1997] 1 WLR 1558, CA

Facts: The Krauszs were in mortgage arrears and the Cheltenham & Gloucester had obtained an order for possession, the execution of which had been stayed on several occasions. The Krauszs found a purchaser for the property at £65,000, but the Cheltenham & Gloucester refused to agree to the sale, believing that the property was worth nearer £90,000. The Krauszs unsuccessfully applied for an order for sale under s 91(2) when their arrears totalled £83,000.

Phillips LJ

At 1562

Until Palk's case it was the practice of the Chancery court only to entertain an application for sale by the mortgagor if the proceeds of sale were expected to be sufficient to discharge the entirety of the mortgage debt. In such circumstances the mortgagor might initiate proceedings by bringing an action for sale under section 91(1), or, if the mortgagee sought to foreclose, the mortgagor could apply for an order for sale in place of foreclosure. The practice thus reflected the heading to section 91: "Sale of mortgaged property in action for redemption or foreclosure."

Palk's case established, for the first time, that the court has power under section 91(2) to make an order for sale on the application of a mortgagor, notwithstanding that the proceeds of sale will be insufficient to discharge the mortgage debt. In Palk's case the mortgagees had obtained an order for possession with the intention, not of proceeding to sell the property but of waiting in the hope that the market might improve. The mortgagor was anxious that the property should be sold so that the proceeds would reduce the mortgage debt, on which interest was accruing at an alarming rate. The Court of Appeal held that, as the mortgagees could buy the property themselves if they wished to speculate on an increase in its value, in the interests of fairness the property should be sold [...]

In cases before Palk's case, where the proceeds of sale were likely to exceed the mortgage debt, the court was prepared to entrust the sale to the mortgagor on the basis that the mortgagor had a keener interest than the mortgagee in obtaining the best price. [...]

In any case in which there is negative equity it will be open to the mortgagor to resist an order for possession on the ground that he wishes to obtain a better price by remaining in possession and selling the property himself. In not every case will the primary motive for such an application be the wish to obtain a better price than that which the mortgagee is likely to obtain on a forced sale. Often the mortgagor will be anxious to postpone for as long as possible the evil day when he has to leave his home. This court has ample experience of hopeless applications for leave to appeal against possession orders designed to achieve just that end. There will be a danger, if the mortgagee does not obtain possession, that the mortgagor will delay the realisation of the property by seeking too high a price, or deliberately procrastinating on completion. At present there is a simple procedure for seeking possession in the county court and the issue tends to be whether there are arrears and whether the mortgagor is likely to be able to discharge these in a reasonable time. If possession is to be suspended whenever this appears reasonable in order to give mortgagors the opportunity to sell the property themselves, the courts are going to have to enter into an area of difficult factual inquiry in order to decide in the individual case whether or not this course will be to the common benefit of mortgagor and mortgagee. Furthermore there will be obvious practical difficulties for mortgagees in monitoring the negotiations of mortgagors who are permitted time to market their properties. [. . .]

Before the decision in Palk's case it seemed that section 36 of the Act of 1970 and section 91 of the Act of 1925 were complementary. An application under section 91 would only be contemplated where the proceeds of sale were expected to exceed the mortgage debt. In these circumstances section 36 gave the court the power to suspend possession in order to enable an application for sale under section 91 to be made. It is, however, quite clear that section 36 does not empower the court to suspend possession in order to permit the mortgagor to sell the mortgaged premises where the proceeds of sale will not suffice to discharge the mortgage debt, unless of course other funds will be available to the mortgagor to make up the shortfall. A mortgagor seeking relief in the circumstances of Palk's case is thus unable to invoke any statutory power to suspend the mortgagee's right to enter into possession.

2.5.6 Right or remedy?

We have already noted that the lender enjoys a right to possession that is inherently independent of default. Section 36 is, however, an important jurisdiction that effectively controls the lender's right to possession of a dwelling house within a remedial context, and, as such, plays a vitally important social role. Nevertheless, as our survey of the jurisdiction has highlighted, its parameters are highly dependent on judicial interpretation, which has not always been able hold this social function firmly in its sights.

Haley, 'Mortgage Default: Possession, Relief and Judicial Discretion'
(1997) 17 LS 483, 483

The history of this interventionist jurisdiction is, however, chequered. It has been marked by the uneasy interaction between the laissez faire attitude of the common law (which upheld the lender's contract and estate rights) and the more protective and tender treatment of the mortgagor in equity (which, in appropriate cases, sought to restrict the exercise of those rights). The jurisdiction is now in statutory form, but the tension between the commercial interests of the mortgagee and the need for the mortgagor to maintain a home persists. Although the court must attempt to achieve a balance between those competing claims, under the present legal regime this is, patently, not a simple task. The judicial stance must necessarily reflect individual circumstances and broader notions of public interest, social and economic policy and parliamentary purpose. Consequently, the granting of relief against possession, as well as being reactive to prevailing community norms, is susceptible to major swings in judicial attitude and statutory constructions.

The remedial context of the lender's right to possession is reinforced by the regulatory controls imposed by the FSMA 2000 through MCOB 13, as strengthened by the Pre-action Protocol. These measures are predicated on the policy that possession should be a measure of last resort and that it should not be used to harass borrowers in arrears. As such, they may sideline the s 36 jurisdiction and mean that it is increasingly difficult to justify the lender's inherent right to possession. The law should reflect the reality that possession is a remedy that should only be capable of exercise under the scrutiny of the court.[59]

McMurtry, 'Mortgage Default and Repossession: Procedure and Policy in the Post-Norgan Era' (2007) 58 NILQR 194, 207

> The regulatory reforms concerning the policy and procedure for dealing with arrears is disappointing and limited. The overriding concern is that a lender should give proper consideration to arrears issues, follow a documented approach and ensure that proper internal systems are put in place for the fair treatment of customers. Such goals are purely matters of form and operational procedure. As to the substantive rules governing borrower protection, there is nothing that is innovative [. . .] This regulatory response adds nothing to that adopted by the judiciary over the last ten years and does not operate to increase further the protection to borrowers in temporary financial straits. It is ironic that, instead, it might cause judicial sympathies to sway in favour of the institutional lender. First, it is possible that judges will be better disposed towards lenders who evidence the alteration of the terms of the mortgage contract in the prescribed ways. Secondly, it is likely that far fewer cases will come before the courts when the postponement of possession is the likely outcome. Thirdly, it is likely that more borrowers will have already benefited from a Norgan style repayment plan before the case ever reaches court. Of course, where there is little evidence of a desire on the lender's part to adhere to the spirit of the regulation, judicial sympathies will understandably shift towards the borrower. Nevertheless, it is only when the circumstances fall within the parameters of the Norgan liberality that the court will be able to maintain a roof over the borrower's head. As those parameters are likely to have already been reached, it is difficult to see how such sympathy can translate into effective relief.

2.6 HOME REPOSSESSION AND HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 36 may wrestle the exercise of a lender's right to possession within the court's control, but there are gaps in its application—most notably, where there is no need for the lender to apply to court for possession. Several commentators have raised the suggestion that the lender's right to possession conferred by s 87(1) of the LPA 1925 is incompatible with Art 8 (respect for the home).[60] The issue is of course one of horizontal application of the Convention standards between private parties but, given that the lender's right to possession is derived from statute, s 3 of the Human Rights Act requires this statutory right to be interpreted in a human rights compatible manner.[61] The question of [59] As the Law Commission has recommended: see Law Commission Report No 204 (1991) [6.16], [7.28]–[7.38].

[60] See also Gray and Gray, Elements of Land Law (4th edn, 2005, [15.147]); Rook, Property Law and Human Rights (2001, p 199); Dixon, 'Sorry, We've Sold Your Home: Mortgagees and Their Possessory Rights' (1999) 58 CLJ 281.

[61] See Chapter 3.

compatibility is governed by the familiar justification formula namely; whether or not the interference with the borrower's home presented by repossession, is justified, because it is lawful and serves a legitimate aim, which is necessary within a democratic society to address a pressing social need, yet is also proportionate in its effect upon the individual victim.[62] This call for proportionality necessitates an adequate process by which to assess the impact of the measure upon the personal circumstances of the borrower.[63] The exercise of a right to possession of the home must, thus, satisfy both substantive and procedural human rights standards. The fact that a lender's right to possession can be asserted, albeit in unusual circumstances, outside the court process leads to a direct clash with these standards.

Nield, 'Charges, Possession and Human Rights: A Reappraisal of s 87(1) Law of Property Act 1925' in Modern Studies in Property Law: Vol 3 (ed Cooke, 2005,p 173)

The Strasbourg jurisprudence recognises that a lender's right to possession to facilitate the repayment of secured debt is a proportionate and legitimate aim. In Wood v UK (1997) 24 EHRR CD 69 the European Court, when considering Article 1 Protocol 1, stated that:

> [. . .] to the extent that the applicant is deprived of her possessions by repossession, the Commission considers that the deprivation is in the public interest, that is the public interest in ensuring the payment of contractual debts and is also in accordance with the rules provided by law.

And when considering Article 8:

> In so far as the repossession constituted an interference with the applicant's home the Commission finds that this was in accordance with the terms of the loan and the domestic law and was necessary for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others, namely the lender.

These comments presuppose the borrower is in default and the lender is seeking recourse to their security to obtain repayment. But where the borrower is not in default the lender's legitimate aim in obtaining possession is not so obvious unless it is to take steps to protect the value of the security.

Proportionality calls for an examination of the process by which a legitimate aim is achieved. So that, even though repossession to ensure the efficient repayment of debts is a legitimate aim, the means by which that repossession is obtained is a vital consideration under both Articles 1 and 8. The possibility that the lender may obtain possession without some form of judicial consideration over its exercise must tip the fair balance that lies at the heart of proportionality. [. . .] This concern with process operates despite the fact that Article 6 may not be engaged and provides the strongest argument that the right to possession conferred by subsection 87(1) is incompatible with the [Human Rights Act 1998] and thus should be amended.

However, even where a lender seeks a court order for possession does s 36 of the Administration of Justice Act 1970 provide a human rights compliant process? Section 36 is solely concerned with assessing the financial circumstances of the borrower and his or 62 See Chapter 3.

63 See Manchester CC v Pinnock [2010] UKSC 45 [2010] 3 WLR 1441; Hounslow LBC v Powell [2011] UKSC 8 [2011] 2 WLR 287.

her ability to meet his or her debts. The court cannot take into account other factors: for example, the personal circumstances of the borrower or the welfare of children occupying the house as their home. As presently interpreted the court's discretion, thus, may not be wide enough to satisfy the demands of a human rights compatible process. By way of contrast, the welfare of children is an explicit factor in the exercise of the court's discretion to order the sale of co-owned property upon the application of a creditor under ss 14 and 15 of the Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996 (TOLATA 1996).[64] This discriminatory treatment itself might engage Art 14 of the ECHR.[65]

3 SALE

The power of the lender to sell the mortgaged property without having to go to court is a powerful remedy. The lender can control the sale and recover the debt from the proceeds of a sale, accounting to the borrower (or a second chargee, if there is a subsequent mortgage) for any balance received in excess of the debt. In the conduct of the sale, the lender does have to act in a way that pays due regard to the interests of the borrower (or subsequent chargee).

Before examining the duties that a lender owes when selling the mortgaged property, we need to consider the mechanics of the sale itself.

3.1 MECHANICS OF SALE

3.1.1 Source of the power

The power of the lender to sell will be conferred either by the express terms of the legal charge or from the implied power contained in s 101(1)(i) of the LPA 1925 (extracted in section 1.1.2 above).

Where the power is express, the terms of the power should stipulate how and when it may be exercised. It is common for an express power of sale to be exercisable on specified events of default: for example, if the borrower fails to make an agreed repayment of capital or interest, or otherwise breaches any other covenant contained in the legal charge, or upon the borrower becoming insolvent.

Where a lender under a legal charge is relying upon its implied statutory power, there are two stages to be considered. Firstly, the power must arise: s 101(1)(i) provides that the power of sale arises when the mortgage money is due, being the legal date for redemption under the mortgage,[66] or, where the mortgage is repayable by instalments, when an instalment payment falls due.[67] Secondly, the power, once arisen, must become exercisable, which, in the case of the statutory power, is upon the events of default specified in s 103 of the 1925 Act although these events may be, and frequently are, varied by the express terms of the mortgage.

64 See Chapter 18, section 3.3.
65 See Fox, Conceptualising Home (2007), pp 500–3.
66 Twentieth Century Banking Corp v Wilkinson [1977] Ch 99.
67 Payne v Cardiff RDC [1932] 1 KB 241.

Law of Property Act 1925, s 103

Regulation of exercise of power of sale

A mortgagee shall not exercise the power of sale conferred by this Act unless and until—

(i) Notice requiring payment of the mortgage money has been served on the mortgagor or one of two or more mortgagors, and default has been made in payment of the mortgage money, or of part thereof, for three months after such service; or

(ii) Some interest under the mortgage is in arrear and unpaid for two months after becoming due; or

(iii) There has been a breach of some provision contained in the mortgage deed or in this Act, or in an enactment replaced by this Act, and on the part of the mortgagor, or of some person concurring in making the mortgage, to be observed or performed, other than and besides a covenant for payment of the mortgage money or interest thereon.

The power of sale is thus exercisable only on default. In the case of a default in meeting a demand for full repayment, the borrower must be given notice and three months in which to comply with that notice; in the case of default in the payment of interest, no notice is required, but there must be at least two months' arrears.

In the case of a regulated mortgage, a longer process is contemplated. The MCOB 13 (extracted at section1.2 above), governing FSA-regulated mortgages, calls for the borrower to be given notice of any arrears, and for the lender to take reasonable steps to try to arrange the rescheduling of the debt before contemplating possession and sale; statutory default notices must be served where a mortgage is regulated under the CCA 1974.[68] Where the Pre-action Protocol is applicable because the lender is seeking possession prior to sale, the lender must also comply with the steps that it outlines.

Haley has pointed out that, in the case of a dwelling house, the impact of s 36 of the Administration of Justice Act 1970 will give the borrower more time in which to clear any arrears than is contemplated by s 103 of the LPA 1925,[69] and thus 'a long delay in the mortgagee's right to possession is by a side wind eroding the value of the statutory remedy' of sale.[70] He observes that the separate control of the mortgagee's right to possession and its power of sale is artificial when the purpose of obtaining possession is to enable the lender to sell, and advocates reform to bring the remedies into line.[71] Otherwise, a lender may be tempted to sell without obtaining possession.[72]

3.1.2 Passing title

The mechanics of passing title by a mortgagee's sale is the subject of ss 88(1) (for mortgages over freeholds) and 89(1) (for mortgages over leaseholds) of the LPA 1925.

68 Consumer Credit Act 1974 (as amended), ss 88B and 88C.

69 Technically, the reverse could be the case where s 36 does not apply, although it is unlikely that a lender will act so precipitously.

70 'Mortgage Default: Possession, Relief and Judicial Discretion' (1997) 17 LS 483, 496.

71 See also Gardner, An Introduction to Land Law (2009), [12.6.4].

72 See Ropaigealach v Barclays Bank plc [2000] QB 263; Horsham Properties Group Ltd v Clark [2008] EWHC 2327.

Law of Property Act 1925, s 88(1)

Realisation of freehold mortgages

1. Where an estate in fee simple has been mortgaged by the creation of a term of years absolute limited thereout or by a charge by way of legal mortgage and the mortgagee sells under his statutory or express power of sale—

(a) the conveyance by him shall operate to vest in the purchaser the fee simple in the land conveyed subject to any legal mortgage having priority to the mortgage in right of which the sale is made and to any money thereby secured, and thereupon;

(b) the mortgage term or the charge by way of legal mortgagee and any subsequent mortgage term or charges shall merge or be extinguished as respects the land conveyed; and such conveyance may, as respects the fee simple, be made in the name of the estate owner in whom it is vested.

The sale by the lender vests title in the purchaser by overreaching the borrower's equity of redemption, and any other interest over which the mortgage has priority, which vests instead in the proceeds of sale.[73] The mortgage itself and any subsequent charge are extinguished so far as they affect the land itself.

3.1.3 Application of proceeds of sale

By s 105 of the LPA 1925, the lender holds the proceeds of sale (after the discharge of any prior mortgages or encumbrances) in trust, to be applied in, firstly, the meeting the sale costs, and secondly, repaying the amount owing to it under the mortgage, with any balance being payable to the borrower or a subsequent mortgagee (if any).[74]

Law of Property Act 1925, s 105

Application of proceeds of sale

The money which is received by the mortgagee, arising from the sale, after discharge of prior incumbrances to which the sale is not made subject, if any, or after payment into court under this Act of a sum to meet any prior incumbrance, shall be held by him in trust to be applied by him, first, in payment of all costs, charges, and expenses properly incurred by him as incident to the sale or any attempted sale, or otherwise; and secondly, in discharge of the mortgage money, interest, and costs, and other money, if any, due under the mortgage; and the residue of the money so received shall be paid to the person entitled to the mortgaged property, or authorised to give receipts for the proceeds of the sale thereof.

A purchaser is not concerned to check that an event of default has occurred and the power of sale is exercisable,[75] nor is the purchaser concerned to see that the lender applies the sale [73] See s 2(1)(iii), extracted at Chapter 19, section 2.1; Horsham Properties Group Ltd v Clark [2008] EWHC 2327.

[74] West London Commercial Bank v Reliance Permanent Building Society (1885) 29 Ch D 954.

[75] See Law of Property Act 1925, s 104, extracted at section 3.2.6 below.

moneys as required by s 105. The receipt of the lender is a good discharge for the purchase money.[76] The purchaser must, however, check that the lender has a power of sale in the first place, either because the power is expressed in the legal charge, or because it is implied under s 101(1)(i). We will explore the position of the purchaser in more detail below.

3.1.4 Human rights and sale

We have noted that the lender's right to possession of a borrower's home may be incompatible with Art 8. A separate question is whether the lender's out of court power of sale (whether pursuant to an express or implied power) is an unjustified interference with a borrower's property rights under Art 1 Protocol 1 (Deprivation of Possessions). Briggs J in Horsham Properties Group Ltd v Clark[77] rejected this possibility. His primary ground was to reject the horizontal application of Art 1 Protocol 1 to a privately negotiated power of sale. He believed that an implied statutory power of sale also did not engage a horizontal application of Art 1 Protocol 1 because it 'serves to implement rather than override the private bargain between mortgagor and mortgagee.'[78] Briggs J, in the following extract, went onto consider as obiter the human rights compatibility of the power of sale.

Horsham Properties Group Ltd v Clark
[2009] 1 WLR 1255

Facts: The lender, through its receivers, had sold the property without obtaining possession and their purchasers wanted to repossess the property. The borrowers' interest had been overreached by the sale, so they had no legal right to remain and were trespassers.

Briggs J

At [44]–[45]

In my judgment, any deprivation of possession constituted by the exercise by a mortgagee of its powers under section 101 of the Law of Property Act after a relevant default by the mortgagor is justified in the public interest, and requires no case-by case exercise of a proportionality discretion by the court, for the following reasons. First, it reflects the bargain habitually drawn between mortgagors and mortgagees for nearly 200 years, in which the ability of a mortgagee to sell the property offered as security without having to go to court has been identified as a central and essential aspect of the security necessarily provided if substantial property base secured lending is to be available at affordable rates of interest. That it is in the public interest that property buyers and owners should be able to obtain lending for that purpose can hardly be open to doubt, even if the loan-to-value ratios at which it has recently become possible have now become a matter of controversy.

Secondly, I am bound by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Ropaigealach to conclude that there was no wider policy behind section 36 of the Administration of Justice Act 1970 than to put back what the courts had shortly before taken away, namely a discretion to stay or adjourn proceedings for possession, triggered only where the mortgagee considered it necessary or appropriate to go to court if the first place. The question whether a wider policy ought to be implemented wherever steps taken by a mortgagee to release its security is likely to lead to the obtaining of possession is a matter for Parliament, and upon which Parliament has > yet [. . .] to form any view. It would be quite wrong for the courts in a vigorous and imaginative interpretation of the Human Rights Convention to make that policy, as it were, on the hoof.

[76] Ibid, s 107(1). [77] [2009] 1 WLR 1255. [78] Ibid, [35].

There is no doubt that a lender's power of sale can be substantively justified in human rights terms. It is the very essence of a security that the lender can recover his or her debt from a realization of the borrower's property. Indeed the Strasbourg Court has held as much in Wood v UK[79] in relation to both a potential interference with Art 1 Protocol 1 and Art 8. However, what Briggs J overlooks are the procedural imperatives that we have seen form an important part of the justification process.[80] Indeed the decision sparked significant concern, which has resulted in proposals for a lender, exercising its powers of enforcement of a mortgage from a residential owner-occupier, to obtain a court order either when taking possession or effecting a sale so as to afford the borrower the opportunity, at some point in the enforcement process, to access the courts' protection.[81]

3.2 DUTIES OF THE MORTGAGEE IN THE CONDUCT OF THE SALE

The lender has a direct interest in any sale, but so too does the borrower, because, as we have seen, he or she is entitled to any surplus sale proceeds. Even where the sale proceeds are insufficient to meet the sums owing to the lender, the borrower is still concerned, because he or she remains liable to meet the shortfall under the contractual covenant to repay. The balancing of the interests of both the lender and borrower is thus at the heart of the lender's duties upon the sale.

3.2.1 General principles

It has long been asserted that the lender is not a trustee of the power of sale, but the interests of the borrower cannot be ignored.[82] The lender cannot sell with the object of recovering only enough to repay the debt, because, in so doing, the borrower's interests are inevitably overlooked. Early decisions were somewhat ambiguous as to the scope of the lender's duties: it was unclear whether they were limited to a requirement of good faith or whether a degree of care was also required.[83] The law has developed to recognize both of these elements as interrelated strands of the duty that the lender owes the borrower in the conduct of the sale. The lender must, firstly, be able to demonstrate good faith, and secondly, that reasonable care has been taken in the conduct of the sale.

Cuckmere Brick Co v Mutual Finance
[1971] Ch 949, CA

Facts: The borrower owned land with planning permission to build a hundred flats. It subsequently obtained planning permission to build thirty-five houses. The lender

[79] (1997) 24 EHRR CD 69, [70]–[71].
[80] See Chapter 3 and section 2.6 above.
[81] Ministry of Justice, Mortgages: Power of Sale and Residential Property CP55/09 (December 2009). These proposals would not apply where the borrower had voluntarily given up possession.
[82] See Nash v Eads (1880) 25 SJ 95, although a lender is a trustee of the proceeds of sale: Law of Property Act 1925, s 105.
[83] Compare, for example, Kennedy v de Trafford [1896] 1 Ch 762 and Tomlin v Luce (1890) 43 Ch D 191.

became entitled to exercise its power of sale, which it did by putting the land up for auction. The auctioneers referred only to the planning permission for the houses when marketing the property. The borrower brought the failure to refer to the earlier permission to the attention of the lender, which refused to postpone the sale, but asked the auctioneers to mention the planning permission at the auction. A sale price of £44,000 was achieved at the auction, although the borrower asserted that the land was worth nearer £75,000, which might have been achieved if the planning permission for the flats had been properly advertised. The borrower successfully brought an action for an account against the lender for the amount that should have been received from the sale.

Salmon LJ

At 965

It is well settled that a mortgagee is not a trustee of the power of sale for the mortgagor. Once the power has accrued, the mortgagee is entitled to exercise it for his own purposes whenever he chooses to do so. It matters not that the moment may be unpropitious and that by waiting a higher price could be obtained. He has the right to realise his security by turning it into money when he likes. Nor, in my view, is there anything to prevent a mortgagee from accepting the best bid he can get at an auction, even though the auction is badly attended and the bidding exceptionally low. Providing none of those adverse factors is due to any fault of the mortgagee, he can do as he likes. If the mortgagee's interests, as he sees them, conflict with those of the mortgagor, the mortgagee can give preference to his own interests, which of course he could not do were he a trustee of the power of sale for the mortgagor [. . .]

It is impossible to pretend that the state of the authorities on this branch of the law is entirely satisfactory. There are some dicta which suggest that unless a mortgagee acts in bad faith he is safe. His only obligation to the mortgagor is not to cheat him. There are other dicta which suggest that in addition to the duty of acting in good faith, the mortgagee is under a duty to take reasonable care to obtain whatever is the true market value of the mortgaged property at the moment he chooses to sell it: compare, for example, Kennedy v. de Trafford [1896] 1 Ch. 762; [1897] A.C. 180 with Tomlin v. Luce (1889) 43 Ch.D. 191, 194.

The proposition that the mortgagee owes both duties, in my judgment, represents the true view of the law. Approaching the matter first of all on principle, it is to be observed that if the sale yields a surplus over the amount owed under the mortgage, the mortgagee holds this surplus in trust for the mortgagor. If the sale shows a deficiency, the mortgagor has to make it good out of his own pocket. The mortgagor is vitally affected by the result of the sale but its preparation and conduct is left entirely in the hands of the mortgagee. The proximity between them could scarcely be closer. Surely they are "neighbours." Given that the power of sale is for the benefit of the mortgagee and that he is entitled to choose the moment to sell which suits him, it would be strange indeed if he were under no legal obligation to take reasonable care to obtain what I call the true market value at the date of the sale. Some of the textbooks refer to the "proper price," others to the "best price." Vaisey J. in Reliance Permanent Building Society v. Harwood-Stamper [1944] Ch. 362, 364, 365, seems to have attached great importance to the difference between these two descriptions of "price." My difficulty is that I cannot see any real difference between them. "Proper price" is perhaps a little nebulous, and "the best price" may suggest an exceptionally high price. That is why I prefer to call it "the true market value."

Cross LJ, agreeing with Salmon LJ, also rejected the lender's submission that it should not be liable for a lack of care committed by its agent, provided that the appointment was reasonable. A lender is thus liable for a lack of care committed by any valuer, solicitor, or other agent that it may employ in the conduct of the sale.

Cuckmere Brick Co v Mutual Finance
[1971] Ch 949, CA

Cross LJ

At 966

Mr. Vinelott further submitted that even if we should be of opinion that a mortgagee was liable to account to the mortgagor for loss occasioned by his own negligence in the exercise of his power of sale, it was not right that he should be liable for the negligence of an agent reasonably employed by him. It may well be that this point is not open to him in view of the way the argument proceeded below—but in any case I do not accept the submission. In support of it, counsel pointed out that a trustee is not liable for the default of an agent whom it is reasonable for him to employ. But the position of a mortgagee is quite different from that of a trustee. A trustee has not, qua trustee, any interest in the trust property, and if an agent employed by him is negligent his right of action against the agent is an asset of the trust. A mortgagee, on the other hand, is not a trustee and if he sues the agent for negligence any damages which he can recover belong to him. Of course, in many cases the mortgagee may suffer no damage himself by reason of the agent's negligence because the purchase price, though less than it should have been, exceeds what is owing to the mortgagee. In such circumstances it may be that nowadays the law would allow the mortgagor to recover damages directly from the agent although not in contractual relations with him; but that was certainly not so a hundred years ago when Wolff v. Vanderzee (1869) 20 L.T. 353 was decided. In those days the only way to achieve justice between the parties was to say that the mortgagee was liable to the mortgagor for any damage which the latter suffered by the agent's negligence and to leave the mortgagee to recover such damages, and also any damage which he had suffered himself, from the agent. I do not think that we can say that the mortgagee used to be liable to the mortgagor for the negligence of his agent but that that liability disappeared at some unspecified moment of time when the law had developed enough to allow the mortgagor to sue the agent himself.

Salmon LJ's reference to 'neighbours' led subsequent judges to adopt a tortious interpretation for the basis of the lender's duties. But this approach has been discredited. The basis for the lender's duties arises in equity from the relationship of lender and borrower. As we have seen, the lender is under a duty to account to the borrower both for what he or she receives and for what he or she ought to receive.[84] It is from this obligation that the duty to exercise reasonable care in the conduct of the sale finds expression.[85]

84 See section 2.2 above.

85 See also Downsview Nominees Ltd v First City Corp [1993] AC 295, 315, per Lord Templeman.

Silven Properties Ltd v Royal Bank of Scotland plc
[2004] 1 WLR 997, CA

Lightman J

At [19]

When and if the mortgagee does exercise the power of sale, he comes under a duty in equity (and not tort) to the mortgagor (and all others interested in the equity of redemption) to take reasonable precautions to obtain "the fair" or "the true market" value of or the "proper price" for the mortgaged property at the date of the sale, and not (as the claimants submitted) the date of the decision to sell. If the period of time between the dates of the decision to sell and of the sale is short, there may be no difference in value between the two dates and indeed in many (if not most cases) this may be readily assumed. But where there is a period of delay, the difference in date could prove significant. The mortgagee is not entitled to act in a way which unfairly prejudices the mortgagor by selling hastily at a knock-down price sufficient to pay off his debt: Palk v Mortgage Services Funding plc [1993] Ch 330, 337–338, per Sir Donald Nicholls V-C. He must take proper care whether by fairly and properly exposing the property to the market or otherwise to obtain the best price reasonably obtainable at the date of sale. The remedy for breach of this equitable duty is not common law damages, but an order that the mortgagee account to the mortgagor and all others interested in the equity of redemption, not just for what he actually received, but for what he should have received: see Standard Chartered Bank Ltd v Walker [1982] 1 WLR 1410, 1416b.

3.2.2 To whom is the duty owed?

The equitable nature of the lender's duties dictates both the parties to whom the duty is owed and the available remedies. The lender does not owe a duty to those whom it is foreseeable will suffer damage (being a tortious standard); its duty is relationship-based. It is owed to the borrower, a subsequent mortgagee, and any guarantor of the mortgage debt, but not to a beneficial owner, whose position is protected in equity by his or her relationship to the trustees of the legal estate, whom he or she may sue (if appropriate) for breach of trust.

We will look more closely at remedies below.

Parker-Tweedale v Dunbar Bank (No 1)
[1991] Ch 12, CA[86]

Facts: Mrs Parker-Tweedale held the legal estate in the family home on trust for her husband alone. When Mr Parker-Tweedale had a car accident, the Parker-Tweedales ran into financial difficulties and their marriage broke up. The bank exercised its power of sale and Mrs Parker Tweedale agreed the sale price of £575,000. A matter of weeks later, the purchaser sold the property for £700,000. Mr Parker-Tweedale unsuccessfully sought an order to set aside the sale.

[86] Noted at [1990] Conv 431.

Nourse LJ

At 18

This reference to "neighbours" has enabled the plaintiff to argue that the duty is owed to all those who are within the neighbourhood principle; i.e., to adapt the words of Lord Atkin, to all persons who are so closely and directly affected by the sale that the mortgagee ought reasonably to have them in contemplation as being so affected when he is directing his mind to the sale. Further support for the application of the neighbourhood principle in this context can be gained from the judgment of Lord Denning M.R. in Standard Chartered Bank Ltd. v. Walker [1982] 1 W.L.R. 1410, 1415, where it was held that the duty to take reasonable care to obtain a proper price was owed to a surety for the mortgage debt as well as to the mortgagor himself.

In my respectful opinion it is both unnecessary and confusing for the duties owed by a mortgagee to the mortgagor and the surety, if there is one, to be expressed in terms of the tort of negligence. The authorities which were considered in the careful judgments of this court in Cuckmere Brick Co. Ltd. v. Mutual Finance Ltd. [1971] Ch. 949 demonstrate that the duty owed by the mortgagee to the mortgagor was recognised by equity as arising out of the particular relationship between them. Thus Salmon L.J. himself said, at p. 967:

> "It would seem, therefore, that many years before the modern development of the law of negligence, the courts of equity had laid down a doctrine in relation to mortgages which is entirely consonant with the general principles later evolved by the common law."

The duty owed to the surety arises in the same way. In China and South Sea Bank Ltd. v. Tan Soon Gin (alias George Tan) [1990] 1 A.C. 536, Lord Templeman, in delivering the judgment of the Privy Council, having pointed out that the surety in that case admitted that the moneys secured by the guarantee were due, continued at p. 543:

> "But the surety claims that the creditor owed the surety a duty to exercise the power of sale conferred by the mortgage and in that case the liability of the surety under the guarantee would either have been eliminated or very much reduced. The Court of Appeal [in Hong Kong] sought to find such a duty in the tort of negligence but the tort of negligence has not yet subsumed all torts and does not supplant the principles of equity or contradict contractual promises [. . .] Equity intervenes to protect a surety."

Once it is recognised that the duty owed by the mortgagee to the mortgagor arises out of the particular relationship between them, it is readily apparent that there is no warrant for extending its scope so as to include a beneficiary or beneficiaries under a trust of which the mortgagor is the trustee. The correctness of that view was fully established in the clear and compelling argument of Mr. Lloyd, who drew particular attention to the rights and duties of the trustee to protect the trust property against dissipation or depreciation in value and the impracticabilities and potential rights of double recovery inherent in giving the beneficiary an additional right to sue the mortgagee, a right which is in any event unnecessary.

The only exception for which Mr. Lloyd allowed was the special case where the trustee has unreasonably refused to sue on behalf of the trust or has committed some other breach of his duties to the beneficiaries, e.g., by consenting to an improvident sale, which disables or disqualifies him from acting on behalf of the trust. In such a case the beneficiary is permitted to sue on behalf of the trust. This exception is established by a series of authorities, some of which were recently considered by the Privy Council in Hayim v. Citibank N.A. [1987] A.C. 730. In delivering the judgment of their Lordships, Lord Templeman said, at p. 748:

> "These authorities demonstrate that a beneficiary has no cause of action against a third party save in special circumstances which embrace a failure, excusable or inexcusable, by the trustees > in the performance of the duty owed by the trustees to the beneficiary to protect the trust estate or to protect the interests of the beneficiary in the trust estate."

>
> It is important to emphasise that when a beneficiary sues under the exception he does so in right of the trust and in the room of the trustee. He does not enforce a right reciprocal to some duty owed directly to him by the third party.

3.2.3 The primacy of the lender's own interests

Although the lender owes a duty of good faith and of reasonable care in the conduct of the sale, the primary purpose of the power of sale is to safeguard the lender's own objective of securing repayment of the debt. As Salmon LJ pointed out in Cuckmere Brick Co v Mutual Finance,[87] the lender may thus choose whether and in what manner to exercise the power. In particular, the lender may choose its time of sale. The lender does not have to gauge the most opportune time to sell, nor is the lender required to wait for the market to recover, or to press ahead with a sale if prices are showing signs of falling.

For example, in the following case, the lender was not liable, although the value of the security—in this case, shares—had fallen dramatically following the collapse of the guarantor's property empire. Lord Templeman delivered the opinion of the Privy Council.

China and South Seas Bank Ltd v Tan
[1990] 1 AC 536, PC

> Lord Templeman
>
> At 545
>
> If the creditor chose to exercise his power of sale over the mortgaged security he must sell for the current market value but the creditor must decide in his own interest if and when he should sell. [. . .]
>
> No creditor could carry on the business of lending if he could become liable to a mortgagor and to a surety or to either of them for a decline in value of mortgaged property, unless the creditor was personally responsible for the decline [. . .] The creditor was not under a duty to exercise his power of sale over the mortgaged securities at any particular time or at all.

Similarly, a lender is not obliged to improve the mortgaged property to try to maximize the sale price. A lender that goes into possession is only obliged to take reasonable steps to ensure that the property does not deteriorate in value.

Silven Properties Ltd v Royal Bank of Scotland plc
[2004] 1 WLR 997, CA

Facts: The borrower alleged that the receiver appointed by the bank to sell the mortgaged property was under a duty to maximize its value by obtaining planning permission for the development and letting some of the properties that were vacant. The receiver had explored the possibility of obtaining planning permission for some of the properties and of letting the vacant properties, but had decided to proceed to their immediate sale. The Court dismissed the borrower's allegation.

[87] [1971] Ch 949, CA.

Lightman J

At [16]–[18]

The mortgagee is entitled to sell the mortgaged property as it is. He is under no obligation to improve it or increase its value. There is no obligation to take any such pre-marketing steps to increase the value of the property as is suggested by the claimants. The claimants submitted that this principle could not stand with the decision of the Privy Council in McHugh v Union Bank of Canada [1913] AC 299. Lord Moulton in that case, at p 312, held that, if a mortgagee does proceed with a sale of property which is unsaleable as it stands, a duty of care may be imposed on him when taking the necessary steps to render the mortgaged property saleable. The mortgage in that case was of horses, which the mortgagee needed to drive to market if he was to sell them. The mortgagee was held to owe to the mortgagor a duty to take proper care of them whilst driving them to market. The duty imposed on the mortgagee was to take care to preserve, not increase, the value of the security. The decision accordingly affords no support for the claimant's case

The mortgagee is free (in his own interest as well as that of the mortgagor) to investigate whether and how he can "unlock" the potential for an increase in value of the property mortgaged (e g by an application for planning permission or the grant of a lease) and indeed (going further) he can proceed with such an application or grant. But he is likewise free at any time to halt his efforts and proceed instead immediately with a sale. By commencing on this path the mortgagee does not in any way preclude himself from calling a halt at will: he does not assume any such obligation of care to the mortgagor in respect of its continuance as the claimants contend. If however the mortgagee is to seek to charge to the mortgagor the costs of the exercise which he has undertaken of obtaining planning permission or a lessee, subject to any applicable terms of the mortgage, the mortgagee may only be entitled to do so if he acted reasonably in incurring those costs and fairly balanced the costs of the exercise against the potential benefits taking fully into account the possibility that he might at any moment "pull the plug" on these efforts and the consequences for the mortgagor if he did so.

If the mortgagor requires protection in any of these respects, whether by imposing further duties on the mortgagee or limitations on his rights and powers, he must insist upon them when the bargain is made and upon the inclusion of protective provisions in the mortgage. In the absence of such protective provisions, the mortgagee is entitled to rest on the terms of the mortgage and (save where statute otherwise requires) the court must give effect to them. The one method available to the mortgagor to prevent the mortgagee exercising the rights conferred upon him by the mortgage is to redeem the mortgage. If he redeems, there can be no need or justification for recourse by the mortgagee to the power of sale to achieve repayment of the debt due to him secured by the mortgage.

The lender's freedom of action is, however, tempered by the combined duties of good faith and reasonable care. As Lightman LJ observes, if the borrower wishes to protect his or her position further, a higher duty must be negotiated when agreeing the mortgage terms with the lender.[88] It is more likely that the lender may try to limit its duties by the express terms of the mortgage. But the courts have been reluctant to construe a purported limitation of liability by the lender as cutting down its duties of good faith and reasonable care. For example, in Bishop v Bonham,[89] a provision that stated that the lender could exercise its powers 'as it thought fit' was construed as a discretion that could only operate within the constraints of good faith and reasonable care imposed by equity.

[88] For example, MCOB13.6.1 provides that, where a lender takes possession under a mortgage regulated under the Financial Services and Markets Act 2000, the property should be marketed as soon as possible.

3.2.4 Reasonable care in the conduct of the sale

The lender is required to exercise reasonable care in the conduct of the sale. Earlier decisions refer to a need for the lender to take reasonable care to obtain a proper, fair, or true market price, but it is misleading to interpret this test as requiring the lender to attain a given valuation figure.[90] Rather, the courts, in determining liability, look to the reasonableness of the steps that the lender has taken to market the property and, in the light of these steps, to assess the price obtained against a valuation band that allows for some margin of judgment. It is only once the lender has been found to be in breach of its duty of care that the courts need to determine the price that should have been obtained, so that the damages payable to the borrower may be measured. The courts' focus is thus upon such matters as how the property was advertised or otherwise brought to the market,[91] whether a sale by auction or private treaty was more appropriate,[92] how the offer or reserve price was set,[93] how negotiations were conducted, and how the decision on the final sale price was reached.[94] In all of these steps, the advice of a suitably qualified agent will be influential in meeting the required objective standard of conduct.

Michael v Miller
[2004] 2 EGLR 151, CA

Facts: Michael's farm was mortgaged to Miller. Following Michael's default, the farm was sold for £1.625m. Michael called for an account, claiming that the farm was worth considerably more. The judge at first instance decided that the farm was worth £1.75m, but that an acceptable valuation band lay between £1.6m and £1.9m. Michael appealed unsuccessfully.

Jonathan Parker LJ

At [132]–[135]

It is a matter for the mortgagee how that general duty is to be discharged in the circumstances of any given case. Subject to any restrictions in the mortgage deed, it is for the mortgagee to decide whether the sale should be by public auction or private treaty, just as it is for him to decide how the sale should be advertised and how long the property should be left on the market. Such decisions inevitably involve an exercise of informed judgment on the part of the mortgagee, in respect of which there can, almost by definition, be no absolute requirements. Thus (as the judge recognised at p.68F of his judgment) there is no absolute duty to advertise widely. As he correctly put it (at p.69A):

[89] [1988] 1 WLR 742. [90] See Corbett v Halifax Building Society [2002] 1 WLR 964.
[91] For example, Cuckmere Brick Co Ltd v Mutual Finance Ltd [1971] Ch 494.
[92] For example, Tse Kwong Lam v Wong Chit Sen [1983] 1 WLR 1349.
[93] Ibid. [94] For example, Michael v Miller [2002] EWCA Civ 282.

"What is proper advertisement will depend on the circumstances of the case."

Similarly, in some cases the appropriate mode of sale may be sale by public auction (in the instant case, no one has suggested that); in others, for example where there is a falling market, it may not. Moreover, a mortgagee who receives an offer in advance of an auction may have to make a judgment as to whether to accept it or whether to proceed to the auction.

The need for the mortgagee to exercise informed judgment in exercising his power of sale in turn means that a prudent mortgagee will take advice, including (where appropriate) valuation advice, from a duly qualified agent.

I turn, then, to the position of a mortgagee's agent such as Mr Hextall, whose duties included the giving of valuation advice. In my judgment, just as, applying the Bolam principle, a valuer will not breach his duty of care if his valuation falls within an acceptable margin of error (see, e.g., Merivale Moore and the Arab Bank case), so a mortgagee will not breach his duty to the mortgagor if in the exercise of his power to sell the mortgaged property he exercises his judgment reasonably; and to the extent that that judgment involves assessing the market value of the mortgaged property the mortgagee will have acted reasonably if his assessment falls within an acceptable margin of error [. . .]

At [138]–[139]

I accordingly reject Mr Jourdan's submission that as a matter of principle a 'bracket' approach is inappropriate in the context of the exercise of a mortgagee's power of sale. In so far as the exercise of the mortgagee's power of sale calls for the exercise of informed judgment by the mortgagee, whether as to market conditions, or as to market value, or as to some other matter affecting the sale, the use of a bracket—or a margin of error—must in my judgment be available to the court as a means of assessing whether the mortgagee has failed to exercise that judgment reasonably.

It seems to me that Mr Jourdan's submissions on the bracket issue confuse the issue of breach of duty with the measure of damages should breach of duty be established. As Lord Hoffmann said in Saamco at p.221F:

> "Before I come to the facts of the individual cases, I must notice an argument advanced by the defendants concerning the calculation of damages. They say that the damage falling within the scope of the duty should not be the loss which flows from the valuation having been in excess of the true value but should be limited to the excess over the highest valuation which would not have been negligent. This seems to me to confuse the standard of care with the question of the damage which falls within the scope of the duty. The valuer is not liable unless he is negligent. In deciding whether or not he has been negligent, the court must bear in mind that valuation is seldom an exact science and that within a band of figures valuers may differ without one of them being negligent. But once the valuer has been found to have been negligent, the loss for which he is responsible is that which has been caused by the valuation being wrong. For this purpose the court must form a view as to what a correct valuation would have been. This means the figure which it considers most likely that a reasonable valuer, using the information available at the relevant date, would have put forward as the amount which the property was most likely to fetch if sold upon the open market. While it is true that there would have been a range of figures which the reasonable valuer might have put forward, the figure most likely to have been put forward would have been the mean figure of that range. There is no basis for calculating damages upon the basis that it would have been a figure at one or other extreme of the range. Either of these would have been less likely than the mean [. . .]"

[. . .]

At [141]

In the instant case the judge took the, to my mind, somewhat unsatisfactory course of deciding first what was the market value of the Estate at the relevant time (concluding that it was £1.75M) and then asking himself whether the respondents, through Mr Hextall, were negligent in achieving a price substantially less than that. The judge's approach might perhaps be appropriate in a case where the mortgagee accepts the first offer that he receives, without the property having been exposed to the market at all. In such a case, the likelihood is that the only evidence of 'market value' will be expert valuation evidence. But where, as in the instant case, the property has been exposed to the market and a number of genuine offers have been received, the more logical approach (to my mind) is to start by considering the steps which the mortgagee took to sell the property and then to consider whether, in all the circumstances, the mortgagee acted reasonably in accepting the purchaser's offer and contracting to sell the property at that price.

3.2.5 The duty of good faith

A lender must exercise the power of sale in good faith. The impact of this requirement is most obvious where the lender is selling to a connected party, when there is a conflict of interest, and where the lender's motive for selling is improper.

A mortgagee cannot sell to itself, or to a trustee or agent acting on its behalf. In the words of Lindley LJ in Farrars v Farrars Ltd,[95] '[a] sale by a person to himself is no sale at all'. The lender can sell to a company or other organization in which it is interested, or to a person with whom it is connected, but, if the lender does so, the court will scrutinize the lender's conduct to ensure that reasonable care has been taken.[96] In the Hong Kong case of Tse Kwong Lam v Wong Chit Sen,[97] Lord Templeman, giving the opinion of the Privy Council, stated that 'the sale must be closely examined and a heavy onus lies on the mortgagee to show that in all respects he acted fairly to the borrower and used his best endeavours to obtain the best price reasonably obtainable for the mortgaged property'.

The case itself provides a useful example. The respondent exercised his power of sale by putting the mortgaged property up for auction. The auction was only advertised very shortly before it was conducted and only limited details were provided. A reserve price was fixed, but without the guidance of a qualified valuer. At the auction, only one bid at the reserve price was made—by the respondent's wife, acting on behalf of a company owned by the respondent and his family. The Privy Council held that, although the respondent was free to sell to a company in which he was interested, he had failed to demonstrate that he had taken reasonable care in the conduct of the sale. An auction was not necessarily the most appropriate mode of sale. The mortgagee should have sought the advice of a suitably qualified expert both as to the mode of sale, and, if the property was to be auctioned, regarding the reserve price and appropriate marketing.

A lender's motives may also affect its bona fides. In Quennell v Maltby,[98] we saw that the right to take possession must not be exercised for an ulterior motive. Likewise, the power of sale must be exercised with a view to discharging the mortgage debt. In Downsview Nominees

[95] (1889) 40 Ch D 395, 409.

[96] Mortgage Express v Mardner [2004] EWCA Civ 1859; Bradford & Bingley plc v Ross [2005] EWCA Civ 394.

[97] [1983] 1 WLR 1349, 1355.

[98] [1979] 1 WLR 318.

Ltd v First City Corp Ltd,[99] in which receivers were appointed purely to frustrate the exercise of a second mortgagee's powers, there was 'overwhelming evidence that the receivership of the second defendant was inspired by him for an improper purpose and carried on in bad faith, verging on fraud'. Mixed motives will not, however, breach the mortgagee's duties, provided that one of those motives was to recover the debt.[100]

3.2.6 Remedies and the position of purchasers

What action can a borrower take if a lender is in breach of its duties? He or she may either seek an order setting aside the sale, or an order for an account requiring the lender to account for what ought to have been received to compensate the borrower for any shortfall in the purchase price for which the lender is responsible. An order for an account will be the usual course where the lender has fallen short of the objective standard of care. An order to set aside the sale will not be available where the lender has merely sold at an undervalue; there must be some impropriety. The court has discretion to set aside the sale and a court will not do so if there has been an unwarranted delay,[101] or if to do so would cause unnecessary hardship.[102] Furthermore, the position of the purchaser, against whom the sale is to be set aside, must also be considered.

Section 104 of the LPA 1925 provides some protection.

Law of Property Act 1925, s 104

Conveyance on sale

1. A mortgagee exercising the power of sale conferred by this Act shall have power, by deed, to convey the property sold, for such estate and interest therein as he is by this Act authorised to sell or convey or may be the subject of the mortgage, freed from all estates, interest, and rights to which the mortgage has priority, but subject to all estates, interests, and rights which have priority to the mortgage.

2. Where a conveyance is made in exercise of the power of sale conferred by this Act, or any enactment replaced by this Act, the title of the purchaser shall not be impeachable on the ground:

(a) that no case had arisen to authorise the sale; or

(b) that due notice was not given; or

(c) where the mortgage is made after the commencement of this Act, that leave of the court when so required, was not obtained; or

(d) whether the mortgage was made before or after such commencement, that the power was otherwise improperly or irregularly exercise; and a purchaser is not, either before or on conveyance concerned to see or inquire whether a case has arisen to authorise the sale, or due notice has been given, or the power is otherwise properly and regularly exercised; but any person damnified by an unauthorised or improper, or irregular exercise of the power shall have his remedy in damages against the person exercising the power.

99 [1993] AC 295, 317.

100 Meretz Investment NV v ACP Ltd [2007] EWCA Civ 303, [2008] Ch 244.

101 See Tse Kwong Lam v Wong Chit Sen [1983] 1 WLR 1349.

102 Corbett v Halifax Building Society [2002] EWCA Civ 1849, [2003] 1 WLR 964.

The extent of this protection is limited. It relieves the purchaser from making enquiries as to whether an event of default has occurred to trigger the exercise of a power of sale, but does not protect the purchaser if he or she has actual notice of the impropriety:

Corbett v Halifax Building Society
[2003] 1 WLR 964, CA

Facts: Although it was contrary to his terms of employment, an employee of the Halifax purchased, though his uncle, a repossessed property from his employer at a sum that the court found to be an undervalue. The Halifax was unaware of its employee's participation in the sale. The borrowers unsuccessfully applied to set aside the sale.

Pumfrey J

At [25]–[26]

Between contract and completion, the position is described in Lord Waring v London and Manchester Assurance Co Ltd [1935] Ch 310, 318–319 where in a passage subsequently approved by the Court of Appeal in Property and Bloodstock Ltd v Emerton [1968] Ch 94, Crossman J said:

> "The only effect of the conveyance is to put the legal estate entirely in the purchaser: that follows from section 104, subsection (1), of the Law of Property Act 1925, which provides that a mortgagee shall have power to convey the legal estate; and the whole legal estate can be conveyed free from all estates, interests, and rights to which the mortgage has priority. Section 104, subsection (2), upon which also counsel for the plaintiff relied, does not seem to me to affect the question at all. Its purpose is simply to protect the purchaser and to make it unnecessary for him, pending completion and during investigation of title, to ascertain whether the power of sale has become exercisable. Of course, if the purchaser becomes aware, during that period, of any facts showing that the power of sale is not exercisable, or that there is some impropriety in the sale, then, in my judgment, he gets no good title on taking the conveyance. The result in the present case is, in my judgment, that the sale effected by the contract, assuming, for the moment, that there is no objection to it on any other ground, binds the plaintiff, and that it is too late after the sale for him to tender the mortgage money and become entitled to have the property reconveyed to him [...]"

It would seem to follow from this that a completed sale by a mortgagee is not liable to be set aside merely because it takes place at an undervalue. Impropriety is a prerequisite, and section 104(2) makes it clear that the purchaser is not protected if he has actual knowledge of the impropriety. But if the purchaser has no notice of the impropriety, then on the face of it he takes free. Thus, the completed sale by a mortgagee pursuant to his statutory power is vulnerable only if the purchaser has knowledge of, or participates in, an impropriety in the exercise of the power.

The Halifax was bona fide throughout; it was its employee, acting without its knowledge, who was acting improperly. Although the Halifax had sold at an undervalue, a mere undervalue was insufficient to set a sale aside; there had to have been impropriety.

Section 104 will also not assist a purchaser of unregistered land where the lender has no power of sale, for example, because the mortgage is invalid or contains no adequate power of sale, or because any power that there is has not arisen. The lender is acting beyond its powers and any sale is ultra vires.

Where the land is registered and the lender is selling under a registered charge, the provisions of s 52 of the Land Registration Act 2002 (LRA 2002) must be considered.

Land Registration Act 2002, s 52

Protection of disponees

1. Subject to any entry in the register to the contrary, the proprietor of a registered charge is to be taken to have, in relation to the property subject to the charge, the powers of disposition conferred by law on the owner of a legal mortgage.

2. Subsection (1) has effect only for the purpose of preventing the title of a disponee being questioned (and so does not affect the lawfulness of a disposition).

A purchaser may thus assume that a registered chargee enjoys all of the powers of a legal mortgagee unless a restriction is registered, giving notice that these powers have been restricted. As we have noted, the power of sale under s 101(1)(i) of the LPA 1925 must have arisen, because the mortgage money is due, before it can become exercisable. It is thought that the power of sale must have arisen before a purchaser can take advantage of the protection afforded by s 52 of the LRA 2002. The section provides protection to a purchaser where the sale is within the powers of the lender (i.e. intra vires), but is actionable by the borrower because the power has not yet become exercisable or is liable to be set aside (e.g. for impropriety). In these circumstances, there remains the possibility that a purchaser who is implicated in, or has knowledge of, a breach of the mortgagee's equitable duties may be liable as a constructive trustee on the basis of knowing receipt.[103]

4 APPOINTMENT OF A RECEIVER

The implied power to appoint a receiver of the mortgaged land when the mortgage money has become due is conferred by s 101(1)(iii) of the LPA 1925 into all mortgages created by deed, including a legal charge by way of mortgage. The appointment of a receiver provides an attractive option for a lender under a mortgage of commercial property, because a lender can avoid personal liability for wilful default or for breach of duty if the property is sold. The remedy is particularly popular where a legal charge of land owned by a company is coupled with a floating charge over all of the assets and undertakings of a company, under which the lender may appoint either an administrative receiver or administrator to take over the effective running of the company in the event of its insolvency.[104]

[103] See Chapter 19, section 6.3.2.

[104] A floating charge entered into prior to 15 September 2003 may contain an express right to appoint an administrative receiver over all of the assets and undertakings of the company. By s 72A of the Insolvency Act 2006, a lender is no longer entitled to appoint an administrative receiver, but may appoint an administrator. The distinction between an 'administrative receiver' and an 'administrator' is that an administrative receiver owes duties only to the secured lender and the borrower, whilst an administrator's duties extend to all of the creditors of the company, both secured and unsecured.

4.1 FUNCTIONS AND POWERS OF A RECEIVER

Section 109 of the LPA 1925 provides that a receiver may be appointed or removed by written notice, whereupon the receiver is entitled to enter into possession of the property to preserve the security and to collect any income that may be applied, after payment of any costs and expenses including the receiver's remuneration, in the repayment of the interest due, with any balance being payable to the borrower or the person next entitled to the equity of redemption. A receiver is invariably also granted express powers to manage and sell the property. By appointing a receiver, a lender can thus indirectly enforce the legal charge.

Section 109 contains the implied terms that govern the appointment of a receiver under s 101(1)(iii) of the Act.

Law of Property Act 1925, s 109

Appointment, power, remuneration and duties of a receiver

1. A mortgagee entitled to appoint a receiver under the power in that behalf conferred by this Act shall not appoint a receiver until he has become entitled to exercise the power of sale conferred by this Act, but may then, by writing under his hand, appoint such person as he thinks fit to be receiver.

2. A receiver appointed under the powers conferred by this Act, or any enactment replaced by this Act, shall be deemed to be the agent of the mortgagor; and the mortgagor shall be solely responsible for the receiver's acts or defaults unless the mortgage deed otherwise provides.

3. The receiver shall have power to demand and recover all the income of which he is appointed receiver, by action, distress, or otherwise, in the name either of the mortgagor or of the mortgagee, to the full extent of the estate or interest which the mortgagor could dispose of, and to give effectual receipts accordingly for the same, and to exercise any powers which may have been delegated to him by the mortgagee pursuant to this Act.

4. A person paying money to the receiver shall not be concerned to inquire whether any case has happened to authorise the receiver to act.

5. The receiver may be removed, and a new receiver may be appointed, from time to time by the mortgagee by writing under his hand.

6. The receiver shall be entitled to retain out of any money received by him, for his remuneration, and in satisfaction of all costs, charges, and expenses incurred by him as receiver, a commission at such rate, not exceeding five per centum on the gross amount of all money received, as is specified in his appointment, and if no rate is so specified, then at the rate of five per centum on that gross amount, or at such other rate as the court thinks fit to allow, on application made by him for that purpose.

4.2 RECEIVER AS AGENT FOR THE BORROWER

A lender is able to avoid personal liability by appointing a receiver, because the receiver is expressed to be the agent of the borrower, although appointed by and taking directions from the lender. A receiver thus owes duties both to the lender and the borrower, creating a rather unusual triangular relationship. In effect, by entering into the legal charge, the borrower empowers the lender to appoint the receiver as the borrower's agent in applying the income from the property, and (where express power is granted) to sell and apply the proceeds of sale in the discharge of the mortgage debt.

Silven Properties Ltd v Royal Bank of Scotland plc
[2004] 1 WLR 997, CA

Lightman J

At [27]–[28]

The peculiar incidents of the agency are significant. In particular: (1) the agency is one where the principal, the mortgagor, has no say in the appointment or identity of the receiver and is not entitled to give any instructions to the receiver or to dismiss the receiver. In the words of Rigby LJ in Gaskell v Gosling [1896] 1 QB 669, 692: "For valuable consideration he has committed the management of his property to an attorney whose appointment he cannot interfere with"; (2) there is no contractual relationship or duty owed in tort by the receiver to the mortgagor: the relationship and duties owed by the receiver are equitable only: see Medforth v Blake [2000] Ch 86 and Raja v Austin Gray [2003] 1 EGLR 91; (3) the equitable duty is owed to the mortgagee as well as the mortgagor. The relationship created by the mortgage is tripartite involving the mortgagor, the mortgagee and the receiver; (4) the duty owed by the receiver (like the duty owed by a mortgagee) to the mortgagor is not owed to him individually but to him as one of the persons interested in the equity of redemption. The class character of the right is reflected in the class character of the relief to be granted in case of a breach of this duty. That relief is an order that the receiver account to the persons interested in the equity of redemption for what he would have held as receiver but for his default; (5) not merely does the receiver owe a duty of care to the mortgagee as well as the mortgagor, but his primary duty in exercising his powers of management is to try and bring about a situation in which the secured debt is repaid: see the Medforth case at p 86; and (6) the receiver is not managing the mortgagor's property for the benefit of the mortgagor, but the security, the property of the mortgagee, for the benefit of the mortgagee: see In re B Johnson & Co (Builders) Ltd [1955] Ch 634, 661, per Jenkins LJ cited with approval by Lord Templeman in Downsview Nominees Ltd v First City Corpn Ltd [1993] AC 295, 313b, and [1955] Ch 634, 646, per Evershed MR cited with approval by Sir Richard Scott V-C in the Medforth case [2000] Ch 86, 95h-96a. His powers of management are really ancillary to that duty: Gomba Holdings UK Ltd v Homan [1986] 1 WLR 1301, 1305, per Hoffmann J.

In the context of a relationship such at the present, which is no ordinary agency and is primarily a device to protect the mortgagee, general agency principles are of limited assistance in identifying the duties owed by the receiver to the mortgagor: see Gomba Holdings UK Ltd v Homan at 1305b-d (Hoffmann J) and Gomba Holdings UK Ltd v Minories Finance Ltd [1988] 1 WLR 1231, 1233d-h (Fox LJ). The core duty of the receiver to account to the mortgagor subsists, but (for example) the mortgagor has no unrestricted right of access to receivership documents. The mortgage confers upon the mortgagee a direct and indirect means of securing a sale in order to achieve repayment of his secured debt. The mortgagee can sell as mortgagee and the mortgagee can appoint a receiver who likewise can sell in the name of the mortgagor. Having regard to the fact that the receiver's primary duty is to bring about a situation where the secured debt is repaid, as a matter of principle the receiver must be entitled (like the mortgagee) to sell the property in the condition in which it is in the same > way as the mortgagee can and in particular without awaiting or effecting any increase in value or improvement in the property [. . .]

In practice, a receiver, before accepting an appointment, will invariably require an indemnity from the lender against any personal liability that the receiver may incur. Nevertheless, the appointment of receiver is an attractive and popular power available to a lender where the lender anticipates that a sale may not immediately follow the taking of possession, or the property will need to be managed prior to sale: for example, because it is tenanted or is used for business purposes.

4.3 DUTIES OF A RECEIVER

In the following case, the receiver had explored, but rejected, the possibility of improving the property prior to sale. It was argued that, because the receiver was an agent of the borrower, he or she owed a duty to the borrower to present the property for sale in its most advantageous condition, and thus his or her decision not to proceed with the improvements was a breach of this duty. In view of the unique features of the agency, however, this argument was rejected. The receiver's duties were the same as those owed by a mortgagee.

Silven Properties Ltd v Royal Bank of Scotland plc
[2004] 1 WLR 997, CA

Lightman J

At [29]

[. . .] [B]y accepting office as receivers of the claimant's properties the receivers assumed a fiduciary duty of care to the bank, the claimants and all (if any) others interested in the equity of redemption. This accords with the statement of principle to this effect of Lord Browne-Wilkinson in Henderson v Merrett Syndicates Ltd [1995] 2 AC 145, 205e-h relied on by the claimants. The appointment of the receivers as agents of the claimants having regard to the special character of the agency does not affect the scope or the content of the fiduciary duty. The scope or content of the duty must depend on and reflect the special nature of the relationship between the bank, the claimants and the receivers arising under the terms of the mortgages and the appointments of the receivers, and in particular the role of the receivers in securing repayment of the secured debt and the primacy of their obligations in this regard to the bank. These circumstances preclude the assumption by, or imposition on, the receivers of the obligation to take the pre-marketing steps for which the claimants contend in this action. Further no such obligation could arise in their case (any more than in the case of the bank) from the steps which they took to investigate and (for a period) to proceed with applications for planning permission. The receivers were at all times free (as was the bank) to halt those steps and exercise their right to proceed with an immediate sale of the mortgaged properties as they were.

In Downsview Nominees v First City Corp,[105] the Privy Council had decided that a receiver owed the same equitable (not tortious) duties to act bona fide and with reasonable care in [105] [1993] AC 295. See also Yorkshire Bank Plc v Hall [1999] 1 WLR 1713.

the conduct of any sale. But a receiver's role is often rather different from that of a mortgagee: a receiver is given powers to manage the property, including (where a floating charge is granted over the borrower's business assets) any business that may be conducted on the land. As a result, he or she is unable to sit back and do nothing; he or she is obliged to act to preserve the interest of the borrower and the lender.[106]

Medforth v Blake
[2000] Ch 86, CA

Facts: Medforth was a pig farmer. When he ran into financial difficulties, Blake was appointed a receiver and manager under the terms of charges secured over the business. In running the business, Blake incurred losses and Medforth successfully claimed that his failure to obtain discounts on bulk purchases of pig feed had contributed to those losses, for which he should be liable to account.

Sir Richard Scott VC

At 98

The Cuckmere Brick case test can impose liability on a mortgagee notwithstanding the absence of fraud or mala fides. It follows from the Downsview Nominees case and Yorkshire Bank Plc. v. Hall that a receiver/manager who sells but fails to take reasonable care to obtain a proper price may incur liability notwithstanding the absence of fraud or mala fides. Why should the approach be any different if what is under review is not the conduct of a sale but conduct in carrying on a business? If a receiver exercises this power, why does not a specific duty, corresponding to the duty to take reasonable steps to obtain a proper price, arise? If the business is being carried on by a mortgagee, the mortgagee will be liable, as a mortgagee in possession, for loss caused by his failure to do so with due diligence. Why should not the receiver/manager, who, as Lord Templeman held, owes the same specific duties as the mortgagee when selling, owe comparable specific duties when conducting the mortgaged business? It may be that the particularly onerous duties constructed by courts of equity for mortgagees in possession would not be appropriate to apply to a receiver. But, no duties at all save a duty of good faith? That does not seem to me to make commercial sense nor, more importantly, to correspond with the principles expressed in the bulk of the authorities . . . . In my judgment, in principle and on the authorities, the following propositions can be stated. (1) A receiver managing mortgaged property owes duties to the mortgagor and anyone else with an interest in the equity of redemption. (2) The duties include, but are not necessarily confined to, a duty of good faith. (3) The extent and scope of any duty additional to that of good faith will depend on the facts and circumstances of the particular case. (4) In exercising his powers of management the primary duty of the receiver is to try and bring about a situation in which interest on the secured debt can be paid and the debt itself repaid. (5) Subject to that primary duty, the receiver owes a duty to manage the property with due diligence. (6) Due diligence does not oblige the receiver to continue to carry on a business on the mortgaged premises previously carried on by the mortgagor. (7) If the receiver does carry on a business on the mortgaged premises, due diligence requires reasonable steps to be taken in order to try to do so profitably.

106 See Silven Properties Ltd v Royal Bank of Scotland plc [2004] 1 WLR 997, [23].

5 A FINAL WORD ABOUT THE COVENANT TO REPAY

Possession, sale, and appointment of a receiver are all proprietary remedies flowing from the security created by the legal charge by way of mortgage, but it should not be forgotten that the borrower is under a personal contractual liability to repay the loan in accordance with the terms of the loan agreement. A term for repayment of the capital of the loan will be implied in the absence of an express term.[107] This liability is independent of the security and will remain where there is a shortfall after the lender or receiver has sold the property. Thus, where there is negative equity, a borrower may be sued by the lender for the balance that remains owing after the sale proceeds have been applied in repayment. In enforcing that judgment, the lender is in no better position than any other unsecured creditor and may be forced to make the borrower bankrupt.

In suing upon the personal covenant to repay, the lender must bear in mind the relevant limitation periods. The recovery of interest is statute-barred six years[108] after becoming due and the capital, as a debt payable by deed, cannot be recovered after twelve years from the date upon which it became due.[109] The exercise by the lender of its power of sale does not affect these periods.[110]

QUESTIONS

1. Is it satisfactory that the lender has an immediate right to possession, or do the existing qualifications to this right provide adequate safeguards?
2. Compare the different approaches to the width of the courts' discretion under s 36 of the Administration of Justice Act 1936 that were taken in Cheltenham & Gloucester Building Society v Norgan and Bristol & West Building Society v Ellis. Do you think that the courts' approach in both cases is consistent?
3. Why would a borrower wish to apply to court for an order for sale under s 91 of the Law of Property Act 1925? When is a court likely to be sympathetic to such an application?
4. A lender's duties, in exercise of its power of sale, arise in equity rather than in tort, but what consequences flow as a result?
5. In exercise of its power of sale, a lender has a duty to obtain a proper market price. What does this mean and what would you advise a lender to do in order to fulfil this duty?
6. In what circumstances could a borrower successfully apply to set aside a sale made by a lender?

[107] West Bromwich Building Society v Wilkinson [2005] UKHL 44, noted at Prime, 'Mortgage Default, Limitation and Law Reform' [2005] Conv 566.

[108] Limitation Act 1980, s 20(5).

[109] Ibid, s 20(1), but see MCOB 13.6.1 and 13.6.2, which effectively reduce the period to six years where the mortgage is regulated.

[110] West Bromwich Building Society v Wilkinson [2005] UKHL 44.

FURTHER READING

Dixon, 'Sorry We've Sold Your Home: Mortgagees and Their Possessory Rights' (1999) 58 CLJ 281

Ford and Wallace, Unchartered Territory: Managing mortgage arrears and possessions (London: Shelter, 2009)

Fox, Conceptualising Home (Oxford: Hart, 2007, ch 3)

Frisby, 'Making a Silk Purse Out of a Pigs Ear: Medforth v Blake' (2000) 63 MLR 413

Haley, 'Mortgage Default: Possession, Relief and Judicial Discretion' (1997) 17 LS 483

McMurtry, 'Mortgage Default and Repossession: Procedure and Policy in the Post-Norgan Era' (2007) 58 NILQR 194

Nield, 'Charges Possession and Human Rights: A Reappraisal of s 87(1) Law of Property Act 1925' in Modern Studies in Property Law: Vol 3 (ed Cooke, Oxford: Hart, 2005)

Whitehouse, 'Longitudinal Analysis of the Mortgage Repossession Process 1995-2010: Stability, Regulation and Reform' in Modern Studies in Property Law Vol 6 (ed Bright, Oxford: Hart, 2010) ch 7

Whitehouse, 'The mortgage arrears pre-action protocol:an opportunity missed' (2009) 72 MLR 793

INDEX

A

Absolute title 230–231
Accumulations 684–685
Acquisition of rights
- see also Adverse possession; Trusts of land
- direct rights
  - 'benefit and burden' principle 179–180
  - by commission of a tort 178–179
  - by contractual promise 170–171
  - by deed 169–170
  - formalities for registered land 185–186
  - knowledge of pre-existing personal right 180–184
  - by non-contractual promise 171–178
- easements
  - express grant 926
  - implied grant 926–947
  - prescriptive rights 947–961
- equitable mortgages 1054–1056
- equitable rights and interests 157–158
  - doctrine of anticipation 291–301
  - proprietary estoppel 303–355
- formalities 157–158
  - central issues 191
  - contracts 195–209
  - creation and transfer 220–224
  - e-conveyancing 240–244
  - introduction 191–194
  - overview 194–195
  - registration of title 224–240
- freeholds 137–138
- impact of LRA 2002 488–490
- leases 137–138
  - equitable leases 810–812
  - legal leases 805–810
- legal estates 137–138
- legal rights and interests 142
- property and personal rights distinguished 184–185
- proprietary estoppel 303–355
- restrictive covenants 985–986

Actual notice 422
Adverse possession
- 'adverse' defined 253–256
- based on relativity of title 250–251
- central issues 246
- conclusions 285–286
- effects
  - registered land 267–277
  - unregistered land 266–267
- human rights 277–281
- introduction 246–248
- justifications for conferring legal rights 248–249
- key date for accrual of action 251–253
- leasehold titles 281–285
- 'possession' defined
  - acknowledgement starts time again 263–266
  - essential requirements 256–257
  - factual possession 257–259
  - intention 259–261
  - ordinary meaning 256
  - rule in Leigh v Jack 262
- possessory title 230–231

Annexation of covenants
- express 988–990
- once-for-all process 988
- statutory provisions 990–997

Anticipation see Doctrine of anticipation
Appurtenant land 912–913
Assignments
- enforcement of leasehold covenants 893–894
  - assignees—post-1995 863–866
  - assignees—pre-1996 858–863
  - original parties—post-1995 854–858
  - original parties—pre-1996 851–854
- freehold covenants 987–988

B

Bad faith see Fraud
Bankruptcy
- applications for sale involving co-owners
  - applications by creditors 617–628
  - applications by trustees in bankruptcy 628–638
  - introduction 614–615
  - policy considerations 615–617
- charging orders 1058–1061
- severance of joint tenancies 582, 586

Bare licences
- effect of revocation on licensee 700–703
- licensee's rights against strangers 703
- licensee's rights against third parties 703–705
- meaning 700

Beneficiaries
- consultation by trustees 599
- occupation rights
  - applications for sale 615
  - overlap with other statutory provisions 603–604
  - overreaching 656–661
  - trusts of land 599–604

'Benefit and burden' principle 179–180
Bona fide purchasers for value
- 'bona fide' 420–421
- equitable basis 419–420
- 'of a legal estate 421
- 'purchaser for value' 421
- 'without notice'
  - actual notice 422
  - constructive notice 422–427
  - imputed notice 428

Building schemes 997–1004

C

Charges
- see also Land Charges; Mortgages
- defined 1047–1049
- equity of redemption
  - history and development 1062–1063
  - legal charges 1063–1064
- Land Register 234–235
- legal charges by way of mortgage 1050–1053
- mortgages distinguished 1052–1053
- priority 394–397

Charging orders 1058–1061
Children
- court resolution of disputes 607
- occupation rights 608
- overriding interests 466–467

Co-habitation
- see also Shared homes
- reform recommendations 560–566

Co-ownership
- applications for sale
  - applications by creditors 617–628
  - applications by trustees in bankruptcy 628–638
  - central issues 613
  - introduction 614–615
  - policy considerations 615–617
- joint tenancies
  - advantages 594–595
  - central issues 568
  - introduction 568–569
  - requirement for four unities 571–574
  - severance 574–592
  - survivorship 574
  - tenancies in common distinguished 569–571
- overreaching
  - breach of trust 661–667
  - effect 640–641
  - human rights 671–674
  - interests capable of being overreached 643–651
  - occupying beneficiaries 656–661
  - possible future developments 670–671
  - protection of purchasers 665–667
  - rationale 668–670
  - scope 642–643
  - transactions with overreaching effect 651–656
- priority of rights and interests
  - see also Overreaching
  - central issues 639
  - introduction 640
  - where overreaching does not occur 676–679
- regulation outside of TOLATA 1996 609–612
- resulting and constructive trusts 542–544
- tenancies in common
  - central issues 568
  - determination of status 571–574
  - introduction 568–569
  - joint tenants distinguished 569–571
- termination of trust 593–594
- trusts of land
  - beneficiaries' rights 599–604
  - court resolution of disputes 604–609
  - overlap with other statutory provisions 603–604
  - scope of trust 597
  - statutory imposition of trust 595–597
  - trustees' powers 597–599

Collateral advantages
- equitable controls 1118–1121
- meaning and scope 1118
- restraint of trade 1121

Collateral contracts 203–206
Common law rules
- equitable rules distinguished 55–59
- relationship with equity
  - equitable rights and interests 158–166
  - legal rights and interests 160–162
  - property 160–162
- relationship with human rights 75–76

Commonholds
- central issues 1015
- commonhold associations 1027–1028
- community statement 1029–1031
- creation 1025
- dispute resolution 1034
- legal structure 1024–1025
- management 1031–1033
- objectives 1023–1024
- purity of title 1026–1027

Compensation see Damages and compensation Consent
- see also Licences
- adverse possession 253–256
- defence to priority claims
  - express consent 406
  - implied consent 406–409
- prescriptive rights 956–960

Conspiracy see Lawful act conspiracy
Constructive notice 422–427
Constructive trusts
- contractual licensee's rights against third parties 719–724
- doctrine of anticipation 299–301
- institutional and remedial versions distinguished 369–371
- judicial definitions 368–369

means of acquiring direct rights 171–178
Pallant v Morgan equity basis now unclear 384–385 three requirements 380–382
unconscionability 382–384
practical difficulties with occupiers and banks 17–22
proprietary estoppel compared 211–212
rationalization of common links 385–387
Rochefoucauld v Boustead doctrine
overview 371–372
three-party case 376–379
two-party case 372–376
shared homes
critique of common intention 555–556
focus on context 524–526
introduction 522–524
joint legal owners 542–544
quantification of beneficial interests 544–555
rationalization through Stack v Dowden/Jones v Kernott 557–559 sole legal owners 529–542
Consumer credit
applicability 1082–1083
excessive interest rates 1123–1126
statutory framework 1082–1085 unfair relationships 1085–1087
unfair terms 1109–1114
Contractual promises basis of proprietary estoppel 311–312
doctrine of anticipation
central issues 291
conclusions 301
constructive trusts 299–301
enforcement against third parties 298–299
freeholds sales 293–294
introduction 291–292
leases 292–293
nature of rights acquired 297–298
significance of specific performance 295–297
formal requirements
collateral contracts 203–206
effects of non-compliance 202–203
exchange of contracts 199–200
legal and equitable rights and interests 197–199
overview 195–197
proprietary estoppel 209–220
rectification 206–209
signatures 200–202
statutory provisions 197–199
land charges
effect of failure to register 431–432
registrable interests 429
leases characterization of contract 819–821 effects of lease 750–755
licences
effect of revocation on licensee 706–712
licensee's rights against strangers 712–716
licensee's rights against third parties 716–737
meaning and scope 705–706
means of acquiring direct rights 170–171
mortgages 1176
Conversion see Doctrine of anticipation Courts
applications for sale involving co-owners
applications by creditors 617–628
applications by trustees in bankruptcy 628–638
charging orders 1058–1061
statutory control of mortgage repossession discretionary powers 1143–1150
'dwelling-houses' 1141 jurisdiction 1141–1142
notice to lender 1143
postponement of sale 1150–1152 social functions 1152–1153 trustee applications child welfare 607
general principles 605–607
impact of TOLATA 1996 607–609
statutory provisions 603–604
Covenants see Freehold covenants; Leasehold covenants
Creation of legal rights and interests see Formalities
Creditors see Insolvency
Curtain principle 227–228, 445

D

Damages and compensation
adverse possession 278–279
breach of freehold covenants 1006–1007 breach of leasehold covenants 872 interference with protection of property (ECHR Art 1) 95–97 rectification and indemnity of title register 236–238
Deeds
easements 926
formal requirements 220–224
leases 806
means of acquiring direct rights 169–170
Defences
\acquisition of direct right with prior knowledge of personal right 183
bona fide purchasers for value
'bona fide' 420–421
equitable basis 419–420

Defences (cont.)
'of a legal estate 421
'purchaser for value' 421
'without notice' 421–428
breach of freehold covenants 1007
easements
registered land 962–963
unregistered land 963
impact of LRA 2002 490, 493
leases
equitable leases 818–819
legal leases 818
priority of rights
exceptions to basic rule 398–400
express consent 406
implied consent 406–409
lapse of time 409–410
legal and equitable property rights distinguished 411–414
public authorities 71–72
Delivery of deeds 222–223
Direct rights
see also equitable rights and interests; Legal interests
central issues 167
conclusions 186
introduction 167–168
licensee's rights against third parties
bare licencees 704
contractual licencees 717–718
estoppel licences 740
licences coupled with an interest 747
statutory licences 744–745 means of acquisition
'benefit and burden' principle 179–180
by commission of a tort 178–179
by contractual promise 170–171
by deed 169–170
formalities for registered land 185–186
knowledge of pre-existing personal right 180–184
by non-contractual promise 171–178
property and personal rights distinguished 184–185
Discrimination (Art 14) Convention text 115
key issues 115–116
overreaching 673
Dishonest assistance 674–675
Distress for rent 873
Doctrine of anticipation
central issues 291
conclusions 301
constructive trusts 299–301
enforcement against third parties 298–299
freeholds sales 293–294
introduction 291–292
leases 292–293
nature of rights acquired 297–298
significance of specific performance 295–297
Doctrine of conversion 644–646
Doctrine of notice
actual notice 422
constructive notice 422–427
exclusion from land charges 437–439
imputed notice 428
Dominant tenements essential characteristics 904
essential requirements
accommodation by servient land 914–917 land separate from servient tenement 904–913 separate ownership from servient tenement 913 subject matter of grant 917–925
excessive user 963–965
freehold covenants
equitable rules of enforcement 972–973
extinction and modification 1010 particular requirements 973–974
Duress
conceptual underpinnings 1093–1094
meaning and scope 1089
Dwelling houses 1139–1153

E

E-conveyancing
doctrine of anticipation 301
formal requirements 242
legal impact 242–244, 491–493
objectives 240–242
Easements
acquisition of rights express grant 926
implied grant 926–947
prescriptive rights 947–961
central issues 901
essential characteristics 904
essential requirements
accommodation of dominant land 914–917
overview 904
separate ownership of dominant and servient tenements 913 separate pieces of land 904–913 subject matter of grant 917–925
excessive user 963–965
extinguishment 965–966
history and development 903–904
introduction 901–902
land charge registration 429
overriding interests 469–470
priority of rights
registered land 962–963
unregistered land 963
Enforcement see Remedies
Enfranchisement of long leases 1019–1020
Entailed interests 686
Environment themes 5–6
Equitable leases
assignee's liability
post-1995 law 864
pre-1996 law 862–863
defences 818–819
formalities 810–812

Equitable mortgages
acquisition of rights 1054–1056
equitable charges 1056–1057
equitable estates 1056
reform proposals 1057–1058
Equitable rights and interests see also Equitable leases; Equitable mortgages; Trusts of land acquisition of rights
formalities 157–158
contractual formalities 197–199
doctrine of anticipation
central issues 291
conclusions 301
constructive trusts 299–301
enforcement against third parties 298–299
freeholds sales 293–294
introduction 291–292
leases 292–293
nature of rights acquired 297–298 significance of specific performance 295–297
easements
registered land 962–963
unregistered land 963
equitable estates in land 148–149
evaluation of LRA 2002
accuracy of Register 493–510
Law Commission's aim 510–516
impact of LRA 2002
acquisition of rights 490
defences 493
e-conveyancing 492–493
overreaching
breach of trust 661–667
effect 640–641
human rights 671–674
interests capable of being overreached 643–651
occupying beneficiaries 656–661
possible future developments 670–671
protection of purchasers 665–667
scope 642–643
transactions with overreaching effect 651–656
priority rules for unregistered land 418–419
proprietary estoppel
central issues 303
essential requirements 311–332
extent of duties owed 338–349
introduction and overview 384–387
priority of rights 349–355
prospect of detriment 329–332
reliance on assurances 325–329 role of unconscionability 332–338
trusts acquisition of dependant rights 152–153 contents 149–152
key concepts 148–149
Equity
common law rules distinguished 55–58 relationship with common law equitable rights and interests 158–166
legal rights and interests 160–162
property 160–162
relationship with human rights 75–76
Equity release 1067–1068
Escrows 222–223
Estate contracts
effect of failure to register 431–432
land charge registration 429
Estate rentcharges 984–985
Estates in land see Legal estates
Estoppel see Proprietary estoppel
Eurohypothec 1068–1069
Exchange of contracts 199–200
Execution of deeds 221–222
Express rights
easements 926
Rochefoucauld v Boustead doctrine 374–375
trusts of land 359–360
Extinguishment of title see Limitations

F

Fair trial (Art 6)
civil rights and obligations 117
Convention text 116
fair hearings 118
scope 116–117
Fee simple estates see Freeholds
Financial services regulation
Mortgage Conduct of Business Sourcebook (MCOB) 1078–1080 ombudsman 1080–1081
regulated mortgage contracts 1075–1076
statutory framework 1075–1076
Finders' rights 48–57
Fixtures and fittings
chattels 40–48
meaning and scope 40–48
Flats
central issues 1015
commonholds
commonhold associations 1027–1028
community statement 1029–1031
creation 1025
dispute resolution 1034
legal structure 1024–1025
management 1031–1033
objectives 1023–1024
purity of title 1026–1027
conclusions 1034–1035
introduction 1016–1017
long leases changes of landlord 1018–1019
enforcement of covenants 1022
enfranchisement and extensions 1019–1020

Flats (cont.)
forfeiture 1023
maintenance and repair 1020–1022
variations 1022–1023
Forfeiture of leases
effects 876–877
flat owners 1023
introduction 873–875
peaceful re-entry 888
proposed reform 895–897 requirement for notice of breach 879–887 statutory relief derivative interests 893–894
rent 888–890
waiver 877–879
Forgery 239–240
Formalities
acquisition of direct rights over registered land 185–186
contractual promises
collateral contracts 203–206
effects of non-compliance 202–203
exchange of contracts 199–200
legal and equitable rights and interests 197–199
overview 195–197
proprietary estoppel 209–220
rectification 206–209
signatures 200–202
statutory provisions 197–199
creation and transfer of legal rights
deeds 220–224
registration of title 224–240
introduction 191–194
leases
basic requirements 805–806 registration of long leases 810
subleases 810
overview 191–194, 194–195
trusts of land 359–360
Franchises 229
Fraud
constructive trusts 371–372, 376–379 enforcement of pre-existing property rights
registered land 470–471
unregistered land 439–440
rectification of register 239–240
Freehold covenants acquisition and priority of restrictive covenants 985–986 annexation
express 988–990
once-for-all process 988
statutory provisions 990–997
assignment of benefits 987–988
the benefit—persons entitled to sue 986–987
building schemes 997–1004
the burden—persons entitled to sue benefit to dominant land 974–979
equitable rules of enforcement 972–973 requirement for negativity 979–981
central issues 968
extinction and modification
no injury to dominant owner 1010
obsolescence 1008
obstruction of reasonable user 1009–1010
statutory provisions 1008
indirect enforcement of positive covenants chain of indemnity covenants 984
estate rentcharges 984–985
mutual benefit and burden 982–984
introduction 968–969
reform proposals 1011–1013
remedies for breach
damages 1006–1007
defences 1007
general principles 1004–1005
injunctions 1005–1006
role 969–970
terminology 970–971
Freeholds
see also Freehold covenants
adverse possession 250–251
commonhold developments 1026–1027
doctrine of anticipation 293–294
legal estates
contents 134–136
prescriptive rights 960–961
registration of title
events giving rise to first registration 230
grades of title 230–231
registrable title 229–230

G
Good leasehold title 230–231

H
Home reversion plans 1067–1068
Home rights see Shared homes
Human rights
absolute and qualified rights distinguished 79 applications by creditors involving co-owners 626
central issues 59
fair trial (Art 6)
civil rights and obligations 117
Convention text 116
fair hearings 118
scope 116–117
freedom from discrimination (Art 14) Convention text 115
key issues 115–116
history and development of ECHR 60

horizontal effect
much-debated issue 74–75 relationship with common law and equity 75–76 State's positive duties 76–79
statutory interpretation 75 impact on proprietary rights 118–121 incorporation of ECHR duty of courts as public authorities 65–67 duty to take account of Strasbourg jurisprudence 61–63 statutory interpretation 63–65
justified interferences in accordance with the law 79–80 judicial deference 85–87 legitimate aims 80 margins of appreciation 80–83
proportionality 83–85
mortgage repossessions 1153–1155
mortgagee sales 1158–1159
overreaching 671–674
privacy (Art 8)
central focus 98–99
contractual licencees 732–733 implications of respect 101–102
justified interferences 102–115 meaning of 'home' 99–101
repossession 102
protection of local authority tenants 826 protection of property (ECHR Art 1)
adverse possession 277–281
interference with possessions 90–94
justified interferences 94–98
three distinct rules 88–90
public authorities
compliance with ECHR 65–67
defences 71–72
vertical effect 67–70
retrospective application 88

I Implied rights defence based on consent 406–409
easements
extinguishment 965–966 intended easements 931–935 necessity 928–931
overview 926–928
rule in Wheeldon v Burrows 935–938
statutory provisions 938–947
Imputed notice 428
Indefeasibility of registered title insurance principle 235–236
rectification of register 239–240
Injunctions
breach of freehold covenants 1005–1006 enforcement of direct rights acquired by contract 170
Insolvency
applications for sale involving co-owners
introduction 614–615
applications involving co-owners
applications by creditors 617–628
applications by trustees in bankruptcy 628–638
policy considerations 615–617
charging orders 1058–1061
severance of joint tenancies 582, 586
Inspection of land
investigation of title 418
overriding interests 461–463
Insurance principle general principles of registration of title 228
indefeasibility of registered title 235–236
Interest rates
excessive rates 1123–1126
fluctuating and index-linked rates 1121–1123
penalties 1126–1127
Investigation of title
pre-existing property rights 418 problems with names-based register 436
registered land 470
Islamic mortgages 1066–1067

J
Joint tenancies
advantages 594–595
central issues 568
introduction 568–569
requirement for four unities 571–574 severance
acts operating on a share 582–587
course of dealings 588–589 meaning and effect 574–576
mutual agreement 587–588
by notice 576–582
proposed reforms 590–592
unlawful killing 590
survivorship 574
tenancies in common distinguished 569–571
Judicial review 72–74

K
Knowing receipt 674–675

L Land
meaning and scope
conclusions 59
fixtures and fittings 40–48 physical reach 32–40 things found on or in land 48–57

Land (cont.)
special features limited availability 11–12 multiple simultaneous uses 9–10 permanence 8 social importance 10 uniqueness 9
Land charges claims to alternative property rights 440–441
easements 963
effect of registration or failure to register 431–432 exclusion of doctrine of notice 437–439 mechanics of registration 432–433
overview 428–429
problems with names-based register charges hidden behind root of title 436 errors 434–436
registrable interests 429–431
searches 433–436
Land law
impact of human rights 118–121
practical difficulties with occupiers and banks alternative approaches 14–15
comparisons of the alternative approaches 22–23 doctrinal model 15–19 essential dilemma 12–14
general lessons to be drawn 23–24 later developments and lessons 24–25 utility model 20–22
scope core topics 6 key themes 5–6
overview 4–6
underlying questions 7–8
Lands Tribunal
extinction and modification of covenants
no injury to dominant owner 1010
obsolescence 1008
obstruction of reasonable user 1009–1010
statutory provisions 1008
Lawful act conspiracy 179
Leasehold covenants see also Leases
central issues 847–848
flat owners 1022
introduction 848
privity of contract and estate
assignees—post-1995 863–866
assignees—pre-1996 858–863
continuing liability for breaches 866–867
continuing right to enforce breaches 867–869
original parties—post-1995 854–858
original parties—pre-1996 851–854
overview 849–851
subleases 869–871
remedies for breach damages 872 distress 873
forfeiture 873–897
overview 871–872
specific performance 872
terminology 849
Leases see also Leasehold covenants
acquisition of rights
equitable leases 810–812
legal leases 805–810
adverse possession 281–285
central issues
key features 749–750
statutory protection 823–824
contractual aspects 819–821
defences
equitable leases 818–819
legal leases 818
doctrine of anticipation 292–293
effects
overview 750
between parties 750–755
against the rest of the world 755–759 third parties acquiring freehold 759 exclusive possession
exceptions 802–804 general position 767–770
limited term 785–802
multiple occupancies 780–784
proprietary rights 784
shams and pretences 770–780
summary 804–805
flats changes of landlord 1018–1019
enforcement of covenants 1022
enfranchisement and extensions 1019–1020
forfeiture 1023
maintenance and repair 1020–1022
variations 1022–1023
intention to create legal relations 766–767 to grant lease 762–766 landlord tenant relationship 761–762
legal estates 136
practical importance of diversity 759–761
priority of rights and interests 468
registration of title
events giving rise to first registration 230
grades of title 230–231
registrable title 229–230
statutory protection
history and development 825–828
introduction 824
statutory provisions practical considerations 831–841
proposed reforms 841–845

termination
  effluxion of time 812–815
  exercise of powers before expiry of term 815–816
  surrenders 816–817
Legal estates
  see also Legal rights and interests acquisition formalities
    central issues 191
    introduction 191–194
    overview 194–195
  acquisition of rights 137–138
  doctrine of notice 421
  formal requirements for creation or transfer
    deeds 220–224
    registration of title 224–240
  impact of LRA 2002 488–490
  registrable titles 229–230
Legal rights and interests see also Legal estates
  acquisition formalities
    central issues 191
    introduction 191–194
    overview 194–195
  formal requirements for creation or transfer contracts 195–209
    deeds 220–224
    registration of title 224–240
  impact of LRA 2002
    acquisition of rights 488–490
    defences 493
    e-conveyancing 491–492 justifications for adverse possession 248–249 numerus clausus principle 141
  priority rules for unregistered land 418–419
Licences
  bare licences
    effect of revocation on licensee 700–703
    licensee's rights against strangers 703
    licensee's rights against third parties 703–705
    meaning 700
  central issues 697
  contractual licences
    effect of revocation on licensee 706–712
    licensee's rights against strangers 712–716
    licensee's rights against third parties 716–737
    meaning and scope 705–706
  coupled with an interest
    licensee's rights against grantor 745–747
    licensee's rights against strangers 747
    licensee's rights against third parties 747–748
    meaning 745 leases distinguished 750–755
  meaning and scope 698–700
  statutory licences
    licensee's rights against grantor 743
    licensee's rights against strangers 744
    licensee's rights against third parties 744–745 meaning 742–743
Liens 1046
Life estates nature 686–687
  rule against perpetuities 684–685
  types of trust 683–684
Limitations
  adverse possession key date 251–253
    no implied consent 253–256
    registered land 267, 271
    underlying principles 250–251
    unregistered land 266
  prescriptive rights 947–950
'Lock-out' agreements 197

M

Margins of appreciation 80–83
Matrimonial homes see Shared homes; Spousal rights Mirror principle 227–228, 445
Misrepresentation
  conceptual underpinnings 1093–1094
  meaning and scope 1091
Mistake problems with land charges register 434–436 rectification and indemnity of title register evaluation of LRA 2002 493–510
    general principles 236–238
Mortgagees
  collateral advantages equitable controls 1118–1121
    meaning and scope 1118
    restraint of trade 1121
  remedies
    central issues 1129
    introduction 1129–1130
    possession 1136–1155
    receivers 1171–1175
    sale 1155–1171
    sources of rights and remedies 1130–1132 statutory regulation 1132–1135
Mortgages
  charges distinguished 1052–1053
  collateral advantages equitable controls 1118–1121
    meaning and scope 1118
    restraint of trade 1121
  control of terms
    sources of control 1107–1108
    underlying principles 1107 defined 1046–1047
  equity of redemption
    history and development 1062–1063
    legal charges 1063–1064
  factors governing procedural fairness conceptual underpinnings 1093–1094
    duress 1089
    misrepresentation 1091

Mortgages (cont.)
non est factum 1088–1089
overview 1088
unconscionability 1091–1093
undue influence 1089–1091
history and development
legal charges by way of mortgage 1050–1053 mortgages over land 1049–1050
interest rates
excessive rates 1123–1126
fluctuating and index-linked rates 1121–1123
penalties 1126–1127
lender's remedies
central issues 1129
introduction 1129–1130
possession 1136–1155
receivers 1171–1175
sale 1155–1171
sources of rights and remedies 1130–1132
statutory regulation 1132–1135
modern forms
equity release and home reversion plans 1067–1068
Eurohypothec 1068–1069
Islamic mortgages 1066–1067
shared ownership 1067
mortgagor protection
central issues 1071
control of terms 1107–1127
introduction 1071–1073
market regulation 1073–1081 procedural fairness 1088–1106
overreaching 644
practical difficulties with occupiers and banks general lessons to be learnt 25–26
registration of title charges registers 234–235
events giving rise to first registration 230
regulated mortgage contracts 1076
role and importance 1040–1044
severance of joint tenancies 582–586
undue influence
notice to lender 1103–1104
proof 1098–1103
role in shared homes 1094–1106
steps the lender should take 1104–1106
Mortgagors
central issues 1071
introduction 1071–1073
market regulation
consumer credit 1082–1087
financial services regulation 1075–1081
history and development 1073–1075 restrictions on redemption options to purchase 1114–1115 postponement of right to redeem 1116–1118

N Necessary easements 928–931
Non est factum 1088–1089
Notice
doctrine of notice
actual notice 422
constructive notice 422–427
exclusion from land charges 437–439
imputed notice 428
forfeiture of leases 879–887
severance of joint tenancies service of notice 579–582
statutory provisions 576
written requirements 576–579
statutory control of mortgage repossession 1143
Notices on the register
equitable leases 818
nature and effect 453 persons entitled to apply 454–455 role 453
scope 454

O
'Occupation contracts' 842–845
Occupiers' rights
see also Licences; Possession beneficiaries
applications for sale 615
overlap with other statutory provisions 603–604
overreaching 656–661
trusts of land 599–604
overriding interests
actual occupation 458–461 assessing occupation 463–466
children 466–467
inspection of land 461–463
need for inquiries 467–468
proxy occupiers 466
statutory provisions 456–458
practical difficulties with occupiers and banks general lessons to be learnt 25–26
shared homes 559–560
Options
contractual formalities 198–199
protection of mortgagors 1114–1115
Oral promises 171–178
'Ouster' principle 921–925
Overreaching
breach of trust 661–667
co-ownership
central issues 639
introduction 640
effect 640–641

human rights 671–674
interests capable of being overreached 643–651
occupying beneficiaries 656–661
possible future developments 670–671
priority of rights and interests 405–406
protection of purchasers 665–667
rationale 668–670
scope 642–643
transactions with overreaching effect 651–656

Overriding interests
easements and profits 469–470, 962–963
evaluation of LRA 2002 508–510
leases 818
occupiers' rights
actual occupation 458–461
assessing occupation 463–466
children 466–467
inspection of land 461–463
need for inquiries 467–468
proxy occupiers 466
statutory provisions 456–458
rationale 455–456
short leases 468

P

Perpetuities rule 684–685
Personal rights acquisition of direct rights with prior knowledge 180–184
impact of LRA 2002 487–488
Personal rights distinguished real property rights 126–130
Pledges 1045
Positive freehold covenants chain of indemnity covenants 984
estate rentcharges 984–985
mutual benefit and burden 982–984
Possession
see also Adverse possession; Occupiers rights justified interferences under Art 8 repossession generally 102 social housing 103–115
leases
exceptions 802–804
general position 767–770
licences distinguished 750–755
limited term 785–802
multiple occupancies 780–784
proprietary rights 784
shams and pretences 770–780
summary 804–805
mortgagee's remedy
court powers 1141–1152 duty to account 1137–1138
express terms 1132
human rights 1153–1155
immediate right to possession 1136–1137
procedural safeguards 1139
rationale 1138–1139
security provisions 1130–1131
statutory provisions 1131–1132
protection of property (ECHR Art 1) controls over possession 92–94
defined 90–92
deprivations 92 peaceful enjoyment 94
unity required for joint tenancy 571
Possessory title 230–231
Pre-contract negotiations 318–325
Pre-existing property rights
see also equitable rights and interests; Legal interests
acquisition of direct right with prior knowledge of personal right 180–184
bona fide purchasers for value
'bona fide' 420–421
central issues 416
equitable basis 419–420
'of a legal estate' 421
'purchaser for value' 421
'without notice' 421–428
claims to alternative property rights 440–441
conclusions 186, 441
direct rights distinguished 167–168
fraud 439–440
introduction 417–418
investigation of title 418
land charges
central issues 416
effect of registration or failure to register 431–432
exclusion of doctrine of notice 437–439
mechanics of registration 432–433
overview 428–429
problems with names-based register 434–436
registrable interests 429–431
searches 433–436
licensee's rights against third parties
bare licencees 704–705
contractual licencees 724–737
estoppel licences 740–742
licences coupled with an interest 748
statutory licences 744–745
overview 167–168
priority 397–398
registered land
central issues 443
conclusions 476
e-conveyancing 491–493
easements and profits 469–470
effect of registered disposition 447–448

Pre-existing property rights (cont.)
fraud 470–471
general principle 444–446
'immediately before the disposition' 448–450
impact of LRA 2002 487–488
impact of Peffer v Rigg 471–474
importance 480–482
introduction 444
investigation of title 470
need to balance needs of prior users with direct rights 482–484
new statutory approach 474–476
notices on the register 453–455
overriding interests 455–468
owner's powers 446
restrictions on the register 450–452
short leases 468
specific aims of LRA 2002 485–486

Prescriptive rights
basis of prescription 950–954
history and development 947–950
reform proposals 961 user as of right 954–960
user in fee simple 960–961

Priority of rights and interests basic rule 393–394
central issues 391
co-ownership
see also Overreaching
central issues 639
introduction 640
where overreaching does not occur 676–679
conclusions 414
defences based on consent
express consent 406
implied consent 406–409
doctrine of anticipation 298–299
easements
registered land 962–963
unregistered land 963
exceptions to basic rule 398–400
introduction and overview 392–393
lapse of time
registered land 410
unregistered land 409–410
legal and equitable property rights distinguished 411–414
licensee's rights against third parties
bare licences 703–704
contractual licences 705–737
estoppel licences 740–742
licences coupled with an interest 748
statutory licences 744–745
overreaching 405–406
breach of trust 661–667
effect 640–641
human rights 671–674
interests capable of being overreached 643–651
occupying beneficiaries 656–661
possible future developments 670–671
protection of purchasers 665–667
rationale 668–670
scope 642–643
transactions with overreaching effect 651–656
period between completion and registration of title impact of e-conveyancing 243 vulnerability 232–233
proprietary estoppel
introduction 349–350
position after court order 350–351 position before court order 351–355
registered land
basic defence 400–401
central issues 443
conclusions 476
e-conveyancing 491–493
easements and profits 469–470
effect of registered disposition 447–448 exceptions to basic defence 401–405
fraud 470–471
general principle 444–446
'immediately before the disposition' 448–450
impact of LRA 2002 487–488
impact of Peffer v Rigg 471–474
importance 480–482
introduction 444
investigation of title 470
lapse of time 410
need to balance needs of prior users with direct rights 482–484
new statutory approach 474–476
notices on the register 453–455
overriding interests 455–468
owner's powers 446
restrictions on the register 450–452
short leases 468
specific aims of LRA 2002 485–486
restrictive covenants 985–986 timing questions
charges 394–397
independent acquired rights 397–398
unregistered land
alternative property rights 440–441
bona fide purchasers for value 419–428
central issues 416
conclusions 441
fraud 439–440
introduction 417–418
land charges 428–441
lapse of time 409–410
legal and equitable rights distinguished 418–419

Privacy (Art 8)
applications by creditors involving co-owners 626
central focus 98–99
contractual licencees 732–733 implications of respect 101–102
justified interferences 102–115
meaning of 'home' 99–101
mortgage repossessions 1153–1155
mortgagee sales 1158–1159
overreaching 671–674
protection of local authority tenants 826
repossession 102

Privity of contract and estate
freehold covenants
the benefit—persons entitled to sue 986–987
benefit to dominant land 974–979
building schemes 997–1004
the burden—persons entitled to sue 972–973
requirement for negativity 979–981
leasehold covenants
assignees—post-1995 863–866
assignees—pre-1996 858–863
continuing liability for breaches 866–867
continuing right to enforce breaches 867–869
original parties—post-1995 854–858
original parties—pre-1996 851–854
overview 849–851
subleases 869–871

Procuring a breach of contract
contractual licensee's rights against third parties 717–718
means of acquiring direct rights 178–179

Profits à prendre
overriding interests 469–470
registrable title 229

Property
effects of lease 755–759, 804–805
impact of human rights 118–121
protection of property (ECHR Art 1)
adverse possession 277–281
interference with possessions 90–94
justified interferences 94–98
three distinct rules 88–90
role of covenants 969–970

Property registers 234–235

Proportionality 83–85

Proprietary estoppel
central issues 303
essential requirements
assurances in relation to land 312–316 prospect of detriment 329–332
reliance on assurances 325–329
estoppel licences
licensee's rights against grantor 738–740
licensee's rights against strangers 738–740
licensee's rights against third parties 740–742
meaning 737–738
extent of duties owed 338–349
failure to comply with contractual formalities 209–220
interests capable of being overreached 648–651
introduction and overview 304–311
nature of duty
contractual explanations 384–387
pre-contract negotiations 318–325
priority of rights
introduction 349–350
position after court order 350–351
position before court order 351–355
role of unconscionability 332–338

Proprietorship registers 234–235

Protection of property (ECHR Art 1)
adverse possession 277–281
interference with possessions 90–94
justified interferences 94–98
three distinct rules 88–90

Public authorities
compliance with ECHR 65–67
defences 71–72
interface with judicial review 72–74
vertical effect 67–70

Public-sector housing repossession and justified interferences under Art 8 103–115 statutory controls 826

Puisne mortgages 418, 429, 441, 643

Purchase money resulting trusts
judicial exposition 362
presumption of advancement 363–367
rebuttal of presumption
general principles 364 illegal transfers 364–368
scope 367–368
shared homes
introduction 522–524
joint legal owners 542–544
sole legal owners 526–529

Q

Qualified title 230–231

R

Re-entry see Forfeiture of leases

Real property rights
impact of LRA 2002 487–488
personal rights distinguished 126–130

Receivers
agent of borrower 1172–1174 duties 1174–1175 express appointment 1132 functions and powers 1172
mortgage provisions 1132
statutory provisions 1131–1132
Rectification
failure to comply with contractual formalities 206–209 title register
evaluation of LRA 2002 493–510
indefeasibility in action 239–240 rectification and indemnity 236–238 Redemption of mortgages
history and development 1062–1063
legal charges 1063–1064
protection of mortgagors intervention of equity 1108–1109
options to purchase 1114–1115
postponement of right to redeem 1116–1118
Registered land
see also Registration of title
adverse possession
LRA 1925 267–270
LRA 2002 270–277
basis of overreaching 647–648
easements 962–963
formalities for acquisition of direct rights 185–186
licensee's rights against third parties
contractual licencees 731
estoppel licences 741–742
priority of rights and interests
basic defence 400–401
central issues 443
conclusions 476
e-conveyancing 491–493
easements and profits 469–470
effect of registered disposition 447–448
exceptions to basic defence 401–405
fraud 470–471
general principle 444–446
'immediately before the disposition' 448–450
impact of LRA 2002 487–488
impact of Peffer v Rigg 471–474
importance 480–482
introduction 444
investigation of title 470
lapse of time 410
need to balance needs of prior users with direct rights 482–484
new statutory approach 474–476
notices on the register 453–455
overriding interests 455–468
owner's powers 446
restrictions on the register 450–452
short leases 468
specific aims of LRA 2002 485–486
proprietary estoppel 352
protection of purchasers from trustees 666–667
Registration of title
see also Registered land
evaluation of LRA 2002
accuracy of Register 493–510
central issues 478
Law Commission's aim 510–516
events giving rise to first registration 230 general aims 479–480
general principles 227–228
grades of title 230–231
history and development 224–225
impact of e-conveyancing 242–244
impact of LRA 2002
acquisition of rights 488–490
defences 490–491
e-conveyancing 491–493
personal rights 487–488
summary 486–487
importance 480–482
indefeasibility 235–236
leases 810
legal charges by way of mortgage 1051 need to balance needs of prior users with direct rights 482–484
rationale 225–227
rectification of register
indefeasibility in action 239–240 indemnity and compensation 236–238 registers and title number 234–235
registrable titles 229–230
specific aims of LRA 2002 485–486 subsequent dealings 231–232 types of title 230–231 voluntary and compulsory applications 228–232 vulnerable period between completion and registration 232–233
Relativity of title 250–251
Relief from forfeiture
derivative interests 893–894
other covenants 890–893
rent 888–890
Remedies breach of freehold covenants
damages 1006–1007
defences 1007
general principles 1004–1005
injunctions 1005–1006
breach of leasehold covenants
damages 872 distress 873
forfeiture 873–897
overview 871–872
specific performance 872 defective mortgagee sales 1169–1171 direct rights acquired by contract 170

failure to comply with contractual formalities
  proprietary estoppel 209–220
  rectification 206–209
mortgagees
  central issues 1129
  introduction 1129–1130
  possession 1136–1155
  receivers 1171–1175
  sale 1155–1171
  sources of rights and remedies 1130–1132
  statutory regulation 1132–1135 rights acquired under doctrine of anticipation 298–299 specific performance
  breaches of contractual licence 710 enforcement of direct rights acquired by contract 170

Rent
assignee's liability 859
legal leases 807
not necessary for lease 759
relief from forfeiture 888–890

Rentcharges 229

Repairs
flat owners
  commonhold associations 1031
  long leases 1020–1022
forfeiture of leases 879–887, 890–893
status-conferring effects of lease practical considerations 831–841
  proposed reforms 841–845
  statutory provisions 827–831

Respect
see also Privacy (Art 8)

Restraint of trade
collateral advantages 1121
sources of control 1107–1108

Restrictions on the register 450–452

Restrictive covenants acquisition and priority 985–986
assignment of benefits 987–988
the benefit—persons entitled to sue 986–987
the burden—persons entitled to sue benefit to dominant land 974–979
  equitable rules of enforcement 972–973
  requirement for negativity 979–981
central issues 968
direct rights 181–184, 719 effect of adverse possession 267 effect on leases
  equitable leases 862–863
  subleases 870
land charges registration 430, 441 notices on the register 454
role 969–970
terminology 970–971

Resulting trusts
alternative approaches 360–362
purchase money resulting trusts
  judicial exposition 362
  presumption of advancement 363–367
  rebuttal of presumption 364–368
  scope 367–368
shared homes
  focus on context 524–526
  introduction 522–524
  joint legal owners 542–544
  rationalization through Stack v Dowden/Jones v Kernott 557–559
  sole legal owners 526–529

Rights in rem 126–130

S

Sale of land
applications involving co-owners
  applications by creditors 617–628
  applications by trustees in bankruptcy 628–638
  central issues 613
  introduction 614–615
  policy considerations 615–617
doctrine of anticipation 293–294
mortgagee's remedy
  court powers 1141–1152
  express terms 1132
  mechanics of sale 155–156
  mortgagee's duties 1159–1171
  security provisions 1130–1131
  statutory provisions 1131–1132
trustees
  basis of overreaching 646–647
  overreaching and breaches of trust 661–667
  transactions with overreaching effect 651–656

Searches
land charges 433–434
registered land 470

Securities
central issues 1039
charging orders 1058–1061
equitable mortgages
  acquisition of rights 1054–1056
  equitable charges 1056–1057
  equitable estates 1056
  reform proposals 1057–1058
equity of redemption
  history and development 1062–1063
  legal charges 1063–1064
general forms charges 1047–1049
  liens 1046
  mortgages 1046–1047
  pledges 1045
history and development
  legal charges by way of mortgage 1050–1053
  mortgages 1049–1050

Securities (cont.)
introduction 1039–1040
modern forms
equity release and home reversion plans 1067–1068
Eurohypothec 1068–1069
Islamic mortgages 1066–1067
shared ownership 1067
role and importance 1040–1044
Servient tenements essential characteristics 904
essential requirements
accommodation of dominant land 914–917 land separate from dominant tenement 904–913 separate ownership from dominant tenement 913 subject matter of grant 917–925
excessive user 963–965
prescriptive rights
basis of prescription 950–954
Severance of joint tenancies
acts operating on a share 582–587
course of dealings 588–589
meaning and effect 574–576
mutual agreement 587–588
by notice
service of notice 579–582
statutory provisions 576
written requirements 576–579
proposed reforms 590–592
unlawful killing 590
Shared homes
see also Co-ownership
central issues 521–522
critique of common intention 555–556
focus on context 524–526
introduction 522–524
joint legal owners 542–544
land charge registration 430 meaning of 'home' under Art 8 99–101
occupation rights 559–560
practical difficulties with occupiers and banks
general lessons to be learnt 25–26
quantification of beneficial interests 544–555
rationalization through Stack v Dowden 583–585 reform recommendations 560–566
sole legal owners
constructive trusts 529–542
overview 526
resulting trusts 526–529
undue influence
notice to lender 1103–1104
proof 1098–1103
role in shared homes 1094–1106
steps the lender should take 1104–1106
Shared ownership 1067
Signatures
contracts 200–202
deeds 221–222
leases 806
rectification of register 239–240
trusts of land 360
Specific performance
breach of leasehold covenants 872
breaches of contractual licence 710
doctrine of anticipation 295–297
enforcement of direct rights acquired by contract 170
Spousal rights
land charge registration 430
occupation of shared home 559–560, 603–604
practical difficulties with occupiers and banks general lessons to be learnt 25–26
statutory licences 744
Statutory interpretation
horizontal effect 75
vertical effect 63–65
Statutory licences
licensee's rights against grantor 743
licensee's rights against strangers 744
licensee's rights against third parties 744–745
meaning and scope 742–743
Subleases
formalities 810
legal charges by way of mortgage 1051
privity of contract and estate 869–871
relief from forfeiture 893–894
Successive interests
central issues 681
creation 688–690
entailed interests 686
historical significance 682–683
introduction 681–682
joint tenancies 574, 594–595
nature of life estates 686–687
regulation under TOLATA 1996 691–693
rule against perpetuities 684–685
types of trust 683–684
Surrender of leases 816–817

T

Tenancies in common
central issues 568
determination of status 571–574
introduction 568–569
joint tenants distinguished 569–571
Termination of leases
effluxion of time 812–815
exercise of powers before expiry of term 815–816
surrenders 816–817
Third party rights see Priority of interests
Time limits see Limitations

Title
see also Registration of title investigation
pre-existing property rights 418
problems with names-based register 436
registered land 470
mortgagee sales 1156–1157
Torts
contractual licensee's rights against third parties 717–718
means of acquiring direct rights 178–179
Tracing 675–676
Transfer of legal rights and interests
e-conveyancing
formal requirements 242
legal impact 242–244
objectives 240–242
formal requirements
contracts 195–209
deeds 220–224
e-conveyancing 242
registration of title 224–240 registration of dealings 231–232
Trustees
alternative causes of action against
breach of trust 674
knowing receipt and dishonest assistance 674–675
tracing 675–676
applications to court
child welfare 607
general principles 605–607
impact of TOLATA 1996 607–609
statutory provisions 603–604 obligation to consult beneficiaries 599 powers 597–599 powers of sale
basis of overreaching 646–647
overreaching and breaches of trust 661–667
transactions with overreaching effect 651–656
Trusts
adverse possession of registered land 267–268 successive interests
central issues 681
creation 688–690
entailed interests 686
historical significance 682–683
introduction 681–682
nature of life estates 686–687
regulation under TOLATA 1996 691–693
rule against perpetuities 684–685
types of trust 683–684
Trusts of land
applications for sale involving co-owners
applications by creditors 617–628
applications by trustees in bankruptcy 628–638
introduction 614–615
policy considerations 615–617
basis of overreaching 644
central issues 357
co-ownership
beneficiaries' rights 599–604
court resolution of disputes 604–609
overlap with other statutory provisions 603–604
scope of trust 597
statutory imposition of trust 595–597
trustees' powers 597–599
constructive trusts
contractual licensee's rights against third parties 719–724
doctrine of anticipation 299–301
institutional and remedial versions distinguished 369–371
judicial definitions 368–369
means of acquiring direct rights 171–178
Pallant v Morgan equity 379–385
proprietary estoppel compared 211–212
rationalization of common links 385–387
Rochefoucauld doctrine to prevent fraud 371–379 express trusts 359–360
Rochefoucauld v Boustead doctrine 374–375
introduction 358–359
occupiers' rights 559–560
protection of purchasers
registered land 666–667
summary 667
unregistered land 665–666
regulation of successive interests 691–693
resulting trusts
alternative approaches 360–362
purchase money resulting trusts 362–368

U

Unconscionability
constructive trusts
judicial definitions 368–369
Pallant v Morgan equity 382–384
Rochefoucauld v Boustead doctrine 376–379 knowing receipt and dishonest assistance 674–675
mortgages
meaning and scope 1091–1093
protection of mortgagors 1108–1109
proprietary estoppel 332–338

Undue influence
conceptual underpinnings 1093–1094
meaning and scope 1089–1091
protection of mortgagors
notice to lender 1103–1104
proof 1098–1103
role in shared homes 1094–1106
steps the lender should take 1104–1106
rectification of register 239–240

Unfair mortgage terms 1109–1114

Unjust enrichment 375–376

Unregistered land
adverse possession 266–267
easements 963
investigation of title 418
priority of rights and interests
alternative property rights 440–441
bona fide purchasers for value 419–428
central issues 416
conclusions 441
fraud 439–440
introduction 417–418
land charges 428–441
lapse of time 409–410
legal and equitable rights distinguished 418–419 protection of purchasers from trustees 665–666

W

Waiver of forfeiture 877–879